515. Elsam and the social justice agencies of the Protestant (PGI) and Catholic (KWI) churches established the Joint Committee for the Defence of the East Timorese (JCDET). Its function was to provide legal aid, support for the families of prisoners in Timor-Leste and bursaries to East Timorese students whose political activities had cost them their government scholarship. The Surabaya Legal Aid Institute represented José António Neves during his trial 1994-95 and argued that the trial was illegal because Timor-Leste had not exercised its right of self-determination.

516. In 1994 Ms Ade Sitompul had to leave Indonesia for six months to avoid arrest.

517. Dr George Aditjondro's experience further illustrates the cost of opposition to Indonesia's policies in Timor-Leste. In 1994, after an Australian newspaper published his reports on Timor-Leste, Aditjondro was branded a traitor by senior government figures and his home in Salatiga was stoned. He left Indonesia in 1995 for an extended period.*

* IAPC was established by the Australian Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA, now ACFID) to foster people-to-people links between Indonesia and Australia, and partly to offset the perception in Indonesia that Australian NGOs were too focused on Timor-Leste. Its contribution to the International NGO Forum on Indonesian Development (INFID) and other Indonesian organisations allowed it to raise Timor-Leste in a more positive environment. In 1992, its Secretary, Pat Walsh, was expelled from Indonesia and blacklisted for several years after being named in the Dili massacre trials.

518. Indonesian supporters of Timor-Leste not only had to face the military and a hostile state. Many in mainstream civil society, including Christians, Muslims and middle-class professionals, also disagreed with them and backed the official stance on Timor-Leste. Whatever their reasons, many Indonesians in these circles shared a common concern that Indonesia would disintegrate like Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union if Timor-Leste were permitted to opt out of the Republic. This view was also shared by some in the democracy movement who, while agreeing with the activist call for wide-ranging reform, urged Indonesian supporters of Timor-Leste and their East Timorese colleagues to abandon independence and work with them for the greater cause of democracy for all. These were powerful arguments. At no time, however, did East Timorese activists at any level threaten Indonesia's security or national integrity, or presume to interfere in Indonesia's internal affairs. They remained exclusively focused on their own legitimate struggle.

519. From the mid-1990s a cross-section of senior pro-democracy figures and organisations joined the younger generation in support of Timor-Leste. The International NGO Forum on Indonesian Development (INFID) – a coalition of more than 100 Indonesian and international NGOs – commented on "the emergence of more and more voices in the democratisation movement in Indonesia for a peaceful settlement of the conflict in East Timor".[259] Those speaking up included the former Tempo editor Goenawan Mohamad, the Catholic educationist Father Mangunwijaya, the trade union leader Mochtar Pakpahan, and the leading Islamic dissident Sri Bintang Pamungkas, each of whom supported self-determination.

520. Several establishment figures also challenged government policy, including the leaders of Indonesia's two largest Muslim organizations. In 1996, the head of Muhammadiyah, Amien Rais, stated publicly that Timor-Leste should be allowed to separate from Indonesia, if that was the wish of its people. He told the Australian press that he believed the Indonesian government had done its best, but "if the East Timorese still want a referendum and want to have a free country then I think it's better to say goodbye. If the result of the referendum is true then we can't stick to our position. Let them be free."[260] Abdurrahman Wahid, also known as Gus Dur, the leader of Nahdlatul Ulama (NU), Indonesia's largest Islamic organisation, made public references to the need to resolve the Timor-Leste problem. Privately, he was more explicit. With his support, INFID made regular references to Timor-Leste in its conference statements. Based on the premise that human rights and democratisation were essential for sustainable development, INFID challenged the military's security approach and called on the international community to suspend all forms of military assistance until the TNI had been subordinated to civilian control. It also called on the international community to

* Aditjondro's immediate reason for leaving was to escape a political trial for articles he wrote about Soeharto-linked businesses, but his views on Timor-Leste also complicated his relations with the regime (Herb Feith, Emma Baulch and Pat Walsh (Eds.), East Timor: An Indonesian Intellectual Speaks Out).

"support the establishment of an international tribunal to investigate allegations of war crimes committed by Indonesian military personnel in East Timor"[261] after the 1999 post-ballot violence.

521. Yeni Rosa Damayanti testified to the Commission about the euphoria that swept the ranks of Indonesian civil society following the fall of Soeharto in May 1998. Over the following months, Indonesian activists visited Timor-Leste freely and stepped up their public campaign. "We didn't speak about Timor-Leste in secret closed rooms anymore."[262] Nevertheless, much of the New Order remained intact and she and Nugroho Katjasungkana testified that Indonesian NGOs, based on their experience of repression at the hands of the security apparatus over many years, were very surprised that the United Nations entrusted security to the Indonesian military and police in 1999. In April 1999, for example, Indonesian support groups had to hide East Timorese in safe houses when Kopassus brought 150 pro-integration militia to Jakarta to hunt down those who were campaigning for self-determination.[263]

522. Despite their mistrust of TNI and also because of it, some 600 Indonesian civil society members came to Timor-Leste in August 1999 to observe the ballot. Co-ordinated by the Independent Committee for Direct Ballot Monitoring (Komite Independen Pemantau Suara, Kiper),* they formed the largest external observer group and rejected Indonesian claims that the UN had manipulated the vote. By their presence, they offered protection to East Timorese voters and helped facilitate the historic act of self-determination that they, as Indonesians, had contributed to against great odds. President Habibie was not the first in Indonesia to talk about a referendum for Timor-Leste, nor did he hear about it first from Australian Prime Minister John Howard. Indonesian civil society had advocated the idea for many years before 1999.

Conclusion

523. Ian Martin, the head of UNAMET tasked with overseeing the East Timorese people's exercise of their right of self-determination, has written that:

> The role of non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and of some remarkable individuals, who sustained concern for Timor-Leste when the diplomatic world was its most indifferent, is a story with important lessons…[264]

524. This view is widely shared. Much of the work of those in the solidarity movement was done in the face of hostility by their governments and others with power. Even in wealthy countries, most solidarity organisations and individuals struggled with limited funds and resources on what was considered by many to be a fringe issue. The bulk of the work was done by individuals who gave up their time and personal lives, in order to focus on the cause of Timor-Leste. It was a process of struggle, but also of sharing and learning, of reaching out to Timorese inside Timor-Leste and in the diaspora, and of building partnerships and friendships between different national and cross-national groups.

* Kiper was chaired by Bonar Tigor Naipospos. Board members included Dr Lukman Soetrisno, Abdurrahman Wahid, Dr Arief Budiman, Dr Saparinah Sadli and Dr George Aditjondro.

525. On 23 May 2002, three days after Timor-Leste's independence celebrations, a gathering was convened in Dili to honour international solidarity. Three of Timor-Leste's newly sworn-in leaders – President Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão, Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri and Senior Minister for Foreign Affairs and Co-operation, José Ramos-Horta – used the occasion to offer praise to all the individuals and groups who had supported East Timorese in their struggle. Several days earlier, at International People's Park on the Lecidere waterfront, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan, told a gathering convened by the United Nations Volunteer programme: "Without the work of UNVs, Timor-Leste could not have recovered from the destruction. Without the actions of international solidarity, Timor-Leste could not have achieved its independence." A plaque at the site bears the following words over the name of Dr José Ramos-Horta, Nobel Peace Laureate: "We shall never forget you our eternal friends."[265]

526. The Commission believes that the following lessons can be drawn from this experience:

- Civil society's contribution to the resolution of the Timor-Leste question was only possible because civil society existed and was permitted to function freely as an independent sector in many parts of the world or because, as in Indonesia and Timor-Leste itself, civil society asserted itself against repression. Timor-Leste's experience is that a robust civil society is critical to the proper functioning of individual societies and the international community.
- During 25 years of struggle, a strong partnership was forged between many of Timor-Leste's current leaders in all walks of life and international civil society that is rare in the history of nation-building. This partnership, which is now in a new phase, should be nurtured on both sides because it is an important long-term asset for Timor-Leste.
- Civil society should take from its Timor-Leste experience that, while it has to be strategic, it is most effective when it (a) sticks to principle, (b) is politically disinterested, (c) is non-violent, (d) is open to everybody's contribution and (e) independent but ready to co-operate with government and business when possible.

Findings

The international community

527. The Commission finds that:

1. Recognition by the United Nations that Timor-Leste was a non-self-governing territory with the right of self-determination was fundamental to Timor-Leste's fate as a small and vulnerable people. This gave the issue an international legal basis which became the principal asset of the people of Timor-Leste in their unequal struggle for independence.

2. The respect of member states for the international legal system and the role of the United Nations is essential to good international relations and the upholding of peace and justice, particularly for minorities. The people of Timor-Leste know from experience that the failure of member states to respect international principles has the most bitter of consequences, but also that the proper functioning of the United Nations works to the benefit of all.
3. Most members of the United Nations failed to support Timor-Leste in the General Assembly from 1976 to 1982 by either voting against resolutions on Timor-Leste or abstaining. Until it was delegated to the Secretary-General in 1982, the question of Timor-Leste was kept alive at the United Nations by about only one-third of the world community. Most of these countries were Third World or socialist states. Only four Western nations supported Timor-Leste at the United Nations throughout this period: Cyprus, Greece, Iceland and Portugal.
4. Most Western countries failed to strike the right balance between support for the principle of self-determination and their strategic and economic interests in relation to Indonesia. In 1975 they gave over-riding weight to the latter and paid only obeisance to self-determination.
5. Civil society played a critical role by upholding international principles in many countries, including Portugal and Indonesia. Civil society promoted the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination, provided moral, political and financial assistance to the Timorese struggle, and challenged the indifference or hostility of governments towards Timor-Leste. Respect for civil and political rights and the functioning of a robust civil society are critical to the proper functioning of individual societies and the international system.
6. Timor-Leste benefited from the work of key UN officials and bodies including secretary-generals and the special or personal representatives they appointed, staff in the secretariat responsible for the issue, the Special Committee on Decolonisation, Special Rapporteurs on Human Rights, and the Sub-committee on the Protection of Minorities.
7. The Security Council recognised the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination in 1975 and 1976, but failed to effectively uphold this right until 1999. It did not intervene to halt the Indonesian invasion although at least two of its members knew of Indonesia's intentions; it expressed concern at the loss of life and the need to avoid further bloodshed, but did not provide for emergency humanitarian assistance; it did not sanction Indonesia for non-compliance with its wishes; it did not follow-up Resolution 389 and it shelved the question until 1999. This failure to uphold Timor-Leste's right to self-determination was the responsibility of the Permanent Members of the Security Council each of whom, with the exception of China, was dismissive of the Timor question and chose to shield Indonesia from international reaction at Timor's expense.
8. The United States acknowledged that the people of Timor-Leste had the right of self-determination but did not support any General Assembly resolutions on the issue between 1975 and 1982 or provide any assistance to the Timorese struggle for self-determination until 1998. As a Permanent Member of the Security Council and superpower, the United States had the power and influence to prevent Indonesia's military intervention but declined to do so. It consented to the invasion and allowed Indonesia to use its military equipment in the knowledge that this violated US law and would be used to suppress the right of self-determination. It continued to provide military, economic and political support to Indonesia despite Security Council resolutions calling for Indonesia to withdraw and to allow the free exercise of self-determination.

9. France and the United Kingdom both acknowledged the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination but, although Permanent Members of the Security Council, chose to stay silent on the issue. Both nations abstained from supporting all General Assembly resolutions between 1975 and 1982 and failed to promote the right or to provide assistance to the struggle of the East Timorese until 1998. Both countries increased their aid, trade and military co-operation with Indonesia during the occupation. Some French and British military equipment was used by the Indonesian forces in Timor-Leste.
10. China and the Soviet Union supported Security Council resolutions and General Assembly resolutions on the issue between 1975 and 1982 (with the exception of 1979 for China). Indonesia falsely claimed that both countries were allied to Fretilin and had a strategic interest in Timor-Leste and used this to justify military intervention. In reality, both countries gave over-riding priority to Indonesia and took only marginal interest in Timor's fate apart from some early backing by China.
11. Japan supported the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination and did not recognise the Indonesian takeover or provide military assistance to Indonesia. However, it voted in support of only one Security Council resolution and against all General Assembly resolutions between 1975 and 1982. Japan was Indonesia's major investor and aid donor and had more capacity than other Asian nations to influence policymaking in Jakarta, but it did not use this leverage on behalf of Timor-Leste.
12. The Vatican supported the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination and, consistent with this policy, did not integrate the local Catholic Church into the Indonesian Church despite pressure from Indonesia to do so. Pope John Paul II was the only world leader to visit the territory during the occupation. Leaders of the Catholic Church in Timor-Leste regularly requested the Vatican to support their appeals for self-determination, but the Vatican, concerned to protect the Catholic Church in Muslim Indonesia, maintained public silence on the matter and discouraged others in the Church from promoting the issue.

The key stakeholders

528. The Commission finds that:

1. The diplomacy of the East Timorese resistance was the most important factor in achieving self-determination. The Resistance maintained its commitment in the face of extraordinary challenges including significant disunity, resource constraints, isolation and overwhelming odds, both inside and outside Timor-Leste. The diplomacy of the resistance was ultimately successful because it focused on internationally agreed principles, eschewed ideology and violence, was open to the contribution of all Timorese, and made maximum use of the international system, media and civil society networks. As a human rights and moral (rather than ideological) issue, the question of Timor-Leste gained international legitimacy and support at the expense of Indonesia whose case rested on force and had no basis in international law or morality.

2. The Republic of Indonesia under President Soeharto violated the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination. The responsibility for this violation rests primarily with President Soeharto, but is shared by the Indonesian armed forces, intelligence agencies and the Centre for Strategic and International Studies which were principally responsible for its planning and implementation.
3. President Soeharto and his advisers decided to incorporate Portuguese Timor in 1974 and used a variety of means to achieve this objective. These included propaganda, intimidation, subversion, interference in Portuguese Timor's internal affairs, and ultimately force and military occupation.
4. The Popular Representative Assembly held in Dili on 31 May 1976 did not meet international requirements for a genuine act of self-determination. The Assembly was not representative and did not constitute an informed and democratic process. Timor was in the grip of military occupation and armed conflict and had not attained an advanced stage of self-government with free political institutions that would have given its people the capacity to make a real choice. The process offered only one choice and was rejected by the United Nations.
5. The Indonesian military forcibly suppressed advocacy of self-determination within Timor-Leste and Indonesian government agencies sought to neutralise Timorese, Indonesian and international civil society advocates of self-determination.
6. The Indonesian people bear no responsibility for these violations. Indonesian civil society showed rare courage by actively supporting the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination.
7. Following the change of Indonesian policy by President Habibie, a genuine act of self-determination was held in Timor-Leste in 1999 despite violent attempts by the Indonesian military to subvert it.
8. The Republic of Portugal under the Salazar-Caetano regimes violated the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination by not recognising the non-self-governing status of the territory and by not preparing the Timorese people for self-government in accordance with United Nations requirements. These failures undermined the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination by contributing to the belief that an independent Timor-Leste was not economically or politically viable and could only subsist through incorporation into Indonesia.

9. The decision by Portugal in 1974 to recognise the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination was historic and changed Timor's destiny. However, Portugal failed to discharge its responsibilities adequately during this critical time and left Timor-Leste relatively defenceless both on the ground and internationally in the face of Indonesian plans to incorporate the territory.
10 As the administering power, Portugal adhered to the principle of self-determination throughout the Indonesian occupation and provided financial and political assistance to the people of Timor-Leste in their struggle for self-determination. However, Portuguese diplomacy did not match that of Indonesia and it did not promote self-determination strongly or consistently for much of the occupation.
11. Portuguese civil society actively supported the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination particularly through advocacy at home and abroad and the sustained dissemination of information.
12. Australia was well-placed to influence policymaking on the issue because the people of Timor-Leste, President Soeharto and the international community regarded its views on the question as important. Australia cautioned against force in 1975 but led Indonesia to believe it would not oppose incorporation. It did not use its international influence to try to block the invasion and spare Timor-Leste its predictable humanitarian consequences. Australia acknowledged the right of self-determination, but undermined it in practice by accommodating Indonesia's designs on the territory, opposing independence and Fretilin, and giving de jure recognition to Indonesia's takeover. Australia supported only one General Assembly resolution on the question between 1975 and 1982, provided economic and military assistance to Indonesia and worked hard to win over Australian public opinion and the international community to support for Indonesia's position.
13. The United Nations and its member states strongly supported the act of self-determination conducted in 1999.

Table A: UN General Assembly Resolutions on Timor-Leste: How countries voted, 1975–1982

Country	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982
Afghanistan	A	A	A	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Albania	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Algeria	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Angola	-	-	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Antigua and Barbuda	-	-	-	-	-	-	NP	N
Argentina	A	A	A	A	A	N	N	N
Australia	Y	A	A	N	N	N	N	N
Austria	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Bahamas	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A

Country	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982
Bahrain	Y	A	A	A	A	A	N	N
Bangladesh	Y	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Barbados	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Belgium	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Belize	-	-	-	-	-	-	Y	Y
Benin	N	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Bhutan	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Bolivia	Y	A	A	A	A	N	N	A
Botswana	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A
Brazil	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Bulgaria	Y	Y	Y	Y	NP	NP	NP	NP
Burma	NP	NP	A	A	A	A	A	A
Burundi	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Byelorussian SSR	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Cambodia (Democratic Kampuchea)	NP	Y	NP	A	NP	N	N	N
Canada	A	A	A	A	Y	N	N	N
Cap Verde	NP	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Central African Republic	NP	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A
Chad	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	N
Chile	A	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
China	Y	Y	Y	Y	N	Y	Y	Y
Colombia	A	Y	A	A	N	N	N	A
Comoros	NP	NP	Y	NP	NP	NP	N	NP
Congo	NP	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Costa Rica	A	A	A	NP	Y	A	NP	A
Cuba	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Cyprus	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Czechoslovakia	Y	Y	Y	Y	A	A	A	A
Democratic Yemen	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Denmark	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Djbouti	-	-	A	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP
Dominica	-	-	-	-	NP	NP	NP	A
Dominican Republic	NP	A	A	A	A	A	N	A
Ecuador	Y	Y	Y	A	NP	A	Y	NP
Egypt	A	A	N	N	N	N	N	N
El Salvador	Y	A	A	A	A	N	N	N
Equatorial Guinea	Y	Y	Y	NP	Y	Y	A	NP
Ethiopia	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Fiji	Y	A	A	A	A	A	A	N
Finland	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
France	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Gabon	Y	Y	Y	A	A	A	A	A

Country	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982
Gambia	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	NP	N	N
German Democratic Republic	Y	Y	Y	Y	NP	NP	NP	NP
Germany, Federal Republic	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Ghana	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A	Y
Greece	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Grenada	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Guatemala	A	A	A	A	A	NP	N	N
Guinea	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A
Guinea-Bissau	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Guyana	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Haiti	Y	A	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A
Honduras	NP	A	A	A	N	N	N	N
Hungary	Y	Y	Y	Y	A	A	A	A
Iceland	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
India	N	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Indonesia	N	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Iran	N	N	N	N	Y	Y	Y	NP
Iraq	A	A	N	N	N	N	N	N
Ireland	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	Y
Israel	A	A	NP	A	A	A	A	A
Italy	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Ivory Coast	Y	Y	A	A	A	A	A	A
Jamaica	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A	A
Japan	N	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Jordan	A	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Kenya	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Kuwait	Y	A	A	A	A	NP	N	N
Laos (People Democratic Republic)	Y	Y	Y	A	Y	Y	NP	Y
Lebanon	NP	A	A	A	A	NP	NP	A
Lesotho	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A	Y	Y
Liberia	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A	N
Libyan Arab Republic	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP
Luxembourg	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Madagascar	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Malawi	Y	Y	A	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Malaysia	N	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Maldives	NP	A	N	N	N	N	N	N
Mali	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Malta	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP
Mauritania	A	N	N	N	A	A	A	A
Mauritius	A	Y	NP	Y	NP	A	NP	Y
Mexico	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	NP	Y	Y

Country	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982
Mongolia	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	NP	NP
Morocco	A	N	N	N	A	A	A	N
Mozambique	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Nepal	Y	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Netherlands	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
New Zealand	A	A	A	A	N	N	N	N
Nicaragua	A	N	N	N	Y	Y	Y	Y
Niger	Y	NP	Y	Y	Y	Y	NP	A
Nigeria	Y	NP	Y	A	A	A	A	A
Norway	A	Y	A	A	A	A	A	A
Oman	A	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Pakistan	Y	A	A	A	A	A	A	N
Panama	A	Y	Y	A	A	A	A	A
Papua New Guinea	NP	A	A	N	N	N	N	N
Paraguay	A	A	A	N	N	NP	N	N
Peru	Y	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Philippines	N	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Poland	Y	Y	Y	NP	NP	A	A	A
Portugal	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Qatar	N	A	A	N	N	N	N	N
Romania	Y	Y	Y	NP	A	A	A	A
Rwanda	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
St Christopher and Nevis	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
St. Lucia	-	-	-	-	Y	Y	Y	N
St Vincent and the Grenadines	-	-	-	-	-	NP	N	NP
Samoa	-	-	A	A	A	A	A	A
Sao Tome and Principe	NP	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Saudi Arabia	A	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Senegal	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A	A
Seychelles	-	NP	NP	A	Y	Y	Y	Y
Sierra Leone	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Singapore	A	A	N	N	N	N	N	N
Solomon Islands	-	-	-	NP	NP	NP	A	N
Somalia	NP	Y	NP	NP	NP	N	A	A
South Africa	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP	NP
Spain	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Sri Lanka	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Sudan	A	A	A	A	N	N	N	N
Surinam	NP	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Swaziland	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Sweden	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A	A	A
Syrian Arab Republic	A	A	N	N	N	N	N	N
Thailand	N	N	N	N	N	N	N	N

Country	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982
Togo	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Trinidad and Tobago	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Tunisia	NP	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Turkey	A	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Uganda	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Ukrain SSR	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
USSR	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
United Arab Emirates	Y	A	A	A	A	A	NP	NP
United Kingdom	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
United Republic of Cameron	Y	Y	Y	Y	A	A	A	A
United Republic of Tanzania	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
United States	A	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Upper Volta	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	A
Uruguay	A	N	N	N	N	N	N	N
Vanuatu	-	-	-	-	-	-	Y	Y
Venezuela	Y	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Vietnam	-	-	Y	NP	Y	Y	Y	Y
Yemen	NP	A	NP	NP	N	N	NP	N
Yugoslavia	A	A	A	A	A	A	A	A
Zaire	A	A	N	N	N	A	A	A
Zambia	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y	Y
Zimbabwe	-	-	-	-	-	Y	Y	Y
Total	72:10:43:19	68:20:49:9	67:26:47:9	59:31:44:16	62:31:45:14	58:35:46:15	54:42:46:15	50:46 50:11
Proportion of vote for	50%	46.6%	44.9%	39.3%	40.8%	37.7%	34.4%	31.8%

Y = Vote for; N = Vote Against;
A = Abstain;
\- = not a member of UN at time of voting;
NP = Not Present (Absent at time of voting)
Total = Y:N:A:NP UN voting on Timor 1975-82

Endnotes

1. See most recently Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, (2004) International Court of Justice [henceforth ICJ], para 155.
2. These include Security Council [henceforth: SC] Resolution 384, 22 December 1975; SC Resolution 389, 22 April 1976; General Assembly [henceforth: GA] Resolution 3485 (XXX), 12 December 1975; GA Resolution 31/53, 1 December 1976; GA Resolution 32/34, 28 November 1977; GA Resolution 33/39, 13 December 1978; GA Resolution 34/40, 21 November 1979; GA Resolution 35/27, 11 November 1980; GA Resolution 36/50, 24 November 1981; GA Resolution 37/30, 23 November 1982.
3. Common article 1(2) of the ICCPR and ICESCR, GA Resolution 1514 (XV), 14 December 1960, para 2.
4. Article 3, Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and People, GA Resolution 1514 (XV), 14 December 1960.

5. Art 1(3) ICCPR and Art 1(3) ICESCR.
6. Human Rights Committee General Comment 12, para 6.
7. Ibid.
8. Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among states in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, GA Resolution 2625 (XXV), 24 October 1970.
9. Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South-West Africa) Notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970) (1971) International Court of Justice Reports 16 at para 119; Separate opinion of Judge Weeramantry in the Case Concerning East Timor (Portugal v Australia) (1995) International Court of Justice Reports 90, esp at 204; art 41(2), International Law Commission Draft Articles on the Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, International Law Commission, Commentaries on the Draft Articles on the Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, at pp. 287-91, esp p. 290.
10. Security Council Resolution 384, 22 December 1975, para 1; and Security Council Resolution 389, 22 April 1976, para 1.
11. Art 25 UN Charter.
12. Security Council Resolution 384, 22 December 1975, para 2; and Security Council Resolution 389, 22 April 1976, para 2.
13. Security Council Resolution 384, 22 December 1975, para 3.
14. Document 391, Jakarta, 23 December 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), Australia and the Indonesian Incorporation of Portuguese Timor 1974–1976, Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade Documents on Australian Foreign Policy, Melbourne University Press, Victoria, 2000, [henceforth Wendy Way, (Ed.), DFAT], p. 650.
15. Document 154, Jakarta, 10 July 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 291.
16. GA Resolution 1542 (XV), 15 December 1960. Krieger (Ed.), East Timor and the International Community Basic Documents, Grotius, Cambridge University Press, 1997, pp. 29-30.
17. Correspondence between Dr Salazar and the Australian Prime Minister, R G Menzies, 1961-64, Australian Senate Inquiry into East Timor, 1999–2000, Submission 5, pp. 31-47.
18. Secret cable, 5 February 1963, released by Australian Government in 2002.
19. José Ramos-Horta, Funu: The Unfinished Saga of East Timor, Red Sea Press, Trenton, New Jersey, 1978, p. 14.
20. Secretariat to the Special Committee on Decolonisation, Working Paper on Timor, 20 November 1975. Krieger, pp. 18-26.
21. Document 406, Jakarta, 24 January 1976, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 674. Similar views were expressed by the New Zealand Ambassador, Roger Peren, in 1978, in New Zealand Government East Timor Official Information Act (OIA) Material [henceforth New Zealand…OIA Material], Vol. 1, 13 January 1978.
22. UN Department of Political Affairs, Report on Decolonisation, No. 7, August 1976, p. 43.
23. GA Resolution 3294 (XXIX), 13 December 1974, para 2.
24. Mario Lemos Pires, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
25. Letter from the Permanent Mission of Portugal to the UN to the Secretary-General, 28 November 1975. Krieger, p. 39.
26. Communique of the Council of Ministers. Quoted in UN Department of Political Affairs, Report on Decolonisation, p. 45.
27. Secret Contacts Between Portugal, Indonesia and the PGET: June–July 1976, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, pp. 782-83.
28. Case Concerning East Timor (Portugal v Australia) (1995), ICJ Report 90.
29. Mario Lemos Pires, testimony, ibid.
30. CAVR interview with Adelino Gomes, Dili, 11 June 2003.
31. Krieger, pp. 39-40.
32. David Scott, testimony given to CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004, p. 2.
33. Australian Senate Report*, East Timor*, December 2000, p. 138.
34. Letter to J L Jones, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, 11 June 1976, in UK unclassified documents (Dowson File 7.25).
35. Statement, 6 September 1983, Torben Retboll (Ed.) East Timor: The Struggle Continues, International Working Group for Indigenous Affairs, Copenhagen, 1984, p. 197.
36. Document 888, 4 March 1993, The National Security Archive at George Washington University [henceforth NSA].

37. Jamsheed Marker, East Timor: A Memoir of the Negotiations for Independence, McFarland & Company, Inc., London, 2003, p. 73.
38. SC Resolution 1272, 25 October 1999.
39. GA Resolution 56/282, 8 May 2002.
40. Official Records of the GA, quoted in Decolonisation, UN Department of Political Affairs, No. 7, August 1976, p. 41.
41. Quoted Donald Weatherbee, "Portuguese Timor: an Indonesian Dilemma", Asian Survey 6 (12), Dec. 1966), p. 689.
42. Weatherbee, p. 690.
43. Official Records of the General Assembly, quoted in Decolonisation, UN Department of Political Affairs, p. 47.
44. Official Records of the General Assembly, quoted in Decolonisation, UN Department of Political Affairs, pp. 14, 48.
45. Document 95, Jakarta, 24 February 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 198.
46. Richard Woolcott, The Hot Seat: Reflections on Diplomacy from Stalin's Death to the Bali Bombings, HarperCollins Publishers, Sydney, 2003, p. 306.
47. Document 217, Jakarta, 6 September 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, pp. 391-92.
48. Krieger, p. 63.
49. GA Resolution 3485 (XXX), 12 December 1975 and SC Resolution 384 (1975), 22 December 1975, in Krieger, p. 123, 53.
50. Winspeare Guicciardi's report to the Secretary-General, 29 February 1976. Krieger, p. 92.
51. Krieger, pp. 47-49.
52. Krieger, p. 124.
53. US Congress Hearing on Human Rights in East Timor, Committee on International Relations, 19 July 1977, p. 47
54. 1 June 1976, in NZ…OIA Material, Vo. I.
55. José Ramos-Horta, letter to the Secretary-General, 8 July 1976, UN Doc. S/12133.
56. Francesc Vendrell, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
57. Ibid.
58. Krieger, p. 275.
59. Woolcott, p. 164.
60. UN Press Release, 3 September 1999.
61. "Cabinet Minute", Canberra, 5 February 1963, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 26.
62. Document 375, Jakarta, 13 December 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 627.
63. "Cabinet Minute", Canberra, 21 February 1963, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 26, n. 1.
64. Ibid, pp. 26-27.
65. "Dispatch from Furlonger", Jakarta, 19 January 1973, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 43.
66. "Submission to McMahon", Canberra, 1 December 1970, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 42.
67. "Submission to Whitlam", Canberra, [30 May] 1973, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 45.
68. Australian Senate Report, East Timor, December 2000, p. 141.
69. Document 263, Canberra, 16 October 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 470.
70. Document 26, Yogyakarta, 6 September 1974, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, pp, 95-96.
71. Document 45, Lisbon, 14 October 1974, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 119.
72. Document 24, Canberra, 2 September 1974, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, pp. 91-92.
73. Document 123, Townsville, 4 April 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 246.
74. Document 169, Jakarta, 17 August 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, pp. 313-314.
75. Document 191, Canberra, 27 August 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 347.
76. Document 265, Jakarta, 16 October 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 473.
77. Document 310, Jakarta, 29 October 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 533.
78. Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade, East Timor in Transition 1998–2000: An Australian Policy Challenge [henceforth East Timor in Transition, DFAT], Canberra, 2001, p. 13.
79. Australian Senate Report*, East Timor*, p. 167.
80. Ibid, pp. 174-75.
81. For text of the survey report, see East Timor in Transition, DFAT, Canberra 2001, pp. 177-79.
82. Australian Senate Report*, East Timor*, p. 142.
83. SC Resolution 384 (1975), 22 December 1975, in Krieger, pp. 53-54.
84. Ibid.
85. Report by the Special Representative of the Secretary General, 29 February 1976, in Krieger, pp. 87-93.

86. SC Resolution 389 (1976), 22 April 1976, Krieger, p. 93.
87. Francesc Vendrell, testimony given to CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, Dili, 15–17 March 2004.
88. Ibid.
89. Ibid.
90. Ibid.
91. Jamsheed Marker, p. 204.
92. The text of the Agreements can be found in Ian Martin, Self-determination in East Timor: The United Nations, the Ballot, and International Intervention, Lynne Rienner Publishers, London, 2001, pp. 141-48.
93. SC Resolution 1236 (1999).
94. Mark Riley, "How the UN plans to abandon a people", Sydney Morning Herald, 7 August 1999.
95. Ian Martin, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
96. Ibid.
97. SC Resolution 1264 (1999).
98. Document 55, Jakarta, 29 October 1974, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 130.
99. Document 98, Canberra, 28 February 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 201.
100. 16 December 1975. Krieger, p. 69.
101. Ramos-Horta, Funu, p. 156.
102. UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 7.2.
103. Document 478, Jakarta, 3 July 1976, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 807.
104. Krieger, p. 85.
105. Krieger, p. 117.
106. GA Resolution 3485 (XXX), 12 December 1975.
107. Krieger, p. 152.
108. Convention relating to double taxation and fiscal evasion, signed by France and Indonesia on 14 September 1979. Krieger, p. 292.
109. Ramos-Horta, Funu, p. 142.
110. Gabriel Defert, Timor Est, le génocide oublié: Droit d'un peuple et raisons d'Etat, L'Harmattan, Paris, 1992, p. 246.
111. Ibid.
112. Ramos-Horta, Funu, p. 142.
113. New Zealand…OIA Material, Vol. 1.
114. Document 58, Canberra, 14 November 1974, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 133.
115. Woolcott, p. 149.
116. Security Council debates 18 December 1975 and 22 April 1976. Krieger, pp. 81, 117.
117. Ramos-Horta, Funu, p. 109.
118. Cable to London, 10 February 1976, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 7.4.
119. Defert, pp. 241-43; Ramos-Horta, Funu, p. 155.
120. UN Monthly Chronicle, Vol. 1 (4), August–September 1964, p. 32.
121. Document 157, Jakarta, 21 July 1975, in Wendy May (ed.), DFAT, p. 295.
122. Secret cable, 24 October 1975, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 6.
123. Ibid.
124. Australian Senate Report, East Timor, December 2000, p. 137.
125. Secret Cable, 24 October 1975, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 6.
126. Document 249, London, 2 October 1975, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 443.
127. See Richard Mann, 400 Years and More of The British in Indonesia, Gateway Books, United Kingdom, 2004.
128. J A Ford, 10 February 1976, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 7.4.
129. A K Goldsmith, South East Asian Department FCO, 4 February 1976, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 7.5.
130. J A Ford, 2 January 1976, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 7.2.
131. Krieger, p. 118.
132. A M Simons, 20 May 1976, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 7.15.
133. 11 June 1976, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 7.26.
134. Krieger, p. 164.
135. Baroness Trumpington, House of Lords, 16 July 1992. Krieger, p. 301.
136. Krieger, p. 302.

137. Tapol and Campaign Against the Arms Trade (CAAT) Factsheet, June 2004.
138. United Kingdom – House of Lords, Official Report, Parliamentary Debates, Unstarred Question-Indonesia: Aid and Human Rights, 16 July 1992, in Krieger, p. 302.
139. 24 May 1976, in UK unclassified documents, Dowson File 7.16.
140. Advice to Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, Averell Harriman, 5 February 1963, NSA Document 2.
141. Ibid.
142. Gary Gray, testimony given to CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004. Gary Gray testified in a personal capacity.
143. Secretary of State, 25 September 1974, NSA Document 15.
144. US Embassy Canberra, 20 February 1975, NSA Document 24.
145. National Security Council, 4 March 1975, NSA Document 40.
146. The Secretary's Staff Meeting, 8 October 1975, NSA Document 90.
147. Appeal to US President, 5 December 1975, NSA Document 174.
148. White House Memo of conversation, 10 December 1975, NSA Document 163.
149. Krieger, p. 119.
150. Krieger, p. 239.
151. National Security Council report to Brent Scowcroft, 12 December 1975, NSA Document 165.
152. CAVR Interview with José Ramos-Horta, Dili, 26 May 2004.
153. Human rights in East Timor and the Question of the Use of US Equipment by the Indonesian Armed Force: Hearings before the Sub-Committee on Asian and Pacific Affairs and Sub-Committee on International Organisations, 10, 17, 22 and 23 March 1977, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, 1977.
154. National Security Council, 29 June 1976, NSA Document 312.
155. Letter to Senator Humphrey, 15 October 1976, NSA Document 355.
156. Statement to Hearing before the US Senate Committee on Foreign Relations by Kenneth M Quinn, Acting Assistant Secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, 6 March 1992. Krieger, p.318.
157. Memorandum to President Carter, 14 June 1977, NSA Document 398.
158. Gary Gray, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
159. Arnold Kohen, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
160. 31 January 1992, NSA Document 872.
161. CHR Vole on East Timor, 4 March 1993, NSA Document 885.
162. US Embassy Jakarta to Secretary of State, 5 March 1993, NSA Document 885.
163. US Department of State Press Release, 4 September 1999.
164. GA Resolutions 1514 (XV) and 1541 (XV). See UN Yearbook 1960, pp. 49, 509.
165. Shizuo Saito, New Trends at the United Nations: Reactions to the Structural Changes in the International Order, Shinyudo, Tokyo, 1979, p. 19.
166. Ramos-Horta, Funu, p. 122.
167. Krieger, p. 109.
168. 10 January 1976, in New Zealand…OIA Material, Vol. 1.
169. 4 May 1976, in New Zealand…OIA Material, Vol. 1.
170. Krieger, p. 50.
171. April 1976, NSA Document 252.
172. Document 406, Jakarta, 24 January 1976, in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 674.
173. East Timor in Transition, DFAT, p. 12. For the tax agreement, see Krieger, p. 292.
174. Statement by 92-person, Japanese Diet Members Forum on East Timor to the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation, New York, 8 August 1991.
175. Petition to the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation, 8 August 1991.
176. Kenneth Christie and Denny Roy, The Politics of Human Rights in East Asia, Pluto Press, London, 2001, pp., 274-75. The ODA Charter was revised in 2003.
177. Press Release, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Japan, 4 September 1999.
178. Henry Kissinger to a business luncheon in Sydney, 13 November 1995, in E G Whitlam, "E.G. Whitlam launches Bill Nicol, 'Timor – a Nation Reborn'", It's time e-magazine, Issue 7, University of Sydney Co-op Bookshop, 26 June 2002,
179. New Zealand's Ambassador to Indonesia after meeting with the Indonesian Minister of Defence, General Panggabean, 22 July 1974, in New Zealand…OIA Material, Vo. 1.
180. Quoted in Peter Elgin, "East Timor, The Globe and Mail and Propaganda," Portuguese Studies Review 11 (1) 2003, pp. 69-70.

181. Don McKinnon, New Zealand Foreign Minister, Speech to the Canterbury School of Journalism, 21 March 1995, in New Zealand…OIA Material, Vol. 3, February 1994-October 1995.
182. Eamon Duffy, Saints and Sinners, A History of the Popes, Yale University Press, Princeton, New Jersey, 2002, p. 367.
183. Quoted in Frédéric Durand, Catholicisme et protestantisme dans l'île de Timor: 1556–2003, Irasec, Bangkok, 2004, p. 89.
184. Pat Walsh, "Church May Hold Key to Timor's Future," National Outlook, January 1982, p. 14.
185. CAVR interview with Pat Walsh, Dili, 25 February 2005.
186. The Church and East Timor: A collection of documents by National and International Church Agencies, Catholic Commission for Justice, Development and Peace, Melbourne, 1993, pp. 13–15; and Frédéric Durand, pp. 92-93.
187. Quoted in media release by Christians in Solidarity with East Timor, 20 May 1983.
188. Letter to Monsignor Francesco Canalini (1986–1991), in The Church and East Timor: A collection of documents by National and International Church Agencies, Catholic Commission for Justice, Development and Peace, Melbourne, p. 10.
189. Letter to Father Pierre Toulat, Secretary, French Commission for Justice and Peace, Paris.
190. Sister Monica Nakamura, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
191. Radio Renascenza, 12 May 1991, excerpted from Frédéric Durand, p. 111.
192. CAVR interview with Alex Gusmão, 28 March 2005.
193. Interview with Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão, September 1990, in Robert Domm, East Timor: Keeping the Flame of Freedom Alive, ACFOA Development Dossier 29, 1991, p. 24.
194. Smythe, p. 199.
195. Kohen, p. 154.
196. Pat Walsh, East Timor's Political Parties and Groupings, ACFOA, April 2001.
197. Domingos de Oliveira, former UDT Secretary General, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Internal Political Conflict 1974–1976, 15–18 December 2003.
198. Ibid.
199. "Fretilin on the World Stage" in Wendy Way (Ed.), DFAT, p. 450.
200. Jill Jolliffe, East Timor: Nationalism and Colonialism, University of Queensland Press, St. Lucia, Brisbane, 1978, p. 221.
201. David Scott, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
202. Krieger, pp 66-7.
203. Krieger, p. 96.
204. CAVR interview with José Ramos-Horta, Dili, 26 May 2004.
205. Ibid.
206. Ibid.
207. Ibid.
208. UN Press Release, Department of Public Information Press Section, GA/D/2334, 9 November 1982.
209. CAVR Interview with José Ramos-Horta, 29 July 2004.
210. Statement on the Current Portuguese Attitude on the Question of East Timor, 6 September 1983, Ost-Timor Information, No. 3, October 1983.
211. Letter from the Parliamentary Human Rights Group in Britain to the Secretary-General, 10 August 1984, in Torben Retbøll, East Timor: The Struggle Continues, International Work Group for Indigenous Affairs Document No. 50, Copenhagen, October 1984, pp. 209-11.
212. CAVR interview with João Carrascalão, Dili, 30 July 2004.
213. CAVR interview with Zacarias da Costa, 14 March 2005.
214. Maria Angela Carrascalão, Timor: Os Anos da Resistência, Mensagem, Lisbon, 2002, p. 135.
215. Estavão Cabral, "Fretilin: Roots of the Friction", Fitun, No. 11, September 1993.
216. CAVR interview with João Carrascalão, Dili, 30 July 2004.
217. CAVR interview with José Ramos-Horta, Dili, 26 May 2004.
218. Letter of the Nationalist Convergence of Timor to the President of the Portuguese Republic, Mário Soares, 9 March 1988. Krieger, p. 280.
219. Statement by the Timorese Democratic Union to the Special Committee on Decolonisation, New York, 13 August 1987.
220. Message of 7 December 1987 on the 12th anniversary of the Indonesian invasion. Sarah Niner (Ed.), To Resist is To Win: The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, Aurora Books, Victoria, 2000, pp. 129-36.
221. Ben Anderson et al., interview with Mario Carrascalão, Indonesia (76), October 2003, pp. 21-2.

222. Communiqué of the Nationalist Convergence of Timor, 10 November 1989, in Krieger, pp. 281-2.
223. José Ramos-Horta, Towards a Peaceful Solution in East Timor, East Timor Relief Association (ETRA), Sydney, 1996, p 31.
224. CAVR interview with José Ramos-Horta, Dili, 26 May 2004.
225. Nobel Committee Press Release, 1996.
226. CAVR interview with Agio Pereira, Dili, 24 September 2004.
227. East Timor in Transition, DFAT, p. 10.
228. Jamsheed Marker, East Timor.
229. See Fernando de Araújo, "The CNRT campaign for independence", in James J Fox and Dionisio Babo Soares (Eds.), Out of the Ashes, Crawford House, Canberra, 2000, pp. 106-25.
230. CAVR interview with Agio Pereira, 24 September 2004.
231. Abel Guterres, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
232. Luisa Teotonio Pereira, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
233. Abel Guterres, testimony, ibid.
234. Ibid.
235. Ibid.
236. Luisa Teotonio Pereira, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
237. David Scott, unpublished manuscript, CAVR Archives.
238. Luisa Teotonio Pereira, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004, ibid.
239. Arnold Kohen, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
240. CAVR interview with John Taylor and Arnold Kohen, Dili, 2 February 2005.
241. For an account of Steve Cox's work in Britain following the massacre, see Kirsty Sword Gusmão with Rowena Lennox, A Woman of Independence, Macmillan, Sydney 2003, pp. 38-9.
242. See, for example, Peter Slezak (Ed.), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, East Timor Relief Association, Sydney, May 1996.
243. Essay by Carmel Budiardjo in East Timor: Testimony by Elaine Briere, Toronto, 2004, p. 68.
244. See David T. Hill, "East Timor and the Internet: Global political leverage in/on Indonesia", Indonesia (73), April 2002, pp. 25-51.
245. Carlos Santiago Nino, Radical Evil on Trial, Yale University Press, Princeton, New Jersey, 1996, p. 186.
246. Yeni Rosa Damayanti, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
247. Jean Pierre Catry, Memo to CAVR, 28 January 2005.
248. East Timor in Transition, DFAT, p. v.
249. Ian Martin, Self-determination in East Timor..., p. 88.
250. Para 1, Preamble, UUD Negara Republik Indonesia 1945 [Constitution of the Republic of Indonesia 1945].
251. Yeni Rosa Damayanti, testimony, given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
252. Liem Soei Liong, Communication to CAVR, 28 February 2005.
253. Yeni Rosa Damayanti, testimony, given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
254. Nugroho Katjasungkana, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2003.
255. Yeni Rosa Damayanti, testimony, given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
256. George J Aditjondro, Menyongsong Matahari Terbit di Puncak Ramelau, Yayasan Hak and Fortilos, Jakarta, 2000, p. 251.
257. James Goodman, "Indonesians for East Timor", Inside Indonesia (59), 1999.
258. Ade Sitompul, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17 February 2003.
259. Statement by 11th INFID Conference, Bonn, 4-6 May 1998.
260. Patrick Walters, "Let Timor-Leste Decide, Muslim Leader", The Australian, 11 December 1996.
261. Statement by the 12th INFID Conference on the Role of the Military in Indonesian Society, Bali, 14–17 September, 1999.

262. CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, Dili, 15–17 March 2004.
263. Yeni Rosa Damayanti, testimony given at the CAVR National Public Hearing on Self-determination and the International Community, 15–17 March 2004.
264. Ian Martin, Self-determination in East Timor…, p. 13.
265. Geoffrey C. Gunn, "International Actors and East Timor's Right to Self-determination", Report for CAVR, August 2003, p. 138.

Photo/CAVR archives

Chega!

Part 7.2.

Unlawful Killings and Forced Disappearances

Part 7.2 Unlawful Killings and Forced Disappearances

Tables:

Graphics:

Unlawful Killings and Forced Disappearances 7.2

Introduction

1. The Commission estimates that about 18,600 unlawful killings and disappearances occurred during the period of its mandate. The vast majority of them were perpetrated by the Indonesian security forces. The proportion of the total number of killings and disappearances which were attributed to the Indonesian security forces increased steadily over the years of the occupation, although from the mid-1980s their absolute number declined in most years until 1999.

Definitions

2. The arbitrary deprivation of human life is prohibited under international human rights law.[*] Even where an emergency threatens the life of a nation, obligations in respect of the right to life may not be limited in any way ("derogated from").[†] The right not to be arbitrarily deprived of life also applies during an armed conflict. During such a conflict the question of whether a deprivation of life is arbitrary is to be determined by applying the rules of international humantiarian law.[‡] The most important of these rules for the purposes of this part are the following.

- The intentional killing of civilians is always prohibited
- It is prohibited intentionally to kill combatants who are no longer taking part in combat because they are wounded or sick, have been captured, or have laid down their arms.

* Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Article 3; International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Article 6; and customary law: see Human Rights Committee General Comment 24, para 8.

† International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Article 4(2); Human Rights Committee, General Comment 6, para.1.

‡ Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons, (1996) ICJ Reports 226 at 240.

3. In this part the Commission has adopted certain terminology to refer to the violations discussed. The terms "extra-judicial executions" or "unlawful killings" are used, interchangeably, to refer to any intentional killings in violation of the right to life as set out above. For the sake of brevity, this part uses the term "killings" or "executions" to carry the same meaning.

4. The terms "mass execution" and "massacre" are also used throughout this part. The Commission has defined "mass execution" as meaning the killing of five or more people who have been specifically targeted as individuals, carried out in one place and as part of a single operation, where the victims are effectively defenceless. "Massacre" is defined by the Commission as meaning the indiscriminate killing of five or more people, carried out in one place and as part of a single operation, where the victims are effectively defenceless. The use of "indiscriminate" proposed in this definition is not meant to imply that the group that is the object of attack has been chosen totally randomly, only that the individuals within the group are not being targeted individually. Thus in a number of the massacres described in this part, such as the massacres that followed the Kraras incident in August 1983, the Santa Cruz Massacre of 12 November 1991 and the Suai Church Massacre in September 1999, the attackers were not acting indiscriminately in the sense that their actions were not targeted against a particular group of people or not triggered by some event, but only in the sense that they did not target particular individuals within the group under attack.

5. Although a "massacre" defined in this way is not a discrete violation of a particular rule of international law (rather, it is a group of violations) the Commission considers that it is important to refer to massacres because they demonstrate the scale and gravity of killings of this kind.

6. The Commission has adopted the draft definition of enforced disappearances used by the United Nations Working Group on a Draft Legally Binding Normative Instrument for the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearances.[*] Accordingly the Commission defines an "enforced disappearance" as:

> [T]he arrest, detention, abduction or any other form of deprivation of liberty committed by agents of the State or by persons or groups of persons acting with the authorisation, support or acquiescence of the State, followed by a refusal to acknowledge the deprivation of liberty or by concealment of the fate or whereabouts of the disappeared person, which places such a person outside the protection of the law.[†]

* The definition remains a topic of disagreement in the Working Group's deliberations, however the source of that disagreement is whether the definition should be expanded so as to include non-state actors who do not have the authorisation, support or acquiescence of the state. Since disappearances in Timor-Leste were not carried out by such persons, this difficulty does not effect the Commission's use of the Working Group definition.

† Working paper prepared by the Chairman of the Working Group to elaborate a draft legally binding normative instrument for the protection of all persons from enforced disappearance, at the end of its 4th session (31 January–11 February 2005), E/CN.4/2005/CRP.4, 7 March 2005, Article 1.

7. Carrying out enforced disappearances is prohibited by international law.[*] The UN Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance provides that no one shall be subjected to enforced disappearance, and that no exceptional circumstances whatever, whether a war, threat of war, internal instability or other emergency, may be invoked as a justification for enforced disappearances.[†] States are obliged to take specific measures to prevent the enforced disappearance of individuals and must investigate and prosecute disappearances when they do occur.[‡] As well as the right to life, disappearances violate the victim's rights to liberty and security of the person, to be free from torture and ill-treatment, to be treated humanely when deprived of liberty, and to be recognised as a person before the law.[§] Disappearances may also "cause mental anguish in the victim's relatives sufficient to amount to a violation of the prohibition on torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment".[¶]

8. The peculiar abhorrence attached to disappearances arising from the uncertainty surrounding the fate of the victim and the consequent suffering caused to those close to the victim are also recognised in the UN draft declaration where it states that "acts constituting enforced disappearance shall be considered a continuing offence as long as the perpetrators continue to conceal the fate and the whereabouts of persons who have disappeared and these facts remain unclarified".

9. In practice the distinction between executions and disappearances was often not clear-cut during the years of conflict in Timor-Leste. In the course of its research the Commission sometimes received multiple testimonies about the same case in which one person testified that the victim had disappeared, while another stated on the basis of having had more direct access to the event that the person had been executed. Whether the victim is said to have been executed or to have disappeared, the common thread running through these cases and a cause of continuing deep anguish to relatives and friends is that the victim's remains have never been recovered. Relatives of the disappeared who testified to the Commission, some of whom are quoted below, frequently highlighted the distress caused by the fact that there may well be individuals who could identify where bodies were disposed of and who could assist in their recovery.

* Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearances, General Assembly Resolution 47/133, 18 December 1992, Article 2.

† Working paper prepared by the Chairman of the Working Group to elaborate a draft legally binding normative instrument for the protection of all persons from enforced disappearance, at the end of its 4th session (31 January–11 February 2005), E/CN.4/2005/CRP.4, 7 March 2005, Article 3.

‡ Human Rights Committee, General Comment 6, para.4; Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearances, General Assembly Resolution 47/133, 18 December 1992, Articles 3 and 4.

§ Jegatheeswara Sarma v Sri Lanka (2003) HRC Communication No. 950/2000 at para 9.3; Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearances, General Assembly Resolution 47/133, 18 December 1992, Article 1(2).

¶ Quinteros v. Uruguay (1983) HRC Comm. No. 107/1981 at para 14; Jegatheeswara Sarma v Sri Lanka (2003) HRC Communication No. 950/2000 at para 9.5.

Methodology

10. In order to gain an accurate picture of the killings and disappearances which took place in Timor-Leste during the years of the conflict, the Commission adopted a number of different approaches:

- The Commission collected 7,669 narrative statements from all 13 districts of Timor-Leste and from refugees living in West Timor. Deponents in the Commission's statement-taking process reported a total of 5,120 unique killings and 835 disappearances.
- In the early phase of its work, the Commission conducted consultations in each sub-district to identify events in which major human rights violations had occurred. During this consultation, many people spoke about massacres and killings that took place in their community. Based on this information and other sources, Commission staff conducted close to 1,000 interviews of witnesses and survivors of killings and disappearances in all 13 districts.
- Seventeen victims and two expert witnesses gave testimony at the CAVR Public Hearing on Massacres held in Dili on 19–23 December 2003. Survivors were able to describe the brutality they witnessed or experienced during the 25-year period of conflicts. Some provided recommendations to the Commission on how to ensure that these gross violations never occur again.
- The Commission conducted community-level discussions in 216 villages, to document communities' collective experiences of human rights violations. During these discussions, people spoke of killings and disappearances which took place in their community.
- The Commission, together with statistical experts, conducted a special project to estimate the total number of deaths from all causes, including killings, during the conflict. This project consisted of two information-gathering exercises: a census of marked and unmarked gravestones found in 492 cemeteries across the country (the Graveyard Census Database – the GCD); and a survey of 1,322 randomly selected households, on deaths and displacements in their family during the duration of the conflict (the Retrospective Mortality Survey – the RMS). In the survey respondents were asked to specify cause of death, which could include killing. To arrive at its estimate of the death toll the Commission combined the data from the GCD with those collected through its statement-taking process.*
- The Commission also received submissions on this topic. For example, the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner on Human Rights provided an important study on the violence which took place in 1999. The Commission also had access to data gathered by international and national human rights NGOs on killings and disappearances throughout the period of the conflict.

* HRDAG (Human Rights Data Analysis Group) is a division of Benetech Inc in Palo Alto, California, USA. HRDAG staff include statisticians, computer programmers, and record linkage experts. HRDAG team members have worked in large-scale human rights documentation and analysis projects on five continents, in more than a dozen countries over the past 20 years. HRDAG has worked with official truth commissions in Haiti, South Africa, Guatemala, Peru, Ghana and Sierra Leone; with the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia; and with non-governmental human rights groups in El Salvador, Cambodia, Guatemala, Colombia, Afghanistan, Sri Lanka and Iran. For more information see http://www.hrdag.org.

11. The analysis in this part is based both on quantitative analysis of data collected by the Commission through its statement-taking process, the Graveyard Census Database and the Retrospective Mortality Survey, as well as on interviews conducted by the Commission with witnesses and, occasionally, perpetrators, and secondary sources. While the Commission has used the quantitative data to illuminate important patterns in the violence over time and space, it recognises that a comprehensive understanding of the killings that occurred in Timor-Leste during the mandate period requires that they be placed in the context in which they occurred and that can be done only through interviews conducted with that purpose in mind.

Quantitative overview

12. On the basis of its quantitative analysis the Commission found that of the approximately 18,600 unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of East Timorese non-combatants perpetrated between 1974 and 1999, the overwhelming majority, 70%, were committed by the Indonesian security forces, including East Timorese auxiliaries.* Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances were perpetrated by the Resistance as well as by Indonesian security forces. The temporal profile of the killings and disappearances attributed to the Resistance is very different from that of those attributed to the Indonesian security forces. Killings and disappearances reported to have been committed by members of the Resistance are heavily concentrated in the early years of the conflict, primarily during and after the inter-party conflict known as "the civil war" and during the Fretilin intra-party purges of 1976 and 1977-78. While 49.0% (561/1,145) of all documented killings and disappearances in 1975 were attributed to Fretilin/Falintil, the percentage (although in 1976-84 not the absolute number of killings and disappearances) falls sharply in each succeeding period, decreasing to 16.6% (563/3,398) of documented killings and disappearances in 1976-84, to 3.7% (18/488) in 1985–1998 and to 0.6% (5/898) in 1999. There is a corresponding increase in the percentage of killings and disappearances attributed to the Indonesian security forces and their East Timorese auxiliaries.

Killings and disappearances perpetrated by the Resistance

13. The Commission in no way seeks to minimise violations committed by the Resistance. In the early stages of the conflict many senior figures in the political and military leadership of the Resistance behaved with extreme brutality not only towards their political opponents but also towards ordinary civilians. However, during the 1980s and 1990s, both the quantitative and the qualitative evidence confirm that the number of killings and disappearances attributed to the Resistance declined sharply. In addition, for a number of reasons the Commission has often found it difficult to be sure that the Resistance always bears institutional responsibility for the unlawful killings and disappearances attributed to it. Because East Timorese society became so heavily militarised during this period, the status of many of the civilians who were killed by Fretilin/Falintil was often ambiguous. Further complicating the attribution of responsibility is the fact that victims included people who were forcibly put at risk by the Indonesian security forces. Moreover, particularly during armed attacks, it is also not always clear from the available information that a particular victim was specifically targeted. Finally, in at least some cases, particularly but not only in 1999, the Commission received credible information, including from persons who had been censured for their actions, that the Falintil High Command did not institutionally condone violations committed by its personnel.

* Auxiliaries comprise "civil defence" groups (including Hansip, Ratih, Wanra and Kamra), members of the local administration acting in a "security" role, paramilitary groups (such as Tonsus and the various "Teams" that were forerunners of the militia groups formed in 1998-99), and the militia groups themselves.

Killings and disappearances perpetrated by the Indonesian security forces

14. By contrast the Indonesian military consistently resorted to killings and disappearances during the whole period of its occupation of Timor-Leste. This consistency is one indication that killings and disappearances had an overall strategic purpose, namely that of eliminating opposition to the occupation by terrorising the general population. The general character of the killings and disappearances committed by the Indonesian security forces, the specific methods they employed and the impunity enjoyed by those who carried them out, are others.

15. The nature and scale of the killings and disappearances perpetrated by the Indonesian security forces changed over time as Indonesia's occupation of Timor-Leste and the resistance to it went through different phases. Killings and disappearances perpetrated by the Indonesian security forces reached peak levels in 1975-79, 1983-84 and 1999. However, while there were years between 1975 and 1999 when there were relatively few killings, the fact that first and final years of the occupation were also peak years for killings and disappearances is perhaps one indication that throughout the years of the occupation the Indonesian security forces were consistently prepared to resort to executions.

16. The killings committed by the Indonesian security forces had a particularly horrific character. The methods used ranged from death by severe deprivation in a prison cell to public executions committed using the most extreme brutality, in which villagers were sometimes forced to participate, to at supposedly secret sites, which in fact became widely notorious, to indiscriminate shooting of large numbers of persons in confined spaces.

17. The fact that executions were frequently public provides strong evidence that the practices were systematic and an accepted practice within the Indonesian military, either ordered or condoned by the senior officers. Direct perpetrators and their commanding officers enjoyed almost total impunity for their actions.

18. In the years immediately after the invasion Indonesian forces were engaged in operations to gain control of the territory first by occupying towns and villages of strategic importance and then by destroying the Resistance bases in the interior and forcing the civilian population under Fretilin control into Indonesian-controlled resettlement camps. The Commission received many reports that during this phase of the conflict Indonesian forces killed non-combatants. Sometimes those killed had been denounced as members of Fretilin, but many of the victims of these killings were randomly targeted members of the civilian population. Ordinary civilians were targeted in a variety of other circumstances: while looking for food or going about their daily activities, when encountered by Indonesian security forces on operations, in retaliation for Falintil attacks, and on suspicion of having contact with or having knowledge about Fretilin/Falintil.

19. While engaged in offensives against Fretilin/Falintil bases and attacks on their positions and in the aftermath of such operations, Indonesian security forces killed civilians and others not engaged in combat, including surrendered and captured combatants. The majority of reports of this nature which the Commission received related to the period 1977-79, when many of those who had fled to the mountains and came into the custody of the Indonesian forces through surrender or capture were summarily executed. The Commission received information indicating that violations of this kind continued to be committed during later operations, such as during the Operasi Kikis of June–September 1981.

20. During the early years of the occupation, but in particular in 1978–1979 and in 1983-84, ABRI commanders, troops and auxiliaries committed systematic and widespread unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of persons who had been active members of the Resistance and persons suspected of having clandestine contacts with members of Fretilin/Falintil still fighting.

21. Throughout the occupation, but in particular in the early 1980s, ABRI commanders, troops and auxiliaries committed unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of civilians to punish communities collectively that were suspected of supporting Falintil forces. The indiscriminate punishment of persons known to have previously been involved with the Resistance movement and the collective punishment of communities were particularly severe in the aftermath of Falintil attacks on Indonesian troops and military targets, such as those that occurred in Dili in June 1980, in and around Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) in August 1982 and in Kraras (Viqueque) in August 1983.

22. In the period 1985–1998 the number of killings and disappearances committed by ABRI and its auxiliaries declined relative to the earlier years of the occupation. During the whole period 1985-98, excluding the Santa Cruz Massacre, the Commission received reports of about 250 killings and disappearances, less than 20 a year. However, there were a number of continuities with the past. The Indonesian security forces continued to kill and cause the disappearance of civilians with real and suspected association to groups resisting the occupation, including members of Fretilin/Falintil, the clandestine networks and other pro-independence groups. As in earlier years, during this period Indonesian security forces also continued to perpetrate random killings of members of the civilian population who had been forcibly recruited for military operations or as they were going about their daily activities or; and to commit reprisal killings, as after Falintil attacks in Alas (Manufahi) in October 1998. Reflecting a shift in Resistance strategy, they also targeted demonstrators, most famously at the Santa Cruz Cemetery, but also before and during the visit of European Union ambassadors in June 1997.

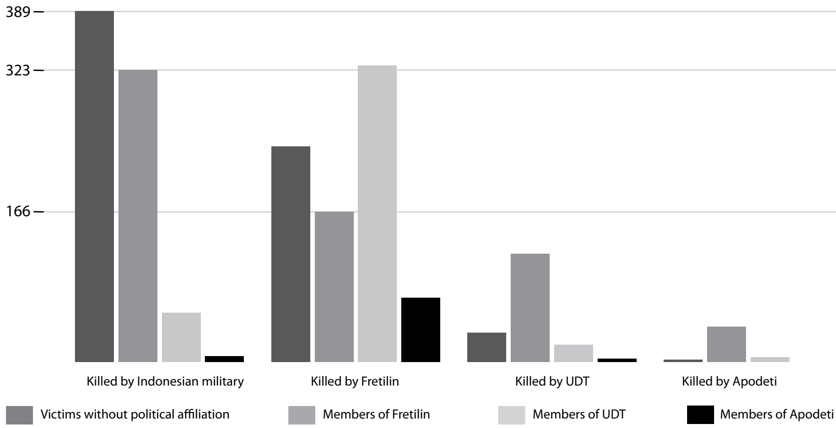
23. In 1999 killings and disappearances returned to levels not seen since the late 1970s. In several respects they bore marked similarities of method and purpose to those committed in the earlier years of the occupation, targeting both political activists and the wider civilian population with the aim of intimidating the population, this time into voting for integration with Indonesia. In two respects they differed from the killings and disappearances committed in earlier phases of the conflict. The first was the reliance of the Indonesian security forces on its auxiliaries acting alone to carry out the campaign against the civilian population. The second was that after the result of the ballot became known killing became purely punitive and vindictive, divorced from any overriding purpose.

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances during the internal conflict: 11 August–24 September 1975



24. The Commission received reports of 1,070 non-combatant killings in 1975. Of these reports, only 73.6% (787/1070) recorded the month during which the event took place. The Commission received 348 statements relating fatal violations which took place in the months of August and September of 1975, or about 44.2% (348/787) of statements which report the month of the event. The relatively low number of cases reported to the Commission demonstrated the limitations of the statement-taking process. The Commission believes that between 1,500-3,000 people died during the internal conflict. ICRC observers reported at the time:

> The loss of human lives is very hard to establish. The number dead is…3,000 for the whole island. The majority of the victims seem to be non-combatants who it seems have been killed during the street fighting or executed in reprisal from the Fretilin as well as from the UDT. The actual state of mind is one of vendetta (feud.)*

25. Based on statements reported to the Commission, the following graph shows the pattern of unlawful killings, by perpetrator and victim groups which took place in 1975–1976.

* Memorandum by A. Pasqueir to the ICRC Geneva entitled International Committee of the Red Cross, East Timor Relief Operation, Concerning: Situation in Timor, Report of the activities of the delegation from 1–15 September. Darwin, 16 September 1975.

Reported killings based on the institution of the perpetrator and victim, 1975–1976

Source: Statements to the Commission

26. The internal conflict of August–September 1975 occurred in the context of rising tensions between political parties that had formed in late 1974. After the breakdown of the UDT-Fretilin coalition in May 1975, political chaos and violence took hold in communities throughout the country. Several external influences encouraged this violence, including an Indonesian covert destabilisation campaign mounted from West Timor, and the faltering decolonisation process run by Portugal. East Timorese political parties themselves encouraged antagonistic and violent partisan behaviour. Some individuals or groups also used this as an opportunity to resolve long-standing feuds quite unrelated to the political conflict.*

27. In his testimony before the Commission, Xanana Gusmão described the atmosphere of increasing violence and impunity in the months before the August armed movement by UDT:

> We noticed a lack of will on the part of the party leaders to reduce the level of violence, to address what was going on. Sometimes we noticed that the parties were quite happy when their supporters would come and say, "We beat up this person" or "We killed that person", it was regarded as a small victory…If a party had the most number of people in a sub-district, they didn't let other parties campaign in that area. And so when other parties would go to those places people would attack, block their way, boycott, throw rocks at each other and beat each other.[1]

* See Vol 1, Part 3: History of the Conflict for a detailed account of the period preceding the internal armed conflict. This background section simply highlights several elements within the context of the internal conflict.

Radio programmes: taking-sides and inciting violence

The Commission notes that a striking feature of the internal violence in 1975 was the use of radio programmes by political parties to incite violence and spread hatred. During the Commission's National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict, East Timorese leaders described how both UDT and Fretilin used radio programmes to make both personal attacks and attack the political parties throughout the brief decolonisation period, and the damage caused by these attacks.

Domingos de Oliveira, Secretary General of UDT at the time, remembered how opposing parties used the radio to slander each other shortly after the decolonisation process allowed the establishment of political associations:

A new situation arose which created problems. The first communications like this came from the radio, from the Timorese students who had come from Portugal. They spoke strongly against UDT. They said that UDT were ultra-conservatives, that they just wanted to maintain the situation and did not want independence…This was not true, so UDT responded. ASDT then responded and the topsy-turvy relations between the two parties began…I have to admit that this unhappy situation got worse and worse. On the radio, and the relations between old friends deteriorated so that we did not see each other as friends any more. What had been calm discussions became very nervous and edgy. I think this is something in our culture, we argue, we want to hit each other and then we hit our own foreheads and ask how can this happen to our land…we attacked each other using the radio programme.[2]

João Carrascalão, also a UDT leader at the time, re-affirmed the use of radio to incite divisions:

When I became involved in April 1975, the parties were attacking each other already. They were already saying bad things about each other, abusing each other. The radio programmes were just slinging abuse, provoking each other – "this red rooster is a fascist", "this one is Indonesia's lackey". Constant abuse, always seeking to start fires with lightning like this.[3]

Mari Alkatiri, a senior political commissar of Fretilin at the time, highlighted the personal nature of many attacks over the radio:

So many things went the wrong way, because of this or because of that. We didn't control things, we tried to control them but couldn't control everything… like the radio, everyone talked just as they wanted… Radio Maubere was used just to name people. I had to go there myself to control them from using people's names.[4]

Mario Carrascalão, a senior political leader of UDT at the time, described how attacking political opponents over the radio became an obstacle to dialogue to resolve differences:

I think something that was a big problem for us was that there was no communication. People did not sit together. There were no discussions. There was no-one to promote discussions, only insulting each other over the radio.[5]

Francisco Xavier do Amaral, then President of Fretilin, recalled that once the UDT 11 August movement was underway radio became an important tool to incite violence across the territory:

Radio Dili sent "UDT to attack Bucoli" [Baucau, Baucau]. They said "Arrest Fretilin, go and arrest them in Cairui [Laleia, Manatuto], go and arrest the communists." I thought, what communists?…They were saying that all Fretilin was communist…. I listened to the radio all the time…I heard that they attacked in Aileu, attacked in Ermera, attacked in Letefoho, those from Atsabe came and attacked the Central Committee in Aileu. From Turiscai, Funar, Fatumakerek, Laclubar, Soibada, Barique, they all came together and formed a crusade. They said, "This war is a crusade, a war against communism." This had the blessing of the priests. The priests prayed with them in a big mass, and gave them their blessing…[6]

The Commission received testimony about how Indonesian intelligence operators also used radio programmes to spread propaganda from West Timor. Domingos Oliveira told the Commission that information gathered across the territory by Indonesian agents was used as the basis of daily propaganda from radio programmes broadcast from Kupang, West Timor:

The radio programme from Kupang attacked Fretilin as communist. [It] attacked UDT as neo-colonialist because it wanted a continuation of links with Portugal…. Whatever Fretilin was doing, that same day it would be broadcast over Radio Kupang. Whatever UDT was doing, the same day it would be broadcast over Radio Kupang.[7]

Mari Alkatiri told the Commission of the message from radio programmes in Kupang after the 11 August armed movement by UDT:

Indonesia began to think that UDT had really won, and so Indonesian radio from Kupang accused UDT of being communist, pro-Soviet, and Fretilin communist pro-China. [They said] that everyone was communist. Friends, we can see that communists or no communists, Indonesia was going to enter Timor-Leste.[8]

28. By mid-1975 there was rising tension between the political parties, incitement by all sides through radio programmes and increased lawlessness. One key factor that influenced the expansion of the violence from an attempted political coup into a wider conflict was that both parties distributed arms to their civilian members. Mario Carrascalão described the arming of civilians throughout Dili:

> When I got to Dili (on 14 August 1975) I could see that just one group was in command, the military. There were no political commanders in Dili. Who commanded the movement? I did not see any political direction. There was no political direction of this movement. It was a military movement. You could say that the masses followed it…with old men and young boys carrying guns all over Dili…
>
> In the interior it was a different situation. In the interior the UDT party leaders really took control. They took control and commanded. I think there was a link with the military and operational commanders. I do not know who did the nomination…
>
> In Palapaco [Motael (Dom Aleixo, Dili) UDT headquarters] I found old men and young boys and young men…twelve-year-olds carrying guns. I saw the son of a friend of mine, 12 or 13 years old, carrying a G-3…
>
> A small amount of guns were taken from sub-district administrations. Fretilin took some, UDT took some. But in relation to the larger amount that UDT had, I was not in Dili though I heard information that they were from the police in Dili.[9]

29. Repeating the same point, former Fretilin Central Committee member Mari Alkatiri described the chaos resulting from uncontrolled arms distribution:

> In Dili, Fretilin and Apodeti were together against UDT. There was a lot of confusion and guns were distributed without criteria. But because guns had been distributed without criteria the [Fretilin] Central Committee sent me to go down from Aileu [to Dili] on the 20th or 21st of August. At this time, at the time for breakfast all of Fretilin and Apodeti would go to the Quartel to eat. I placed a paper on the door for people to go to breakfast. They came to breakfast, and formed a line and everyone [Apodeti] handed over their guns.[10]

30. Adding to the deteriorating situation, many of the East Timorese members of the Portuguese armed forces abandoned their neutrality. Although some joined UDT and supported its action on 11 August, the majority supported Fretilin when it mounted its counter-coup on 20 August. This was partly a result of the two political parties having long targetted members of the military, seeking their loyalty. Former Portuguese army Lieutenant Rogério Lobato later recalled:

> I can say that UDT made a campaign to get the support especially from the military graduates, the sergeants. But Fretilin also made an open campaign, not hidden, amongst the forces to mobilise the soldiers.[11]

31. A substantial supply of weapons existed in Portuguese Timor, as Portugal kept NATO-issue arms in the territory. The Portuguese did not intervene in the civil war, which meant that the parties were able to commandeer the weapons once the soldiers joined the conflict.

32. The table below summarises the experiences of six villages during the internal conflict, as they recalled them in community discussions organised by the Commission:[12]

Table 1: Summaries of the experiences of 6 communities during the internal conflict

Community	Summary
Mulo, Hato Builico, Ainaro	1975: Two Fretilin delegates from (the neighbouring sub-district of) Maubisse came and told the local Fretilin delegates to sell (party identity) cards to the us. Because we were afraid, we paid one escudo to buy a card. Then Fretilin told us to greet each other by saying "Camarada", to show that we greatly respected each other. August 1975: Fretilin raised its flag in a delegate's house below the clinic in Wisei, Dare. Mulo village, (Hato-Builico, Ainaro). From that time, Dare became divided between those on the bottom road (Fretilin) and those on the upper road (UDT). A Fretilin member detained two catechists for a day, during which they did not receive food or drink, and then captured six other UDT supporters. They were taken to the Dare elementary school where they were punished. UDT supporters living in Maubisse made a plan to send forces to enter Mulo from Nunu Mogue to rescue the UDT detainees. Soon after Fretilin brought 200 men from Maubisse "to kill us all". When the Fretilin group reached Tatiri, Mulo (Hato-Builico, Ainaro) a community leader brought a buffalo to be slaughtered in Dare and appealed for an end to the hatred between Fretilin and UDT. After the Fretilin group had eaten, a Fretilin cadre visited the six detained UDT members. We, the womenfolk, wept because we thought the six had been killed, though they had not been. Then a Fretilin leader went on to Nunu Mogue where he captured and killed a UDT supporter, though his body was never found. UDT and malae (outsider) forces then went into Dare and cut down the Fretilin flag.

Community	Summary
Kasabauk (when it was called Maudemo), Tilomar, Covalima	1974: Life was generally calm and happy. However the liurai, Saneti, punished those who did not do labour in the fields. 1975: Fretilin distributed party cards. Local Fretilin cadre told the people it was better to join Fretilin. Only two people joined UDT, but many joined Apodeti. After the Fretilin counter-coup the Apodeti people were arrested and told to join Fretilin, and several were recruited to Falintil in Tilomar.
Uaitame, Quelicai, Baucau	1974: There were two political parties in this community, Fretilin and UDT. 1975: After the August UDT coup, local UDT leaders took around 50 UDT supporters to Dili. There was no significant response by local Fretilin members in Uaitame after the counter-coup by Fretilin in Dili. 11 September 1975: Fretilin leaders visited Quelicai telling supporters to set up civilian and military structures. Six UDT leaders were arrested by Fretilin and taken to the Descascadeira (a detention centre in the town of Baucau) where they were held for one month.
Orlalan/Batara, Laclubar, Manatuto	1975: UDT used its dominant position to intimidate people into joining a force being recruited to attack the Fretilin base in Turiscai, the neighbouring sub-district. UDT supporters from Laclubar joined forces with others from Soibada and Barique and assembled a 300-strong force at Fatumakerek. From there, they left to attack Turiscai. Their attack failed because Fretilin forces were better armed. Fretilin from Turiscai (Manufahi) soon counter-attacked Laclubar. The Fretilin-Turiscai forces confiscated people's belongings and the livestock, killing some and taking the rest to Turiscai. They also captured five UDT party leaders in Laclubar and took them bound to Turiscai where they were punished. Only Raja Monis [the liurai] returned; the rest were killed in Turiscai.
Bibileo, (Viqueque, Viqueque)	1974: A small majority favoured UDT over ASDT/Fretilin and Apodeti. Party cards were handed out in the village head's office. People felt ambivalent about the parties. 1975: After the UDT coup, everyone rallied to UDT as the winners. Then, after the Fretilin counter-coup, the population divided into two forces: one to await the arrival of Fretilin forces in Sukaer Oan, Caraubalu (Viqueque, Viqueque); and one to wait in Natarbora. After Fretilin forces won the civil war, the people rallied to Fretilin.
Saburai, Maliana, Bobonaro	1974: The majority of the population joined Fretilin, but the village head was a UDT member. Before the formation of parties there was already growing sentiment against the village head. 11 August 1975: After the UDT coup all Fretilin supporters were arrested and detained in the district administrator's office before being transferred to Corluli (a building in Maliana that was used by UDT as a prison after the coup). UDT ordered everyone to go to Maliana Town. 30 August 1975: Troops from (the Portuguese army's) Cavalry Squadron No 5, based in Bobonaro, came down to Maliana. UDT and Apodeti supporters were forced to evacuate to West Timor for one month. About 500 people from the aldeia of Masage moved to Tahon, West Timor. Several were tortured, killed and hung. Around 50 women were raped. Many children died from disease. 16 October 1975: Indonesian troops crossed the border at Memo (Akidiru Laran). 17 October 1975: The Indonesians took control of Maliana.

Unlawful killings before the UDT armed action of 11 August

33. The Commission received testimony about several killings during the two weeks immediately preceding the UDT movement of 11 August. Several of these killings were perpetrated by Fretilin in Ermera and around Maubisse (Ainaro).[13] These appear to have been isolated killings, and reflect the tensions developing in these two areas where support for both parties was strong.

34. The Commission heard corroborated evidence of the killing by Fretilin forces of between ten and 25 people in Maulau village (Maubisse, Ainaro) on 7 August 1975. According to the collective testimony to the Commission, the people of Maulau had become divided in their political allegiances. They recalled a series of events which led to the outbreak of violence. In September 1974 a group of Fretilin supporters moved to the neighbouring sub-district of Turiscai (Manufahi) In January 1975, a conflict broke out between a UDT supporter and a Fretilin delegate during a traditional harvest ceremony in Maulau. In August 1975 tensions increased when a Fretilin leader visited the nearby sub-districts of Turiscai (Manufahi) and Lequidoe (Aileu) and made speeches inciting communal violence. The leader urged Fretilin supporters to "clear the thorns in Lumoluli", an aldeia of the village of Maulau. According to the people of Maulau, this eventually led to an attack by Fretilin forces from Lequidoe, Turiscai and Manumera, (Turiscai, Manufahi) on 7 August. The attackers targeted three aldeias - Maleria, Lumoluli and Ussuli. According to this collective testimony many were killed, hundreds of houses were burned, and livestock were slaughtered or stolen. UDT supporters fled to Maubisse, leaving behind the elderly and children in Maulau.[14]

35. The Commission also received testimony about an unlawful killing by UDT forces. On 10 August a Fretilin delegado named Armando Barros was killed by UDT forces in Lisapat, Aifu (Hatolia, Ermera).[15] On the same day another Fretilin delegado was captured and detained by UDT forces in Gleno (Ermera). The UDT forces attempted to kill him, but he was able to escape.[16]

Killings on 11 August, the day of the UDT armed movement

36. On the night of 10 August, UDT launched its armed movement in Dili. On 11 August there was a spate of unlawful killings across the central and western districts. Most of these cases were perpetrated by UDT members in Liquiçá and Ermera.

Days of chaos and armed clashes in Dili

The residents of Dili witnessed firsthand the events surrounding the armed conflict between the political parties in August 1975.

The Commission heard community members from villages and neighbourhoods in Dili recall their memories from this time.

Colmera (Vera Cruz, Dili)

The people of Colmera recalled that on 11 August 1975 three UDT companies from Baucau, Lospalos and Laclubar came to Dili. The western part of Dili was controlled by UDT. The Fretilin leadership withdrew to the area of Mota Ulun in Bemori on 11 August. The following day, 12 August 1975, Fretilin leaders in Dili "sought the help of the people and Fretilin Regional Committee in Aileu". On 13 August a vehicle came to meet the leadership in Balibar to take them to Aileu. On that day UDT supporters burnt down Francisco Xavier do Amaral's house in Audian, took down the Fretilin flag, and arrested (key Fretilin leaders). On 17 August 1975, Fretilin attacked the Companhia de Instrução (the Portuguese army training centre in Aileu) and took weapons and other material. By 21 August 1975, the Fretilin leadership had established a commission, working with the women's and youth organisations, OPMT and OPJT, to "exercise control and help people who needed food." According to the people of Colmera:

There was no food, and everyone was hungry. All economic activities came to a halt. There was no schooling, no medical services. During that time we could only get medical assistance in Lahane.[17]

Asucai Lorosae (Nain Feto, Dili)

The residents of Asucai Lorosae recalled the days after UDT launched its armed movement:

On 11 August we woke to find that UDT had launched its coup. [Security forces] gathered at the house of a Fretilin leader by the Chinese Cemetery…On 16 August Lemos Pires and the Portuguese chief of staff, Marcelino Barreto, tried to meet [Fretilin leaders] to resolve the conflict…[Fretilin leaders] had already told the troops in Aileu to revolt and disarm the [Portuguese army], and UDT were intent on taking power.

The troops in Dili at the Quartel Geral in Taibessi and PM near Palapaço [were organised] to launch a counter-coup at midnight on 18 August. On 20 August Rogério Lobato was given authority by Lemos Pires to take command of the East Timorese troops and hand over the weapons in the arsenal to him. Civilians received weapons from the Quartel Geral on 22–24 August to reinforce the troops.

UDT followers fled to West Timor and Fretilin started detaining UDT and Apodeti followers in the Quartel Geral in Taibessi and in the Comarca [Balide]. Members of the Fretilin Central Committee came and beat them arbitrarily. In September a Comissão de Policia de Segurança Publica Inquerito Politica Militar (CIPM, Military Police Commission for Police and Security) was formed to "organise the situation". Many in the Comarca died of illness and many were injured."[18]

Bemori (Nain Feto, Dili)

The people of Bemori described the disruption to ordinary people's lives:

In 1975 the situation became heated. People began to throw stones at each other, to fight each other using spears and machetes. Some people dug cellars as a place to hide. Between October and December, everyone had left their homes and hid in neighbouring areas. Some fled to hide in caves for three months. The food situation was difficult. Many grew hungry, but nobody died of starvation.[19]

Unlawful killings by UDT in Liquiçá

37. The Commission received corroborated evidence that on 11 August 1975, UDT forces, led by M1, conducted a series of attacks in the village of Darulete (Liquiçá, Liquiçá), an area near Fazenda Kaitugloa, owned by the Carrascalaõ family. According to witness testimonies, the attacks, which were aimed at apprehending a local Fretilin leader named Afonso dos Santos, resulted in the death of two civilians, known as Mau Manu and Lakucai.[20]

38. An eyewitness to the killling, the son of the victim, Mau Manu, told the Commission that eight armed members of UDT, including M1, M2, M3, M4, and M5, shot and killed Mau Manu, a local villager who was running away from his house towards the hills. Guilherme Martins told the Commission about his father's death:

It was around 8.00am on 11 August, Senhor M1 and his members came over with four guns; FBP, two Mauser and a pistol….After arriving at our house, my father, Mau Manu, went out of the house and started to walk toward the hill. Senhor M1 and his members then started shooting from the direction of the road. A bullet went through my father's neck and it came out of his forehead. Instantly, my father collapsed to the ground although he was not yet dead. Then, a member of Senhor M1's group, M4 found my father and gashed his left shoulder three times, once in his left side of his neck, waist and three times behind his knee with a machete. Then my father died.[21]

39. Immediately after the killing of Mau Manu, the same group of armed men killed another villager, named Lakucai. Lakucai was an elderly man, who was blind in one eye. He worked as a cook and washer for a clerk in the local court. According to testimony provided by his wife, Adelina Freitas, Lakucai was killed after Mau Manu's murder. He was beheaded, and his head was put on a stake in front of the house of Afonso dos Santos in Darulete. The armed men took Afonso's car when they did not find him at home. Adelina Freitas told the Commission she had to collect her husband's head from the front of Afonso's house. She wrapped the head in a Timorese woven cloth, a tais, reunited his head with his body which lay about 500 metres away, and buried her husband in a grave next to their house in Darulete.[22]

40. In another incident, UDT detained Fretilin supporters, leading to at least one killing. On 11 August UDT forces entered an area called Pukemenan, in the village of Leotela (Liquiçá, Liquiçá). They detained seven Fretilin supporters. According to Marcal da Conceição, one of the seven men, Paul Madeira, was stabbed to death. The others were brought to the village of Dato (Liquiçá, Liquiçá).[23]

Killings by UDT in Manufahi, Ermera and Aileu

41. In some districts UDT's 11 August movement directly led to violent clashes and killings. Some of these killings were clearly of armed party supporters. Others involved the killing of unarmed civilians.*

42. The Commission heard testimony about a killing in Manufahi District. UDT leaders and supporters actively went looking for Fretilin members. They found Carlito da Silva, a Fretilin supporter, and killed him in a place called Fore-Udo in Letefoho (Same, Manufahi) on 11 August 1975.[24]

43. In Ermera, on the same day, a local UDT leader, M6, reportedly arrested and killed Maumanu, a Fretilin supporter at Talitu on the border of Railaco Kraik.[25]

44. In Aileu on 11 August there were violent clashes that resulted in three people, Mali Bere, Mariano, and Antonio, being killed. In the chaos, the killers were not identified. However, civilians in Henrian, Madabeno (Laulara, Aileu) later suspected that three members of UDT were responsible for the killing. They arrested a man named Martinho, who at that time was the local liurai, and two others, Domingos and Basco.[26]

Unlawful killings following the UDT armed movement, 12–17 August

45. In the week between the UDT armed movement and the launching of the Fretilin counter-coup on 18 August, unlawful killings occurred regularly in several of the central and western districts. Most of these killings were perpetrated by UDT members. In some cases local Fretilin leaders were targeted.

* The distinction between civilian and an armed party supporter during this period in many cases is difficult to conclusively establish.

Killings by UDT supporters in Liquiçá

46. Starting with the killings described above on 11 August, over the next three days marauding bands of armed UDT forces killed at least eight civilians. Two out of the eight were beheaded, and the heads displayed, in separate incidents, in front of the houses of local Fretilin leaders. Only one of the eight victims was a Fretilin leader. From witness accounts the other victims seemed to be innocent bystanders.

47. On 13 August 1975 UDT supporters killed and beheaded a local Fretilin leader in the village of Leotela (Liquiçá, Liquiçá). According to the testimony of Brigida Martins, the daughter of the victim, four armed members of UDT came looking for João Martins, a local Fretilin leader, in his house in Banitur, Leotela. Discovering that he was not home, the armed men torched his house. He was later captured by another UDT supporter in an area of the village called Pukemenaro. In front of his brother, wife, and child, he was tied up and forced to walk. One of his captors, M10, took his spear and stabbed João Martins from behind. As a result João Martins collapsed from loss of blood in an area called Rai Robu. M10 beheaded João Martins, calling out "Long live UDT, I have cut the head of Fretilin". He took the head to the Kaituglao plantation (Darulete, Liquiçá). According to witness testimonies, an elderly woman member of UDT known as M11, played a role in inciting this killing by encouraging or ordering the killer to act.[27]

Rising tensions in Maubisse, Ainaro

Many of the cases of unlawful killings were the result of disputes between neighbouring communities. In some cases the violence was politically motivated. However, in others local disputes were behind the violence as much as the UDT-Fretilin political divide.

The people of the villages of Manelobas, Manetu, and Edi, in separate discussions with the Commission, recalled a clash in Manelobas and Manetu during August between UDT forces from Ermera and Fretilin forces from Turiscai. The community in Manelobas told the Commission that after this initial clash Fretilin forces shot and killed two members of the UDT forces from Ermera in Ernaro, Manelobas (Maubesse, Ainaro). UDT forces then burned houses and killed livestock in Manelobas. Fretilin captured two UDT supporters and brought them to Turiscai where they were killed. Another UDT supporter was killed at the village centre in Ernaro. He was beheaded and his head was brought to Turiscai. Fretilin supporters fled to Turiscai.[28]

In Manetu, most people joined ASDT and then Fretilin. The liurai, however, established a UDT branch. The community of Manelobas remembered that UDT forces from Ermera came and burned houses, killed and stole livestock. In a shoot-out on the river border with Manelobas, two UDT soldiers were killed. Fretilin supporters fled to Turiscai. At the mouth of the river in the aldeia of Boro Ulu, Manetu (Maubisse, Ainaro) bordering Turiscai, Fretilin killed a villager who had worked for the liurai of Manetu.[29]

The people of Edi recalled the same event. However, they described a four-day attack conducted by UDT forces from Ermera, Atsabe and Maubisse, in which many houses were burned and livestock killed. They also recalled the killing of two Fretilin supporters, one of whom was beheaded. They told the Commission of the disappearance of the local liurai who fled to Aileu where he was detained by Fretilin. He was never seen again.[30]

In the village of Maulau, on 14 August, Fretilin supporters from Turiscai burned eight houses in Laka Malikau, Maulau (Maubisse, Ainaro). This attack took place a week after the previous attack by Fretilin forces on 7 August on this village (see above), and as a reaction to the UDT armed movement on 11 August. A group of 30 UDT forces were summoned from Ermera. Eventually, a Fretilin leader, Januario Soares, and the company commander and his men arrived and told the people: "There are no longer parties, but everyone belongs to the Maubere people's party (Fretilin), and there will be no more killing." By that time 37 people, mostly UDT supporters, had been killed.[31]

48. In a separate incident on 13 August 1975, UDT supporters in the neighbouring village of Asumano (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) gathered at the house of M12, the local UDT leader. They raised the UDT flag.[32] According to testimony received by the Commission, this group of men, which included M13, M14, M15, M16, M17, M18 and M19, walked to the house of the village head of Asumano, bringing with them an elderly man who was believed to hold sacred powers (lulik). They conducted a ritual ceremony underneath a flagpole and became increasingly agitated. At this time, a man named Mau Besi approached the crowd and the group suddenly assaulted him. He was chased down with a spear and machetes, and finally captured and beheaded. His head was put on a stake under the flagpole in front of the house of the village head. The ritual ceremony resumed. When it was over, the head of Mau Besi was brought to the house of M12.[33]

49. The Commission also heard that on the same day up to six others were killed in the aldeias of Siskualema and Hatumatilu, Asumano (Liquiçá, Liquiçá), and that arrests of Fretilin members and others followed the killings.[34]

Isolated killings by Fretilin and UDT supporters in Aileu and Manufahi

50. The Commission received testimony that on 13 August two members of UDT, Manuel de Jesus and Alberto Sousa, were arrested by a group of Fretilin supporters (M20, M21, M22, and others). The two victims were to be taken to Remexio in Aileu. After meeting with another group of Fretilin members, the two victims were executed at the river between Acumau (Remexio, Aileu) and Darlau.[35]

51. Bere-Sera told the Commission of the killing of her father, Maubere, in the aldeia of Betulalan, Aitutu (Hato Builico, Ainaro) on 14 August 1975. UDT forces killed him, then burned his house. Francisca Bere-Sera buried the remains of her father.[36]

Killings by UDT supporters in Ermera

52. On 11 August, UDT members arrested a group of Fretilin supporters including Anacleto Pires, Martinho dos Santos, Antonio de Deus, Abel Pinto, and José Bosco. They were tied to a flagpole by UDT, then detained for 40 days. On 14 August the local UDT leader, M6, took the local Fretilin secretary, named Vicente, to Aifu where he was killed. This provoked a violent clash between UDT and Fretilin members at Dukurai (Letefoho, Ermera), leading to the death of at least one civilian, named Mau Bere Mencoi.[37]

53. Another killing occurred in the sub-district of Hatolia (Ermera) on 15 August. UDT forces captured five men, Marcelino, Rasi Batu, Maumeta, Maubuti Maubere and a Fretilin delegate named Julião. They were tied together and brought to a location called Guntur, Leimea Kraik (Hatolia, Ermera). Julião was then taken to the river bed and shot dead.[38]

Mass killings by UDT and Fretilin in Turiscai and Laclubar

54. In a cycle of violence and counter-violence UDT and Fretilin supporters killed each other in the village of Fatumakerek (Laclubar, Manatuto) and the sub-district of Turiscai (Manufahi). In August 1975, UDT forces from Soibada, Laclubar, and Barique assembled 300 men in Fatumakerek to attack the Fretilin base in Turiscai on 19 August. Fretilin was better armed, and defeated the attack. However, according to Francisco Barbosa, the UDT attack killed three Fretilin supporters – Antonio Barbosa, Tito Manuel, and a man known as Jacinto.[39]

55. According to witness testimony, Fretilin forces attempted to intervene to stop the violence. In an interview with the Commission, Francisco Xavier do Amaral recounted that he sent 11 members of Fretilin from the Sub-district of Turiscai to meet UDT supporters in the neighbouring village of Foholau (Turiscai, Manufahi). According to him, the delegation was sent to Foholau to prevent further fighting between members of the two communities, who had close familial ties but opposing political affiliations.[40] Mateus Soares, one of the survivors of the killing that followed, described to the Commission:

When the political party conflict broke out in August 1975, I was in Turiscai. During that time UDT organised attacks in various areas including Laclubar, Soibada, and Turiscai. I don't know why the attacks were made or how many people died. After they had finished they went back to Foholau in Turiscai, where UDT made their headquarters.

Francisco Xavier do Amaral initiated a mission involving 11 Fretilin fighters, led by Geraldo Barbosa. The goal of the mission was to go to Foholau to talk with UDT about the two parties working together. We walked to Foholau, but as soon as we arrived UDT militants attacked and captured us. They gave us no chance to explain why we had come. They just tied our hands and began to torture us.

Later we were taken to Laoda in Fatumakerek, where the torture continued. We were not given any food or drink. In the area of Laoda there was a traditional house. Outside this house UDT supporters were sharpening their weapons on a whetstone. They proudly displayed their machetes, spears, swords and arrows. Then someone inside the house started a traditional ritual. He came out and started running, jumping and shouting according to the ritual. We were still tied up and we were very afraid. When the ritual ended they pulled us onto a mound near the house and then toward the edge of a gorge. They stabbed my friends with spears and pushed them toward the gorge. I was tied to a friend.The [UDT] supporters threw a machete in our direction. It missed and cut the rope that tied us together. I threw myself into the gorge even though my hands were still tied behind my back. They threw rocks and spears into the gorge. One of them hit…our leader, Geraldo Barbosa, who was still alive when he fell into the gorge. Only three of my friends survived this massacre, José Morena, Gaspar, and one other.[41]

56. After this incident, Fretilin supporters from Turiscai retaliated, reportedly killing six people.[42]

Unlawful killings between 18–20 August

57. On 18 August, Fretilin mounted its response to the UDT movement of 11 August. Although UDT continued to commit unlawful killings, from this point onwards Fretilin became the major perpetrator.

Mass killings by Fretilin in Aileu

58. One district where a number of unlawful killings occurred during the days following Fretilin's armed insurrection was Aileu, where Fretilin had set up its headquarters after the 11 August movement. Domingos da Silva Soares told the Commission that on 19 August a Fretilin leader named M23 and a group of Unetim (Fretilin youth wing) members arrested Afonso Mesquita. He was taken to the detention centre in Unmenlau

(Laulara, Aileu). Afonso Mesquita's father, Mau Loe, arrived to enquire about his son, and was himself arrested and detained. Afonso Mesquita managed to escape. As a result, his father was killed by a Unetim member. His body was thrown into the Berloi River Fatisi, (Turiscai, Manufahi).[43]

59. Joanico Pereira told the Commission that a group of eight men were detained in Fatisi (Laulara, Aileu) by Fretilin on suspicion of being UDT spies. On 20 August the eight were taken out, and five of them killed at the Berloi River, Fatisi. The remaining three were killed near Fatisi. The eight killed were Mannusa, Antonio, Leandro, Mausoko, Maukuta, Laubelam, Maimeta and Manuel.[44]

Revenge killings by Fretilin in Liquiçá

60. In a discussion with the Commission, the people of Asumano (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) recalled that Fretilin members began to retaliate against the killings perpetrated by UDT the week before (See account in sub-section entitled "Killings following the UDT armed action, 12–17 August", para 45-46). On 20 August Fretilin forces raised their flag in the aldeia of Hatumatilu Asumano (Liquiçá, Liquiçá). Fretilin captured and detained 40 UDT followers and then took them to Leorema (Bazartete, Liquiçá). Most of them were later released on the orders of Graciano da Silva, a Fretilin leader who had been detained by UDT. However, eight detainees were killed in an area called Fatubessi, in the aldeia of Hatumatilu, Asumano.[45]

61. On 20 August 1975 Fretilin forces from Aileu abducted seven members of UDT who were at the Fazenda Kaitugloa in Liquiçá, the scene of previous killings by UDT.* They were brought to Darulete where they were executed in an area called Mampatia, Darulete (Liquiçá, Liquiçá). The seven victims included four men named Evaristo, Mau Loe, Maubuti and Maulaku.[46] One of the witnesses to the killings, Carlos Vicente de Sousa, was wounded during the UDT attack in Darulete. He explained his view of the violent events to the Commission:

> We must speak objectively. That a war took place is part of our history. UDT started it, then Fretilin avenged the killings during the "counter coup". At the time, there was little respect for humanity or justice. Seven people were killed in Darulete.[47]

62. This incident was corroborated by the community in Darulete during a discussion with the Commission.[48] The people of Darulete also recalled that in addition to those killed, 50 others were detained. But as in Asumano, the intervention of the local Fretilin leader, Afonso dos Santos, secured their release.

* Fazenda Kaitugloa was a coffee plantation owned by the Carrascalão family. A number of killings occurred in the surrounding area during the period of the internal conflict. See accounts in sub-section "Killings on 11 August, the day of the UDT armed action" and "Killings following the UDT armed action, 12- 17 August" (par. 45-46).

A killing by UDT forces in Ermera

63. In his testimony to the Commission Abel de Oliveira Pinto told about the killing of a man named Mausoco Meugoco in Sandato (Letefoho, Ermera). He was shot by UDT forces led by M24. Mausoco was beheaded and his head brought to the town of Letefoho.[49]

Killings between 21 August and 30 August, the major period of the internal armed conflict

64. During the conflict with UDT, Fretilin had the support of most of the East Timorese members of the Portuguese military, and the armed conflict was fought primarily in Dili. Its military superiority meant that Fretilin quickly gained the upper hand. By early September UDT forces were in retreat and fighting between the two sides had virtually ended. However, the killing of civillians continued. These killings were perpetrated by both sides, but primarily by Fretilin. Both sides are known to have perpetrated mass killings during this period.

Killings of detainees by UDT in Palapaço, Dili

65. After UDT took control of Dili on 11 August, Fretilin supporters were detained at the UDT headquarters in Palapaço, Dili. The Commission has received evidence regarding the deaths of three men in the UDT-controlled detention centre in Palapaço. The three men were: José Siqueira, Domingos Conceição, and José Espirito Santo.[50]

66. The Commission has received corroborated evidence regarding the killing of one of these detainees, José Siqueira, a member of the Fretilin Central Committee, on 24 August 1975. According to Mário (Marito) Reis, who witnessed the killing, José Siqueira was agitated because while in detention he had been unable to take the medicine he needed for a specific medical condition he suffered. He began shouting. This drew the attention of the prison guards who were from Ermera. One of them opened fire, killing José Siqueira instantly. The body remained in the prison until the following morning.[51]

67. The following day, 25 August 1975, Marito Reis again witnessed the apparently accidental shooting death of two men, Domingos Conceição and José Espirito Santo. Marito Reis told the Commission that at about 5.00 that afternoon he, the two men, and another elderly man left the area where they were held to go to the toilet, escorted by an armed UDT guard. Suddenly, a mortar shell from Falintil forces dropped somewhere near Palapaço. The armed guard was surprised by the noise and pulled his trigger. The bullet went through José Espirito Santo's body and entered Domingos Conceição's body. Both prisoners died.[52]

Portuguese nationals killed during the internal conflict

Although the majority of the Portuguese nationals withdrew to a "neutral zone" in Farol and played no part in the armed conflict, some became involved. The most prominent of these was Lieutenant Colonel Rui Maggiolo Gouveia, the head of PSP (Policia Segurança Publica, Public Security Police). He was captured by UDT on 11 August, and three days later formally declared his support for UDT.[53] After the Fretilin armed insurrection, Colonel Maggiolo Gouveia was arrested and detained by Fretilin, first in Dili, then at Aileu, until his execution by Fretilin in December.* Although Colonel Maggiolo Gouveia was the highest ranking Portuguese national killed, there were other executions. One of these was Lino Cowboy, who was killed by Fretilin in Same in January 1976. [54]

Mass killings by Fretilin in Ermera

68. In their collective testimony to the Commission, the community of Laclo Village (Atsabe, Ermera) recalled a massacre perpetrated by Fretilin on 22 August. They told the Commission that Fretilin troops from Aileu and Maubisse entered the village of Paramin (Atsabe) and killed 11 people falsely accused of being members of Apodeti.[55]

69. Also in Ermera, a UDT member named Antonio Exposito was killed in Tokoluli (Railaco, Ermera) on 30 August. The local Fretilin leader, M25, arrested three UDT members. Later, Antonio arrived, and was beaten and then shot. His body was thrown into his house and burnt.[56]

The killing of a detainee by UDT in Ermera

70. The Commission heard testimony regarding the unlawful killing of a detainee in Ermera towards the end of August by UDT forces. The killing occurred on 26 August when a Fretilin member named Antonio Salsinha escaped his UDT captors in the village of Poetete (Ermera, Emera). He was in a bad condition, having been beaten by UDT forces. He returned home to get medical attention. However when the UDT forces discovered his escape, they went to rearrest him and on 27 August shot him dead.[57]

Massacre of detainees by UDT in Wedauberek (Mahaquidan, Alas, Manufahi)

71. The Commission heard evidence on the killing of 11 Fretilin supporters at a beach called Meti Oan, in Wedauberek on 27 August 1975. According to Ilidio Maria de

* See section on Fretilin Killings, para 177.

Jesus, the son of one of the victims, UDT forces detained 11 Fretilin supporters in Alas on 11 August. The detainees included members of the Fretilin youth organisation, Unetim. The UDT members who made the arrest included, amongst others, M26, M27, M28 and M29. The Fretilin detainees were held in Alas from 11 to 16 August and on 17 August they were moved to Same. On learning that Falintil forces from Aileu were approaching, the UDT supporters took the detainees south to the coast and killed them. Ilidio Maria de Jesus, who saw the bodies immediately after the killings, described them to the Commission:

> The UDT coup d'etat occurred and UDT started arresting people. Among those taken prisoner was my father, José Maria. He was held in Alas from 11 to 16 August and then taken to Same until 24 August. When Falintil was advancing on Same from Aileu, UDT members fled to Natarbora, Manatuto, taking 11 Fretilin prisoners with them. Their original plan was to kill the prisoners in Natarbora but the people of the area refused to allow it.
>
> On the morning of 27 August, a truck was driven past our house with the 11 prisoners in the back. The prisoners were surrounded by armed guards, but apparently they were not tied up. My father raised his arm and made a fist as they drove past. We heard that they were being taken to Besusu [Alas, Manufahi]…UDT had warned us that if we didn't want to be killed we should flee to the forests, so my mother, younger brothers and sisters and I fled to a nearby hilltop. While we were there we heard gunfire coming from Meti Oan beach, Wedauberek.
>
> Four days later, on 31 August, Falintil troops from Same found the bodies on the beach in Meti Oan. The other prisoners who had been killed with my father were the Regional Secretary, Nurse Ponciano; the Vice Secretary, Sabino Soares Pereira from Pikuario who was a cattle farmer; the Second Vice Secretary, Bernardino Hornay; the Deputy Delgado, António Guterres; Domingos Lobato, the president of the student organisation Unetim; Chiquito Kaduak, Francisco, Domingos Ribeiro and Alexandre da Costa, all members of Unetim; and Tonito Ribeiro, another member of Unetim who was just 17 years old. Tonito and Domingos [Ribeiro] were the sons of Nurse Ponciano. That same day we went to the site of the massacre at Meti Oan beach and found ten bodies, including my father's. My father had been shot in his stomach. His hands were covered by his own intestines which had come out of the hole in his stomach. Domingos Ribeiro's hand had been severed from his body.[58]

Killing of Apodeti leader by Fretilin in Same (Manufahi)

72. Fretilin forces entered Same on 27 August. By then most of the UDT forces had fled east towards Baucau and Viqueque Districts.[59] Monis da Maia, then Second Secretary for Apodeti in Manufahi District, told the Commission about the detention and killing of Celestino da Silva, Regional Secretary of Apodeti:

On 27 August, the Fretilin army entered Same. UDT had fled east. We remained in Same and went to witness the army's arrival. As soon as the Fretilin soldiers saw me they caught me and beat me until I fainted. I was taken to a school along with several others, including Celestino da Silva. Antonio Cepeda, a Fretilin leader, came to the school. He ordered Celestino to clean up the mess in the toilet. When Celestino was carrying out this task, a Fretilin soldier shot him dead with a Mauser [rifle]. The rest of us were held in the school for two days.[60]

73. Monis da Maia also told the Commission about an incident where he thought the detainees were about to be executed, including himself. However, unexpectedly, the Fretilin commander, Mau Hunu, changed his mind and the execution was halted:

At the flag raising ceremony, 11 of us were brought out of the prison to be killed. At the last minute Mau Hunu changed his mind, saying, "If they are all killed, who will we govern after independence, trees and stones?" So we were taken back to prison. [61]

Unlawful killings by Fretilin supporters in Aileu

74. On 22 August 1975, Luis Casimiro, a UDT supporter, was shot in the hip by José Tilman, a Fretilin member. At the time, he was hiding underneath a bed in his in-laws' house in Nunurema (Maubisse, Ainaro). According to his wife, Rosa Pina Meneses, he was dragged along the street towards the local hospital. His wounds were treated by a doctor. Against medical advice, Fretilin militia took Luis Casimiro to Aileu. Luis Casimiro's family believe that he was later executed in Aissirimou (Aileu Vila, Aileu) on 26 August 1975, based on information given to them by a neighbour, a Fretilin supporter, who said he witnessed the killing. They also suspect that a family member with a personal vendetta was involved in the murder.[62] However, according to Lucas da Costa, who was in charge of guarding Portuguese prisoners in Aileu, Luis Casimiro died in detention in Aissirimou from the gunshot wound he suffered in Maubisse.[63] Francisco Xavier do Amaral, a distant relative to Luis Casimiro, described this case in his testimony to the Commission. According to his testimony:

I know he died because I was always with him since he was the in-law of my older sibling. I asked my brother to go to Maubisse to save him, but he was not there, he had run away…Generally [people were killed because of the] political problem, [but] there were people who used this politics to take their own actions…and Luis's case is one of these cases.[64]

75. In another case described to the Commission, on 30 August Fretilin killed two men, Francisco de Araújo and Duarte de Araújo in Ainaro. These killings were carried out by Fretilin forces commanded by M33. The victims' bodies were thrown into the river at Surale-Barele.[65]

Execution of detainees and other killings in September

76. The pattern of killings in September is closely linked to the withdrawal of UDT through the western districts of Timor-Leste towards West Timor. On 24 September, the UDT forces crossed the border at Batugade into West Timor. The majority of reported killings during this period occurred in Ermera, including a mass execution on 1 September.

Mass killings of detainees by UDT in Klaek Reman (Ermera, Ermera)

77. As advancing Fretilin forces gained control of Dili and Aileu, UDT forces in Ermera resorted to increasingly desperate measures. Early in September, UDT had been defeated in Dili. Although UDT was still strong in Ermera, Fretilin forces were pushing westwards.The Commission was told that on 1 September 1975 at least 30 detainees were executed by retreating UDT forces in Ermera, four in Klaek Reman (Ermera, Ermera) and 26 in Aifu (Ermera, Ermera). Manuel Duarte survived the killing in Klaek Reman. He told the Commission about this incident:

> On the morning of 12 August 1975, I was captured and taken with four others to Aifu. In Aifu there were many prisoners. They tied us up and made us lie on the ground like pigs. We were held there for over two weeks. On 20 August, in response to the counter coup in Dili, UDT fled to Ermera. M6 moved us from the prison in Aifu to a prison in Ermera. We were kept there for five days. We were packed in on top of one other with 70 people in one cell. The toilet was just a drum in the middle of the cell.
>
> On 1 September, a UDT commander ordered the armed forces to take Lorenço dos Santos, Armando Barros, Miguel Salsina, Vicente, Armando and myself to Aifu to be killed. Before we arrived in Aifu we met members of the [UDT] armed forces and their commander coming from the direction of Aifu and we were ordered to go to Klaek Reman, Ermera.
>
> In Klaek Reman they took our wristwatches and money, and we thought we were going to be killed. We met a second group of prisoners there who had also been heading for Aifu. We didn't speak to each other. We just prayed.
>
> A group of 70 prisoners was taken to Aifu. There were two children in this group. They were my relatives. That group was shot with rifles. Some were killed and some survived.
>
> Six of us were taken to Klaek Reman. Lorenço asked for time to pray before we were killed. Then they stabbed us with spears. We rolled down a cliff into a coffee plantation by the river. The soldiers followed us and hit my jaw until it broke. Then they lay us all in a row, covered our bodies with a tarpaulin, branches and pieces of wood, and left us there to die. My hands were tied with wire but I managed to push aside the branches and wood and get up. I drank some water which made me sick and then hid in a small cave made by a dried up waterfall... In the early evening I found some tall grass nearby and collapsed, totally exhausted.[66]

78. Manuel Duarte managed to crawl to the house of a friend. A local nurse gave him medical treatment. The following day, 2 September, Fretilin forces arrived and he was transported to Dili where he received medical treatment from the Red Cross. According to Manuel Duarte, two of the six among the group executed at Klaek Reman survived, Lorenço dos Santos the Fretilin Regional Secretary for Ermera, and himself.[67]

Mass killings of detainees by UDT in Aifu (Ermera)

79. Florentino de Jesus Martins was in the group of detainees taken by UDT to Aifu to be executed. In his testimony to the Commission, he corroborated the chance meeting with the six detainees who were brought to Klaek Reman to be killed. He related the story of the execution of at least 26 detainees in Aifu, on that same day, 1 September 1975:

> M34 was the person who gave orders to kill the detainees. But Senhor M34 received the mandate to murder the detainees from M6 and Senhor M35. As we arrived at the residence of M35 in Aifu, they told us to take a break first. Then we were brought out in small groups, of around four people, to clean the grass in front of the house. We were just sitting...
>
> [All of a sudden] my friend, Virgilio Exposto, and another one, were taken to the corner of the warehouse and were shot. The gun fired and we started to cry. We thought "this is it, we're all going to die". Then another four people were taken out to be killed, and the gun fired. Those people who were taken to be killed, their hands were all tied, and then they were shot with a Mauser (rifle).
>
> After those people were killed, there were 30 of us left. Then M34 gave an order to stop the killing for a moment. We were still sitting on the terrace. I think it was because M34 received a card from Pedro Lemos [Falintil, Ermera] that said, "Senhor M34, you must release the 70 or so prisoners immediately. Tonight. Aifu has been surrounded, and our forces are coming from Hatolia and Loerema."[68] The other remaining detainees and I were released the following morning. But some had escaped that evening. According to witness testimonies, 26 people were executed in Aifu. Added to the four people who were killed in Klaek Reman, this means that at least 30 detainees from the UDT prison in Ermera were killed on 1 September 1975.[69]

Killing of a UDT detainee and disappearance of Apodeti leader by Fretilin forces in Railaco (Ermera)

80. The Commission received evidence indicating that as Fretilin established its ascendancy in Ermera during early September, it too resorted to killing. In September 1975 Fretilin forces entered the sub-district of Railaco (Ermera). Approximately 50

UDT supporters, including a man named Mateus Soares, sought protection at the house of Daniel Carvalho, the Regional Secretary of Apodeti in Ermera. Eufrazia de Jesus Soares, the wife of Daniel Carvalho, recalled how her husband told her to put a white cloth in front of the house to indicate their neutrality in the conflict. Daniel Carvalho wrote a letter to the Fretilin commander, pleading that Fretilin forces not use violence in Railaco. When Fretilin entered Railaco, Daniel Carvalho surrendered the 50 UDT supporters to Fretilin troops. However, without any warning, Mateus Soares was taken from the group and executed. Eufrazia de Jesus Soares told the Commission what her husband told her about the incident:

> My husband said, "I didn't know it would turn out like this. I thought if they surrendered they would be safe. But then someone was killed. I feel guilty, I shouldn't have given them over, I should have let them go…now I feel terrible, because they shot someone."[70]

81. According to Eufrazia de Jesus Soares, a few days later, Daniel Carvalho was captured by Fretilin troops and brought to Aileu. Later on, he was moved together with other detainees to Same in Manufahi. His family never saw him again.

Killings of detainees by Fretilin in Aileu

82. The Commission was told of a series of killings perpetrated during early September. On 28 August a Fretilin group arrested and detained nine UDT members in Aileu. On 3 September the Fretilin group arrested eight more UDT members. Two people were killed, one named Major Lorenço, and another, a member of Apodeti. A third victim, Simplicio, was killed at Soibada (Manatuto) and was beheaded. Another man, Abilio Amaral, was also killed by Fretilin at Daisoli, Fatubosa (Aileu Town, Aileu).[71]

Unlawful killings by Fretilin forces in Manatuto

83. The Commission received testimony about the killing of ten UDT members in Manatuto in September 1975. On 4 September Fretilin forces attacked the village of Hatukonan (Laclo, Manatuto) and arrested 12 UDT members. Nine of them were taken to Makati and killed. On 7 September another victim, Pascoal Bernardo, was detained by Fretilin and then tied beneath a flagpole. He was shot and then beheaded.[72]

Mass killing of UDT detainees by Fretilin in Katrai-Kraik and Ermera (Ermera)

84. The Commission has received corroborated evidence regarding the killing of seven UDT supporters on 15 September by Fretilin forces in the village of Katrai-Kraik (Letefoho, Ermera). These killings appear to have been cases of Fretilin taking revenge for the UDT executions on 1 September. According to an eyewitness to the killings, Adelino Maia, Fretilin forces led by a man M36, and two Fretilin militia named M37 and M38, detained seven UDT supporters in the village of Katrai-Kraik. The UDT members included Teti Mau, Mau Saka, Lequimau, Caetano, Maurema, Saka Bere and

Mau Bere. They were brought to a location called Germano, in the village of Katrai-Leten, where they were executed.[73]

85. The killing of a captured UDT commander was described to the Commission. Captain Miguel Martins was a UDT commander from Ermera who was captured by Fretilin in Cailaco (Ermera) while attempting to escape to Indonesian West Timor on 15 September. He was taken to Bobonaro and then back to Ermera. On 25 September he was brought before a "popular justice" hearing by Fretilin. The Fretilin leader, M39, asked the assembled people: "If you answer 'Go to Aileu!' he lives. If you answer 'Stay in Ermera' he dies."[74] Most of the people, among the crowd were families of victims of UDT violence, and they answered 'Stay in Ermera'. Then M39 ordered two Fretilin members to tie Captain Miguel Martins up. Captain Miguel Martins asked permission to pray, thanked the public for the cross he was given, and asked his oldest child to look after her younger brothers and sisters. The two Fretilin members then took him to Dadesan in Ermera and shot him.[75]

Other killings

86. The Commission received reports of unlawful killings during this period that do not seem to fit into the general patterns described above. One example was the killing of 12 Apodeti members by Fretilin supporters in Bobometo (Oesilo, Oecussi), some time in September.[76] Another was the arrest of 11 Fretilin members on Ataúro by a village head, Antonio Maria Gomes, a UDT supporter. Four of these men were killed by UDT.[77] These killings appear to be isolated incidents that occurred in districts that otherwise experienced little violence during that period. They demonstrate the impact of the internal conflict on Timor-Leste society, and the fact that it provoked killings in places across the territory.

Political responsibility for the internal armed conflict

At the Commission's National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, both UDT and Fretilin party leaders addressed the sensitive issue of responsibility for the internal conflict and its large death toll. The following are some excerpts of what they had to say.

Domingos Oliveira, then Secretary General of UDT:

And from this [11 August] movement the crisis arose that others have spoken about. People killed each other, many people. I regret that many people were killed. Not just Fretilin killing UDT, but UDT also killed Fretilin. UDT killed three people in the prison in Palapaço... and Fretilin reacted to the killing in the prison. Many UDT prisoners also died, so many died. Some were killed in Aileu, some were killed in Maubisse, and others were killed in other places. We need to slowly carry out an investigation so that we can understand where they died.

João Carrascalão, then a member of the Central Committee of UDT:

I want to begin by saying to you all that I did wrong against my community. All the UDT victims that Fretilin killed, it is my fault. All the Fretilin victims killed by UDT, it is my fault. Because I initiated the 11 August movement. I accept full responsibility to establish the truth. If you look for who was to blame, you don't need to look so far. I was at fault. I will carry the weight of this. It is important, friends, if you want to point the finger, only point it at me.

There was no order to arrest Fretilin members and take them to prison. We were surprised to see that the prison was suddenly full. There was no order from the [UDT] Central Committee. This action was spontaneous…and many people acted for their own personal reasons, [because of what had happened in] earlier years, and they grasped this opportunity and just took people arbitrarily…Every day I went to the UDT prisons and released 50 to 60 people.

So there was no control. Who is at fault? I am at fault. I accept this. You do not need to look for many people to blame. So many people killed, close to 1,200…We forgot our biggest responsibility…I did wrong, because I did not understand the Timorese people."

Francisco Xavier do Amaral, then President of Fretilin:

There was a lot of confusion. Everybody was heated, their blood ran hot, and because of this they beat each other, violence happened. When this one won he would take vengeance on that one. When that one won he would take his vengeance on this one. This is what happened in 1975. This is a problem in our country. For example, some people who worked in a place and were fired. They took vengeance on their superiors when they had this chance. They took out their hatred. They beat each other until they were killed…This is part of the Timorese character. When your blood is hot, these things happen. We say that yesterday you beat my father, my child, my younger brother, without any reason, and so the hatred begins. This is always here.

Mari Alkatiri, then a senior political commissar of Fretilin:

[During] the earlier aggression in August and September, so much happened and many people were killed. We killed each other…as I said in my earlier testimony…During the war between UDT and Fretilin many people died. Some people say up to a maximum of 3,000. I do not believe 3,000 people died in this war, but we will know more clearly in the future.

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances during the Indonesian occupation (1975–1999)

Unlawful killings by Indonesian military before the invasion in December 1975

Western districts (August–December 1975)

87. Indonesian military incursions into the western districts of Timor-Leste began in late August 1975. They were conducted by three groups of special forces troops, named Team Susi, Team Tuti, and Team Umi. These units worked in conjunction with a group of East Timorese known as Partisans, who were trained, armed and led by ABRI.[78]

88. The covert operations undertaken by the Special Forces teams and the Partisans took place between August and December 1975. The three teams entered Timor-Leste through the border with West Timor. They operated separately and then regrouped in Atabae (Bobonaro) in December 1975. The Commission has documented at least 20 unlawful killings of civilians during these months, in the Bobonaro sub-districts of Atabae, Cailaco, Maliana, Balibó and Bobonaro.[79]

89. Claudio Vieira, a Partisan who took part in the covert operations as a member of Team Umi, told the Commission about the killing of two civilians near Mount Taroman by a Partisan named M41 who accompanied Team Umi on their advance on Suai in September 1975. The two unidentified civilians, one man and one woman, were captured and killed by machete. Their bodies were abandoned on the side of the road.[80]

90. In 1975 ABRI soldiers and a Partisan unit led by M42 killed at least two civilians in the sub-districts of Balibó and Atabae.* In an area called Litete in Balibó, the armed group captured a civilian named Bau-Mau. According to a witness's testimony, Bau-Mau refused to surrender the bow and arrow he was carrying. He was then captured, his house was burned and his livestock stolen. He was killed and his body dumped in an area called Aipasrah. [81]

91. From data gathered by the Commission, the largest number of deaths from pre-invasion covert military operations took place in the district of Ermera. According to Marciana Gracia, Indonesian forces infiltrated the sub-district of Atsabe in September 1975, coming through Cailaco (Bobonaro). In the aldeia of Coileki, in the village of Baboe Leten (Atsabe, Ermera) they captured and killed four UDT prisoners being held by Fretilin, Mau Butar, Berleki, Beremau and Mausico. They were beaten and killed in Haulete, Malabe Village (Atsabe, Ermera), under orders from the commander of Battalion 403 and the Partisan commander, M43.[82] The Commission received testimony from the same deponent about the killing of four other civilians, Casimiro

* This witness also told the Commission of a combatant casualty. Talo Bere, who was a Falintil soldier, was shot dead by this group in Pona Ahi (Balibó, Bobonaro).

Soares Gomes, Letisiga, Berhali and Loe Mau in four seperate incidents in Atsabe. Two of the four were working in the fields when they were killed.[83]

92. The Commission received corroborated evidence regarding a large number of civilian deaths on 8 September 1975, in Aifu (Atsabe, Ermera). According to Florentino de Jesus, Team Susi under the command of M44 entered Ermera, at dawn. In Hatolia (Ermera) fighting broke out between them and Falintil forces. Two people were killed, one on each side. Team Susi, which was made up of ABRI and Partisan members, retreated to Haekesak (Atambua, West Timor, Indonesia), then returned to Ermera by way of Asulau and Matarobu-Borro (Ermera). Florentino de Jesus told the Commission that dozens of civilians were killed when Team Susi arrived in Aifu. Among the casualties was Helder Varela, the son of the former Sub-district administrator. Florentino de Jesus also told the Commission that a Falintil soldier, Celestino Soares, was killed during this attack.[84] Information about this attack was corroborated by Tomás Gonçalves, an ex-Partisan member, who told the Commission that at least 70 civilians were killed.[85]

The killing of five journalists at Balibó

93. In the early morning of 16 October 1975, a covert Indonesian military force led by Team Susi under the command of Captain M44 (codenamed Major Andreas) launched an attack to take the town of Balibó (Balibó, Bobonaro).[86] Tomás Gonçalves estimated that some 700 men in total were involved in the attack, including hundreds of East Timorese auxiliaries and a para-comando force backing up Team Susi itself. Indonesian forces first bombarded Balibó from both the north coast and from the direction of Maliana, and then launched a ground attack from three directions.[87] During the attack, five journalists from two Australian television networks were killed. Greg Shackleton (29) and Tony Stewart (21) were both Australians, who with Gary Cunningham (27) from New Zealand worked for Melbourne's Channel Seven network. Brian Peters (26) and Malcolm Rennie (29), both British, worked for the Sydney-based Channel Nine network. The journalists had been in Balibó since 13 October covering the story of the Indonesian covert operations inside Timor-Leste and in anticipation of an Indonesian attack on the town.

94. The deaths of the journalists in Balibó have subsequently attracted a great deal of international attention. The Australian government commissioned two inquiries into the deaths, in 1995 and 1998 led by Tom Sherman. Two recent books investigating the deaths of the five journalists – Cover-Up (2001) by Jill Jolliffe and Death at Balibó, Lies in Canberra (2000) by Desmond Ball and Hamish McDonald – both contain important new information. Ken Conboy's Kopassus (2003) provides information on the military operation to seize Balibó based on interviews with Indonesian military sources who took part in it. In mid-2000 the UNTAET civilian police (Civpol) established a Historical Crimes Unit within the National Investigation Unit (NIU) and began an investigation into the deaths in Balibó. As part of this investigation, on 22 March 2001 the Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Sérgio Vieira de Mello, wrote to the Attorney General of Indonesia requesting interviews with nine suspects believed to be in Indonesia. The Attorney General turned down this request on the grounds that the Indonesian Parliament had not ratified a memorandum of understanding on witness cooperation between UNTAET and his office, thereby effectively ending the Civpol investigation.

95. All inquiries into the deaths have been limited by the fact that the remains of the journalists, buried at the Tanah Kusir Cemetery in Jakarta, have not been subjected to scientific investigation and that key witnesses in Indonesia have declined to give testimony to the various official inquiries. The material presented here concentrates on witness testimony provided to the Commission on the circumstances of the journalists' deaths.

Guido dos Santos

96. Guido dos Santos, then a 24-year Fretilin medical orderly, has long been a central witness to the events at Balibó. He gave his first eye-witness account soon after the event.[88] In August 2000 he participated in a re-enactment in Balibó organised by Jill Jolliffe. Guido dos Santos was not interviewed by Tom Sherman as he was in Timor-Leste at the time of the Australian government initiated inquiries.[89]

97. The Commission interviewed Guido dos Santos in July 2004 and recorded a video interview with him at the square in Balibó in September 2004. In this video interview he explained that the journalists beckoned to him while he was standing near the large banyan tree at the point where the Cova Road enters into the square.[90] He was defending the square against the attacking troops coming over the Portuguese Section, but then realised that enemy soldiers were already at the Maliana road on the opposite side of the square. He then saw one journalist fall. He thought that the journalist was shot, although he is now not sure whether he had dropped to a lying position in an attempt to avoid the gunfire.* At almost the same time as he saw the journalist fall, Guido dos Santos also saw and heard the remaining journalists shouting "Australia, Australia" with their hands up. Rather than go in the direction of the journalists, he instead ran towards the backyard of another Chinese shop-house facing the square, along the edge of the football field of the school and behind the large banyan tree, and then climbed up the side slope of the fort. He continued to hear the journalists shouting for about two minutes until he reached a path where he felt secure. Guido dos Santos confirmed to the Commission, as he had said in earlier interviews, that the man he saw fall down was "big and bald", a description that fits Brian Peters.[91] In his video-recorded interview with the Commission, Guido dos Santos was confident in pointing to the first house on the Maliana road as the place where the journalists were actually killed.

Olandino Guterres

98. Olandino Guterres was a UDT supporter who fled to Indonesian Timor from Balibó, trained in Haekesak in West Timor, and then returned to Balibó with the

* In an interview by CAVR with Elias Lopes, a UDT member who joined the attacking force on Balibó, he stated that he saw one foreigner had come down from the residence alone. However, he claims that he was ordered away by the Indonesian troops, and then subsequently heard firing. [CAVR Interview with Elias Lopes, Kampung Merdeka, Comoro, Dili, 27 July 2004].

attacking force. The Commission interviewed Olandino Guterres in June 2004 in Dili. He told the Commission that he was standing behind the house where the journalists had been staying:

> There was a voice, "Tembak. Maju." (Shoot! Advance!). I heard the sound of AKs firing. They began to shoot. It was already light…Moving back a little, I saw them all enter the house. I also entered. I saw there three Australian journalists, inside the house. The bodies were on the chairs, one precisely at the window. When I was still standing looking like that, Yunus ordered, "Heiho, get out. You go there. Guard down there. Don't stay here."[92]

99. Olandino Guterres told the Commission that he then went to the back of the house. He said that all the doors of the house were open and he could see what was going on inside. He heard an Indonesian soldier saying: "If you don't come out, I will throw a grenade":

> Maybe the Australian journalist heard the word "grenade" [granat in Indonesian], and he came out with his hands raised…I heard him say: "I am sorry, I am tourist" [in English]. It was M45 who got him out. When he'd got him out, he immediately struck him with his commando knife. The fifth one came out of the bathroom…[and] he [M45] stabbed him in the back.

100. Olandino added that Captain M44 had ordered M45 to take out his knife.[*]

Tomás Gonçalves

101. In 1975 Tomás Gonçalves was the commander of Apodeti troops at Balibó who were attached to the para-commando group led by Captain Ali Musa.[†] In April 1999 he fled to Macau after he refused to lead a militia group. The Commission interviewed Tomás Gonçalves in October 2003, May 2004 and September 2004. He also gave testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76 in December 2003. According to Tomás Gonçalves, at about 6.00am he saw four men come out of the house, one in front and three behind. He could not hear what they were saying but thought they were surrendering. Then he saw soldiers firing. He saw Yunus Yosfiah, Ali Musa, and Kirbiantoro in the group of soldiers surrounding the house. He believes that they too were firing, but he could not recognise exactly who was firing. At that time there was no shooting coming from the Fretilin position. Continuing to fire, the soldiers went into the house, and then dragged the bodies of the journalists inside where they were burnt to ashes on a pile of wood fuelled by gasoline.

* CAVR Interview with Olandino Guterres. "M45" has been identified as a local assembly member between 1992 and 1997 in Baucau [Jill Jolliffe, op. cit., pp. 281-301].

† He had told Jill Jolliffe that he was with Kirbiantoro, but in his interviews with the Commission he consistently said that he had been part of the group that had attacked from behind the Portuguese Section and that this group was led by Captain Ali Musa.

Possible sequence of events

102. While these witness accounts are not entirely consistent with each other and they differ in some respects from what the same witnesses have said on other occasions, the Commission believes that it is possible on the basis of these witness testimonies to draw together a coherent account of what happened on that morning. The Commission believes that the following is a credible account based on these testimonies.

103. Around 6.00am, one journalist, possibly Brian Peters, was shot in front of the first house at the Maliana road. The gunfire came from the attacking troops advancing along the Maliana road, who were just about to reach the square when Guido dos Santos saw the journalist fall.* One possible reason why the journalist was on the road was that he had just come down with a camera from the hill and tried to go back to the house when he accidentally came across the advancing troops.† The journalists at the house shouted "Australia, Australia" with their hands up and they continued to shout for about two minutes. Tomás Gonçalves said he saw four persons being fired at in the doorway of the house, one in front and three behind. It was impossible for him to see the first journalist fall down because it occurred when Guido dos Santos was still at the edge of the square and Tomás Gonçalves was not there at that time. What he saw was the Indonesian soldiers deliberately firing on the remaining journalists and them enter the house while firing continued. Some of the journalists might have fallen at the doorway. But at least one journalist escaped into the house and was killed at the rear of the house, possibly by M45.

104. The Commission also believes that members of ABRI dressed up the dead journalists bodies, some or all, in uniforms and then photographed them with machine guns. While there is little consistency in the witness accounts given to the Commission regarding the disposal of the journalists' bodies, all sources agree that they were burnt in Balibó.[93]

Conclusions

105. The Commission believes that this account is consistent with the information available to it. It implies that the five journalists were not killed in crossfire or as an unfortunate side-effect of the Indonesian operation to take Balibó. In addition to the attempts of the journalists to identify themselves to the Indonesian soldiers, there is considerable evidence that the attacking force had prior knowledge of the presence of Australian journalists in Balibó, including an admission from General Moerdani that he had received reports to that effect.[94] The Commission also believes that official and semi-official Indonesian accounts of the events in Balibó suggesting that members of the attack force found the bodies of the journalists after they had taken the town are not consistent with any of the evidence that it has received.[95] The Commission does not

* The account of Lucas Jeronimo, although his statement was not recorded as evidence, supports this hypothesis.

† Lucas Jeronimo's account that he saw a journalist filming and then falling down is also consistent with this version of events. See the article reproduced in Tom Sherman, Report on the Deaths of Australian based journalists in East Timor in 1975, 1996, pp. 31-32.

claim on the basis of its own limited inquiry into these events that it is in a position to reach definitive conclusions on what happened in Balibó on 16 October 1975. However, it does believe that its own findings support the case for further investigation of the elusive truth of this matter.

Unlawful killings by Indonesian military during the invasion of Dili 7-8 December 1975

106. The Indonesian military launched a full-scale invasion of Dili at dawn on Sunday, 7 December 1975. Indonesian warships fired mortar and cannon rounds into Dili for about one hour, after which Indonesian troops parachuted into the heart of Dili and marines landed at Kampung Alor (Dom Aleixo, Dili), to the west of the city centre. Troops from the Special Warfare Command (Kopassandha) were divided into three teams, each of which was assigned to secure a particular strategic location.

107. At 4.30am several hundred Indonesian marines in amphibious tanks and personnel carriers landed on the beach at Kampung Alor. Just before dawn on 7 December the first sortie of nine Indonesian air force planes entered their drop formation over Ataúro Island, flew west toward the Wetar Straight, and then approached Dili from the east. At 5.45am paratroopers began to jump. Indonesian paratroopers who landed to the west of the Governor's building along José Maria Marques Street also encountered strong resistance. There were several Fretilin militia posts in the area. One of these posts was on the ground floor of the Red Cross building, from where Fretilin militia engaged in heavy fighting with the invading paratroopers.

Unlawful killings of ethnic Chinese civilians in Colmera, 7 December 1975

108. On the morning of 7 December Indonesian troops approached the Toko Lay building, located next to the Red Cross building on José Maria Marques Street. An Indonesian paratrooper whose parachute had gotten caught on the top of the building some time earlier was hanging dead in front of the building. The Indonesian troops ordered the occupants of Toko Lay to come out of the building. The Commission has received information that there were about 20 people staying in the building, all of whom were ethnic Chinese.[96] An ethnic Chinese man named Tsam Yi Tin and his son (possibly named Tsam Meu Tang) came out of the building next door. The Commission received information that the Indonesian soldiers shot Tsam Yi Tin dead and that his son was wounded by a bullet but survived.[97] The individuals who had been staying in Toko Lay were taken to the port.[98]

109. The Commission received corroborating evidence regarding this incident. Erminio da Silva da Costa told the Commission that when he accompanied Brigadier General Benny Moerdani around the city later on that day or the following day, they encountered an ethnic Chinese woman near the Lay store whose husband had been shot. Erminio told the Commission that the woman asked for help burying her husband and Moerdani replied: "I am sorry if there was a mistake. I am responsible, and I am sorry."[99]

Table 2: Victims next door to Toko Lay, morning of 7 December 1975, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
1. Tsam Yi Tin	Shop assistant	Age ~50, from Turiscai	Killed
2. Tsam Meu Yang	-	Son of No. 1	Injured

110. That morning Indonesian troops in Colmera ordered all residents to come out of their homes and places of business. According to witness testimony, the Indonesian soldiers, wearing green berets, wanted to search for weapons in their homes. While conducting this search, the troops found a group of ethnic Chinese people who were hiding in a gutter behind the house of Li Nheu Ki on Sebastião da Costa Street. A witness told the Commission that he heard that people had been killed at a house nearby and wanted to bury them. When he looked out of the doorway of the house where he was staying he saw the corpses, but was afraid and went back inside.[100]

Table 3: Victims at the home of Li Nheu Ki, morning of 7 December 1975, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
1. Li Nheu Ki	-	Age ~60	Killed
2. Pu Kim Seong	San Tai Hoo employee	Age 48	Killed
3. Lay Siu Siong	-	-	Killed
4. Yong Yung Nhang	-	Age ~60	Killed
5. Istri Yong Yung Nhang	-	Age ~60	Killed
6. A Fa [Lay Kim Fa?]	Cook/store clerk	Age ~22	Killed
7. Li Chap Pin	Carpenter	Age ~30	Killed
8. Jong Kui Jung	The wife of No. 7	Age ~30	Killed
9. Li Chap Kang	-	Age ~40	Killed

111. The Commission has received information about at least five other ethnic Chinese people killed in the Colmera area on 7 December. Around midday a businessman named Lay Kim Chang, aged about 38, came out of his store and was immediately shot dead by Indonesian soldiers, who then took his expensive wrist watch. In the afternoon an Indonesian military informer identified a shop-owner named Lay Chung To, aged about 60, as being a Fretilin member and having a Fretilin flag. He was immediately shot dead. Three other individuals are also reported to have been executed.[101]

Table 4: Other ethnic Chinese killed on the morning of 7 December 1975, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
1. Lay Kim Chang	Store owner	Age ~38	Killed
2. Lay Chung To	Store owner	Age ~60	Killed
3. Jong KongYi	Businessman	Age ~60	Killed
4. Wong Seu Fa	Employee of Fa Qui	Age ~50	Killed
5. Lay Si Leong	-	-	Killed

112. The ethnic Chinese people staying in Toko Lay were taken to the waterfront. In 1984 a man named Chong Kui Yan told Amnesty International that the occupants of Toko Lay were taken to the Sporting Club, where they were threatened at gun point, then led to the entrance to the harbour, where they were again threatened. The women and children were told to go to the Chinese school and a group of 16 men were ordered to dig a large grave in the park, in which dead Indonesian soldiers were later buried.[102]

Killings at the Assistencia building, 7 December 1975

113. At the time of the Indonesian invasion of Dili many families were living in the newly constructed Portuguese Department of Social Affairs (Assistencia) building, located on the southeast corner of Albuqueque Street and Caicoli Street. These families had taken refugee in the new Assistencia building because their homes in Vila Verde and other neighbourhoods had been burned down in August during the armed conflict between UDT and Fretilin.

114. On the morning of 7 December, Fretilin sympathisers who had previously received military training gathered at the 15th Hunter Infantry Company (Companhia 15) building in Caicoli to look for weapons and munitions. The commander of Companhia 15 was not present. Alberto de Oliveira Camara told the Commission that the Fretilin militia members fired on the descending Indonesian paratroopers. The fighting continued until the Fretilin militia members ran out of bullets and fled.[103]

115. Early in the afternoon, Indonesian soldiers approached the Assistencia building. The soldiers discovered an Indonesian paratrooper who had become entangled in the electrical cables in the morning and had been shot. According to Francisco da Cunha, a former Portuguese military police officer:

> A Captain was shot dead by the Falintil of Caicoli Company- Casa Quinze. We were beginning to exchange fire with ABRI/TNI at the time. Our forces were no longer able to hold, however, so we retreated to join the Balide Company.[104]

116. The soldiers lowered the dead soldier. At the time a Fretilin flag was flying on the flag pole next to the garage, to the west of the old Assistencia building. After securing the area, the soldiers brought the dead soldier over to the flag pole, lowered the Fretilin flag, then ordered all of the civilians to come out of the new Assistencia building.

117. The family of Bernardo Muniz was staying on the second floor at the back of the building, and so were among the last to leave the building. Bernando's daughter, Felismina dos Santos da Conceição, who was 12 years old at the time, told the Commission that from the second floor of the building she looked across the street and could see two dead Indonesian soldiers and a dead Fretilin soldier near the flag pole next to the ambulance garage at the old Assistencia building.[105]

118. The Indonesian soldiers ordered the civilians to gather in the field across the street from the new Assistencia building. Indonesian soldiers also ordered civilians in the Villa Verde neighbourhood to gather in the field. Francisco Soriano told the Commission that he and his family hid in the house of a Portuguese Military Police officer named Santos because the house was well built and could withstand bullets. However in the early afternoon the house was hit by a bullet and the inhabitants of the house went outside. Indonesian soldiers told them to gather in the field across the street from the Assistencia building.*

119. The soldiers separated the men from the women and children. The women were told to pray and the Indonesian soldiers searched the group of up to 80 men.† The soldiers then told the group of men to go to the Companhia 15 building, next door to the old Assistencia building, where they were ordered to bring all goods out of the building. Felismina dos Santos da Conceição, who was in the field with the women and children, told the Commission that she saw her father and Sergeant Mesquito carrying goods from Companhia 15 outside. After this, the men were taken to the side of the building. Francisco Soriano told the Commission that he saw two dead Indonesian paratroopers there.[106] The men were told to line up in rows. Francisco Soriano told the Commission:

* CAVR Interview with Francisco Soriano, Dili, 4 July 2004. See also CAVR Interview with Alberto de Oliveira Camara, Dili, 17 August 2004, who told the Commission that he heard from Josefina Pereira Noronha that Josefina's husband, Lourenço Pereira, had been shot by Indonesian soldiers in Vila Verde on the morning of 7 December 1975.

† CAVR received several pieces of information about the number of men involved. Francisco Soriano, interviewed on 4 July 2004, told the Commission that there were 60-80 men involved.

[After] leaving the Company, ABRI ordered us to form lines…ABRI pointed their guns at us and ordered us to move, and we lined up. Three rows, or three lines. We were ordered into lines, but we didn't understand Indonesian. Once we were in lines, they [ABRI] began discussing something. All I could make out was the writing on their shirts – 501. Green hats…we were in three lines, and they were long lines.[107]

120. The Indonesian soldiers had a discussion for 10 to 15 minutes. Three of the soldiers then aimed their weapons at the group of East Timorese men. When he saw this, Francisco turned around to run. The soldiers then opened fire on the men. As he ran, Francisco could see that two of his friends had been hit by bullets. Domingos Pinto Faria was hit in the head and fell. Manuel was shot in the thigh. After running for about 100 metres, Francisco was hit by a bullet in the back.

121. Domingos Soares told the Commission that he was among the group of men when the shooting took place. He stated:

I was in the first line. After I fell, [I realised] that a bullet had hit me right in the arm. A Chinese friend was in line with me, he was also shot, and fell down dead across my body. and I saw that there were many dead. But I only know a few names: Jacinto Candido and Tomás Conceição – both of them my teachers – and Domingos Urbano.[108]

122. Felismina dos Santos da Conceição told the Commission that shortly after the group of men had been taken to the Companhia 15 building, she could hear gunfire that lasted for 15 to 20 minutes, as well as the sound of several grenades exploding. After some time, one of Felismina's friends, a girl named Isabel, stood up and took some water to the location of the shooting. When Isabel arrived at the location the Indonesian soldiers were moving away in the direction of a building called Sang Tai Hoo, in Colmera. Isabel returned to the group of women and reported that all of the men had been killed.

123. Hearing this, Felismina and several women went to see what had happened. When Felismina reached the Assistencia building, she saw that the men had been shot and body parts were strewn about the location. Felismina found her brother, Jacinto Fereirra Simões, aged 17:

I lifted up my brother's head straight away and placed him on my lap. I gave him some water. Soon after, my lap was wet. Then I realised that the water I had given my brother had spilled out through his neck onto my lap. Not long after, he died in my lap.[109]

124. Felismina and her friends then returned to the field, and together with the other women and children went in the direction of Vila Verde. On the way she saw her father, Bernardo Muniz, coming from the direction of the Military Police headquarters on Albuqueque Street. He was covered in blood. Bernardo Muniz told his daughter that he was not injured; the blood was from the other men who had been killed.

125. The Commission received information from several informants about the number of victims at the Assistencia building. The figures range from 23 individuals to a high of 60 to 70 individuals.* The Commission has been able to identify the following victims:

Table 5: Identified victims from Assistencia, Caicoli, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
1. Domingos Pinto Faria	-	-	Killed
2. Domingos Xavier	Military Police	From Viqueque	Killed
3. Antonio Mesquita	2nd Sergeant	-	Killed
4. Manuel	Servant in Santos home	-	Killed
5. Graciano de Carvalho	Nurse	-	Killed
6. Rosa Lay	Ambulance driver	-	Killed
7. Jacinto Fereirra Simoes	-	Age 17	Killed
8. Jacinto Candido	Teacher	-	Killed
9. Tomas Conceição	Teacher	-	Killed
10. Silvino das Neves	-	-	Killed
11. Luis Antonio Salsinha	-	-	Injured
12. Domingos Urbano	-	-	Injured
13. Antonio de Araújo	Former soldier	-	Injured
14. Francisco Suriano	Fretilin militia member	Age 17, from Dili	Shot in the back
15. Carlos Afonso	Unetim member	-	Shot in hand

* CAVR Interview with Alexandrino do Rego, Dili 22 August 2004. He said that he counted 23 corpses at the scene. Felismina dos Santos da Conceição, interviewed by the CAVR in November 2003, and Filomeno Gomes, interviewed 25 June 2004, both said that there were "tens" of victims; see also CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [A3], Dili, 16 August 2004, who said there were 40 victims, both men and women; see also James Dunn, Timor: a People Betrayed, Jacaranda Press, The Jacaranda Press, Milton, Queensland, 1983, p. 284. See also Amnesty International, East Timor Violations, pp. 27-29.

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
16. Domingos	-	-	-
17. José de Carvalho	-	-	-
18. Cico Badak	Tourist	-	Injured
19. Bernardo Moniz	-	Died 1981	-
20. João Brito	Fretilin militia member	From Ermera	-
21. Domingos Soares	-	Age 9	Injured

126. Domingos Freitas told the Commission that two days after the Indonesian invasion of Dili he went with a woman named Candida and her child to look for Candida's husband, who was a Portuguese Military Police officer. Behind the Companhia 15 building they found dozens of decomposing corpses that had been partially eaten by animals.[110]

127. On 9 December, members of the Indonesian military ordered several East Timorese civilians to burn the bodies behind the Companhia 15 building. According to Filomeno Gomes, Indonesian military personnel forced him to burn decomposing corpses at a location between the Companhia 15 building and the current PLN (Electricity Services) building.[111] Similarly Alexandrino do Rego told the Commission that he burned 23 bodies next to the old Assistencia building. He could only identify two corpses: Rosa Lay, an ambulance driver, and Graciano de Carvalho, a nurse.[112]

Corpses at the Portuguese Military Police compound

128. The Commission has received information about corpses seen at the Military Police compound, located next to the new Assistencia building on Albuqueque Street. Sebastiana Henrique Guterres Soares Belo, who was a Unetim member, told the Commission that on 8 December 1975 she went from Taibessi to the Caicoli neighbourhood to look for food. She said that she saw two Hino trucks enter the Military Police complex. Curious about what was going on inside the complex, Sebastiana said that she climbed a tree so that she could see into the compound. There she saw Indonesian soldiers and East Timorese civilians loading corpses onto the truck.[113]

Executions in Matadouro, 7 December 1975

129. On the afternoon of 7 December, Indonesian troops approached the Matadouro building, a public slaughterhouse for cattle during the Portuguese time, located about 400 metres south of the Assistencia building at the end of Albuqueque Street. After seizing power in August 1975, Fretilin established a militia post there.[114]

130. The Commission received various information about individuals executed in the vicinity of this building, with some variation in detail. One informant told the Commission that after Indonesian troops landed on 7 December local residents remained in the area and some of the men assisted the Indonesian troops, who had set up a post on a hill overlooking the area.[115]

131. Mid-afternoon on 7 December some of the women, children and old men who had remained in the field across from the old Assistencia building made their way south to Matadouro. Late in the afternoon, however, Indonesian troops ordered many of the locals out of their homes. According to Maria Filomena Godinho, her father showed the Indonesian soldiers "an Apodeti membership card and flag." She told the Commission that late in the afternoon on 7 December:

> ABRI came straight to our house and ordered us to get out…In Matadouro we were split into two groups, men in one group and women in the other. Then the men were all shot dead. I saw ABRI shooting them. I witnessed that with my own eyes.[116]

132. Three individuals were killed together, including Maria Filomena's father, Vicente Godinho, her older brother, Teodoro Godinho, and the owner of the house in which they were staying, Lourenço. According to another informant:

> Four members of ABRI came to Lourenço's house, and began to beat him, along with two of his friends, Teodoro Godinho and Vicente Godinho, using their rifle butts. One of Lourenço's children, Domingos Pereira, arrived, and begged the perpetrators to cease torturing the victims. So one of the four ABRI members dragged Lourenço, Teodoro and Vicente out to the garden and shot them dead. Then Fransisco Xavier arrived, and began protesting the perpetrators' actions. So one of the perpetrators shot Fransisco Xavier dead also, in the garden of the Matadouro house.[117]

133. Acacio da Costa Carvalho told the Commission that on 10 December 1975 he heard that several of his family members had been shot by Indonesian soldiers at 4.00pm on 8 December. Acacio heard about the killings from his mother and aunt, both of whom witnessed the killings. They described how Indonesian troops set up a post on the hill south of Matadouro, called the men outside, searched each house, and then executed three individuals: Acacio's father, Julio da Costa, one of Acacio's uncles and Francisco Xavier (also know as Mausale).[118]

134. Another witness provided information about three more individuals killed in the Matadouro area on the afternoon of 8 December:

> On 8 December at 4.00pm, José dos Santos, who had just got out of hospital [in Lahane], with two of his friends, Manuel Febu and Duarte da Silva, were killed by ABRI/TNI in Matadouro. My child, Liberatu dos Reis Soriano, witnessed the incident. Their bodies were not buried.[119]

135. A number of other informants told the Commission that they had heard about the executions at Matadouro. One informant said that he was with a group of Kostrad soldiers which arrived at Matadouro at about 4.00pm on 8 December and saw three corpses at the location.[120]

136. The Commission has found that the individuals listed below were killed by Indonesian troops in the vicinity of the Matadouro building:

Table 6: Identified victims in the vicinity of Matadouro on 7-8 December 1975, as reported to the CAVR*

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
1. Vicente Godinho	Pegawai negeri	Age ~50	Killed
2. Teodoro Godinho	-	Son of no. 1	Killed
3. Laurenco da Conceição	-	Home near Matadouro	Killed
4. Francisco Xavier Luis Pereira	-	Relative of no. 5	Killed
5. Julio da Costa	-	Age ~50	Killed
6. José dos Santos	-	-	Killed
7. Duarte dos Santos	-	-	Killed
8. Manuel Febu	-	-	Killed

Maloa River killings, 7 December 1975

137. João Dias Ximenes told the Commission that he was at home in Bairo Pite on the morning of 7 December. He said that he and his family stayed in their house all morning, but that at 2.00pm Indonesian soldiers entered Bairo Pite and told everyone to come out and line up. At about 3.00pm the local residents heard that a number of civilians had been killed at the Maloa River (Bairo Pite, Dom Aleixo. Dili). At 4.00pm João Ximenes accompanied Indonesian soldiers to the site. He saw eight male corpses, but could only identify one of the bodies, that of Crisogono Fraga. Indonesian soldiers told the civilians to douse the bodies with gasoline and burn them. According to João Ximenes, the eight men were killed because an Indonesian soldier had been killed by Fretilin forces.

138. Other informants have also provided information about corpses in the same area. Felismina dos Santos da Conceição told the Commission that on the afternoon of 8

* Other possible victims include Antonio dos Reis, aged 30, Zeca, and Inacio, a former Military Police officer from Viqueque. See CAVR Interviews with anonymous informant [A3], Dili, 16 August 2004; Calistro de Jesus Brito, Dili, 29 June 2004 and Iria de Araújo, Dili, 4 August 2004, Dili.

December she was among a group of woman who moved from Vila Verde to Guarda Colmera, in the Tuanalaran neighbourhood. Near Guarda Colmera the women encountered Indonesian soldiers. The soldiers put one woman into a vehicle that drove away. The soldiers then took five men away with them. When the five men returned they told the group of women that the soldiers had forced them to bury a group of dead civilians at the Maloa River.[121] Similarly, Iria de Araújo told the Commission that on the afternoon of 8 December, following the mass execution in Ailok Laran, Bairo Pite (Dom Aleixo, Dili) she walked down the Maloa River to Bairo Pite and saw a number of corpses at the Maloa River.[122]

Dili wharf on 8 December 1975

139. On the night of 7 December Indonesian paratroopers from both Kostrad and Kopassus stayed in what is now the Hotel Timor building, which had not yet been completed, facing the Dili port facility. An East Timorese informant told the Commission that he and several friends who had been detained by Fretilin at the police headquarters near the Old Market slept at the Hotel Timor on 7 December, where they met with an Indonesian platoon commander named F. Sinaga.[123] On the morning of 8 December a large number of Kostrad and Kopassus were present at the building, having spent the previous night sleeping in the empty building.

140. One witness, who was among a group of six former Fretilin detainees who had slept in the small park in front of Hotel Timor, told the Commission that at 6.00am on 8 December he approached a soldier near the park and asked for permission to wash his face. The soldier gave him permission to go to the large park 50 metres to the west. The witness said that in the large park he saw a dead East Timorese man, aged about 25, wearing civilian clothes and lying face down.[124]

141. On the morning of 8 December, the group of 16 ethnic Chinese men who had been detained in the customs house the previous night were ordered by Indonesian soldiers to continue digging in the park, eventually burying about 20 Indonesian soldiers.[125]

142. On the morning of 8 December, Indonesian soldiers told civilians in various locations in central Dili to go to the port. One informant told the Commission that he was in Colmera with a group of about 20 ethnic Chinese who intended to move to the Taiwanese embassy. The group walked from Colmera to the waterfront, where they were stopped by Indonesian soldiers and told to stay in the street. "We sat there, facing the ocean. We were not allowed to look back at Hotel Timor. There were a lot of soldiers."*

143. Sometime after 8.00am on the morning of 8 December, relatives of Fretilin Prime Minister Nicolau Lobato, including his wife, Isabel, were at a house on the corner of Fernando and Formasa Streets, located directly behind the Bank Nacional

* CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [W2], Dili, 24 August 2004. See also CAVR Interview with Alexandrino do Rego, Dili, 4 February 2004, who told the Commission that he arrived at the Colmera area at about 12.30pm on 8 December and saw Indonesian soldiers ordering people to loot the stores; See also CAVR Interview with Erminio da Silva da Costa, Jakarta, 9 August 2004.

Ultramarino (BNU). This group of 15 people decided to walk to Motael and take refuge at Fr Monteiro's house. In a recent interview Laurinda Guterres Barreto Ximenes, the younger sister of Isabel Lobato, told a local journal:

> We were trying to get to the church at Motael, to seek sanctuary there. When we arrived at the Sporting building intersection, Dili harbour was full of Indonesian soldiers. Our group was ordered to assemble in the Camara Ecclesiastica park.[126]

144. Several witnesses recall seeing Isabel Lobato in front of the port. One stated: "[I] saw Nicolau's wife arrive…She was wearing tais [traditional cloth]."[127]

145. The Commission received information from a number of sources about how Indonesian military personnel treated the civilians gathered in front of Hotel Timor. One source said that Indonesian troops gave the civilians drinks and cigarettes, and asked who belonged to Fretilin:

> [They] asked, "whoever is Fretilin raise your hand?" "Can anyone speak bahasa [Indonesian]?"…nobody raised their hand, but there was someone who spoke Indonesian and they pointed out [who was Fretilin].[128]

146. The Commission has determined that several of the Apodeti members who had been interned by Fretilin from October until 7 December and who slept at the Intendencia building and in or near the port the previous night acted as interpreters for the Indonesian military on 8 December. Furthermore, the Commission believes that several of these former prisoners pointed out individuals in the large crowd of civilians to the Indonesian military. The civilians were pointed out on the basis of their membership in Fretilin or its affiliated associations (for example Unetim), or on the basis of their family relations to prominent Fretilin leaders. Frederico dos Santos Almeida, who was detained by Fretilin in Comarca Balide until 7 December, told the Commission:

> We arrived at [Hotel Timor]. They told us to assemble in front of the hotel. Soon afterwards, Dr. Gonçalves's wife arrived and sat with us. Not long after that, soldiers [ABRI] took Arnaldo [dos Reis Araújo] inside [the hotel]. Then they took Nicolau's wife down to the beach.[*]

147. The Commission has determined that Isabel Lobato was escorted through the east gate into the port area.[†] Minutes later the sound of gun shots was heard. A number of

* CAVR Interview with Frederico dos Santos Almeida, Dili, 29 August 2003. It is important to note that the Commission received conflicting information about who identified Isabel Lobato to the Indonesian troops.

† CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [A3], Dili, 13 August 2004, who told the Commission: "And then they took Mr. Lobato's wife to the port. I saw she was escorted to the port. But I thought at that time they wanted to ask her the whereabouts of her husband." In 1984 Isobel Lobato's sister, Laura Barreto, told Amnesty International that the Commission informant A3 personally escorted Isobel into the port. See Amnesty International interview "Interview with Laura Barreto – 4 July 1984, Lisbon" (mimeograph, 3 pages).

other Fretilin members or relatives of Fretilin members were also selected out of the crowd at this time and all were escorted into the port. According to Erminio da Silva da Costa:

> The person I saw down there [in the harbour] was Senhora Isabel. Her child was crying, still pulling at his mother's skirt. Then Rosa Bonaparte, Borja da Costa and another person [were taken into the harbour]. There were three or four people.[129]

148. An eye-witness told the Commission that shortly after Isabel Lobato was taken into the harbour, he was approached by her sister, Laurinda Barreto, who said that she had heard a shot and asked him to help find out what had happened. He approached a soldier in front of the hotel and was escorted to the harbour. When he went into the port area he saw "dozens" of corpses near the west entrance, including the corpses of two or three women, among which was the body of Isabel Lobato, who had been shot in the back.[130]

Table 7: Identified victims killed or last seen at the harbour on 8 December 1975, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
1. Isabel Lobato	Housewife	Wife of Nicolau Lobato	Killed
2. Rosa Muki Bonaparte	CCF member	-	Killed
3. Bernardino Bonaparte	CCF member	-	Killed
4. Francisco Borja da Costa	CCF member	-	Killed
5. Bimba da Silva	Unetim member	-	Disappeared
6. Roger East*	Journalist	Australian	Disappeared
7. Silvinia [Bimba] Epifania M. da Silva	Unetim member	-	Disappeared

149. After Isabel Lobato, Rosa Muki Bonaparte and Francisco Borja da Costa were escorted into the harbour area there were a number of important movements:

- Several informants have told the Commission that sometime after 9.00am they were taken from the harbour to Kampung Alor, where they met with an Indonesian "commander."[131]

* The Commission did not receive any first-hand information about the death of Roger East. For an account of East's death see James Dunn, Timor: a People Betrayed, The Jacaranda Press, Milton, Queensland, 1983, pp. 286-289.

- Sometime on the morning of 8 December, Major General L.B. Moerdani arrived at the Dili airport on a Twin Otter aircraft, and then proceeded by BTR-50 amphibious vehicle to inspect Dili.[132] He met with Colonel Dading Kalbuadi, Colonel Sinaga, and Naval Colonel R. Kasenda near the Governor's office.
- Some time after 10.00am Erminio da Costa da Silva accompanied Major General Benny Moerdani on a tour of Dili. They visited Toko Lay, where a Chinese woman told them that her husband had been killed by Indonesian troops.[133]
- Another eye-witness told the Commission that at about 10.00am he and several pro-Apodeti friends volunteered to join Indonesian troops on patrol in Dili. He said that his group went from the harbour to the Governor's office, to Toko Lay, to Formosa Street behind the Governor's office, to the Assistencia building, to Matadouro, to Balide, and then returned to the harbour.[134]

Mass executions, early afternoon

150. The Commission has received information from a number of individuals about mass executions on the Dili wharf on 8 December. Alexandrino do Rêgo, who was a military nurse posted at the Lahane Hospital, provided the Commission with detailed information about events at the port in the early afternoon on 8 December. He said that he arrived in Colmera at about 12.30pm and did not see any corpses in the area. Two Kopassandha soldiers then escorted him to the port. On the way, he overheard other Kopassandha soldiers asking an East Timorese man where the communists were, and saw the East Timorese man point at the Chinese shop-houses across the street.

151. Alexandrino do Rêgo told the Commission that he and the two Kopassandha soldiers arrived at the park in front of the harbour, "Then I saw a group of ethnic Chinese being told to prepare the grassy fields in front of the port to be made into graves." He explained that after entering the port facility:

> I was told to stand up and lean against the wall in order to watch ABRI/TNI killing people in the harbour. I was leaning against the wall, facing the sea, and saw ABRI killing people and throwing [their corpses] in the sea… They were ordered to form lines and then were shot all at once. When one group was finished, another group would come forward. Each group was of around 20 people.[135]

152. Alexandrino do Rêgo explained that he was then escorted under the pier to meet with an Indonesian doctor who was in a rubber speed boat:

> After I had witnessed the killing of two groups of people, I was carried under the pier to meet with a doctor, Hadi Santoso, whose rank was Lieutenant-Colonel. Two of his staff accompanied me. It was dark, and they were using candles. They were there in a rubber boat – the doctor along with four members of Tanggo Platoon…I got into the…rubber boat and was ordered to speak with the doctor. So I told him that I was a staff member of the military hospital. The doctor seemed pleased, and gave me some tasks to do…[I] could still hear shooting, and there were still people falling into the water.[136]

153. According to Alexandrino do Rêgo, the two groups of civilians he saw shot on the wharf were indigenous East Timorese, not ethnic Chinese. Alexandrino do Rêgo told the Commission that after speaking with Dr. Santoso, he returned to the military hospital in Lahane.

154. Alexandrino do Rêgo's account of several groups being executed is supported by testimony of Alberto de Oliveira Camara, who told the Commission that from the Motael Church, located about 300 metres from the port, he could see several large groups executed on the Dili wharf.

Only after we heard the gunfire did we go out [of the church] and see the people being lined up and shot…They were shot all at once, because the military were in rows by the wall, and they [the victims] were ordered to stand on the pier…Around 25 to 30 people at a time were shot…They were in a line, or a group – 25 to 30 people at once. While we were watching, perhaps one or two groups had already been shot. Then a new line was formed – a third row, and a fourth.[137]

155. Because of the distance, Alberto Camara could not tell if the victims were indigenous East Timorese or ethnic Chinese.

156. The Commission has been unable to identify any of the individuals executed on the edge of the wharf. However, the Commission has received information about a number of corpses seen on 9 December along the beach and in the sea to the east of the port, and believes that some of these corpses are individuals who were killed at the port in the early afternoon on 8 December.*

Disappearance of ethnic Chinese work party, late afternoon on 8 December

157. On the morning of 8 December, a group of 16 ethnic Chinese men (who had been detained in the customs house the previous night) were ordered by Indonesian soldiers to dig a large grave in the park in front of the harbour. Alexandrino do Rêgo told the Commission that he arrived at the harbour at about 1.00pm he saw the men working in the park. After meeting with Indonesian military doctor Hadi Santoso, Alexandrino do Rêgo was told to return to Lahane. He reached Lahane at about 2.30pm, where he met with his family, and then at about 3.00pm left Lahane with several friends in two vehicles. The group reached the harbour at about 3.30pm. When he arrived he saw the group of ethnic Chinese men were still digging in the park.

* HRVD Statement 03742. The deponent states that on 9 December he saw the corpses of Isabel Lobato and Rosa Bonaparte on the beach in Dili. See also James Dunn, Timor: a People Betrayed, Jacaranda Press, The Jacaranda Press, Milton, Queensland, 1983, p. 288.

I didn't see any more bodies. I couldn't see anyone there [at the harbour]. There was only one person, a Chinese person, outside [in the park]. [They] were still in front of the harbour, digging pits. Still the same [people].[138]

158. Another witness told the Commission that he was in the park in front of Hotel Timor from morning until late afternoon on 8 December. At about 4.00pm Indonesian military personnel told him to lead 127 ethnic Chinese people to Kampung Alor.

[ABRI] told all us Chinese people to go to Kampung Alor. We left the Hotel Timor, then [I] saw some people burying [Indonesian] soldiers. About ten people.[139]

159. Sometime thereafter some of the ethnic Chinese men in the work party were disappeared. The Commission believes that they were executed in the harbour area. The witness who led the 127 ethnic Chinese to Kampung Alor told the Commission that he heard that eight of these individuals were killed and two were released. In a testimony to the Commission, a survivor of these killings, now living in Melbourne, Australia, said:

My uncle Lay Pin Leong, cousin Lai Siu Xian and brother-in-law Leong Yun Fa were taken and we never saw them again. Later I was told that they had been killed. We do not know what they did with the bodies and whether or not they were thrown in the ocean. A soldier grabbed my shoulder - I assumed to take me to where they were killing people. I spoke to him in Indonesian and told him I was from Kupang and that I wanted to return to Kupang one day. The soldier said "you are one of us" and let me go. My brother also spoke Indonesian to the soldier and was let go.[140]

160. The Commission has determined that the following members of the ethnic Chinese work party in the park were disappeared, and are presumed to have been executed in the harbour area, late in the day on 8 December.

Table 8: Ethnic Chinese who disappeared and are presumed to have been executed at the harbour, 8 December 1975, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
1. Lay Pin Leung	Businessman	From Remexio	Disappeared
2. Lay Siu Xian (Assio)	-	Age 19, son of No. 1	Disappeared
3. Lay Siu Chang	-	Age 30, son of No. 1	Disappeared
4. Lay Su Chean	-	From Aileu, age 25	Disappeared

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
5. Chung Tjeo Ching	-	Age 40s, from Liquiçá	Disappeared
6. Lay Mi Fon	Driver	Age 40s	Disappeared
7. Lay Kian Pau	Student	Age 17, son of No. 6	Disappeared
8. Leung Yung Fa (A Fa Qi)?	-	Aged 19	Disappeared
9. Lay Su Po	Shop assistant	From Aileu, age 18	Disappeared
10. Lay To Su	-	From Suai	Disappeared
11. Lay Tin Chang	Shop assistant	Age 22, from Bobonaro	Disappeared
12. Yong Tsoi Sin	-	-	Disappeared
13. Lay Tso In	Student	Age 17	Disappeared

161. Of the 16 ethnic Chinese in the work party in the park, the Commission has been able to identify three survivors. The Commission was unable to determine the fate of the other members of the group of 127 Chinese-Timorese people detained in Kampung Alor.

Executions in Ailok Laran, 8 December 1975

162. The Commission received information about extra-judicial killings along the Maloa River in the Ailok Laran neighbourhood, about one kilometre southwest of the Matadouro building. Iria de Araújo, who was 25 years old at the time, told the Commission that late in the afternoon on 8 December her uncle, Daniel de Araújo, appeared from the direction of the Assistencia building. He was wounded. According to Iria, her uncle told his relatives that they should retreat to the south, but Iria's father, Alfredo de Araújo, disagreed and they remained at their home. Iria de Araújo told the Commission that on 8 December Indonesian soldiers killed a group of men at the Maloa River:

> At around 5.30pm they [ABRI] reached the [Maloa] river bank. We stood up and faced them. We surrendered just like that, we surrendered to them…We faced them and they immediately split us up – men in one group, women and children in the other. The men were driven uphill, and the women were pushed down, onto the road to Matadouro. Then we came to the river in front of Sr. Tomás Ximenes' house. Once there, I looked back. ABRI had begun to gather them [the men] together.[141]

163. Curiously, the Indonesian troops then pulled Iria de Araújo's brother out of the group and questioned him.

My brother Antonio, who was in Fifth Year [of school], was pulled out of the group of men. I was far away, but I could clearly see them pulling him out and separating him from the group.[142]

164. Iria de Araújo explained that the soldiers spoke with Antonio, then executed him. Then the soldiers opened fire on the group of men, killing all of them. Iria explained:

Next [ABRI] surrounded them and then they fired a series of shots at the men. I saw this with my own eyes. I saw with my own eyes that Indonesian [soldiers] shot them. [143]

165. The Commission has determined that 17 individuals were killed and only one survived.* Most of the victims were from Ainaro, and many were members or followers of the monarchist party KOTA.

Table 9: Victims from Ailok Laran, 8 December 1975, as reported to the CAVR†

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
1. Antonio de Araújo	Former Tropas	Age 26	Killed
2. Pedro de Araújo	-	Age ~33	Killed
3. Francisco Xavier Araújo	-	Age 38, father of No. 4	Killed
4. Abilio Israel Xavier Sousa	-	Age 17, son of No. 3	Killed
5. Salustiano de Araújo	-	Age 40, brother of No. 3?	Killed
6. Albino Sousa da Silva	-	Age 15, son of No. 5	Killed
7. José Mendes	-	Age 42, brother of No. 3	Killed
8. Alcino de Araújo Sousa	-	Age 26	Killed
9. Alexandre de A. Carvalho	Former Tropas	Age ~26-28	Killed

* This list of victims is based on a Portuguese language list titled "Nome de alguns massacrados pelos soldados indonésios n Zona da Malao, Ail Loc Laran e Bairro do Matadour, Dili nos primeiros dias (8–12–1975) do ataque indonésio a Dili," (Names of some people killed by Indonesian soldiers in Zona da Malao, Ail Loc Laran and Bairro do Matadouro, in Dili during the first days (8–12–1975) after the Indonesian attack on Dili). [Submission to the CAVR, Anthony Goldstone].

† One other possible victim is Afonso de Araújo, age 39.

Name	Profession	Personal Data	Violation
10. Marçal de Araújo Carvalho	-	Age 23, from Ainaro	Killed
11. Antero da Conceição	-	Age 22, from Ainaro	Killed
12. Adelino de Araújo	-	Age 22, from Ainaro	Killed
13. Luciano de Araújo	-	-	Killed
14. Antonio dos Reis	-	-	Killed
15. Vasco da Silva	-	Age 56	Killed
16. Vidal de Araújo	-	Age 31	Killed
17. Tomás Xavier	-	-	Killed
18. Honório	-	-	Injured

166. Francisco Soriano told the Commission that on 9 December Indonesian soldiers came to Manumeta Raihun and asked several men to help bury corpses. Although he did not bury them himself, his uncle was part of the group who came to Maloa River to bury the 12 people from Ainaro.[144]

167. The Commission received information about a second incident at the same location later on the night of 8 December. According to Iria de Araújo, on the night of 8 December her father and uncle went to the river to see the corpses. Indonesian soldiers fired shots, one of which hit and killed Juvençio de Araújo, Iria's 2-3 year old cousin, who was in the arms of his mother, some distance from the men.[145]

Individual executions and corpses found in Dili

168. In addition to the major cases involving mass killings and executions discussed above, the Commission has also received information about numerous killings and corpses found in Dili during the first few days of the invasion. Less than half of these individuals can be identified by name. Table 10 shows the locations where these individuals were killed or where their corpses were seen.

Table 10: Civilians killed and corpses found in Dili, 7–10 December 1975, as reported to the CAVR

Location	7 December		8 December		9 December		10 December
	Killed	Corpse	Killed	Corpse	Killed	Corpse	Killed	Corpse
Becora	-	-	-	-	-	-	1	-
Bidau Lecidere	2	1	-	2	-	4	-	-
Bairro dos Grilhos	1	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Bairro Formosa	-	5-6	-	-	-	-	-	-
Audian	1	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Museum/ waterfront	-	-	-	6-8	-	4	-	-
Caicoli	-	-	-	2	-	-	-	-
Vila Verde	1	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Lahane	-	-	-	-	-	-	1	-
Ponte Caise/ Harbour	2	-	-	1	-	-	-	-
Mandarin	-	5-6	2	-	1	-	1	-
Motael	-	-	-	-	-	2	-	-
Palapaço	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Bairro Pite	-	1	-	-	-	-	-	-
Maloa River	-	-	-	3	-	-	-	-
Fatumetan	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	2
Kampung Alor	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Location unknown	-	1	-	-	-	-	-	-
Total	14-15	8-9	-	15-17	-	11	4	**-

169. Of these 52 to 56 individuals, 48 to 50 were men, 6 were women, and 11 to 12 were of ethnic Chinese origin. Combined with the major cases discussed in the previous sections, the Commission can provide the following overview of civilian deaths/ executions reported to the Commission from 7 to 10 December 1975.

Table 11: Total number of civilians killed or executed, 7–10 December 1975, as reported to the CAVR

Location	Timorese	Chinese	Australian	Total
Colmera
Next to Toko Lay	-	1	-	1
Individual cases	-	5	-	5
Home of Li Nheu Ki	-	8-9	-	8-9
Assistencia building	23-60	-	-	23-60
Matadouro	8-11	-	-	8-11
Maloa River	8	-	-	8
Harbour
Morning	6-15	-	1	7-16
Mass executions	60-75	-	-	60-75
Chinese work party	-	13	-	13
Ailok Laran	18	-	-	18
Other cases	41-44	11-12	-	52-56
Total	164-231	3	1	203-272

170. The Commission received information about several civilians who were reportedly wounded during the invasion. In addition to those individuals wounded at the Assistencia builiding and the one individual injured in the Ailok Laran mass execution, these include a nine-year-old ethnic Chinese boy seen near the Governor's building and a man named Orlando Costa.[146]

171. Finally, the Commission has received information about several individuals who are reported to have disappeared during this period, but it has not been possible to determine if these individuals were killed in Dili or fled into the mountains.

Unlawful killings by Fretilin after the Indonesian invasion (December 1975 and February 1976)

172. On the day of the full-scale Indonesian invasion on 7 December 1975, many of the senior Fretilin leaders in Dili evacuated to Aileu. With them went the detainees Fretilin had been holding in the Quartel Geral in Taibessi (Dili). On the same day the 100 or so prisoners who had been detained by Fretilin in the Comarca Balide were allowed simply to walk out of the prison; many of them then making common cause with the invading Indonesian force (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, and Torture and Ill-Treatment). In Aileu the approximately 900 detainees who were brought from Dili joined an existing detainee population variously estimated at between 1,000 and 3,000.*

* On the number of detainees brought from Dili, see CAVR Interview with Assis dos Santos [transcript undated]; on the number held in Aileu after the evacuation of the prisoners from Dili, see CAVR Interview with Humberto Martins da Cruz, Dili, [undated].

The Commission has received evidence that several hundred of these detainees were killed in Aileu, Maubisse (Ainaro), and the area of Same (Manufahi) in December 1975 and January 1976 as Fretilin/Falintil retreated from the advancing Indonesian forces. It was also told that several senior Fretilin leaders were directly implicated in the killing. The Commission also received individual statements about executions that occurred in other districts at this time, including Manatuto, Ainaro, Ermera and Lautém, but was not able to investigate these reports further.

Executions in Aileu, December 1975

173. The Commission received testimonies about mass killings which took place in December 1975 at several execution sites near the warehouse in Aissirimou where Fretilin held most of its prisoners. Witnesses testified about killings in Saboria and Aituni, both about 3km from the prison, and in two locations in Aissirimou, both about 2km from the prison. The Commission was also told of two other places, another site in Aissirimou and the Chinese cemetery, where prisoners were reported to have been executed.

174. From the general accounts received from former prisoners held in Aileu, which describe regular night-time executions, it would appear likely that the executions were not confined to the specific events about which the Commission received testimony.

175. One witness, Miguel Fatima Soares, told the Commission that if the man in charge of the day-to-day running of the prison and carrying out of executions, Humberto Martins da Cruz, came to the warehouse where the prisoners were held with a sheet of paper in his hand, it meant that he would call out the names of prisoners to be taken out never to reappear. Two other prisoners, Alexander da Costa Araújo and Serafin do Nascimento, described seeing prisoners regularly being taken away in trucks with their hands tied behind their backs usually late at night. They were taken to a designated place where holes had already been dug and ordered to pray. Another witness told the Commission that in the afternoons it was routine for prisoners to be ordered to dig holes behind the Aileu church.[147]

176. Alexandre da Costa Araújo, in his testimony during the Commission's public hearing on massacres, described the killing of ten detainees in Saboria in December 1975, by a team under the command of Humberto Martins da Cruz:

> My brother Afonso Araújo and I were members of UDT. At the time of the coup d'etat I was living in the village of Saboria and didn't know anything about it. When the Fretilin counter-coup occurred, I was captured and taken to Aissirimou where, along with hundreds of other prisoners from various areas, I was forced to work in the Fretilin communal garden. After some time I was officially freed from the prison. But for several weeks after that I still had to bring firewood to Aissirimou every afternoon and was still not allowed to sleep in my own house in Saboria. After several weeks of doing this I was given permission to sleep at home.

At 11 o'clock one night, when I was sleeping in my house, I heard the sound of a car followed by someone knocking on my door. I felt anxious and afraid. I opened the door and found the head of the prison, Humberto, standing there. I invited him in but he just told me to come with him. I realised then that he was drunk, but I had to do what he said. He took me to a place where a truck was parked with people in the back. There were ten people, but I only knew two of them. One was Maubale from Seloi [Village].

He ordered his men to get the people down from the truck. Then he stood the prisoners in a line, gave them time to pray, and fired a shot. As soon as he fired the shot his men fired their G3 weapons at the prisoners. The prisoners were only ten metres away and died instantly. Humberto then commanded me to call the people of the area to come and bury the bodies.[148]

177. In his testimony to the Commission, Humberto Martins da Cruz, the head of the prison in Aissirimou who led the execution squads, gave a strikingly similar account of what appears to have been a separate mass execution that also took place one night in December 1975. The victims comprised between 23 and 26 detainees, and included the former head of the Portuguese police, Colonel Rui Maggiolo Gouveia, who had sided with UDT after the armed movement. The details of the execution – from the taking of bound prisoners at around 11.00pm to an execution site where a hole that would become their common grave had already been dug, to Humberto Martins signalling with a pistol shot for his squad to open fire – confirm the testimony of others that the executions followed a routine.

178. According to Humberto Martins da Cruz, the decision to execute the detainees was taken over dinner by six Fretilin leaders, who included members of the Central Committee, as well as local leaders and the Falintil commander in Aileu.* Humberto Martins da Cruz recalled:

At 11.00pm they called on me at my house…They came to my house on the way to the place where the prisoners were being held, because we were to take them out to be killed at Aissirimou…It had been agreed at the dinner the previous night that the prisoners would be killed…I carried out the order, and followed them to Aissirimou, to the place where the prisoners were to be executed.

* Humberto Martins said that the following people took the decision to execute the prisoners: José da Silva (Commander of the Aileu company and Falintil deputy chief of staff), Adão Mendonça (head of the Aileu Regional Committee), Alarico Fernandes (member of the Central Committee), Sebastião Sarmento (member of the Central Committee), Luis Castro, Pedro Aquino and Gildo Ribeiro. Other sources wholly or partially confirmed to the Commission that these individuals were ultimately responsible for the decision to execute prisoners (see, for example, CAVR Interviews with Adelino Gomes, Dili, 11 June 2003; José Catarino Gregório Magno Trindade de Melo (Labut Melo), 23 July 2004, and Herminio da Silva da Costa, Jakarta, 9 August 2004).

Upon arrival, I saw between 23 and 26 prisoners standing there, over a pit which had been prepared for them. The prisoners were bound. The pit had been prepared in the afternoon, the day before they were executed. Before they were executed I said to them this is it now, so whoever wants to run away, go ahead. One of them answered me…we came here to die, not to live.[149]

179. Humberto Martins da Cruz said that he then gave the signal to the others in the execution squad to open fire by himself firing a shot in the direction of the prisoners. The squad fired their G-3s and a grenade was thrown.

180. Alexandre da Costa Araújo gave testimony about another mass killing of detainees in an area called Manifunihun in Aissirimou.

One night the people of Saboria Village heard that more than 100 prisoners were being taken from the prison in Aileu to Manifunihun, Aissirimou. Among the prisoners was my son-in-law, Felisberto dos Santos, who had been captured by Fretilin in Soibada. When the people of Saboria heard about the transfer of the prisoners we were very distressed. Several of us went secretly to Aissirimou. Aissirimou is upstream from Saboria so we quietly waded up the river to where the prisoners were being kept. We stopped at a place where we could see the prisoners and several parked cars, but we were still some distance from them. Not long after that we heard gunfire and screaming. The gunfire lasted for about 15 minutes. We didn't see exactly what happened after that because as soon as the screaming stopped we went back to Saboria. To this day no one knows exactly how many people died in that massacre. Some say 90, others say as many as 160 people were killed.[150]

181. About 150 prisoners were moved to Maubisse on 8 December and confined in another warehouse. One prisoner believed that they were being taken there to be killed and were saved because Fretilin troops in Maubisse vehemently opposed the plan. However, two groups of prisoners, one comprising UDT leaders, most of them mestiço, and the other consisting of 30-40 Apodeti leaders, were taken back to Aileu on separate occasions, and were killed there. A member of the Central Committee, Helio Pina (Mau Kruma) who was in Aileu at the time reportedly attended the executions, which were carried out by teams under the command of Humberto Martins da Cruz and his assistant, Pedro Aquino.

The unlawful killings of detainees by Fretilin in Maubisse (Ainaro)

182. A group of 300-400 detainees were evacuated from Aileu on 27 December 1975, as Indonesian soldiers closed in on the town. The detainees were made to carry boxes of ammunition and several of them, weakened by hunger and ill-treatment, reportedly died on the journey. The group arrived in Maubisse the following day, 28 December 1975. João da Costa, a UDT supporter from Same who had been moved to Aileu with other prisoners in September, told the Commission about the execution of a group of detainees in Maubisse on the night of 28 December 1975. The group included Major Lorenço, a UDT leader from Same, Amadio Coelho, manager of the pousada in Maubisse, Celestino and Manuel Belo from Baucau, Jacqes Pan and an unidentified Chinese man. They were taken out and executed at the crossroads that branches off to Turiscai.[151]

183. Another group of prisoners who had been brought to Maubisse was also taken back to Aileu at around this time, apparently to be executed there. One member of the group believes that they were saved through the intervention of Nicolau Lobato:

> [At a bridge called Fatubosa], maybe one kilometre from Aileu…[there were] a lot of people and troops there, military police from the east…They said: "What are you going to do with them? They are our brothers. Why do you have to kill [them]?"…The person in charge…said: "You guys…I've got a letter here from the Vice-President of Fretilin, Nicolau Lobato, asking the car to turn back [to Maubisse]…What happened was that when we were on our way [to Aileu], at the Maubisse-Turiscai crossroads, Nicolau Lobato and Eduardo dos Anjos were there with binoculars watching the [Indonesian] planes bombarding Aileu. He saw our car pass…I don't know what happened, but after we had been in Fatubosa for 10 or 15 minutes the letter from the Vice-President came [instructing the troops] to send back the car.

Killings in Same at the end of January 1976

184. The Commission has received corroborated evidence about a series of executions that took place in Same in late January 1976, as Indonesian forces captured the nearby village of Betano (Same, Manufahi) and began to advance on Same itself.

- On 27 January, seven prisoners, including the Secretary General of Apodeti, José Fernando Osório Soares, were executed at Hat Nipah, Holarua.
- On 29 January, 11 prisoners were taken out of the elementary school building in Same detention for what they presumed was to be their execution; nine of them escaped en route but two were killed.
- On 29 January, about 30 prisoners were killed in the elementary school building in Same.

185. On 29 December 1975, the remaining 300-400 detainees were evacuated south, from Maubisse to Same, with retreating Fretilin forces. They were forced to carry boxes of ammunition on the march to Same, where they arrived the following day. On 2 January 1976 the detainees were divided into groups based on Fretilin's assessment of the level of threat they posed, although in the view of João da Costa, one of those deemed to belong in the "most dangerous (perigosissimo)" category, their jailers were not familiar enough with the individual prisoners to be able to make this judgement. The group thought to be most dangerous, which included the Secretary General of Apodeti, José Fernando Osório Soares, were detained in a cell below ground in the Sub-district administrator's office (posto) in Same Town.[152] Those thought to be less dangerous were held in the town's elementary school.

186. On 27 January, after Betano had fallen to the Indonesians, all the prisoners were moved to Holarua to the house of Major Lorenço, the UDT leader who had been killed in Maubisse one month before. That same night the Central Committee member César Mau Laka came to the house and ordered eight people to be taken out supposedly for investigation.[153] The eight—José Fernando Osório Soares, the Secretary General of Apodeti, and seven other detainees, Domingos Osório Soares, Arlindo Osório Soares, Mário Zores, Monis da Maia, Saidi Musa, Manuel Jacinto and Peter Mu (also known as Peter Vong)—were brought to a place called Hat Nipah.

187. Monis da Maia, the only survivor from this group, told the Commission:

> On 27 January ABRI entered Betano. Fretilin was struggling to cope with the situation and we were moved to Holarua. Our group stayed at the house of Major Lorenço. One day, after I had been praying in the house, someone called me to come outside. When I came outside the person who had called me ripped the buttons off my shirt. I was surprised and said: "Why are you tearing my shirt? What have I done? Am I going to be killed?" Someone else behind me said: "Stab him, so he shuts up."
>
> They blindfolded me, threw me in a car with some others, and took us away to be killed. When we arrived at Hat Nipah the car stopped. We were taken off one by one. The first to be taken off was Arlindo Osório. Arlindo shouted not to kill him yet, but the people shot him right away. Then they pulled down Domingos Osório and shot him. Then it was the turn of the Apodeti Secretary General, José Osório Soares. He said: "Don't kill us like this. Let us die on the battlefield." But they shot him dead.
>
> Then they pulled out Saidi Musa, Peter Vong and Manuel Jacinto and shot them one by one. I got out of the car and said, "Let me pray first." I knelt, closed my eyes, and gave myself over to God. The weapons were pointed at me. The shots were fired and I fell to the ground. I have no idea how, but the bullet just wounded the back of my head. Of the eight of us who were taken to be killed, six died on the spot. One other, Mário Zores, survived but was killed later.[154]

188. Monis da Maia was left to die. He crawled to safety, was able to find refuge with relatives in Same and survived his superficial head wound. Assis dos Santos, an Apodeti member, who had been arrested in Dili on 4 October and then followed the route taken by Fretilin and its detainees from Dili to Aileu to Maubisse to Same and then to Holarua, witnessed the death of Mário Zores, who had also survived the mass execution on 27 January. The following day Mário Zores came out of his hiding place near the house in Holarua where the prisoners were being held, to look for food. A man saw him eating a piece of corn by the village well, and started shouting for people to come with their spears and bows. One man threw a spear which lodged in Mário Zores's stomach. When it did not kill him, another man shot Mário Zores dead.[155]

189. During the night of 28 January 1976, 34 of the detainees were transferred by Fretilin forces led by (Central Committee Member) César Mau Laka from Holarua to Same where they joined another ten prisoners being held in the elementary school building. From his regular visits it was evident to the prisoners that César Mau Laka had been given responsibility for them. Several other national and local Fretilin leaders are also reported to have played a role in determining the fate of the prisoners. They included: the Central Committee members Nicolau Lobato, Lito Gusmão, Hamis Bassarewan (Hata), Alarico Fernandes and Kanusa Bino, and the local Fretilin leaders Pedro Cortereal, Adriano Cortereal and Antonio Cepeda.

190. The next morning, 11 of the detainees—João Pereira, Nicolau dos Santos, José Tilman, Miguel Pereira, Mateus de Araújo, Alfonso de Araújo, José Miquita, Lebeak Lobato, Paulo Pereira, João Pereira and Lino Cowboy—were taken from the elementary school in a vehicle, supposedly to attend a popular justice hearing. Assuming that they were about to be executed, when the rope by which they had been bound together came loose, they all tried to jump out of the vehicle. Lino Cowboy tripped and was shot dead. Paul Pereira was reportedly also killed.[156]

191. The escape of the rest of the group angered César Mau Laka. He stormed into the school building. João da Costa, a survivor of the ensuing slaughter, told the Commission what took place:

> César Mau Laka led the execution of the detainees. He entered the school room and shouted: "Get in line." We stood up. He said: "Your friends who were to be tried, escaped. They have run to the Indonesians who now will come and kill us. Now, all of you, pray!" Before we finished praying, they began to shoot. Three people were shooting until they ran out of bullets. Then another three started shooting. And again, another three. When they left, they threw a grenade.
>
> I was underneath these corpses. I lifted myself out and stood in a corner. My brother held me from behind. He was not going to make it. I held his stomach, but blood was pouring out.[157]

192. About 30 people died in this massacre. João da Costa watched as his brother bled to death. He, and three others, Filipe Antonio de Aquino Caldas, Bento dos Reis Fernandes and Nazario Cortereal, were the only survivors. They managed to escape by jumping out of the window.[158]

193. The executions stopped after a group of Falintil commanders from the eastern districts forced the issue.* The commanders and their followers rushed to Holarua from Aileu and Viqueque, after hearing that Nicolau Lobato had ordered the execution of José Osorio Soares and the other Apodeti leaders. Witnesses told the Commission that the commanders included a sergeant called Guido, who had served in the Portuguese

* They were not the only commanders who were reported to have opposed the executions. Francisco Gonçalves told the Commission that Raul Isaac, a Same commander, had protected one of the 9 or 10 detainees who had escaped the truck apparently carrying them to their execution on 29 January. According to Francisco Gonçalves,: "And then he took [him] straight away to the Vice-President, Nicolau Lobato, and he said: 'This guy [is] with me, I don't want anybody to touch him.' He didn't touch him."

Military Police, Paulino Gama (Mauk Moruk), Ologari, Antonio Pinto (Kalohan), Moises Quina, Joaquim Ossu, Albino Gusmão and Julio Nicolau.[159] According to Sera Malik, who was with the commanders when they arrived in Same, they argued that it was wrong for Fretilin to kill their fellow East Timorese and the dispute became so serious that a shoot-out between the two sides was narrowly averted.[160] When the commanders left Same, they took with them a group of prisoners whose homes were in the east. In early 1976 the Fretilin Central Committee issued a directive that lifted all restrictions on UDT prisoners while retaining some on Apodeti prisoners.[161] Thereafter some of the prisoners blended into the general population under Fretilin control; others went on to play active roles in the Resistance and yet others opted to move into Indonesian-controlled areas. In areas under Fretilin control former UDT and Apodeti members continued to be suspect and sometimes became the target of human rights violations, including killing (see below).

Levels of responsibility

194. Past and present Fretilin leaders have acknowledged that mass executions took place in December 1975 and January 1976, and that Fretilin as an institution bears political responsibility for them. * They also maintain that the execution of the prisoners did not occur as the result of a formal Central Committee decision but was the product of the chaotic conditions created by the Indonesian onslaught and the resulting loss of Fretilin control over events.

195. The Commission accepts that the killings that took place in Aileu, Maubisse and Same did not have the formal backing of a Central Committee decision. However, it believes that the available evidence indicates that these actions did have the support not just of local Fretilin leaders but also of individual Central Committee members who were in the areas where the killings took place.

196. Witnesses to the killing that occurred in the two months after the Indonesian invasion on 7 December named members of the Fretilin Central Committee who were in Aileu, Maubisse, and Same at the time of the executions. Some of these Central Committee members are reported to have been aware that the killings were going on; some are reported to have been directly involved in deciding who should be executed; some are reported to have been present when executions took place.

197. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, who in December 1975 was the President of Fretilin and the RDTL, told the Commission's National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict in December 2003 that, although there was no formal decision taken by the Fretilin Central Committee to kill the prisoners, once the Indonesians had invaded, sentiment in favour of killing the prisoners gained ground at all levels:

* See, for example, the quotation from Mari Alkatiri, a member of the Fretilin Central Committee since 1974 and currently its Secretary General, in Box: Fretilin Responsibility and the Mass Executions of December 1975 and January 1976, paragraph 207, below.

I can explain it like this. There was no decision. When you write something down, then we say it is a decision.

Sometimes we share our impressions, we talk with friends. And these ideas of ours, people…took them to be the same as our decisions…

Therefore, some of them [Fretilin] took a decision that we kill them, so that the enemy could not endanger us. Perhaps this opinion was commonly held, more or less commonly, by leaders at all levels.[162]

198. In the wake of the invasion leaders' attitudes hardened, sometimes because of the personal impact on them of the loss of family members. In this climate individual leaders did not necessarily behave consistently. As noted above, the Commission was told that Nicolau Lobato intervened to prevent the execution of one group of prisoners. It was also reported to the Commission that a few days later, when a group of Apodeti prisoners refused an order to carry boxes of ammunition from Maubisse to Same, Nicolau Lobato told them not to try his patience further, or they would be killed: "Don't make me upset, because I have lost my family. I have lost everything. You guys have to cooperate." Later, in Same, he apologised to them for having made this threat.[163]

199. However, while the situation immediately after the invasion was certainly chaotic and feelings against those affiliated to parties that were cooperating with the Indonesians were running high, the evidence available to the Commission suggests that the killings that took place during this period were not entirely random, that a pattern of abuse towards detainees had emerged in the preceding months which laid the ground for the executions, and that rudimentary structures were in place that continued to operate in the immediate aftermath of the invasion.

200. Over the months preceding the invasion, when Aileu became the major holding centre for detainees from districts throughout the territory, a culture of abuse, which did not preclude the possibility of execution, developed in Aileu. Those responsible for the prisoners held there showed no regard for the basic rights of the detainees. During this period prisoners suffered extreme deprivation, were subjected to severe violence and were forced to perform hard labour while often weakened by hunger and ill-treatment. As a result of these conditions many of them died. In Aileu Fretilin officials created and operated structures for the investigation, trial and imprisonment of political opponents. While all of these institutional forms failed to guarantee protection to the prisoners, they did constitute a system that operated through a chain of command. A similar system operated briefly in Same.

201. The specific threat of executions had been in the air since at least the outbreak of the civil war. While many, possibly most, of the earlier executions attributed to Fretilin in the months before the 7 December invasion appear to have been localised revenge killings, not all of them were, particularly those that occurred in Aileu. According to one witness, the question of whether Fretilin should execute its detained opponents was being debated within the leadership soon after the party launched its successful

"counter-coup" in August 1975. At that time one faction advocated killing selected UDT prisoners held in the Quartel Geral.* Several UDT prisoners were executed in Marabia as they were being transferred to Aileu in September 1975.[164]

202. Francisco Gonçalves, one of a group of prisoners who were moved from Dili to Aileu on 13 September 1975, recalled that the group received a grim warning from the Fretilin President, Francisco Xavier do Amaral:

> [On] the day of 13 September, when we moved to Aileu, [at] 4 o'clock in the morning, Xavier do Amaral [came] to talk with us, to give us information. And then he said that if Indonesia invade[d] Timor-Leste, we [were] all going to die. We were prisoners, we were good for…fertiliser, "coffee prisoner[s]" – Xavier said that.[165]

203. Not long after Fretilin launched its "counter-coup" and started arresting UDT members, Nicolau Lobato set up an Investigation Committee headed by Lucas da Costa in Aileu to assess the involvement of UDT prisoners in the armed movement. Later, in October, when Fretilin started arresting Apodeti leaders in response to mounting Indonesian incursions, this Commission also investigated them, mainly to gather intelligence about Indonesian intentions towards Timor. However, some time during October its head, Lucas da Costa, moved to Atsabe and the Committee was dissolved.[166]

204. The experience of a group of at least 12 Apodeti members who appear to have narrowly escaped execution after being arrested in the Fretilin crackdown on Apodeti supporters in October 1975, illustrates how the abuse of prisoners was already well entrenched at this time.

205. In an interview with the Commission, Labut Melo recalled his arrest in Dili on 4 October 1975 and his transfer with other Apodeti leaders to Aileu on 19 October. On the night of their arrival in Aileu the group were brought before the Investigation Committee. The "hearing", which was held by the river in Aissirimou, started in the late evening and went on until 2.00 or 3.00am the following morning. Among those he remembers being present at the hearing were several of the same people who were involved in the screening and execution of prisoners in December, including Pedro Aquino, Paul Manulin and Humberto Martins da Cruz. According to both Labut Melo and Herminio da Silva da Costa, another member of the Apodeti group interviewed by the Commission, the prisoners were interrogated about Indonesia's invasion plans and received death threats from the men running the proceedings, Lucas da Costa and Pedro Aquino, as well as beatings from their subordinates.[167] According to Labut Melo:

> After we had finished our evening meal there was another order from the Justice Committee, or the "Maubere Court of Justice" or whatever it was they had there in Aissirimou under the command of Lucas [da Costa],

* Those advocating the execution of prisoners included Alarico Fernandes, Sebastião Montalvão, Gildo Ribeiro and Domingos Ribeiro [CAVR Interview with Humberto Martins da Cruz, Dili, undated].

[Antonio] Barbosa [dan] Pedro [Aquino (Naimau)]. Basically, the 25 of us were in their hands…In Ribeira at the Aissirimou [river] we were welcomed with sticks and various kinds of assaults…it was a real hammering they gave us…I don't know what we were saying, what kinds of noises we made, whether we cried or not I don't know, but I know we were tortured until 2.00 or nearly 3.00am. And the statements that they made to us were the same as on that first morning: "Brothers, you have made a mistake, you chose Apodeti, and if Indonesia invades, not one among you will survive, everyone of you will die". Then I said to them…"If we die, we die, and if we live, that's in God's hands, and it is God who presides over life and death." It was Lucas and Pedro Naimau who gave the orders, while Paulo Manulin and the others, all the illiterate ones, they were just carrying out their duties. [168]

206. The Apodeti leaders were transferred back to Dili on 22 October where they were held in the Comarca Balide until the Indonesian invasion on 7 December. Herminio da Costa da Silva and Labut Melo separately told the Commission that they believed they owed their lives to the intervention of senior commanders in Dili.*

207. While the practice of executing prisoners may have won the support of some Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders as well as of the lower ranks in both organisations, it was not universally accepted. The Commission heard several accounts of troops and commanders who refused to take part in the killing and in some cases took steps to stop it. Immediately after the invasion in early December, Guido Soares, then deputy defence minister and Falintil chief of staff, and troops under his command, left Aileu for Ainaro taking with them a group of prisoners who were spared the fate of the prisoners who who were executed in Aileu, Maubisse and Same.[169] Falintil troops in Maubisse reportedly refused to go along with a plan to execute about 200 prisoners who were brought from Aileu for that purpose on 8 December 1975. A group of eastern commanders successfully intervened to stop the killing in Same in late January. In both Maubisse and Same the troops who opposed the killing made the same argument: "These are our fellow East Timorese; we should not kill them."[170]

Fretilin responsibility and the mass executions of December 1975 and January 1976

Present and former members of the Fretilin Central Committee addressed the subject of the unlawful killings of UDT and Apodeti

* Herminio da Silva da Costa says that they were rescued by four Falintil commanders who had been despatched to Aileu by Rogério Lobato after the ICRC had intervened on the Apodeti leaders' behalf. Labut Melo believes that Nicolau Lobato was the ultimate source of the order and that he was responding to the intervention of Sergeant Constancio Soares, a relative of the wife of one of the detainees, Antonio Parada.

detainees by Fretilin forces during the Commission's National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76 in December 2003. Xanana Gusmão, then a member of the Fretilin Central Committee, said about these killings:

The UDT and Apodeti prisoners were taken up into the hills not with the intention to kill them…but the parachutists were already landing… the Indonesian troops were occupying Dili, coming up, coming up.

Control, I can say…there was a lack of control…The Aileu massacre, some say that it was the taste for political revenge, but I do not believe it was a party policy, especially because there was already a lack of control. We members of the Fretilin Central Committee, the civil political members, at the moment of the invasion, the [Fretilin] military people told us if we don't want to carry guns…just to run… The population was running, running, running to the hills…I can say that the massacre was not a planned political programme, not a political policy or strategy. It happened, yes. It happened. And the Same massacre shows us that the Fretilin Central Committee did not have capacity [to control]…because the enemy was pushing, pushing pushing…Falintil and the Fretilin Central Committee's complete attention was on the advance of the enemy…We cannot say that the party said to do this, no, the problem was that the forces of the enemy were coming from the East, from the border, then in Dili, parachutists in Baucau, landing in Lospalos, in Viqueque…the situation was one of lack of control…we cannot say that Fretilin organised it.[171]

Mari Alkatiri, then a member of Fretilin Central Committee, told the Commission that Fretilin, as an organisation, must take responsibility:

If you want me to say who killed them, I do not know. I was not here. Now I say that the massacres by Fretilin, Fretilin as an organisation must take responsibility. It was not a Fretilin massacre, but a massacre by elements of Fretilin, but Fretilin as an organisation must take responsibility because of the context, and I do not run away from this… Who was responsible for the killing in Aileu and in Same? If we look at it from the point of view of justice we need to consider individual responsibility. Who was the person who ordered the killings? From a political perspective it becomes a matter of collective responsibility, the responsibility of the organisation. We need to recognise these two approaches and not confuse individual and collective responsibility.

From the political angle, even if the superiors didn't have control, this is the responsibility of the political organisation. [The leaders] didn't have control. They may not have approved what happened, but that is a separate issue. If they didn't control their charges, there is political responsibility. At the moment I am personally trying to find out who ordered the killings. Who gave the command? But I admit that I still don't know. If I knew I would say. If not publicly, I would tell the Commission.[172]

Francisco Xavier do Amaral, who was President of Fretilin at the time, depicted the difficult choices which were faced by Fretilin, as the Indonesian forces advanced. He believed that there was no formal decision taken at Central Committee or government level, but that, out of fear and panic, decisions to kill detainees were taken, sometimes with the approval of senior Fretilin figures:

I can explain it like this. There was no decision. When you write something down, then we say it is a decision.

Sometimes we share our impressions, we talk with friends. And these ideas of ours, people called them…took them to be the same as our decisions. Because our thoughts are just our opinions. Sometimes I have an opinion, and I say it.

We were in the middle of war, in this war, when we ran from our enemies, we ran, we took those we had imprisoned, our enemies who we had imprisoned, with us. Before we even had a chance to catch our breath, we said, "They are close. What do we do now? We must keep running. We don't have too many choices. There's no transport, no food, not much medicine, none of this."

Some of those we imprisoned were already seriously sick, many were very weak. So we had to look at this. Do we leave them here alive? Do we run alone and leave them? Or do we kill them and then run? I see danger in both these. If we leave them here alive, they can fall into the enemies' hands. If we abandon them, for example a member of UDT or Apodeti, and he falls into the Indonesian enemy's hands. The Indonesian military can come and he can fall into their hands. Indonesia can put pressure on him and they could find us. They could trick him or he might confess. From this we can make a conclusion, if they are weak already and they can't walk with us, and if we want to carry them but we don't have the strength, there is no guarantee that we can make it to a safe place, then is it better if he dies or we die? Therefore, some of them took a decision that we kill them, so that the enemy could not endanger us.Perhaps this opinion was commonly held, more or less commonly, by leaders at all the levels.[173]

Rogério Lobato, ex-Commander of the Armed Forces, in a moving testimony declared his grief for the tragic loss on both sides of the conflict and his sense of responsibility for what took place:

I want to say that in this process of war so many died. I don't want to lay blame here. I think it is important for us here to set out the facts…it is true that Fretilin killed many UDT prisoners…UDT also killed Fretilin prisoners…I want to…concentrate attention on what is the Commission's focus, human rights. At this time I was the Commander of the Armed Forces. I must take responsibility for much that happened.[174]

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances by ABRI after the Indonesian invasion, 1976–1979

208. Data gathered by the Commission show a steady escalation of unlawful killings and enforced disappearances by Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries during 1976-79, reaching a peak in 1978-79.

209. During the period between 1976 and late 1978 the Indonesian military slowly consolidated its hold over the territory of Timor-Leste. It was only at the end of this period that it gained overall control of the territory. By the end of 1976 the Indonesian occupation forces controlled the main towns and connecting roads. This forced the East Timorese Resistance and much of the civilian population to evacuate to the mountains and forests in the interrior of the country. From late 1977 the momentum of the war started to move decisively in favour of the Indonesian forces as the base areas controlled by Fretilin/Falintil began to fall into Indonesian hands. By mid-1978 all sub-district towns were under Indonesian control, and ABRI began a final offensive against the large population concentrations still holding out in areas such as Alas in Manufahi, the Natarbora Plain (Manatuto), Mount Ilamano in Manatuto and on Mount Matebian. Once trapped in these confined areas, their populations came under massive Indonesian bombardment from the land, air and sea. Fretilin/Falintil could no longer defend themselves or the population that had followed them there. Throughout this period several hundred thousand East Timorese people were captured by or surrendered to Indonesian forces. By early 1979 most East Timorese people were living under Indonesian control, usually under the severely restrictive circumstances of the resettlement camps (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Famine and Forced Displacement).

210. During this period, although many East Timorese civilians were detained in military custody, prisoners taken by ABRI were held without charge or trial. Killings occurred in a variety of circumstances. There were indiscriminate killings of civilians engaged in daily activities; the killing of civilians during military operations; the killing of detainees; the summary killing of surrendered civilians; and the targeted killings of Fretilin members and surrendered combatants.* But all killings of civilians in custody were extra-judicial and unlawful.

* Once surrendered, an individual loses their combatant status, and is afforded protection as a prisoner of war. ABRI systematically violated this right, and actively targeted and executed surrendered Falintil members.

211. This section consists of two sub-sections. The first describes the general patterns of killings and disappearances committed by ABRI and its auxiliaries over the whole period 1976-79. The second focuses on 1978-79 when after the fall of the bases de apoio, killings and disappearances perpetrated by ABRI and its auxiliaries reached their peak, and presents the Commission's evidence that during this time ABRI engaged in a coordinated campaign to eliminate Fretilin/Falintil leaders who had surrendered or been captured.

Patterns of unlawful killing and enforced disappearance by ABRI, 1976–1979

Civilians killed during military operations

212. The Commission heard extensive testimony about the arbitrary killing of civilians encountered by members of ABRI while on patrol or during military operations. In many of these cases civilians were killed indiscriminately as Indonesian forces extended their control into new areas or conducted operations in areas not controlled by either side. Although many civilians fled ahead of the invading army, those who stayed behind or had the misfortune to run into Indonesian patrols were often shot on sight. For example:

- Americo da Costa and his wife were killed by ABRI as it entered Hera on 16 January 1976. Falintil had retreated, leaving behind some villagers. Americo da Costa and his wife were discovered by ABRI as they were picking corn, and shot dead.[175]
- On 11 February 1976, ABRI troops entered Lelaos (Dare, Dili). They bayoneted two civilians, Antonio Soares and Inácio de Jesus, to death.[176]
- In early March 1976, ABRI Battalions 315, 512 and 401, with an Armed (Artileri Medan, Field Artillery) unit in support, entered the sub-district of Letefoho (Ermera). They started seeking out and attacking places where the civilian population were hiding. In the village of Hatugau they shot dead Sebastião Lemos. In Eraulo they arrested two men suspected of trying to contact Falintil, Cristovão Soares and Filomeno, and executed them at Mandoki Lau. They kept on harrying the population, causing them to flee first to the Talo Forest in Hatolia and then back to Tata in Letefoho. Survivors who stayed in Eraulo were resettled in Letefoho Town where they stayed for three years.[177]
- One deponent told how when troops of Battalion 726 entered the sub-district of Railaco (Ermera) in April 1976, he fled with his wife and children to Halaltur in the village of Railaco Leten, His wife fell seriously ill and urged her family to leave her to avoid to being killed by the advancing Indonesian troops. The rest of the family took her advice. When Battalion 726 found her alone asleep in a hut, they shot her dead.[178]
- Around the same time Vicente de Jesus and his wife, Raimunda da Conceição, were shot by an unidentified ABRI unit and Partisans as they entered the sub-district of Railaco (Ermera). Vicente died of his wounds. His wife was wounded in the thigh but survived.[179]

- In March 1978, when ABRI attacked Mount Bibileo (Viqueque) the population that had been concentrated there scattered. A deponent told the Commission that his elderly aunt was left behind. A few days later the deponent and his brother returned to the village. They found that the old lady had been shot dead by ABRI and her body half-eaten by dogs[180]

Civilians killed while carrying out daily activities

213. From the earliest days of the occupation the lives of civilians who went looking for food in areas where Indonesian forces had established posts or were conducting operations were also in danger. For example:

- After the Indonesian capture of Betano (Same, Manufahi) in January 1976, the deponent and his family fled to the nearby aldeia of Fatumeta. In April 1976, four members of the family were shot by marines when they were out looking for food in Bermet Buiudo near the marines' post. The deponent's mother and aunt died of their wounds.[181]
- In September 1976 Indonesian forces entered the village of Seloi (Aileu, Aileu). Because they were desperately short of food, a group of four people, Martinho, José, Martina and Teresa went to the aldeia of Lio, Seloi Kraik Village (Laulara, Aileu) to look for cassava. Indonesian soldiers captured Martina and shot Teresa dead. Martinho and José managed to get away and reached the safety of a Falintil post. Because they were suspected of working for ABRI, they were sent to Weberek (Alas, Manufahi).[182]
- Carlito and Armindo encountered an ABRI patrol while out hunting in the area of Rate Naruk (Viqueque, Viqueque) on 7 February 1977. The unidentified ABRI unit shot them both. Armindo died immediately. Carlito was seriously wounded, but was found by his uncle the next day and recovered.[183]
- In July 1977, Indonesian troops discovered Justina and her husband Talo Mali when they were looking for food in the forest in the sub-district of Atsabe (Ermera). Justina and Talo Mali were arrested on suspicion of collecting food for Fretilin/Falintil. They were detained for ten days in Atsabe where Talo Mali was subjected to continual interrogation during which he was beaten and submerged in water. Talo Mali was then handed over to troops belonging to an Armed (Artileri Medan, Field Artillery) unit. He was taken to Airea, Paramin Village (Atsabe, Ermera) where he was made to stand on the edge of a large hole dug by the troops, and shot dead.[184]

214. The Commission received numerous accounts of killings of civilians held in detention camps after the mass surrenders of late 1978.[185] Faced with starvation, they would leave the camps to go to the forest or to former gardens in search of edible leaves, tree roots, or palm sap. They knew that if they were caught they would be accused of having contact with Falintil and would likely be killed. Father José Tavares recalled the situation in the concentration camp in the sub-district of Natarbora, Manatuto, where he surrendered in 1978:

> Those in the camp were not permitted to leave…unless ordered to do so by ABRI. Those suffering from hunger were forced to go hunting in the > forest secretly. If it were known they had gone beyond the boundary line they would be considered…[to have had] contact with Falintil. These people…usually were immediately killed.[186]

215. In 1978, during the mass surrenders at Matebian, a group surrendered to ABRI at Venilale, Baucau. The deponent, who was a member of the group, was detained for about one year in the Sub-district Military Command (Koramil) headquarters in Venilale. On his release in December 1979 he learned that his wife, Ermelinda, and two daughters, Joana and Anina, had been beaten to death by troops from Battalions 721 and 503 while the women were in the area of Uaihae in Uaioli looking for food. Their bodies had then been burnt, according to a man who had been with the women and who survived.[187] In August of the same year, four civilians who had surrendered were also looking for food. They had not obtained a permit (surat jalan) to leave their area around the camp. At Mount Tokegua in Samagata, Sagadate Village (Laga, Baucau) they were arrested by Battalion 141. One civilian, Anurai, was then taken to the One Bu'u River and killed. Another, Kotedora, was taken to Kotamutodo, and killed in front of the whole village, including the women and children. A third was killed at Uasagia (Laga, Baucau).[188]

216. Sebastião da Costa, his brother, Paulino, and his sisters, Isabel and Maria, were caught while searching for food. They were captured in 1979 in Lakawa (Baguia, Baucau) by Battalion 141 troops who put them in a water buffalo pen. A month later their families found their rotten corpses in the pen and gave them a decent burial.[189]

217. Loi Lu and his family surrendered in 1978. They lived by the road in Uaioli (Venilale, Baucau). Because he was too weak from hunger to walk, and the family were not given food to eat, Loi Lu stole a breadfruit from Pedro to feed his family. Pedro caught him and handed him over to Liurai Antonio. Liurai Antonio in turn handed him over to members of Battalion 745, who took him to Natarbora in Manatuto where they killed him.[190]

218. In September 1979, when the Indonesian military was building up for its major offensive in the area, soldiers from the Viqueque Kodim caught Leki-Rubi in Uaimata Rae (Ossu, Viqueque), as he was on the way to plant his garden. They killed him on the spot.[191]

Civilians killed on suspicion of working with or having knowledge about Fretilin/Falintil

219. From the earliest days of the occupation civilians living in Indonesian-controlled areas were being killed on suspicion of having been in contact with Fretilin/Falintil. For example:

- Marcelo and his family surrendered to ABRI in 1976 in Bazartete (Liquiçá). They were allowed to return to their home village of Lehata. An East Timorese acquaintance denounced Marcelo and his cousin, Manuel, as Fretilin spies to patrolling troops from Battalion 401. The troops opened fire on Manuel, who fled to his house in the aldeia of Pisulete. The next day the troops from Battalion 401 found and arrested Manuel. They shot Manuel dead and took away six other youths from the village. The following day the people of Bazartete were told to gather in front of the local church. When they had assembled, ABRI troops ordered them to dig a large hole. Then the six youths were brought out of the former Portuguese Company headquarters, showing clear signs of having been badly beaten. Battalion 401 troops lined the six up at the edge of the hole, and shot them dead.[192]

- In 1976, Maubere was one of 13 men and two women who had been recruited in the sub-district of Bobonaro (Bobonaro) by a Partisan commander named M218 to be TBOs for ABRI. One day the Indonesians and Partisans seized all 13 men and tied them up, accusing them of having taken ammunition and given it to Fretilin. The 13 were told they were being taken to Hauba (Bobonaro) to be killed. Once in Hauba the troops released all the men except for Maubere whom they killed. His body was thrown in a river and never recovered.[193]
- On 23 March 1976, two youths, Cristovão and Filomeno Soares, were taking food and clothing to the Fretilin Zone Secretary of Letefoho (Ermera), with whom they had established clandestine contact. A patrol from Battalion 512 intercepted them and suggested that they help them find Fretilin/Falintil in the forest. The two refused and were shot dead at a place called Marconi in Eraulo (Railaco, Ermera). [194]

220. Detainees were also killed for not disclosing or confirming information being sought by their interrogators. In 1978, for example, members of Battalion 403 killed two men, Anselmo and Antonio Cardoso, on Mount Derok Loke (Lacluta, Viqueque) because they were unable to disclose the whereabouts of Xanana Gusmão or where Falintil weapons were hidden.[195]

221. In 1979 a detainee, Manuel da Silva, was confronted with João da Rosa at the District Military Command (Kodim) headquarters in Viqueque. His interrogators demanded that Manuel da Silva confirm that João da Rosa had been supplying food to Falintil. When Manuel da Silva insisted that it was not João da Rosa but someone else, a rope was twisted around his neck and pulled until he died.[196]

Civilians killed in retaliation for Falintil attacks

222. Indonesian forces also reportedly killed civilians in retaliation for Falintil attacks. In several of the cases reported to the Commission the killings appear to have been a form of indiscriminate proxy or collective punishment intended as a general warning to the population and to deter further Falintil attacks:

- In January 1976, Indonesian troops responded to a Falintil attack on Hauba (Bobonaro) by taking nine civilians from the village to Atsabe where they were killed.[197]
- On 4 March 1976, a group of Apodeti members seized 16 East Timorese civilians and took them to the sub-district of Hato-Udo (Ainaro), where they were detained in a house and forced to work for the ABRI unit stationed there.

During March there was a Falintil attack in the area in which Indonesian forces suffered casualties. Four of the 16 detainees were taken by a soldier and an East Timorese man to Betano, Manufahi, ostensibly to unload a ship. They were not seen again.[198]

Civilians killed during ABRI attacks

223. Although the unintentional killing of civilians during combat and civilian fatalities in crossfire are not considered human rights violations, in some situations the Commission has found it difficult to determine whether members of ABRI took sufficient care to distinguish between combatants and civilians, and to avoid civilian casualties by using force discriminately and proportionately. In some of these cases groups composed entirely of civilians came under attack:

- The Commission heard of one case early in the war where a group of civilians attempted to defend themselves against the invading army. On 15 March 1976, when Infantry Battalion 509 attacked Ainaro Town (Ainaro), about 60 civilians tried to oppose the well-armed invaders. Most or all of these civilians were killed.[199]
- In May 1977, ABRI attacked a group of civilians hiding on Mount Kablaki, between Ainaro and Manufahi. Ten were killed during the attack.[200]
- In 1978, troops from Battalions 744 and 745 conducted a raid in Aisapu, Asulau Village (Hatolia, Ermera) during which they killed a large number of people. The deponent who reported this attack to the Commission collected information about 13 separate families who had lost a total of 88 relatives during the raid. At least some of the victims were reported to have been in the custody of troops when they were killed. They included members of one clan group from the uma kain (group of family households) of Poeleu, which suffered the loss of 15 family members.[201]

Civilians killed while in the custody of Indonesian security forces and auxiliaries

224. From the earliest days of the war ABRI routinely took civilians into custody.[202] In many cases this led directly to summary execution. In other cases the victim would be tortured or ill-treated first, or taken to another location and then killed. This pattern of killing occurred throughout the period 1976-79.

- In January 1976, five people were killed immediately after capture by Battalion 126 in Hatugeo (Atsabe, Ermera).[203]
- In 1976, José Cortereal and his family surrendered in Tirilolo, Hola Rua (Same, Manufahi). They were taken by Indonesian troops and Hansip to Lesulau in Hola Rua where two of them, Sirimau and Calistro, were shot dead.[204]

225. Many killings of civilians occurred in military custody. Victims would be seized, then taken to a military facility, and killed. In other cases civilians disappeared after arrest or capture: they are presumed to have been killed, but no witnesses have come forward to confirm that this was their fate. [205] For example:

- In 1976, when three civilians were called to the Battalion 327 post at Mau Ulo (Maubisse, Ainaro), the soldiers ordered the men to be tied up. One was released, but the other two were taken away to the town of Ainaro, and never reappeared.[206]
- Antonio dos Reis told the Commission how he, his father and brother came out of the forest and surrendered to Battalion 405 in Maubisse (Ainaro) in April 1976. While in detention they were frequently beaten and kicked, and every night they were immersed in water. A year later Antonio and his brother were released, but Indonesian troops killed their father, Francisco Xavier, and buried his body near the pousada (inn) in Maubisse.[207]
- In January 1976, ABRI entered Ossu (Viqueque), causing many families to run away. On 23 September 1976, ABRI captured five men who had fled to the forest the previous January, including Leki Gari, and took them to the Koramil headquarters in Ossu, where there were already many other detainees who had been arrested on suspicion of working with the Resistance. At the Koramil they underwent interrogations accompanied by pistol-whippings, beatings with steel pipes and kicking. Leki Gari, and another detainee called Olobere were then taken to the Battalion 202 headquarters in Ossu where many other detainees were being held. That same evening, Olobere, Leki Gari and a third person, Mariano, were taken from the Battalion 202 headquarters and shot dead.[208]
- On 8 November 1978, soldiers from the Koramil in Laga, Baucau District, came to the village of Soba (Laga, Baucau) and arrested Pedro Pereira. They took him to the military police headquarters in the village of Laga for investigation. Later that afternoon Pedro Pereira returned to Soba with his captors. The troops also seized Gregório Pereira and João Pereira from Ro'o Liu and took them to the military command post. The next day João and Pedro Pereira were taken away to Baucau and disappeared.[209]

226. ABRI units also killed women and children who were in their custody. The Commission heard how in January 1976 a woman and her two children were seized by Indonesian troops in Tailau in Ermera. The woman, who was pregnant, was the sister of a Falintil commander and had been denounced by an informer. Indonesian soldiers and two East Timorese partisans raped her. The next day ABRI killed the woman and her children.[210]

227. Women taken into the custody of Indonesian forces might also disappear. During the attack on Mount Matebian in October–November 1978, a mother, Luciana, and two of her daughters, Etelvina and Albertina, were wounded when they came under assault from Infantry Battalion 202. Luciana was taken to Dili for treatment and recovered. Etelvina and Albertina were taken to hospital in Baucau, On her return from Dili, Luciana tried to find her daughters at the hospital, but hospital staff did not know what had happened to them, and they were never located.[211]

228. East Timorese auxiliaries also detained people who had recently surrendered and killed them. The Commission received several statements describing killings of those who had surrendered committed by the Tonsus (Peleton Khusus, Special Platoon) unit established by Kopassandha in the sub-districts of Barique, Soibada, and Laclubar (Manatuto):

- In February 1979 five men –Manuel Carlos, Lekihonik, Pinto, Raimundo de Oliveira and Armando Soares– who had recently surrendered in Orlalan (Laclubar, Manatuto) were taken by Tonsus under the command of M312 to the Kopassandha base in Orlalan. After one week in detention, during which they suffered continual beatings, the five were bound together with rope around their necks and brought by four Tonsus to a place called Manglima where they were shot dead.[212]
- In the same area some time in 1979, two civilians described as "suspected Fretilin supporters", Mali Arus and Miguel Daholo, were picked up by members of Tonsus shortly after surrendering. They were brought to Laclubar, being badly beaten along the way. Once in Laclubar, Mali Arus suffered further beatings, which caused his death two weeks later. Three weeks later the deponent himself and five others, including his father, Graciano Bere Mauk, and his cousins, Martinho and Mau Leki, also surrendered and were taken to the Tonsus post at Orlalan. Soon after, three members of the group, Graciano Bere Mauk, Martinho and Mau Leki were taken out and shot dead by Tonsus members.[213]

229. Many civilians were killed during interrogation and torture, or after serious beating while in military custody.[214]

230. In January 1976 the Sub-district administrator, Mateus Ximenes, ordered the arrest of Cipriano Magno Ximenes, who had recently surrendered, in Soba (Laga, Baucau). After his arrest he was handed over to a Marines unit. Two days later he was joined in detention by his wife and daughter. All three were beaten by the wife and daughter of a local UDT leader. Three days later Cipriano Magno Ximenes was killed.[215]

231. In 1978 after his family had surrendered in Uatolari (Viqueque), Hansip arrested the deponent's son, Afonso, and took him to the Battalion 202 post there. He was beaten so badly by the Hansip and ABRI troops that, though allowed to return home, he died of his injuries.[216]

232. In 1979 four men surrendered to Battalion 202 in the area of Mount Matebian. They were taken to Viqueque where they were beaten by Hansip with rifle butts and kicked. One of the four men died after one week of this ill-treatment. The deponent said during his year in detention in Viqueque two other prisoners, Mário Harec and Julio Soares, also suffered such severe beatings from the Hansip commander M313 that they too died.[217]

"He's gone to school..."

Over a period of several years and across many districts ABRI personnel used a standard set of terms to refer to the killing or disappearance of its victims. People who had been taken away to be executed or who had disappeared were said to have "gone for a bath", "gone to Jakarta/Bali/Quelicai","gone hunting" or "gone on an operation". However, of all these terms the one most commonly used by ABRI and its East Timorese auxiliaries to explain a disappearance was to say that a victim had "gone to school".[218] Cases of people being "sent to school" were reported to the Commission from the districts of Aileu, Ainaro, Baucau, Dili, Lautém and Manufahi. The earliest reported instance of someone being "sent to school" was in Ainaro in 1976.[219] The term was also used in the context of the disappearances that followed the Falintil attacks on Dili in June 1980 and that accompanied Operasi Persatuan (Operation Unity) in 1983-84.[220] But the largest number of cases of people "going to school" reported to the Commission occurred in 1978-79. In the Commission's view, the repeated and widespread use of this and other euphemisms is evidence that the Indonesian military and its auxiliaries executed its victims in accordance with a standard operating procedure emanating from higher up the command chain.

In many of the cases from the 1978-79 period it was captured or surrendered Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders who were "sent to school".

In March 1979, in one of several disappearance cases involving former Fretilin leaders or Falintil commanders reported from Manufahi at around this time,* six Fretilin leaders who had surrendered in Betano (Same, Manufahi) with a large group of people the previous November were put to work building roads. Soon after, the six—José da Conceição, Francisco da Conceição, Franco da Costa, Paulino Teli, Martinho Aulaku and Sebastião Nunes—were summoned by two East Timorese local officials and told that all but one of them were going to be "sent to school". The five have not been seen since. The sixth, José da Conceição, was forced to become a Hansip.[221]

Three ranking members of the Resistance in the North Central Sector, Domingos Damião, a Falintil company commander, Anacleto Mendonça, another Falintil commander and Antonio Sarmento, a delegado, surrendered in 1978 and were recruited as Hansip. In

* See, for example, HRVD Statements 03429 and 03401 and CAVR, Community Profile, Debu-Waen, Mahaquidan Village, Alas Sub-district, Manufahi District.

March or April 1979, while the local Hansip were on parade at the headquarters of RTP 6 and RTP 8 in the town of Aileu, the three were called out by name and told to go to the house of the district military commander (Dandim). The three were last seen being driven away in a convoy of Indonesian military jeeps. The following day an Indonesian army captain came to Antonio Sarmento's house and returned his watch and wedding ring. The captain said the victims "were attending school". On the same day Anacleto Mendonça's wife also received a visit from a captain. He too handed in her husband's watch and ring. However, his explanation of Anacleto's whereabouts was different: he said that Anacleto had "gone to war" in the east.[222]

In Parlamento (Moro, Lautém) eight Hansip—Horacio Silveiro Lopes, Amaro Amaral, Inácio dos Santos, Venancio Gusmão, Rodolfo da Costa Junior, Sebastião Maria Lourdes Oliveira, Justino dos Santos and Domingos Dias dos Santos—were called to the Koramil on 14 May 1979, on suspicion of having been in contact with a Falintil commander. Seven of them were later seen being taken away by troops belonging to Battalion 745. Only one of the seven returned. Relatives of the missing men were repeatedly told that they had "gone to school". Several deponents said that they had eventually learned that their relatives had been killed near the Battalion 745 headquarters in Assalaino (Fuiloro, Lospalos, Lautém) and Sepelata (Bauro, Lospalos, Lautém). Two of the victims' bodies were later found in Asailaino and one in Sepelata.[223]

Sometimes when a family learned that a relative had been "sent to school", they immediately concluded that he had been killed.[*] This was most obviously the case when, for example, a victim who had supposedly been "sent to school in Jakarta" was illiterate.[224] In other instances, when, for example, family members were told that the victims were being sent to attend a course on Pancasila, the Indonesian state ideology that was compulsory for Indonesian civil servants, the explanation might initially seem convincing and only with time would family members come to understand the real meaning of what they had been told.[†]

* See, for example, HRVD 03401, in which when the deponent was told that his daughter had been "sent to school", he immediately understood that she had been killed.

† See HRVD Statements 05365, 05369, 05376 and 05364. The MPR had made these courses, known as P-4 (Pedoman Penghayatan dan Pengamalan Pancasila), under Tap MPR No. II/ MPR/1978.

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of surrendered and captured civilians and combatants

233. During the years 1976–1979, several hundred thousand East Timorese civilians came down from the mountains or out of the forests, and surrendered. Surrenders occurred steadily throughout 1976 and 1977, and then increased during 1978. In the second half of 1978 they reached a new peak as Indonesian forces overwhelmed the last resistance bases (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict). On surrendering, civilians were put through a selection process, intended to determine whether they had been members of Fretilin or Falintil, and if so, whether they had held senior positions. Executions and disappearances were a frequent outcome of this process. Known Fretilin members, civilians suspected of clandestine activity and surrendered combatants were the most common victims. Killings and disappearances reached their greatest intensity in the first half of 1979, several months after the mass surrenders of late 1978 and in the period surrounding the end of Operasi Seroja at the end of March 1979.*

Killings and disappearances in military custody after surrender or capture

234. Many killings of surrendered civilians were clear cases of summary execution.[225] For example:

- In 1976, a member of Falintil, Loe-Sili, was captured by five Indonesian Special Forces troops in Mabil-Loa, Saburai (Maliana, Bobonaro). Immediately after capture and interrogation, the troops killed him.[226]
- A Fretilin member, Dasbere, was arrested on 5 May 1976 by troops of Battalion 403 in Leimea Leten (Atsabe, Ermera). He was taken to Clikata. The Indonesian troops made him pose with the Portuguese flag and took photographs of him. Then they killed him.[227]
- On 9 December 1976, four Indonesian troops arrested Raimundo Pereira and Berleto Moniz in Matai (Suai Town, Covalima) after being told by an Apodeti party member that they were members of Fretilin. The two were brought to Tua-Laran and killed.[228]
- In 1978, a woman called Guilhermina was captured by troops from Battalion 503 in Leorema (Bazartete, Liquiçá). They found an OPMT card (the Fretilin's women's auxiliary, Organização Popular da Mulher Timor) in her possession. She was immediately executed.[229]
- In 1978, a father and son, Uatu Suu and Kenawatu, were captured in Nabolu, Uaioli (Venilale, Baucau) by Hansip commanded by M314. They were then killed, and their bodies left where they fell. The seven-year-old son of Uatu Suu who witnessed the killing was taken away by two of the Hansip and lived with them in Ossu (Viqueque) until 1995 when his relatives came to take him back to Venilale.[230]

* On 26 March 1979, the special operational command, Komando Tugas Gabungan Seroja (Kogasgab Seroja), was abolished and the operational activities of the military in Timor-Leste were placed under the command of a newly-created Sub-Regional Command (Korem), designated Korem 164/Wira Dharma, which stood at the apex of a territorial structure that extended down to the village level. This change, by bringing Indonesian military structures in Timor-Leste more closely into line with those in Indonesia itself, was intended to signal that the Resistance had been defeated and that Timor-Leste was becoming a normal Indonesian province [see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation, section on The Indonesian Armed Forces and their Role in Timor-Leste].

235. By 1978, when the Indonesian offensive against the Resistance was reaching its peak, groups of civilians came under attack both as they sought to surrender and when they tried to hold out in the forest. Two reports from the sub-district of Natarbora in Manatuto illustrate the dilemma facing people at that time:

- In Natarbora some time in 1978, when many civilians were surrendering, a priest, Father Carlos, asked a group of civilians who had already surrendered to go back to the forest and bring out people who were seriously ill so that they could be treated. As the group emerged from the forest, they came under attack from a Kopassandha unit. One person, César Gonçalves, died in the attack.[231]
- In November 1978, Indonesian forces brought Francisco Xavier do Amaral, the former Fretilin President, by plane to Natarbora to persuade people still holding out there to surrender. As a result of Xavier do Amaral's appeal many people did surrender, but others did not. Because the Indonesians knew that there were still people refusing to surrender, they set fire to the undergrowth, and many burned to death.[232]

236. On 18 November 1978, troops from the marine unit, Pasmar 9, and Hansip members came to arrest eight civilians and took them to the military police headquarters in the village of Laga (Baucau). During the month and a half in which they were held there the eight were interrogated and subjected to various forms of torture, including strangulation and the electric shocks to their genitals. Three of the group, Naunoto, Domingos and Nokorika, were taken away by the military police and disappeared.[233]

237. On 16 December 1978, João Pereira was arrested in Buibau (Baucau, Baucau) and detained at the RTP 18 (Resimen Tim Pertempuran, Combat Team Regiment) headquarters, which was located in Buibau. During this time he was beaten. On 21 December a member of the Baucau district military command (Kodim) came to the RTP headquarters and took away the deponent and five other detainees, and beat them. A Hansip commander, named M315, took two of the detainees, Mateus Ximenes and Ernesto Ximenes, to the Wesele River and shot them dead. The other four detainees were then allowed to go home.[234]

238. People who had recently surrendered or been captured also died in detention as a result of torture and ill-treatment during interrogation:

239. Soon after Celestino Pinto and his wife came down from Mount Matebian in 1978, he was arrested in Uatolari Town (Viqueque) by Kopassandha troops and Hansip on suspicion of having been in contact with two members of Falintil, Antonio and Jorgé. His interrogators beat and kicked him for a whole day as they tried to extract information from him about the two Falintil members. The following day he died of his injuries.[235]

The mass execution of captured civilians in Turiscai

Felismina Soares is the sole surviving eyewitness of the mass execution of 13 men from Turiscai (Manufahi) on 22 February 1979.

The victims had been living with many others in a place called Sabailolo in the village of Foholau after fleeing their homes in the sub-district town of Turiscai as Indonesian forces advanced into the town in February 1976.[236] On 22 February 1979, a team of local Hansip under the command of M316 rounded up around 30 men, women and children in Sabailolo and started taking them back to the town of Turiscai. When the group reached the river near Sabailolo, M316 ordered his men to search the 13 men in the group. Then the men were separated from the women.

Eleven of the 13 were brought to a ravine above the river. Felismina Soares remembered the names of only 8 of the 11: Beremali, Ta Mali, Bere Leki, Mau Leki, Mau Leki, Maubere, Maubere, another Maubere. She said that she could not remember three of the names. M316 ordered three of his men to shoot the 11 and then to throw the bodies into the gorge. Afterwards, as it was getting late, the Hansip and the surviving members of the group slept in the place where the killing had taken place. The next day M316 ordered the survivors to continue their journey to Turiscai. On the way, he searched the two surviving males, the former village chief of Liurai, Sebastião, and his brother, and stole their valuables. M316 then ordered the two shot dead. Their bodies were left unburied. M316 still lives in Timor-Leste[237]

Targeted killings of suspected Fretilin/Falintil members and leaders after surrender or capture

240. A clear pattern exists of ABRI targeting suspected former Fretilin members among the surrendering civilian population. The Commission heard numerous cases of the execution of civilians suspected of being members of Fretilin, or having links with it.[238]

241. Sometimes those killed had been living under Indonesian control for some time but had come under suspicion, possibly only because their Fretilin affiliation was discovered:

- In March 1976, Hansip members captured a man named Maukei in Suro Kraik Ainaro, Ainaro) and held him at Leolima (Hato-Udo, Ainaro). In April 1976 he was taken to Luro in Leolima where he, along with four others from

Suro Kraik, was killed by six Hansip members, reportedly on the orders of the Sub-district administrator (camat), M316, of Hato-Udo and Battalion 327 troops who were assigned to Hatu-Udo at the time. Maukei was arrested and killed because he had been a Fretilin delegado sand was suspected of giving help to Fretilin in the forest and so being "two-faced".[239]

- On 20 September 1978, Umberto Xavier, a former Fretilin delegado, and his wife, Bicolo, a Fretilin member, were killed by Hansip at Gourema, Fatukero (Railaco, Ermera), some time after their capture by Indonesian forces.[240] In 1979 a Hansip platoon beat and tortured seven members of a family they had arrested because they had been identified as Fretilin sympathisers. Several of them suffered beatings so severe that they incurred injuries such as broken jaws and serious head wounds. One of them, Artur Mendonça died of his injuries, while another member of the group, Orlando Mendonça, was taken to Maubisse (Ainaro) where he was killed.[241]

242. People suspected of being members of Fretilin/Falintil could be killed immediately after surrender or capture.[242] Luis Pereira described the pattern of targeted killings of Falintil in Manatuto:

> If armed Fretilin [Falintil] surrendered, [they did not go] through an ordinary process, but were handled separately. They were all interrogated by intel [military intelligence], a military investigation team that arrived from Manatuto. Clearly, all decisions about the fate of detainees were taken internally by the military. Often, Fretilin [Falintil] were allowed to go home. However it could happen that one or two months later they would be seized at their home and killed. Tonsus, or another person ordered to collect them, would take them to the Kopassus office. Then after the Kopassus had decided, they would be killed. If they were tied up behind, then the killing would be done by Tonsus. The only ones with the authority to order a killing were Kopassus.[243]

243. The grounds on which they were deemed to be members of these organisations were often tenuous. In cases reported to the Commission, possession of a book was regarded as evidence that a person had been a Fretilin cadre and the inspection of their hands for callouses was a routine way to establish that someone was a Falintil fighter. In one case the suspect's name was regarded by ABRI as sufficient grounds for killing him:

- João de Deus told how when he surrendered to Battalion 512 in Letefoho (Ermera) in 1976, he was detained because the soldiers found a Fretilin party card in his pocket. He was detained with two other people. One of them was Nicolau Rosa. Nicolau was killed because he shared a name with the Fretilin leader, Nicolau Lobato.[244]
- When a group surrendered to Battalion 312 at Haeconi (Baguia, Baucau), on Matebian Feto, in October 1978, the troops picked out three men, Luis Lopes, Basilio and Moises, because they had long hair and were presumed to be Falintil fighters. The three were taken away and never seen again.[245]

- In March 1976, Armindo Gonçalves Martins and Maria Fatima surrendered to Battalion 507 at Bonuk in Holbelis, Labarai (Suai, Covalima) with a group of around 500 civilians. The soldiers suspected that Armindo had been a fighter with Fretilin. They separated him from the rest, and killed him.[246]

244. One outcome of this crude selection process was that many ordinary Falintil fighters and people who had not fought at all were executed. For example:

- Mau Buti and Lelo Sea were Falintil soldiers who surrendered in 1978. They were arrested in February at Rotutu, Same, Manufahi on the orders of ABRI. They were then taken away on the pretext of gathering food, but were then shot by two East Timorese, one of whom was the village chief.[247]
- In August 1978, Antonio da Costa Gono, a Falintil fighter, had surrendered to ABRI at Manatuto. He was then taken at midnight by a group of soldiers, including three East Timorese members of ABRI. He was taken to the police station, detained and tortured. From there, he was taken to the local military headquarters, located at the Hotel Asiceo, where he disappeared.[248]
- Again in August 1978, a Falintil member named Kai Fonok surrendered with 31 civilians from their base at Hali Oan (Lacluta, Viqueque). After three days, Kai Fonok was called by Hansip members to go with them to the forest to retrieve guns left by Falintil. In the forest the Hansip members shot him.[249]
- In 1979, Battalion 202 troops captured Jaco Reis, a former Falintil platoon commander, and civilians Naha Kai, his younger brother, Sigi Kai, Uatumau, and another unnamed person in Coleigo Uaida (Ossu, Viqueque). After interrogation by the commander at the Ossu Koramil, they were detained at the Battalion 202 post and never seen again.[250]

245. The Commission received testimonies from several sources indicating that after the fall of the Resistance base on Mount Matebian many people suspected of belonging to Fretilin or Falintil were executed.

- On 25 November 1978, three men, Pedro Alves Cabral, Laiara and José Ximenes, came down to Umurafa at the foot of Mount Matebian in Quelicai and were captured by members of Battalion 312. The Indonesian soldiers accused the three of being communists, tied them up and beat them with rifle butts. The soldiers kicked Pedro Alves Cabral repeatedly in the head, gouging out an eye. The three were then lined up at the edge of a ravine and shot dead. [251]
- When Luis Soares dos Santos came down from Mount Matebian and surrendered with his family in Atalari (Laga, Baucau) in 1979, Indonesian troops found a bag containing two grenades in his possession and took him to their post in Atalari for investigation. He was allowed to return to the "resettlement camp" where his family were living. A few days later it was announced that the people in the resettlement camp could return to their homes. At the same time, however, Luis Soares dos Santos and his three brothers who had been in the forest with him were picked up by Hansip and brought to Baucau in order, the Hansip said, to continue the investigation. After one week the three brothers returned, but Luis never did.[252]

- In December 1979, Carolino Ximenes was captured on Mount Matebian by Indonesian troops from Battalion 502 with 47 others, all of whom were suspected by Indonesian soldiers of being Fretilin fighters. According to the deponent the men were in fact civilians. The families were told that the captured men would be going to school and would be sent home after they had finished. They never reappeared.[253]
- After they had come down from Mount Matebian in November 1978 the people of the village of Afaloicai (Uato Carbau, Viqueque) were ordered to assemble in a field by Infantry Battalion 502. The Indonesian soldiers selected 13 strong-looking men, whom they said would be serving as TBOs. The 13 were taken to the former Portuguese adminstration building where they were tied up and interrogated for two days while being given electric shocks. Meanwhile five Hansip were ordered to dig graves for the 13 in a place called Garaulu in Afaloicai. Two days after they had been taken for interrogation the 13 were taken to Garaulu and shot dead by members of Battalion 502. The five Hansip were present at the executions and when they were over, they were ordered to bury the 13 bodies. According to an informant, who was a Hansip in Uato Carbau at the time of the executions but who had previously been a Falintil commander in charge of the 13 victims, they were ordinary Falintil troops.
- One week later the commander of Battalion 502 ordered the Hansip to dig two more graves in Garaulu. Two men, Carlos from the aldeia of Irabin Leten in Uato Carbau and Armindo from Baguia (Baucau), who were suspected of having been in contact with the guerrillas, were then executed in front of the deputy Koramil commander, M318. The Commission was told of another seven men who were killed in Uato Carbau in December 1978 by troops from Battalion 502 shortly after surrender. At least three of them – Borloi, Gaspar Asukai and Belarmino Maunaha, all from the village of Bahatata in Uato Carbau – were apparently also targeted on the basis of their strong physical appearance.[254]
- The Commission received statements implicating each of the military units engaged in the assault on Matebian in the killing or disappearance of civilians or of combatants outside combat in the period surrounding the fall of the base.[255] In the months after the mass surrenders on Mount Matebian several of these battalions, including most prominently Battalions 721, 202, 502, and 745, were direct perpetrators of the mass executions of people associated with Fretilin and Falintil that took place in early and mid-1979 in Baucau, Viqueque, Lautém and Manatuto (see below).

246. For example, a number of statements received by the Commission reported the disappearance of people who had been taken to the Battalion 202 headquarters in Uaida, Ossu De Cima (Ossu, Viqueque). In 1979, shortly after surrendering in Uatolari and then being moved to the town of Ossu, Afonso da Silva went to his home village of Nahareka (Ossu, Viqueque) to look for food to relieve his family's hunger. There he happened to meet a Falintil commander called Rosito who was an old friend. He was spotted embracing Rosito and talking to him by two men who informed on him to

Battalion 202 in the town. On his return to the town, Afonso da Silva was picked up and taken to the battalion headquarters in Uaida (Ossu). Since then his wife has heard nothing about the fate of her husband.[256]

Killings after the fall of the bases de apoio

247. The Commission has received extensive testimony describing the systematic killing of Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders. It received evidence indicating that such targeted killings occurred in every year during the period 1976-79. However, the largest number of this category of killings was reported to have occurred in 1978-79. The concentration of killings of Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders in the first half of 1979, months and even years after many of them had surrendered or been captured, and their widespread nature suggest that the killings were systematic and resulted from a high-level decision to prevent the resurgence of the Resistance by eliminating its surviving leadership.

248. The words of a detainee in Baucau describe the constant fear of the time:

> The common topic of everyday conversation centred on crimes: two more have been murdered; so-and-so has been called by the Kotis [Tactical Command] or the RTP [Combat Regiment Team] for interrogation; so-and-so was tortured in the Flamboyan; so-and-so has already disappeared; and so on.[257]

249. The systematic nature of this operation was evident not just to detainees, but to the wider population, instilling alarm even in places, such as Suai, where surrendered and captured fighters and activists were not disappearing but feared that they might.[258]

250. In 1977, President Soeharto promised amnesty to all Fretilin combatants, offering a guarantee of their security if they surrendered. Many Fretilin and Falintil leaders also negotiated terms of surrender with the Indonesian military and East Timorese members of the civil administration that included similar guarantees for themselves and the population which surrendered with them. Both the presidential amnesty and the grass-roots arrangements were systematically breached.

251. In August or September 1978, Fretilin Assistant Merita Alves, then in detention in Dili, received a letter in English from Alarico Fernandes, with the heading "Sky Light". The letter described a plan to negotiate the surrender of his associates and followers still in the forest with Indonesian intelligence. Although Alarico Fernandes himself survived, many others in the "Sky Light" group did not. Sebastião Montalvão (Lais), Afonso Redentor, Antonio Pinheiro (Botemau), Amadeo de Coelho (Surik), and João Bosco Galucho Soares were among those who disappeared. After his surrender, Sebastião Montalvão is believed to have been taken by helicopter to Remexio (Aileu) and executed there.[259]

252. While many former Resistance leaders who disappeared or were executed after capture or surrender were held for a lengthy period of interrogation and even released from detention before disappearing or being executed, others, including Antonio Carvarino (Mau Lear), Hamis Bassarewan (Hata), Herminegildo Alves and César Mau Laka, are reported to have been killed very soon after coming into the custody of the Indonesian military, while others, such as Bi Lear (Maria do Ceu Carvarinho) are reported to have disappeared some time after surrendering but without ever entering the detention system. (See Vol. III, Part 7.4: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearences)

253. César Mau Laka, a member of the Fretilin Central Committee and Political Commissar for the South Frontier Sector, was captured by ABRI troops in Manuwen, a region between Natarbora and Manatuto in November 1978. He was taken to Dilor (Viqueque) where he was held and interrogated by the military for a few days, during which he was tortured and threatened with execution. Then a senior ABRI officer named Soetarto (probably Brigadier General Damianus Sutarto, then commander of the Operational Security Command [Koopkam] for Timor-Leste) came in a helicopter to talk with César. Soetarto urged César Mau Laka to cooperate and tell him where Fretilin and Falintil had their bases. César refused to talk. Soetarto flew off again. That night César Mau Laka was taken away and never reappeared.[260]

254. Bi Lear (Maria do Ceu Carvarinho) was a Fretilin assistente as well as a political advisor for the CPN (National Political Commission). In February 1979, her husband, Mau Lear, the Vice President of Fretilin, was captured near Manatuto. Soon after Bi Lear attempted to negotiate her surrender at the concentration camp near Ostico (Baucau, Baucau) where other Fretilin leaders had already surrendered.[261] A priest, Father Locatelli, acted as an intermediary in her surrender, and she was taken to Venilale (Baucau), where she stayed at the house of an East Timorese collaborator, and under control of the military police until April. During this period she was visited on two occasions by the Commander of Sub-Regional Command for (Danrem) for Timor-Leste, Colonel Adolf Sahala Radjagukguk. Although the purpose of these visits is not known, it is probable that Bi Lear was pressured to make contact with members of the Resistance who were still holding out. Some time after this Bi Lear was taken away, and disappeared.[262]

255. This section focuses on the impact of the coordinated campaign of executions and disappearances in 1979 in Dili, Baucau, Lautém, Manufahi and Viqueque. The campaign spread to other districts, including Aileu (see Box: "He's gone to school", par. 232 above) and Manatuto (see Table 17: Killings in Manatuto District, February–April 1979, par. 335 below) where the pattern of targeting people who had been active in Fretilin and Falintil, including many who had been recruited into the institutions such as Hansip, was reproduced.

Dili

Table 12: Persons reported to have been in custody in Dili before disappearance/execution

	Position	Date of killing/ disappearance	Placeof killing/ disappearance	Source
Adão Cristovão	Tonsus
Agostinho Tilman
Alito Alves
Anibal Araújo	CCF
Antonio Carvarino (Mau Lear)	CCF
Antonio Policarpo
Cornelio Exposto
Domingos Ribeiro	Falintil Chief of Staff
Duarte da Silva		Apr-79	Dili
Filomeno Alves
Filomeno Exposto
Hamis Bassarewan (Hata)	CCF
Horacio Alves
Inacio Fonseca (Solan)	CCF
Jacob Ximenes
João Baptista de Jesus	Sector Commander
João Bosco Sarmento Quintão	CCF	14/4/79	Dili	HRVD No 03759
João Bosco Galucho Soares	CCF
João da Conceicão	CCF	14/4/79	Dili
Maria Borges		8-Mar-79	Dili
Juvenal Inacio	CCF
Leopoldo Joaquim
Manecas Exposto		Apr-79	Dili
Maria Gorete Joaquim
Mateus Barbosa		8-Mar-79	Dili	HRVD No 05775
Mateus Siqueira		8-Mar-79	Dili
Moises Rafael Tilman		10-Apr-79	Dili
Olhada			Dili
Onorio Pereira
Oscar Leopoldino Araújo	CCF
Paulino Pereira
Paulo Mesquita
Paulo Rodrigues	CCF
Sebastião Sarmento
Sebastião Montalvão
Vitor Fernandes		May-79	Dili

Sources: HRVD Statements 03529, 03602, 03759, 05671, 08037, 08041 and 08115.

256. Many senior Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders were brought to Dili, and detained in the Comarca (Balide, Dili) or at the Sang Tai Hoo interrogation centre.[263] Most of them subsequently disappeared around March–April 1979, including some who had been released from detention before being re-arrested. Several of them are reported to have been taken to execution sites near Dili, such as at Tacitolu to the west of Dili and Areia Branca to its east; others were reportedly transferred to detention centres outside Dili before being executed at nearby sites.[264]

257. Merita Alves surrendered in Ilimano (Laclo, Manatuto) on 20 July 1978. ABRI suspected that she was the wife of an important person in the forest because she looked well-fed and healthy. After ABRI interrogated her at their post in Ilimano, they took her to Dili on 22 July where she stayed overnight at the home of a relative. The next day she was taken by intelligence officers to the Sang Tai Hoo interrogation centre where she was held until December 1978. In January 1979 she was moved to the Kotis interrogation centre in the Farol prison. Others who had been held at the Sang Tai Hoo were allowed to go home but had to report twice a day to the Kotis.[265] In March 1979, most of the released detainees were re-arrested, and they and those detained with Merita Alves became victims of what she called 'night seizures' (penangkapan malam): they would be taken away and disappear:

> Every night the military took detainees who disappeared or were killed. The "night seizure" operation began in March 1979. At that time, anyone who had a connection with Fretilin faced the risk of being murdered or disappeared…After I suffered various kinds of torture I was released in August 1979. The rest in my group were killed.[266]

258. During this period others were held in the Comarca, Balide, but regularly taken to the Sang Tai Hoo and later the Kotis in Farol for interrogation. Among senior figures who were reported to have been held in the Comarca and who subsequently disappeared were João da Conceição, João Bosco Sarmento Quintão, Inácio Fonseca (Solan) and Domingos Ribeiro. João da Conceição and João Bosco Quintão were reportedly taken from the Comarca in February 1979 by Kopassandha troops and not seen again. Domingos Ribeiro was reportedly taken out of the Comarca on the night of 18 April 1979 with several others, including the recently rearrested Menecas Exposto and Meno Alves. They are believed to have been executed at Areia Branca and Tacitolu.[267]

259. Others who disappeared from Dili are reported to have been taken elsewhere before being executed. Solan, for example, was reportedly taken from the Comarca in late February and is believed to have been transferred to the RTP 16 headquarters in Baucau before being taken to Lacudala in Quelicai (Baucau) in late April 1979 and executed.[268] Others who had been released after a period of detention in the Sang Tai Hoo and then re-arrested may also have been sent to Baucau before eventually being executed in Lacudala, Lospalos (Lautém) or Uatolari (Viqueque). They include Sera Key (Juvenal Inácio), Leopoldo Joaquim, Anibal Araújo and José Alcino João Baptista Soares de Jesus.

260. Maria de Fatima Vaz de Jesus, an OPMT official, and her husband, João Baptista Soares de Jesus, Commander of the South Frontier Sector, were captured in a place called Lobata in the area of Halic in Covalima on 17 May 1978. Only after periods of detention in Bobonaro and Liquiçá were they brought to the Sang Tai Hoo in Dili, around November 1978. After the Sang Tai Hoo was closed as an interrogation centre, both of them had to report daily to the Kotis headquarters in Farol. On 19 March 1979 João Baptista Soares de Jesus disappeared after reporting to the Kotis.[269]

261. Maria de Fatima Vaz de Jesus told the Commission:

> Whenever I asked about my husband, the TNI would always answer: "Maybe he's gone back to the forest"…Sometimes we want to forget, but we can't because our hearts still hurt. It is hard because we still don't know for sure where his bones are. Where did they kill and bury him? Often, when he was little, my son would ask me: "Why don't you ask the big shots where father was killed? Where was he buried?" He was just a child, but he too wanted to know and that was not easy.[270]

262. The Commission was given the names of many of the Indonesian personnel who worked at the Sang Tai Hoo and the Kotis headquarters. The Sang Tai Hoo was commanded by a Major Bambang and the Kotis interrogation by a Major Syamsun. The overall commander of Kotis was identified as Major Sunarto. Others who conducted interrogations in those places included Major Sinaga, Major Ganap, Major Mukhdi, Captain Ali Musa, Major Soetorus, Major Yani, a Major Freddy and others, such as Gunardi and Aziz Hasyim, whose rank is not known. Many of these officers are believed to be alive and would be able to disclose what happened to those who disappeared from their custody.

The disappearance of Luisa*

ABRI used well-known Resistance figures for propaganda purposes, both in Dili and outside. Some of these people were allowed to live at home, but were regularly collected by ABRI, to be publicly displayed for propaganda purposes or to go on helicopter rides through the interior appealing to those still resisting to surrender. The Commission heard that whenever one of them would be taken, ABRI told their families they were being taken "for a ride" to Baucau. Usually they would not return.[271]

Luisa, a young Unetim activist who became an internationally-known symbol of the suffering of East Timorese women, best illustrates the reality of this kind of treatment. She was first arrested in December

* This is not her real name. A pseudonym has been used in order to protect the identity of the victim

1975, when she was 17 years old and held in the Tropical Snack Bar and then in the Sang Tai Hoo interrogation centre.[272] From then until her disappearance nearly four years later, she suffered continual harassment by members of the Indonesian military and periodic periods of detention during which she suffered torture and rape.[273] During this period she was used as by ABRI for propaganda purposes. She was reportedly also used sexually by several military commanders.[274]

During these years she maintained contact with her friends in the forest, but saw it as her duty to remain in Dili. In 1978 she seems to have changed her mind: her last period of detention appears to have been in that year when a plan of hers to flee Dili with a group of other women and join the Resistance forces in the forest was discovered.[275] She was in Dili in July 1978, when she met Merita Alves in the Sang Tai Hoo and showed her the scars she had accumulated from years of ill-treatment. By then Luisa was no longer detained but had to report regularly to the Sang Tai Hoo. Some time in 1979 she moved to Baucau where she lived in a similar kind of semi-freedom, staying for at least some of that time with a local family and reportedly even working with a clandestine network, and but also having to report regularly to the Flamboyan interrogation centre and accompany Indonesian officers on propaganda missions. The last sighting of her reported to the Commission was in September 1979.[276] According to Merita Alves, she was on the list of those who had been selected to disappear.[277]

Baucau District

Table 13: Killings and disappearances in Quelicai, 1978–1979

	Position	Place of Origin	Place of surrender/ capture	Date of surrender/ capture	Date of execution/ disappearance	Place of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator(s)
Abiro Guimarães					5/1/1979	Quelicai
Afonso Cristovão					5/1/1979	Quelicai
Albino Gusmão (Kiti Karson)	Former military police	Maluro, Quelicai	Venilale	11/1/1978	5/1/1979	Quelicai	Armed 13
Alcina Ximenes			Afaca, Quelicai	14-4-79	4/1/1979	Lacudala	Armed 13, Btn 321 and Sukarelawan

	Position	Place of Origin	Place of surrender/ capture	Date of surrender/ capture	Date of execution/ disappearance	Place of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator(s)
Antonino Correia		Seical, Baucau	Buruma, Baucau	3/1/1979		Lacudala	RTP 18
Antonino Varia	Deputy commander, Ist Companhia		Abafala, Quelicai	3/1/1979	3/1/1979	Lacudala	Btn 315, Armed 13
Antonio Espirito Santo			Afaloicai, Uatolari	1979		Quelicai
Aquilino de Oliveira Pinto (Eli Lau)	Ist Companhia, former teacher	Buruma, Baucau	Abafala, Quelicai	3/1/1979	3/1/1979	Lacudala	RTP ?
Candido Felipe Neto Wemau	Ist Companhia, former teacher		Abafala, Quelicai	3/1/1979	3/1/1979	Lacudala	Flamboyan, RTP 18
Celestino Belo			Afaca, Quelicai	14-4-79	4/1/1979	Lacudala	Armed 13, Btn 321 and Sukarelawan
Celestino Peloy	Commander	Laga	Ailemilari, Tequinaumata, Laga	7/3/1979/4-79	21-3-79/5-79	Lacudala	Camat Mateus, Hansip, Pasmar 8, Koramil Laga
Dara-Koo		Laga		2/1/1979	6/1/1979	Lacudala	"Polisi", Kades, Koramil
Dino Monteiro		Ossu			5/1/1979	Lacudala
Domingos Belo			Afaca, Quelicai	14-4-79	4/1/1979	Lacudala	Armed 13, Btn 321 and Sukarelawan
Domingos Gaio					5/1/1979	Lacudala	Flamboyan, RTP 18
Domingos Torres	Delegado Comissariado, former seminarian	Uato Carbau/ Uatolari?	Buruma	11/1/1979	May/June-79	Lacudala	Flamboyan, RTP 18
Domingos Ximenes			Afaca, Quelicai	14-4-79	4/1/1979	Lacudala	Armed 13, Btn 321 and Sukarelawan
Du Dara			Letemumu, Quelicai			Lacudala
Felix Ximenes		Laga		2/1/1979	6/1/1979	Lacudala	"Polisi", Kades, Koramil

	Position	Place of Origin	Place of surrender/ capture	Date of surrender/ capture	Date of execution/ disappear-ance	Place of ex-ecution/ disap-pear-ance	Perpe-trator(s)
Francisco				11/1/1978	11/1/1978	Quelicai
Francisco da Costa Correia				15-8-79		Quelicai	Kodim, Armed
Francisco Freitas		Buibau, Baucau			5/1/1979	Quelicai
Francisco Marques	Delegado Comissariado				May–June-79	Quelicai
Gaspar Correia	Delegado Comissariado, Baucau	Seical			Apr- June 79	Quelicai	RTP 16
Gil Freitas	Tonsus commander				3/1/1979	Lacudala
Gregorio Pereira		Afaca, Quelicai			May–June-79	Lacudala
Ignacia					1979	Quelicai
Inacio Fonseca (Solan)	CCF, Adjunto	Tutuala, Lautém	Ossu	12/1/1978	4/29/1979	Lacudala
Jacinta Gaio					5/13/1979	Lacudala
Jaime Cabral (Mau Leka)					Early 1979	Lacudala
Januario Braga					May–June-79	Lacudala
Januario Gaio		Guruça, Quelicai			5/1/1979	Lacudala
Jeremias Soares		Uatolari			5/1/1979	Lacudala
João from Baguia		Baguia			May–June-79	Lacudala
João Branco	Tonsus commander	Lospalos		1976	3/1/1979	Lacudala	Armed
João Meneses			Afaloicai, Uatolari	1979	Apr- June 79	Quelicai
Joaquim Fraga (Au Lela)					May–June 1979	Lacudala
Joaquim Ximenes			Afaca, Quelicai	14-4-79	4/1/1979	Lacudala	Armed 13, Btn 321 and Sukarelawan
José Alcino					May–June 1979	Lacudala

	Position	Place of Origin	Place of surrender/ capture	Date of surrender/ capture	Date of execution/ disappear-ance	Place of ex-ecution/ disap-pear-ance	Perpe-trator(s)
José Gaio (Mau Seklai)	Assistente	Guruça, Quelicai	Quelicai	Nov-78?	5/1/1979	Lacudala
José Ximenes		Quelicai		Nov-78?	May–June 1979
Laiara		Quelicai		Nov-78?	May–June 1979
Lino da Costa		Ponta Leste			6/1/1979	Lacudala
Lino Olocasa	Comandante Sector	Uato Carbau	Quelicai	11/1/1978	1/1979	Lacudala	Btn 315, Flamboyan, RTP 16
Lourenço Gaio Ximenes		Abafala, Quelicai			5/1/1979	Lacudala
Luisa Gaio					5/13/1979	Lacudala
Manu Loi				11/1/1978	11/1/1978	Lacudala
Marcal Alcino	Assistente de Zona				May–June 1979	Quelicai
Marçal Braga		Quelicai			May–June 1979	Quelicai
Mateus dos Santos					5/1/1979	Lacudala	Armed 13, Albino (Hansip)
Paulo Agapito Gama	Comandante	Laga	Ailemilari, Tequinaumata, Laga	2-79/7/3/1979/ 4-79	21-3-79/5-79	Lacudala	Camat Mateus, Hansip, Pasmar 8, Koramil Laga
Paulo Gaio		Guruça, Quelicai			5/1/1979	Lacudala
Paulo Soares					May–June 1979	Quelicai
Pedro Alves Cabral		Quelicai		Nov-78?	11/1/1978	Quelicai
Rui Freitas					May–June 1979	Quelicai
Sebastião Alves			Afaloicai, Uatolari	1979
Sidonio Sarmento (Mau Anik)	Secretario, former teacher	Laisorolai		11/1/1978	13-5-79	Lacudala	Flamboyan, RTP 18, Armed 13

	Position	Place of Origin	Place of surrender/ capture	Date of surrender/ capture	Date of execution/ disappear-ance	Place of ex-ecution/ disap-pear-ance	Perpe-trator(s)
Tadeo Freitas Muniz (Laicana)	Commander Ist Companhia	Quelicai	Abafala, Quelicai	Feb-79/Mar-79	5/1/1979	Lacudala	Btn 315, (Fatumaca, house of Aleixo Ximenes), RTP 16, Armed 13
Virgilio Dias	Delegado Comissariado, Dili				6/1/1979	Lacudala	RTP 16

Sources: HRVD Statements 07800, 00572, 07682, 03908, 08051, 07712, 02127, 07760, 00595, 00597 and 07787; CAVR Interviews with Zeferino Armando Ximenes, Baucau, 13 June 2003; Constantino dos Santos, Letemumu (Quelicai, Baucau), 13 June 2003; José Correia (Calala), Tirilolo (Baucau, Baucau), 24 March 2004, Fernando José Freitas Soares and Venancio dos Santos Alves, Quelicai, 2 May 2004; CRRN Communiqué, July 1983, Gatimor No 6, 1983; Community Profile, Maluro, Quelicai.

263. Between late 1978 and mid-1979, many hundreds of people were reported to have been killed or to have disappeared in Baucau District in a variety of circumstances: immediately after surrender, in public executions, while looking for food or going about their daily activities, and in military posts and headquarters and other places used as detention centres around the district.* The most notorious of these killings occurred at execution sites in Quelicai (Baucau) in the period between April and June 1979. The Commission collected the names of 59 people whom it believes were killed at various execution sites in Quelicai, one in a place called Lacudala being most often used.† This number is well below the total given by sources interviewed in Quelicai itself, who believe that more than 300 people may have been executed there. They base their estimates on lists that they had seen and on the number of bones of persons killed there and subsequently collected.‡ Lacudala was an execution site to which people from a wide

* For summary executions, see HRVD Statements 00536, 07069, 05729, 00538, 05395, 06802. 07781, 07761, 02127, 07758, 00521, 09188, 02127, 07087, 07778, 03072 and 02362: for disappearances, see HRVD Statements 07069, 06147, 03933 and 07047; for killings after being taken into custody at military posts and headquarters and places used as detention centres, see HRVD Statements 03908, 07930, 07117, 00126, 07076, Community Profiles, Alawa Kraik (Baguia, Baucau) and Bahamori (Venilale, Baucau); for killings of people looking for food or going about their daily activities, see HRVD Statements 03895, 00542, 00548, 06110, 03879, 07713, and 07797.

† Lacudala was not the only execution site in the area of Quelicai. Others were reportedly located at Samateku, Alaslai, Lawaliu and Lebenei [CAVR Interview with Constantino dos Santos, Letemumu (Quelicai, Baucau) 13 November 2003].

‡ The bodies of executed victims were reportedly thrown into ravines near the execution sites. The executions reportedly stopped in 1980 with the arrival in Quelicai of Battalion 114 from Aceh. Battalion 114 allowed relatives to gather the victims' bones and bury them [CAVR Interviews with Constantino dos Santos, Letemumu (Quelicai, Baucau) 13 November 2003; and Leonel Guterres, Quelicai (Quelicai, Baucau), 13 November 2003].

area were brought for execution. Thus while many of those killed at Lacudala were from Quelicai, there were victims from Lospalos (Lautém), Ossu, Uatolari and Uato Carbau (Viqueque), as well from other parts of Baucau District, including Venilale, Laga and Baguia.[278] Most, though not all, of those killed in Quelicai had held leadership positions in Fretilin or Falintil.

264. The range of victims is indicated by the following accounts:

- Tadeo Freitas Muniz (Laicana) surrendered to Battalion 315 in Kotaisi, Abafala (Quelicai, Baucau) on 7 March 1979 with a fully-armed company. Their surrender was reportedly negotiated with former senior members of Fretilin and Falintil who had themselves surrendered or been captured earlier and were working under instruction from Colonel Iswanto.[279] One week later he and his deputy, Antonino Varia (Ria) were taken to Lacudala and executed. Some of his troops escaped and others were recruited into the paramilitary Team Saka.[280]
- João Branco, a former member of the Fretilin Central Committee who had surrendered with others to the Indonesians in Lospalos in 1976 and had then been appointed to head a 200-strong auxiliary called Tonsus, and one of his lieutenants, Gil Freitas, were reportedly killed at Lacudala in March 1979. João Branco had taken part with his Tonsus in the destruction of the Falintil/Fretilin base on Matebian. Twenty-seven of his members were reportedly killed by troops of Battalion 745 in Trisula (Lautém), some others may have been killed in Lacudala in March 1979 aside from João Branco and Gil Freitas.[*] [281]
- In March or April 1979, a group commanded by Agapito Gama and his deputy, Celestino Peloy, negotiated their surrender to Marine Battalion, Pasmar 3, in Ailemilari (Tequinaumata, Laga, Baucau). They were given guarantees that they would not be harmed if they surrendered. At first they were "concentrated", but not ill-treated. Two weeks later, however, Agapito Gama and Celestino Peloy were picked up by the Sub-district administrator (camat) of Laga, Mateus, and troops from Pasmar 3. They were reportedly taken to the Koramil in Baucau Town. In May or June they were taken to Lacudala and executed.[282]

265. Although generally those executed at Lacudala were targeted because of their roles in the Resistance, the Commission was told of instances where victims did not meet these criteria. For example, Norberto Correia, an employee of the Baucau office of the Indonesian Department of Agriculture, had never been in the mountains and seems to have been killed because he had two sons who were still fighting with the Resistance.[†]

* At least 19 of João Branco's Tonsus were reportedly killed in Lautém and Dili at around the same time [see: Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances in Lautém, below]. A few months before they had participated in the Indonesian offensive on Mount Matebian, but were accused of being "two-headed". The Indonesians' suspicions were well-founded: after João Branco's defection to the Indonesians, Xanana Gusmão had maintained contact with him and the clandestine organisation with which he was working in Tutuala Sub-district [Xanana Gusmão, Timor-Leste – Um Povo, Uma Patria, pp. 37, 38-39 and 41; Sarah Niner, To Resist is to Win: The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, pp. 53, 55 and 58].

† Norberto Correia was reportedly killed despite giving the chief of the Baucau Kodim intelligence section (Kasi-1) four buffalo [CRRN Communiqué, July 1983].

266. The Commission was told of another case in which the person who was killed was the victim of a horrifying display of random violence.

267. On 23 April 1979, Alcina Ximenes and six members of her family, including a four-year-old child, were captured by Indonesian soldiers of Battalion 321 and Hansip in a place called Afateri Doro in Afaça (Quelicai, Baucau) and brought to the village of Mulia (Laga, Baucau). The three adult male family members, Joaquim Ximenes, Domingos Ximenes and Celestino Belo, were tied up and the whole group was taken by car to the Armed (Artileri Medan, Field Artillery) headquarters in Quelicai. Once there a Hansip told the Armed commander that the three men had been leaders in the forest. The Armed troops then set upon the men, beating and stamping on them.

268. The next day the three were brought to Lacudala, told to stand near a hole in the ground and shot. Domingos and Celestino Belo died immediately. Joaquim Ximenes did not: he managed to crawl out of the hole despite being shot three more times. The soldiers grabbed him by the neck and threw him back in the hole, and then bombarded him with stones. He was still not dead, so they buried him alive.

269. When the soldiers returned to their base, one of the women, Alcina Ximenes, who was pregnant at the time, asked the Armed troops what had happened to the three men. She was told that if she wanted to know, she could come with them and see. She was brought to Lacudala where she too was killed. Subsequently her four-year-old child was beaten to death. Two other women continued to be detained for another two months during which time they were repeatedly raped by the soldiers and the Hansip.[283]

270. A number of senior and middle-ranking Fretilin and Falintil commanders who surrendered or were captured in November–December 1978 were brought to the town of Baucau where Kopassandha personnel interrogated them at the Flamboyan Hotel or Uma Merah interrogation centres, sometimes for several weeks, before they were transferred to the headquarters of RTP 18 in Teulale. From the RTP 18 headquarters many of them were taken to Lacudala for execution. Others were brought to Quelicai either directly after arrest or from a Koramil or other military installation.[284] Two survivors of the trip to Lacudala interviewed by the Commission both recall that they were taken there in a military truck called a Reo and brought to the Koramil in Quelicai where they were interrogated by the Armed 13 unit commander, First Lieutenant Osaka, assisted by East Timorese translators, of whom the most notorious was M232. Armed 13, one of the battalions then under the command of RTP 18, also carried out the executions.[285] A former Hansip, Constantino dos Santos, told the Commission that one of his duties was to keep the records at the Koramil in Quelicai. He recalled that there was a "red book" containing 375 names of people who had been or were going to be executed.[286]

271. Zeferino Armando Ximenes recalled:

> With my hands bound I was put in a military vehicle called a Reo and we headed for Quelicai [from the RTP 18 headquarter in Baucau Town] on 13 May 1979, which I remember because it was Assumption Day. Once there we were interrogated into the night…We were not beaten, but we were just waiting for our turn to die, because we had been told that we were going to be sent to school like our friends Tadeo Soares Laicana, Domingos Gaio, and Solan, who, they said, had been sent to school abroad. The next morning there was a vehicle waiting for us by the cave and Indonesian soldiers with a list of Baucau people who were involved with Fretilin were there to meet us and to bring us to Ponto Alto, above Quelicai.[287]

272. Zeferino Armando Ximenes was saved from execution through the intervention of a logistics officer who knew him and happened to be at the Armed 13 base just as he was about to be transported to the execution site.[288]

273. José Correia (Calala), who had surrendered to Major Iswanto in Laga with 13 other fully armed Falintil fighters, also escaped execution. Rearrested in June 1979, he was put in a Reo vehicle which had just come from Lospalos. In the vehicle there were already about 14 prisoners, who he thought were all from Lospalos. The only two people he recognised were João Branco and Gil Freitas. The Commission was told that the prisoners were sitting quietly, not speaking. Their hands were tied behind their backs. They were not allowed to turn their heads to left or right, but had to look straight ahead at the front of the vehicle. They went straight to the Armed 13 headquarters in Quelicai and then to Lacudala where he was put in a building while waiting his turn to be executed. José was kept with around 20 people, all of whom were executed, including José Gaio. TBOs and Hansip worked day and night preparing the graves in which the executed victims would be buried.[289]

274. The Commission has not been able to confirm the higher estimates of the number of people executed in Quelicai. However, it believes that the names of persons that it was itself able to compile do not constitute an exhaustive list of victims. One reason for this conclusion is that others who were detained during this time partially followed the route taken by those who were reported to the Commission to have been killed at Lacudala or other sites in Quelicai: arrest, detention and interrogation, accompanied by torture in one of a number of specific detention centres, such as the Flamboyan, the Kodim or the RTP 16 headquarters in Baucau. In the case of these other victims, however, their fate after going through this process is not known, that is they were simply reported to have disappeared. Moreover, many of those reported to have disappeared in these circumstances, such as the former Fretilin secretary for Baucau, Eduardo Ximenes, were senior or middle-ranking Fretilin cadres or Falintil commanders, and thus also fit the profile of most of those who were killed in Quelicai. Thus, although they were not actually reported to have been killed in Quelicai, this may have been what happened to them. This hypothesis is strengthened by the fact that in several of the statements received by the Commission the victims were reported to have simply disappeared, when other information received by the Commission suggests that in fact those victims were actually killed in Quelicai.[290] *

275. During this time disappearances were occurring in every sub-district in the district of Baucau. Some of these cases are cited below.

* At the same time the Commission learned of several instances where people who disappeared at this time in Baucau District were in fact executed in places other than Lacudala.

Baguia

276. In September 1978, one day after their surrender, Abel do Carmo and Alberto Freitas were summoned by the Sub-district administrator (camat) of Baguia and told that they were going to be taken to Laga. They have not been seen since.[291]

277. In June 1979, the Sub-district administrator, M233, ordered a group of men to go up Mount Matebian to look for Falintil. They captured Gaspar Kasaroi, who was handed over to the Koramil in Baguia. He then disappeared.[292]

278. In December 1978, eight men who had been captured by Battalion 502 on Mount Matebian were suspected of being members of Falintil. Their families were told that they were going to school and would return only after they had graduated. They never returned.[293]

Baucau

279. On an unspecified date in 1979, the Fretilin secretary for Baucau, Eduardo Ximenes (Gamukai), his brothers, Badanau and Bedusobu, and brother-in-law, Inácio da Costa, were captured by the village chief of Afaça (Quelicai), M234, and an aldeia chief named M235. The four men were bound and taken to the Kodim in Baucau. The uncle, who escaped from the Kodim, told the family that the three others had been taken away to be killed that night. According to another statement, which also appears to be about the death of Eduardo Ximenes, he was taken to Quelicai where Indonesian soldiers killed him.[294]

280. In March 1979, troops from the RTP 18 arrested Antonio Correia at the house of Gaspar Sarmento in Suliwa, Buruma. His subsequent whereabouts are not known. On 7 April 1979, two Hansip arrested Fernando Saldanha in Kaisahe, Ono-Sere, Buruma, saying that he had been summoned by the liurai/village chief, M237. He was taken to the TNI dormitory at Teulale, Baucau (probably also RTP 18 headquarters). He has not been seen since.[*†]

Laga

281. In November 1978, four people, Domingos dos Santos da Costa, who had been a chefe de aldeia (aldeia chief) in the forest, José Rusa Fuik, a Força de Auto-Defesa (Self-Defence Force) commander, and Pedro and Amaro, both of whom had been in the Força de Intervenção (Intervention Force), were arrested and taken to the military police post in Laga. After being interrogated during which all four were tortured, the last three disappeared.[‡]

* HRVD Statement 07682. For other disappearances and killings in Baucau Sub-district around this time see HRVD Statements 07826, 07930 and 07805.

† The CAVR Community Profile for Buruma Village, Baucau Sub-district, Baucau District (2 December 2003) contains the story of an unnamed woman who in 1979 brought food for her imprisoned husband and was told that he had been taken to Quelicai.

‡ HRVD Statement 07079. For other disappearances in Laga Sub-district in 1978-79, see HRVD Statements 07699 02362, 00536 and 05729.

282. In 1979, Luis Antero Ximenes, a former Falintil fighter, was arrested in Laga by members of the Koramil and an official of the local administration because he had not registered with the Indonesian authorities after coming down from the mountains. Three weeks later his family saw him being taken away in a jeep. The deponent ran after the jeep and heard his father's last words: "Tell your mother that I am tied up and don't know where I am being taken. If I die, we will not meet again. Only if I live, will we meet again." He never returned.[295]

283. On 9 June 1979, a Falintil commander, Afonso de Carvalho, surrendered to Indonesian forces in Laga. That evening troops from Battalion 745 took him to Baucau for interrogation. He never returned.[296]

284. After surrender to the TNI in the area of Atelari in 1979, one member of a group of six, Luis Soares dos Santos, a member of Falintil, was found to have two grenades. The group was taken to the Atalari post for investigation. A few days later the TNI announced that the people would be allowed to return to their homes, but Luis, Gaspar Soares, Mateus, and Miguel were taken to Baucau for further investigation. A week later all but Luis were allowed to go home. Luis has not been seen since.[297]

Quelicai

285. A man called Dai-Dara was accused by the Indonesian military of being a member of Falintil after they had looked at his hands after surrender in November 1978. He was taken away and has not been seen since.[298]

286. In 1979 two persons, who were suspected of being in contact with Falintil, Ganuloi from the aldeia of Gugulai and Railari from the aldeia of Karanu, were arrested by the TNI and taken to Laga. They have not been seen since.[299]

Vemasse

287. On 16 November 1978, the paramilitary Team Sukarelawan captured four persons, Domingos Lekiwati, Inácio Pereira, Januario dos Reis, and Tomás Samut, during an operation on Mount Ossuala, Vemasse. That night Indonesian troops and members of Team Sukarelawan took the four to the Flamboyan Hotel in Baucau. They have never reappeared.[300]

Venilale

288. On 8 November 1978, four men, two named Antonio Guterres, one called Joaquim Loi and one other, came down from Mount Matebian and were captured by Indonesian soldiers when they reached Quelicai. They were then forced to walk for four days until they reached Uaibua, Uatohaco, in Venilale. On arrival at the TNI and Hansip post, they were detained by the TNI under the command of Major Tswanto and Hansip under the command of M239. When the sister of one of the men, Maria, came to the post bringing food for them, she was told the four had been taken to the Koramil in Venilale. She went to the Koramil and was told that her brother was still at the post in Uaibua and that the others had been released. Antonio has not reappeared.[301]

289. At around the same time Joaquim Guterres came out of the forest and surrendered at the Venilale Koramil to Battalion 721. His subsequent fate is not known.[302]

290. The climate of fear produced by the killings meant that their impact extended beyond those directly targeted and those close to them, as is illustrated by the following account.

291. Maria da Silva Soares had come down to surrender in Quelicai in February 1979 with Laikana. Some time later she heard that Laikana had been arrested by two Hansip and had disappeared. Maria, fearing for her own safety because her husband, Raimundo Cabral, was a Falintil fighter still in the forest, fled with her six children to the forest around the area of Aneilo (Laisorolai Kraik, Quelicai).

292. By March 1979, two of her children, Amaro and Justino, had died of hunger and sickness. Not long after, her other four children, Ana Maria, Betina, Anakai and Reaminga, also died. Maria then managed to make contact with her husband. For several years she moved with him and his Falintil comrades between the districts of Baucau and Lautém, often coming under attack from Indonesian forces.[303]

Lautém District

Table 14: Killings in Lautém 1978–1979 by sub-district and group

Place/group	Name	Position	Reported circumstances of death/disappearance
Lospalos	Afonso de Albuquerque	Secretario da Zona	Disappeared from Lospalos Kodim
	Afonso Savio		Killed Btn 745 in Lausepo
	Adão Amaral		Killed 1979
	Alberto Nunes	Delegado Comissariado	Killed 1979
	Calisto Rego	Delegado Comissariado	Killed in Lospalos Town
	Dinis dos Santos Gandara	Assistente	Killed by Battalion 745 in Kivira Ara, Tximo, Lore
	Duarte Amaral		Died after torture in Lospalos
	Felicidade dos Santos Gandara	Delegado Comissariado	Killed by Btn 745 in Lausepo
	Francisco Sarmento Loy	Delegado Comissariado	Killed by Hansip in Lospalos Town
	Augusto Sanches	Colaborador, Sector Ponta Leste	Killed by Btn 745 in Kurisa Lore
	Jacinta Pereira	Assistente	Killed by Btn 745 in Lausepo
	João Ernestino de Andrade Sarmento	Nurse	Disappeared from Lospalos Kodim in April 1979
	José Farseira	Fretilin	Disappeared 1979

Place/group	Name	Position	Reported circumstances of death/disappearance
	José Fernandes		Disappeared 1979
	José Ferreira da Conceicão		Disappeared 1979
	Orlando Marques	Sub-district administrator (camat), Iliomar	Disappeared after being brought to Btn 745 base at Trisula, June 1979
	Paulo Nunes	Assistente	Disappeared after being brought to Lospalos
	Pedro Sanches	Deputy Sector Commander, Falintil	Killed Btn 745 in Lausepo
	Raul Monteiro	Former seminarian	Killed in Lospalos Town
	Raul dos Santos	Delegado Comissariado	Disappeared after being brought to Lospalos
	Victor dos Santos Gandara		Possibly killed with Felicidade dos Santos Gandara and Jacinta Pereira in Lore
Other Lospalos	Fernando Sanches	Former liurai of Fuiloro	Killed in Sapuada, Home
	Tomé Cristovão	Former Apodeti	Killed in Sapuada, Home
Fuiloro	Adelino da Costa Savio		Killed 1979
	Araújo		Killed 1979
	Arnaldo da Costa		Killed 1979
	Asu Chai		Killed 1979
	Bokleman		Killed 1979
	Carlos Cabral		Killed 1979
	Crispin Lopes		Killed 1979
	Duarte dos Santos (or Duarte Amaral)		Killed 1979
	Eugenio Mosinaca		Killed 1979
	Feliciano		Killed 1979
	Fernando Lavantu		Killed 1979
	Jecarunu		Killed 1979
	Jesus da Costa		Killed 1979
	Julio Rodrigues		Killed 1979
	Justino Kiar Moko		Killed 1979
	Justino Sanches		Killed 1979
	Lamberto de Jesus		Killed 1979
	Lourenço Viana		Killed 1979

Place/group	Name	Position	Reported circumstances of death/disappearance
	Luis Pereira		Killed 1979
	Luis Ximenes		Killed 1979
	Manuel Loi Malai		Killed 1979
	Marcelino Pereira		Killed 1979
	Nasorio Mendes		Killed 1979
	Pedro		Killed 1979
	Pedro Valentim		Killed 1979
Loré I	Albino Adriano		Killed 1979
	Antonio da Costa		Killed 1979
	João		Killed December 1979 by Btn 745
	Kaivaca		Killed 1979
	Lavan Lovaia		Killed 1979
	Loimoco		Killed December 1979 by Btn 745
	Mário Provincial		Killed December 1979 by Btn 745
	Melchior		Killed 1979
	Pedro da Conceição		Killed 1979
	Rogerio da Conceição		Killed 1979
	Sela Moko		Killed 1979
	Sico Falu Malai		Killed 1979
	Tanirauno		Killed 1979
	Tito da Conceição		Killed 1979
Raça	Agapito		Killed 1979
	David Lopes		Killed 1979
	Edmundo da Silva		Killed 1979
	Filomeno		Killed 1979
	João Baptista		Killed 1979
	José Oliveira		Killed 1979
	Natalino		Killed 1979
Bauro	Alvaro Lopes		Killed 1979
	Crispin Caetano		Killed 1979
	João Soares		Killed 1979
	José Caetano		Killed 1979

Place/group	Name	Position	Reported circumstances of death/disappearance
	Kaicavanu		Killed 1979
	Moko		Killed 1979
	Leogildo Freitas		Killed 1979
	Lina dos Santos		Killed 1979
	Luis Lopes		Killed 1979
	Orlando Bosco		Killed 1979
	Roberto Marques		Killed 1979
	Rosario		Killed 1979
Home	Capecai		Killed 1979
	Soru-Koru		Killed 1979
	Telu Kuro		Killed 1979
Mehara, Tutuala	Alarico da Costa		Killed at Btn 745 post at Trisula, Assalaino, Fuiloro, in June 1979
	Alcino		Killed at Btn 745 post at Trisula, Assalaino, Fuiloro, in June 1979
	Gonzalo Soares		Killed at Btn 745 post at Trisula, Assalaino, Fuiloro, in June 1979
	Gabriel Soares		Killed at Btn 745 post at Trisula, Assalaino, Fuiloro, in June 1979
	Carolino Carvalho		Killed at Btn 745 post at Trisula, Assalaino, Fuiloro, in June 1979
	Miguel Monteiro		Killed at Btn 745 post at Trisula, Assalaino, Fuiloro, in June 1979
	Orlando	Comandante de Zona	Killed at Btn 745 post at Trisula, Assalaino, Fuiloro, in June 1979
	João Caetano		Killed at Btn 745 post at Trisula, Assalaino, Fuiloro, in June 1979
	Antonio do Carmo		Killed at Btn 745 post at Trisula, Assalaino, Fuiloro, in June 1979
	Victor Pires	Hansip	Disappeared after arrest by Hansip in 1979
	Faustino Guimaraes	Hansip	Disappeared after arrest by Hansip in 1979
Moro, Tutuala	Afonso		Executed at Daudere by Btn 745 in 1979
	Bendito		Executed at Daudere by Btn 745 in 1979
	Thomas da Costa		Handed over by Kopassandha to Btn 745 and disappeared in May 1979; reportedly killed in Assailaino, Fuiloro

Place/group	Name	Position	Reported circumstances of death/disappearance
	Rui		Handed over by Kopassandha to Btn 745 and disappeared in May 1979; reportedly killed in Assailaino, Fuiloro
	Paulo		Executed at Daudere by Btn 745 in 1979
	Alcino Fernandes Xavier		Executed at Adaveri, Serelau by Btn 508 and Hansip, 1978
	Antonio João Lopes		Executed at Adaveri, Serelau by Btn 508 and Hansip, 1978
	Domingos dos Santos		Executed at Adaveri, Serelau by Btn 508 and Hansip, 1978
	Afredo dos Santos	Clandestine/former comandante	Killed by Btn 745 at Etipiti, Com in June or July 1979
	Oscar Victor	Clandestine	Killed by Btn 745 at Etipiti, Com in June or July 1979
	Virgilio dos Santos	Clandestine	Killed by Btn 745 at Etipiti, Com in June or July 1979
	Duarte		Killed by Btn 745 at Etipiti, Com in June or July 1979
	Mário Amaral		Killed by Btn 745 at Etipiti, Com in June or July 1979
	Pedro		Killed by Btn 745 at Etipiti, Com in June or July 1979
	Antonio Xavier		Killed by Btn 745 at Etipiti, Com in June or July 1979
	José
	Amaro Amaral	Hansip/clandestine	Handed over by Kopassandha to Btn 745 and disappeared in May 1979
	Venancio Gusmão	Hansip/clandestine	Handed over by Kopassandha to Btn 745 and disappeared in May 1979; reportedly killed in Assailaino, Fuiloro
	Sebastião Maria Lourdes	Hansip/clandestine	Handed over by Kopassandha to Btn 745 and disappeared in May 1979
	Horacio Silverio Lopes	Hansip/clandestine	Handed over by Kopassandha to Btn 745 and disappeared in May 1979
	Rodolfo da Costa Junior	Hansip/clandestine	Handed over by Kopassandha to Btn 745 and disappeared in May 1979; reportedly killed in Sepelata, Bauro

Place/group	Name	Position	Reported circumstances of death/disappearance
	Inacio dos Santos	Hansip/clandestine	Handed over by Kopassandha to Btn 745 and disappeared in May 1979
	Pedro dos Santos	Delegado	Disappeared after arrest by Btn 745
	José da Silva		Disappeared after arrest by Btn 745
	Martinho da Silva		Disappeared after arrest by Btn 745
	Julio de Castro		Disappeared after arrest by Btn 745
	Kacoli		Killed in Etipiti, Com by Btn 745
	Pedro		Killed in Etipiti, Com by Btn 745
	José		Killed in Serelau, Com by Btn 745
	Julio		Killed in Serelau, Com by Btn 745
	Alcino da Costa		Killed by Btn 408
	Antonio da Costa		Disappeared from Kodim in October 1978
	Pedro Nogueira		Arrested by Brimob, handed over to Btn 745, tortured and killedin Trisula, Assailaino, Fuiloro, October 1979
	Anudai		Shot dead on Lautém beach by Btn 745, 1979
	Liabui 1		Shot dead on Lautém beach by Btn 745, 1979
	Liabui 2		Shot dead on Lautém beach by Btn 745, 1979
	Koofou		Shot dead on Lautém beach by Btn 745, 1979
Luro/ Benedito Group	Antero dos Santos		Disappeared from Kodim, February 1979
	Benedito Savio	Assistente	Disappeared from Kodim, February 1979
	Bernadino Carvalho		Disappeared from Kodim, February 1979

Place/group	Name	Position	Reported circumstances of death/disappearance
	Antonio Reis		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Cancio da Silva		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Felix Gonzaga		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Felisberto da Cruz		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Fernando da Costa Lopes		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Hermenegildo Viegas		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	José Viegas		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Lambario Lopes		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Manuel Monteiro Leite		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Marcal dos Reis Noronha		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Maria Olga		Disappeared, possibly February 1979
	Moises Fernandes		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Pedro Alvares Cabral		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Tomas Ximenes		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Zeferino Freitas		Killed shortly after capture by Btn 305
	Casimiro dos Santos Alegria	Assistente	Reported killed by ABRI at Darapu'u, Baricafa, 1979
	Domingos Mário		Disappeared from Koramil, Luro, 1979
	Aleixo Soares Malimau		Disappeared from Koramil, Luro, December 1979
	Alfredo Ramos		Disappeared from Koramil, Luro, December 1979
	Amelia da Silva		Disappeared from Koramil, Luro, December 1979
	Antonio da Conceição		Disappeared from Koramil, Luro, December 1979

Place/group	Name	Position	Reported circumstances of death/disappearance
	Hermenegildo da Costa	Fretilin assistente	Disappeared from Koramil, Luro, December 1979
	Manuel da Costa		Disappeared from Koramil, Luro, December 1979
	Manuel Soares		Disappeared from Koramil, Luro, December 1979
	Duarte dos Santos		Disappeared from Koramil, Luro, December 1979
	João Freitas	Chefe de aldeia	Killed by Btn 315, 1979
	Antero Teixeira	Fretilin assistente	Disappeared from Luro, 1979
Members of Tonsus	Acacio Alvares Fernandes		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979
	Adão de Jesus Cristovão		Disapppeared, reportedly taken to Dili, April 1979
	Alarico Caetano		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979
	Aleixo Amaral		Disapppeared, reportedly taken to Dili, April 1979
	Armindo Alvares Fernandes		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979
	Artur Amaral		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979
	Domingos Savio		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979
	Duarte Romão Vieira		Disapppeared, reportedly taken to Dili, April 1979
	Eduardo dos Anjos Caetano		Disapppeared, reportedly taken to Dili, April 1979
	Fernando Lopes		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979
	Gil Cristovão		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979
	Inacio		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979
	Joaquim de Jesus		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979

Place/group	Name	Position	Reported circumstances of death/disappearance
	Levorgildo dos Santos		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucu
	Manuel Patricio Mendes		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979
	Nicolau Quintas		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucu
	Patricio Fernandes		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979
	Paulino Pereira		Disappeared, possibly killed in Lacudala, Quelicai, Baucau, April 1979

Sources: HRVD Statements 04422, 05332, 00703, 02115, 03979, 02262, 01618, 01615, 02293, 00740, 01649, 01622, 01636, 02257, 02252, 02264, 00793, 00702, 00788, 00706, 00740, 00793, 00737, 00740, 00702, 00741, 00706, 00788, 00713, 01623, 02115, 03979, 02293, 02286, 01604, 02300, 02254, 01650, 02130, 07585, 03968, 09117, 04435, 05369, 05376, 05264, 05365 and 02798; Community Profiles, Fuiloro, Bauro, Lore I, Raça and Home (all Lospalos), Mehara and Loro (both Tutuala), and Iparira and Laiara (Parlamento, Moro); CAVR Interviews with Maria Teresa Corvelo Avila Marcel Sarmento, Dili, 25 September 2005; and José Correia (Calala), Tirilolo, Baucau, 24 March 2004; CRRN Communique.

293. In Lautém around 20 people were executed or disappeared in what appears to have been part of the wider campaign against former Fretilin office-holders and Falintil commanders. However, many of those who were killed or disappeared during this period were people suspected of being involved in clandestine activity at the time of their arrest. Most of the former Fretilin office-holders and Falintil commanders about whom specific information was given to the Commission were executed or disappeared in March–May 1979, at around the same time that their counterparts in other districts were meeting the same fate. Some were working in the Indonesian administration as teachers, nurses or members of the civil administration at the time of their arrest. Others had been in continuous detention since being captured or having surrendered in November 1978. They were typically taken to the Kodim in Lospalos and, after interrogation by members of Kopassandha, they were taken away by members of Battalion 745 and killed. Although many of the victims simply disappeared, in a number of other cases East Timorese who were working with the Indonesian forces as drivers and in other auxiliary roles disclosed the places where the victims were executed. The places most often mentioned were Assalaino, Lausepo and the graveyard near the Battalion 745 headquarters in the village of Fuiloro (Lospalos), athough others were reportedly taken to places further afield, such Ililapa and Kurisa Apa by the Tximo river in Lore and Sapu Ara, Home (Lospalos). Relatives of the disappeared were told that victims had gone on operations or had gone to school or on a course.

294. João Ernestino de Andrade Sarmento was the head nurse in Lospalos before the invasion. He continued to work as a nurse and to train others in nursing in the forest. In 1977 he was arrested in the Eastern Central Sector as an “agent of Xavier” on the orders of Central Committee members based there and had narrowly escaped execution (see par. 245 above). He surrendered in the town of Uato Carbau (Viqueque) after the fall of the base de apoio on Mount Matebian in November 1978.[304]

295. One night in January 1979, after hearing that Hansip in Uato Carbau were planning to kill him, the family escaped to Lospalos. He resumed working as a nurse at the hospital, although every day members of Kopassandha would come to their house to talk to them. On 30 May, at around 9.00pm, a Kopassandha soldier came and took João Ernestino de Andrade Sarmento to the Kodim. He went with his 12-year-old son, João Zinho. João Zinho waited outside the room where his father was being interrogated for several hours before being told to go home. During that time he heard shouting. João Ernestino returned home at around 2.00am. He told Maria Teresa that he had been interrogated, tortured and told to return to the Kodim at 5.00am. His farewell to his family can be imagined. He returned to the Kodim with João Zinho, but at 12 midnight João Zinho was told to go home. João Ernestino never returned home. His widow was told by the man who had driven the vehicle in which they were taken for execution that João Ernestino de Andrade had been killed with several other prisoners in Lausepo. His widow was unable to confirm this information because she was afraid to look for her husband's bones.[305]

296. A husband and wife, ZN and AO, both of whom had been delegados in the forest, are both reported to have disappeared in mid-April 1979. AN was reportedly taken from the Kodim in Lospalos to Kurisa Apa by the Txímo River in Lore where he was stabbed to death and his corpse thrown into the river. BN is reported to have been taken to Lausepo with another woman, FO where both were tortured and raped before being machine-gunned to death.[306]

297. Antero dos Santos was taken to the Kodim 1629 in Lospalos shortly after surrendering in Kotamuto (Luro), in February 1979 with two others from Luro, Afonso Albuquerque and Bernadino Carvalho. Approximately one month later he was taken away in a Hino truck in the direction of Motolori together with Afonso Albuquerque, Benedito, Pedro Sanches, and Afonso Savio. Their subsequent fate is not known, although they were seen being driven in the direction of Iliapa.[307]

298. Francisco Sarmento Loy, who had been a delegado in the Ponta Leste Sector, was reportedly living in Lospalos when he was picked up in Mehara and killed some time in 1979 by a platoon of Hansip under the command of M239, who personally shot him to death, trussed up his corpse and took it to Lospalos, where it was tied to a military vehicle and dragged through the streets.[308]

299. The largest number of killings and disappearances of people suspected of clandestine activity reported to the Commission occurred in the Com-Mehara region where a group of Resistance fighters led by Xanana Gusmão took refuge after the fall of the base de apoio on Mount Matebian.[309]

300. Several groups of people were arrested in this area during June–October 1979 and were executed or disappeared.

301. One target was the family of Humberto da Costa, colaborador of the Ponta Leste sectoral command who was hiding in the forest with Xanana Gusmão, and other suspected Resistance activists from Mehara. Humberto's father, Gonsalo Soares, two of his uncles, Gabriel Soares and Miguel Monteiro, a brother, Alarico da Costa, and four others, Carolino Carvalho, João Caetano, Alcino and Antonio do Carmo, were arrested in Mehara in June 1979 by members of Battalion 745 and taken away. Their subsequent fate is not known, but family members believe, including on the basis of information given to them by members of Battalion 745, that some or all of them were killed at the Upo Piti Cemetery in Lospalos, at the Battalion 745 headquarters in Trisula, Assalaino (Fuiloro, Lospalos) or nearby in Silari. Humberto da Costa, and two other Falintil fighters, one called Martinho, were reportedly killed in combat in an operation involving Battalion 745, Hansip and members of the paramilitary group, Team Nuklir, commanded by the then Sub-district administrator of Moro, Edmundo da Conceição, in the area of Com on 17 October 1979.[310]

302. Hansip members in the Mehara-Com area also came under suspicion and were arrested and disappeared.

303. Seven Hansip from the aldeia of Laiara (Parlamento, Moro, Lautém), viz Venancio Gomes, Amaro Amaral, Sebastião Maria Lourdes, Horacio Silverio Lopes, Rodolfo da Costa Junior, Inácio dos Santos and Justino dos Santos, who had been recruited to work as Hansip in the village of Maina I, were summoned to the office of the Moro Koramil on 14 May 1979. There they were interrogated by members of Kopassandha on suspicion of having passed ammunition to Falintil. A few hours later, troops from Battalion 745 came and took them away, supposedly to "go to school". Only one of the seven, Justino dos Santos, reappeared. Their families later heard that at least some of them had been killed by Battalion 745 in Assalaino (Fuiloro, Lospalos) and Sepelata (Bauro, Lospalos) and the bodies of three of the victims were later found in those two places.[311]

304. Victor Pires and Faustino Guimarães from the aldeia of Loro (Tutuala) were two Hansip who disappeared in 1979 with several others after being arrested by their commander, M239. When his brother asked M239 about Victor Pires's whereabouts, he was told that he was "working in the forest". However, neither he nor Faustino ever reappeared.[312] According to his elder brother, Victor Pires was a Hansip with Faustino and others whose names have been forgotten, under the command of M239.[313]

305. In Moro (Lautém) at least three separate groups and several individuals suspected of engaging in clandestine activities were arrested and executed around this time, during what appears to have been an operation conducted by Battalion 745 aimed at destroying clandestine networks in the area.*

- Five men from Mua Puso (Aurlopo, Com), Oscar Victor, Duarte, Mário, Pedro and Virgilio, were arrested in June or July 1979 by members of Battalion 745 on the orders of their commander, Captain Joko Himpuno. Later that day, after being tortured at the Battalion 745 post in Com, the five were taken to the beach at Etipiti (Com) and killed. Virgilio was reportedly shot in the back of the head and then stabbed in the back by three members of Battalion 745 called M240, M241 and M242. The Babinsa told the families to collect the bodies. The next day members of Battalion 745 burned all the houses in Mua Puso. The men had been active in the clandestine movement, but were arrested reportedly because another man, Caetano Vilanova, had fled to the forest.[314]

* During 1979, after being held for more than one year in a resettlement camp in Parlamento, villagers in this area were allowed to return to their homes villages. However, ABRI uncovered a clandestine network called Ajuda Nan Maran, and sent the villagers of Muaspusu, Vailovaya and Lohomata to a new resettlement camp in Com where security was in the hands of Battalions 512 and 745 and conditions were reportedly even worse than they had been in Parlamento [CAVR Interview with Edmundo da Cruz, Com, Moro, Lautém, undated].

- A deponent who was forcibly recruited to take part in this same operation with Battalion 745 under the command of M243, reported that, after burning the houses in Mua Puso the troops moved on to Etepiti where they arrested another five men, Pedro, Kacoli, Julio and José and one other whose name was not known to the deponent, because they were suspected of being members of the clandestine movement. They were taken to the forest and interrogated. Pedro and the fifth man were then taken to the village office in Com; while the other three were taken to a place called Seler. After being heavily beaten, the three were then brought to a place called Keermoko, where they were each in turn beheaded and their bodies left to rot. The deponent later learned that Pedro and Kacoli had also been killed.[315]
- José da Silva been the chief delegado in Com (Moro, Lautém). On 15 or 16 June 1979, members of Battalion 745 led by M243 took him, two of his nephews, Martinho da Silva and Pedro dos Santos, another former delegado, and their cousin, Julio de Castro, from the aldeias of Iraonu and Pitileti in Com to the aldeia of Etipeti.[316] The Indonesian commander said that the men were going to go on an operation to Mount Caicere to look for Fretilin and would return after the operation was over. They never did return. According to a statement given to the Commission by his wife, José da Silva had maintained contact with Fretilin on the Com-Mehara border region.[317] Another source told the Commission that Martinho da Silva and Pedro dos Santos used to catch fish which they would give to Fretilin in the forest.[318]
- Probably in 1979, Alcino Fernandes Xavier, Domingos dos Santos and Antonio João Lopes were arrested by soldiers from Battalion 508, members of Hansip and the police, and the sub-district administrator and commander of the paramilitary group Team Nuklir, M244, on suspicion of having engaged in clandestine activities. They were taken to a place in the forest called Adaveri (Serelau, Moro), where Alcino was killed.*
- Estanislau, Afonso, Bendito, Thomás da Costa, Paulo and Rui were arrested in Daudere, Moro some time in 1979 by members of Battalion 745 while the five men were collecting coconuts. They were taken to a place nearby called Leiresi and asked whether they knew Paulino, a Falintil commander still in the forest. When they denied any knowledge of Paulino, they were tied up. That night Estanislau managed to escape, but the others were taken to a place called Serekara (Daudere, Moro) and shot dead. Later that night the others were shot dead. Two deponents heard the shots. The bodies were left unburied for three years at the spot where the killings took place.[319]

* HRVD Statements 02262 (which gives the date as 1978) and 02293 (which gives the date as 1979).

- In another possibly related case in the same area at around the same time, Anudai was arrested in 1979 in the village of Lautém (Moro, Lautém) by a member of Battalion 745 called M245, and a TBO M246, together with Anudai's wife, Libabui 1, the deponent's aunt, Libabui 2 and another family member, Koofou. The four were taken to the beach at Lautém where M245 shot Liabui 1 dead and wounded Anudai in the thigh. M245 informed the other members of the family what had happened, and two of them came to take the body. That evening M245 and M246 returned to re-arrest Anudai, Liabui 2 and Koofou, and took them back to the shore where he shot the three of them dead. The family were too afraid to collect their bodies until three or four years later.[320]

306. Aside from these group arrests, individuals suspected of being in contact with Falintil were also arrested and executed in Moro at this time.

307. Indonesian troops had captured Alcino da Costa Ximenes in June 1977 in Moro and had taken him to Dili, where he was interrogated for four months. When he returned to his home in the village of Serelau in Moro, he continued to be involved in the Resistance clandestinely. Some time in 1978, he was out walking when he was surrounded by troops from Battalion 408, who ordered him to pick coconuts. While he was doing this, he was shot dead. The sub-district administrator, M244, told his wife, while threatening her with a pistol, that Alcino had attacked the Indonesian soldiers and then run off to the forest.[321]

308. In October 1979, a member of the clandestine movement called Antonio da Costa, from Fuiloro (Lospalos, Lautém), received a letter from the Falintil leader, Dinis, to be passed on to the village head, M248. Antonio da Costa delivered the letter to M248, and M248 gave it to the District Military Command (Kodim) in Lospalos. Jaime then arrested Antonio and handed him over to the commander of the Moro Military District Command (Koramil), whose name was M247. M247 ordered Team Nuklir, the paramilitary group commanded by M244, to take Antonio to the District Military Command headquarters (Kodim). In the Kodim Antonio was held with someone called Carlos. When Carlos was released, he related that Antonio had been taken away to some unknown place.[322]

309. Pedro Nogueira, was arrested by members of Brimob (police mobile brigade) in Leven, Com on 20 October 1979, taken to the Battalion 745 headquarters in Trisula, Assalaino (Bauro, Lospalos). There he was tortured, including by having parts of his body slashed with knives and burned. On the same day, three of his children, Amelia, Juliana and Ermenegildo were brought to the Battalion 745 post in Luarai, Fuiluro (Lospalos). There they were interrogated about Pedro, in particular whether he had ever sent help to Falintil, specifically to his son, Julio. The children were beaten during interrogation, but were allowed to go home on 23 October. On the same day, Pedro was shot dead. On 25 October the children were again called to the Battalion 745 post at Luarai, and asked whether Julio had come to Leven since Pedro's death.[323]

310. Members of clandestine groups in other sub-districts of Lautém also disappeared or were executed during this time. In early December 1979 eight persons suspected of being part of a clandestine network in the sub-district of Luro–Duarte dos Santos, Aleixo Soares (Malimau), Alfredo Ramos, Amelia da Silva, Antonio da Conceição, Hermenegildo da Costa, Manuel Simões and Manuel dos Santos – were ordered by the Sub-district administrator of Luro, M280, to go to the Luro Koramil. The eight were last seen being flown away from the Koramil by helicopter at 6.00am on 3 December 1979. Their families were told that the group were going to take a course in the Indonesian state ideology (Penataran P-4) in Lospalos. Their subsequent whereabouts are unknown.[324]

311. Some time before the disappearance of the eight, a Hansip, Afonso Pinto, had brought CO and Hermenegildo da Costa to the sub-district administrator's house. After Hermenegildo denied knowing anything about a letter from Falintil to the sub-district administrator, the two were threatened but allowed to return home. A few days later, CO was taken to the Battalion 126 post, where another detainee, Alfredo Ramos, was already being held. There she was raped, then told to go home. Early the next morning CO was summoned to the Koramil where the seven others already were. That day they disappeared.* [325]

312. In addition to former Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders, there were also persons killed at this time who had surrendered earlier and been integrated into the Indonesian occupation regime as members of the civil administration or as auxiliaries to the security forces as Hansip or Tonsus.

313. They included members of the Tonsus led by João Branco, some of whom were reportedly executed in Quelicai (see par. 264 above) and some of whom may have been killed in Lospalos (see Table 14: Killings in Lautém, 1978-79, following par. 292). They also included Orlando Marques, from Raça, who had been captured in February 1976 when Indonesian paratroops landed on the Lospalos plain. He joined the Indonesian civil administration and became sub-district administrator of Iliomar. According to a statement given to the Commission by his wife, he was arrested in Tutuala in June 1979 by members of Battalion 745 and brought to the battalion headquarters in Trisula. His family were not allowed to visit him there and have not seen him since.[326]

314. Through its community profile workshops the Commission also received the names of around 40 other people from villages in the sub-district of Lospalos, who were reported to have been executed or to have disappeared during 1979. Very little is known about the circumstances of their disappearance or execution. A typical case about which more is known than most is that of Mário Provincial, a farmer from the aldeia of Vailana

* In what may be a related case Domingos Mário, a TBO at the Koramil in Luro, was arrested for writing a letter to Filomeno Branco for a member of Falintil in the forest. He is reported to have been taken by Indonesian troops from Battalion 305 to a place called Nundelarin, also in Luro, where he was stabbed with a bayonet and burned with cigarettes on the cheek and nine days later was allowed to go home. Three days later he was picked up by Indonesian troops and Hansip and also disappeared [HRVD Statement 04435]. Other individuals arrested at around this time in Luro on suspicion of being in contact with Fretilin/Falintil, who subsequently were killed or disappeared, were João Freitas, head of the aldeia of Buanumar (Kotamuto, Luro) [HRVD Statement 02798], Casimiro dos Santos Alegria, a former assistente from Baricafa, Luro (who was reportedly killed by Indonesian forces at Darapu'u, Baricafa in 1979 some time after his capture on Mount Matebian in 1978 [HRVD Statement 09117]) and Antero Teixeira, a former assistente.

in Lore I Village, who was 56 years old at the time of his death. According to a statement given to the Commission, he was taken away with two other villagers by members of Battalion 745 in December 1979, ostensibly to make a hut for the battalion. In fact they were brought to a place nearby and, on the basis of gunfire overheard by another villager, are all believed to have been shot dead.[327]

Manufahi District

Table 15: Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances in Manufahi District, 1978–1979

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Alas
Anselmo	Falintil		Beaten to death by ABRI in Alas	ABRI	Community Profile, Debu-Waen, Mahaquidan, Alas
Manuel Luis	Falintil	Captured 1978	Killed by ABRI at Uma Metan	ABRI	Community Profile, Lurin, Taitudak, Alas
Florindo da Costa	Falintil	Captured 1978	Killed by ABRI at Uma Metan	ABRI	Community Profile, Lurin, Taitudak, Alas
Duarte Almeida			Killed Uma Metan, February 1979		HRVD 01587, 01506, 01576; Community Profile, Taitudak, Manus, Alas
João da Silva			Killed Uma Metan, February 1979		HRVD 01576; Community Profile, Taitudak, Manus, Alas
João Martins Fernandes			Killed Uma Metan, February 1979		HRVD 01576; Community Profile, Taitudak, Manus, Alas
Remigio Baptista			Killed Uma Metan, February 1979		HRVD 01576; Community Profile, Taitudak, Manus, Alas
Luis Monteiro			Killed Hato-Udo, February 1979		HRVD 01576; Community Profile, Taitudak, Manus, Alas

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Antonio Cepeda	Secretario Zona Same	Manu-Mera, Alas, March 1979	Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750
Antonio Lisboa	Comandante de pelatao	Manu-Mera, Alas, March 1979	Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750
Luis Marçal	Secretario de suco Letefoho	Manu-Mera, Alas, March 1979	Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750, Community Profile Letefoho
José Henrique	Comandante de companhia	Manu-Mera, Alas, March 1979	Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750
Mateus Cortereal	Comandante de Zona Same	Hatu Rai, Same, March 1979	Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750
Jaime Sarmento	Comandante de Zona Maubisse	Hatu Rai, Same, March 1979	Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750
Pedro Cortereal	Secretario de suco Holarua	Hatu Rai, Same, March 1979	Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750, 04081?, 04073?
Martinho Cortereal	Comandante peletao	Hatu Rai, Same, March 1979	Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750, 04081?, 04073?

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Armando da Silva	Comandante		Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750
Vidal	Comandante		Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750, Community Profile Letefoho
Luciano	Comandante		Killed Halikuloli by Hansip after interrogation and torture by Kodim and Kopassandha, March 1979	Kodim, Kopassandha and Hansip	HRVD 04750, Community Profile Letefoho
Manuel Adao			Killed by Hansip in Uma Metan, Alas, 1979	Hansip	HRVD 05410
Marcal Osvaldo			Killed by Hansip in Uma Metan, Alas, 1979	Hansip	HRVD 05410
João Bosco Francisco	Colaborador Alas		Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Btn 401/ Hansip?	HRVD 05153, 03427, 03429, 03401. 04071; Community Profile Debu-Waen, Mahaquidin, Alas, Manufahi
José Maria (Mausiri)	Adjunto	Kolkeu, 11 March 1979	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Btn 401/ Hansip?	HRVD 05153, 03427, 03429, 03401. 04071, 04088; Community Profile Debu-Waen, Mahaquidin, Alas, Manufahi; Ringkasan Kasus
Ermelita Coelho (Siri Lou)	OPMT Alas	Kolkeu, 11 March 1979	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Btn 401/ Armed 10/ Hansip?	HRVD 05153, 03427, 03429, 03401. 04071, 04088; Community Profile Debu-Waen, Mahaquidin, Alas, Manufahi; Ringkasan Kasus

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Eduardo dos Anjos (Kakuk)	Fretilin Central Committee	Kolkeu, 11 March 1979	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Btn 401/ Armed 10/ Hansip?	HRVD 05153, 03427, 03429, 03401. 04071, 04088; Community Profile Debu-Waen, Mahaquidin, Alas, Manufahi; Ringkasan Kasus
Placido da Costa	Comandante de companhia	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Hansip	HRVD 05153, 03427, 03429; Community Profile Debu-Waen, Mahaquidin, Alas, Manufahi
Hipolito Fernandes	Comandante de peletao	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Hansip	HRVD 05153, 03427, 03429; Community Profile Debu-Waen, Mahaquidin, Alas, Manufahi
Benjamin da Costa	Comandante Serac, Alas	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Hansip	HRVD 05153, 03427, 03429, 03414, 03442; Community Profile Debu-Waen, Mahaquidin, Alas, Manufahi
Isidoro Fernandes	Falintil	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Hansip	HRVD 05153, 03427, 03429; Community Profile Debu-Waen, Mahaquidin, Alas, Manufahi
Antonio Vicente		Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Disappeared from Uma Metan, Alas, March 1979	Hansip	HRVD 05153, 03427, 03429; Community Profile Debu-Waen, Mahaquidin, Alas, Manufahi
Vicente Antonio Dias			Killed between Uma Metan and Betano,1979	ABRI	HRVD 03431
Herminio Baptista			Killed in Lebos, 10 or 11 March 1979	Hansip/Linud 100	HRVD 04071, 04069, 04088, 04100, 04069
Estevao da Costa			Killed in Lebos, 10 or 11 March 1979	Hansip/Linud 100	HRVD 04071, 04069, 04088, 04100

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Maliuca			Killed in Uma Metan, Alas, 10 or 11 March 1979	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04088, 04100
Francisco da Silva	Delegado		Killed in Uma Metan, Alas, 10 or 11 March 1979	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04088, 04100
Pedro Pereira			Killed in Uma Metan, Alas, 10 or 11 March 1979	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04088, 04100
Vidal Cina da Cruz	Comandante	Betano, 1979	Killed in Uma Metan, Alas, 10 or 11 March 1979	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04088, 04100
Francisco da Conceicao	Delegado	Betano, 1978	March or July 1979; disappearance; reported killed at Karau Ulun River, Betano	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04073, 04081, 04085; CAVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman
Franco da Costa	Assistente Politica	Betano, 1978	March or July 1979; disappearance; reported killed at Karau Ulun River, Betano	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04073, 04081, 04085; CAVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman
Paulino Veridial (Teli)	Delegado	Betano, 1978	March or July 1979; disappearance; reported killed at Karau Ulun River, Betano	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04073, 04081, 04085; CAVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman
Martinho Pereira (Aulaco)	Delegado, Ailalu	Betano, 1978	March or July 1979; disappearance; reported killed at Karau Ulun River, Betano	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04073, 04081, 04085; CAVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman
Sebastiao Nunes	Vice-Delegado	Betano, 1978	March or July 1979; disappearance; reported killed at Karau Ulun River, Betano	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04073, 04081, 04085; CAVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman
Bernadino Almeida			March or July 1979; disappearance; reported killed at Karau Ulun River, Betano	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04073, 04081, 04085

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Clementino da Conceicao			March or July 1979; disappearance; reported killed at Karau Ulun River, Betano	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 04073, 04081, 04085
João Nascimento Pires		Nu Laran, Taitudak, Alas	1979; disappeared; reported killed by Hansip in Laclo	Hansip	HRVD 0342, 00802, 03433
Edmundo Amaral			1979; killed by ABRI in Fore Karin, Dotik, Alas	ABRI	HRVD 03438
Crispin			1979; killed in Uma Metan	Hansip	HRVD 04023
Eulalia		Uma Metan, Taitudak, Alas	10 May 1979; killed by Soisara River, Mahaquidan, Alas	Hansip	HRVD 03423, 03456
Turiscai
Alucio Barbosa	Delegado	Ailelek, Fahinehan, 1979	1979; shot dead in Manumera by Koramil/Hansip/ Linud100/Linud 700	Koramil/ Hansip/ Linud100/ Linud 700	HRVD 06610, 06610, 06525; Community Profile, Manumera, Turiscai
João Dias	Delegado	Aimoulako, Fahinehan, January 1979	February 1979; beaten to death in Manumera	Hansip/Linud 100	HRVD 03491, 03790; Community Profile, Manumera, Turiscai
Tome	Delegado		1979; killed by Hansip in Fatufaelaran, Turiscai	Hansip	Community Profile, Beremeana, Turiscai
Lequibere			1979; killed by Hansip	Hansip	Community Profile, Beremeana, Turiscai
Antonio Monteiro			1979; killed by Hansip	Hansip	Community Profile, Beremeana, Turiscai
Valente Soares			February 1979; killed in Manumera	Linud 100	HRVD 03491, 03790
Mauhalik			February 1979; killed in Manumera	Linud 100	HRVD 03491, 03790

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Nidal			February 1979; killed in Manumera	Linud 100	HRVD 03491, 03790
Armindo Godinho			1979; shot dead in Mindelo	Hansip	Community Profile, Manumera, Turiscai
Berehunuk		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	1979; shot dead in Datarua, Fahinehan	Hansip	Community Profile, Manumera, Turiscai
Beremalik		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	22 February 1979; shot dead at Saibololo River in Foholau, Turiscai, by Hansip	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD 06440
Bere Leki		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	22 February 1979; shot dead at Saibololo River in Foholau, Turiscai, by Hansip	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD
Ta Mali		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	22 February 1979; shot dead at Saibololo River in Foholau, Turiscai, by Hansip	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD
Mau Leki		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	22 February 1979; shot dead at Saibololo River in Foholau, Turiscai, by Hansip	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD
Mau Leki		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	22 February 1979; shot dead at Saibololo River in Foholau, Turiscai, by Hansip	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD
Mau Leki		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	22 February 1979; shot dead at Saibololo River in Foholau, Turiscai, by Hansip	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD
Maubere		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	22 February 1979; shot dead at Saibololo River in Foholau, Turiscai, by Hansip	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
José		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	22 February 1979; shot dead at Saibololo River in Foholau, Turiscai, by Hansip	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD
Two others		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	22 February 1979; shot dead at Saibololo River in Foholau, Turiscai, by Hansip	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD
Sebastiao		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	23 February 1979; shot dead at Hulala, Liurai between Foholau and Turiscai	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD
Maubere		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	23 February 1979; shot dead at Hulala, Liurai between Foholau and Turiscai	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD
Maubere		Foholau, Turiscai, February 1979	23 February 1979; shot dead at Hulala, Liurai between Foholau and Turiscai	Hansip	CAVR Interview with Felimina Soares; HRVD
Fatuberliu
Berleki	Falintil		Killed, Saluki, Fatuberliu, 1978
Marubi	Falintil		Disappeared after capture by ABRI in Wailuhu, Fatuberliu, 1978
Antonio	Falintil		Disappeared after capture by ABRI in Wailuhu, Fatuberliu, 1978
Berloi	Falintil		Disappeared after capture by ABRI in Wailuhu, Fatuberliu, 1978
Adriano Gomes		Captured in Aicora, Alas, 1978	Killed by Hansip in Laututo, Fahinehan	Hansip	HRVD 04776
Bi-Luis		Captured in Aicora, Alas, 1978	Killed by Hansip in Laututo, Fahinehan	Hansip	HRVD 04776

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Cristiano da Costa		Captured in Aicora, Alas, 1978	Killed by Hansip in Laututo, Fahinehan	Hansip	HRVD 04776
Francisco da Costa		Captured in Aicora, Alas, 1978	Killed by Hansip in Laututo, Fahinehan	Hansip	HRVD 04776
Ijimenio da Costa		Captured in Aicora, Alas, 1978	Killed by Hansip in Laututo, Fahinehan	Hansip	HRVD 04776
Inacio da Costa		Captured in Aicora, Alas, 1978	Killed by Hansip in Laututo, Fahinehan	Hansip	HRVD 04776
Jaimito		Captured in Aicora, Alas, 1978	Killed by Hansip in Laututo, Fahinehan	Hansip	HRVD 04776
Lekibere		Captured in Aicora, Alas, 1978	Killed by Hansip in Laututo, Fahinehan	Hansip	HRVD 04776
Maubere		Captured in Aicora, Alas, 1978	Killed by Hansip in Laututo, Fahinehan	Hansip	HRVD 04776
Arneu	Falintil	Captured in Fatuberliu, 1979	Beaten to death at Kopassandha base in Fatuberliu	Kopassandha	HRVD 03018
Ricardo Lobato			Shot dead by ABRI near house in Betun Laku, Clacuc, Fatuberliu, 1979		HRVD 03449
Humberto Hornai	Comandante de companhia		February 1979; shot dead in Welalika, Fatuberliu	Hansip/ Koramil	HRVD 03464; Community Profile Caicasa, Faturberliu
Augusto de Jesus	Comandante, Armas Brancas		February 1979; shot dead in Welalika, Fatuberliu	Hansip/ Koramil	HRVD 03464; Community Profile Caicasa, Faturberliu
Francisco Ximenes	Comandante de pelotao		February 1979; shot dead in Welalika, Fatuberliu	Hansip/ Koramil/ Linud 100	HRVD 03464, 03455; Community Profile Caicasa, Faturberliu
José Ximenes	Povo		February 1979; shot dead in Welalika, Fatuberliu	Hansip/ Koramil	HRVD 03464; Community Profile Caicasa, Faturberliu

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Luis de Andrade (Amatuak)	Comandante de companhia	Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	8 April 1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
Jorge da Costa (Jorge de Jesus)	Comandante	Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	5 April 1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
Pedro Abilio	Soldier	Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
Hilario	Comandante, Armas Brancas	Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
Joaquim Magalhaes	Comandante de companhia	Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
Martins da Costa	Falintil	Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
João Cairo	Falintil	Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
Borfiri		Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
Webere		Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
Tetiseran		Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
Berkoli		Aidikmean Tutun, Alas	1979; killed in Fatuberliu Old Town (Welaloho?)	Hansip/ABRI	Community Profile, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu
João Abilio Fernandes			1979; killed, Fatuberliu		AI (1985)
João Raul (João Gentio)			1979; killed, Fatuberliu		AI (1985)
Moises Tilman de Araujo			1979; disappeared, Fatuberliu		AI (1985)
Luis Alves			1979; killed at Btn 643 post in Aidiklaran, Fatukmutin, Caicasa, Fatuberliu	Btn 643	HRVD 03470

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Francisco Ximenes		Caicasa, Fatuberliu	1979; shot dead by Linud 100	Linud 100	HRVD 03455
Tobias da Costa		Fatucahi, Fatuberliu, February 1979	1979; disappeared while in custody of Btn 745	Btn 745	HRVD 03424
Caetano de Araujo		Fatucahi, Fatuberliu, February 1979	1979; disappeared while in custody of Btn 745	Btn 745	HRVD 03424
Martins		Fatucahi, Fatuberliu, February 1979	1979; disappeared while in custody of Btn 745	Btn 745	HRVD 03424
João Marmede		Fatucahi, Fatuberliu, February 1979	1979; disappeared while in custody of Btn 745	Btn 745	HRVD 03424
Antonio Fernandes	Comandante de batalhao	Welamusa, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu, December 1978/early 1979	Killed by Hansip in Fatuberliu Town	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 03424, 07021,Community Profile, Clacuc, Fatuberliu
Zaulino Borges Torazao	Comandante	Welamusa, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu, December 1978/early 1979	Killed by Hansip in Fatuberliu Town	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 03424; Community Profile, Clacuc, Fatuberliu
Marcos da Costa Fernandes	Assistente	Welamusa, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu, December 1978/early 1979	Beaten to death by Hansip in Fatuberliu Town	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 03482, 03278: Community Profile, Clacuc, Fatuberliu
Francisco Fernandes	Comandante	Welamusa, Fatucahi, Fatuberliu, December 1978/early 1979	Killed by Hansip in Fatuberliu Town	ABRI/Hansip	Community Profile, Clacuc, Fatuberliu
Luis Ximenes	Falintil	Surrender in Aubaha, Clacuc, Fatuberliu, 1979	Killed by Hansip on top of Mount Clacuc, 1979	Hansip	HRVD 03487, 03488

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Carlos Carlito		Surrender in Aubaha, Clacuc, Fatuberliu, 1979	Killed by Hansip on top of Mount Clacuc, 1979	Hansip	HRVD 03487, 03488
Francisco Lopes	Comandante de pelatao	1979	Killed by Hansip at Fatuk Mutin, Welaluhu, Fatuberliu Lama	ABRI/Hansip	HRVD 03471
Francisco da Cruz	Comandante	Riamori, 1979	Killed by Linud 100 in Riamori	Linud 100	HRVD 03474, 03492
João Baptista		1979	Killed	ABRI	HRVD 03492
João Tariri		Caicasa, Fatuberliu, 13 January 1979	Disappeared; reported killed in Baberuk, Fatuberliu	Linud 100	HRVD 03464
Prudencio Maia	Colaborador Sector Centro Sul	15 April 1979; captured by Linud 100	Killed in front of family on 24 April at Fatubessi, Welaluhu, Caicasa, Fatuberliu by Hansip	Linud 100/ Hansip	HRVD 04030
Felisberto Gouveia Leite	Nurse attached to Comissão de Apoio e Solidaridade (CAS)	January 1979; captured/ surrendered in Aituha/ Raimaliak, Alas?	Disappeared February–March 1979 after being transferred from resettlement camp in Fahinehan to custody of Linud 100 in Fahinehan church, Fatuberliu; reported to have been killed at Ailui, Fahinehan	Linud 100	HRVD 05759; Testimony of Maria da Costa; CAVR Interview with Bernardo da Costa: AI (1985)
Alexandrina Amelia Augusta Pires Leite	Wife of Felisberto	January 1979; captured/ surrendered in Aituha/ Raimaliak, Alas?	Disappeared February–March 1979 after being transferred from resettlement camp in Fahinehan to custody of Linud 100 in Fahinehan church, Fatuberliu; reported to have been killed at Ailui, Fahinehan	Linud 100	HRVD 05759; Testimony of Maria da Costa; CAVR Interview with Bernardo da Costa: AI (1985)

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Maria Auxiliadora Filomena Pires Leite (Karilesu)	Child of Felisberto and Alexandre Amelia; wife of Rogerio Lobato; member of CAS	January 1979; captured/ surrendered in Aituha/ Raimaliak, Alas?	Disappeared February–March 1979 after being transferred from resettlement camp in Fahinehan to custody of Linud 100 in Fahinehan church, Fatuberliu; reported to have been killed at Ailui, Fahinehan	Linud 100	HRVD 05759; Testimony of Maria da Costa; CAVR Interview with Bernardo da Costa: AI (1985)
Dulce Maria Pires Leite (Ililoe)	Child of Felisberto and Alexandre Amelia; member of CAS	January 1979; captured/ surrendered in Aituha/ Raimaliak, Alas?	Disappeared February–March 1979 after being transferred from resettlement camp in Fahinehan to custody of Linud 100 in Fahinehan church, Fatuberliu; reported to have been killed at Ailui, Fahinehan	Linud 100	HRVD 05759; Testimony of Maria da Costa; CAVR Interview with Bernardo da Costa: AI (1985)
Rui Manuel Baptista Pires Leite	Child of Felisberto and Alexandre Amelia	January 1979; captured/ surrendered in Aituha/ Raimaliak, Alas?	Disappeared February–March 1979 after being transferred from resettlement camp in Fahinehan to custody of Linud 100 in Fahinehan church, Fatuberliu; reported to have been killed at Ailui, Fahinehan	Linud 100	HRVD 05759; Testimony of Maria da Costa; CAVR Interview with Bernardo da Costa: AI (1985)
Maria de Fatima Baptista Pires	Child of Felisberto and Alexandre Amelia	January 1979; captured/ surrendered in Aituha/ Raimaliak, Alas?	Disappeared February–March 1979 after being transferred from resettlement camp in Fahinehan to custody of Linud 100 in Fahinehan church, Fatuberliu; reported to have been killed at Ailui, Fahinehan	Linud 100	HRVD 05759; Testimony of Maria da Costa; CAVR Interview with Bernardo da Costa: AI (1985)

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Aurea Fontes Gusmao (Olo Bere)	Foster child of Felisberto and Alexandre Amelia; member of CAS	January 1979; captured/ surrendered in Aituha/ Raimaliak, Alas?	Disappeared February–March 1979 after being transferred from resettlement camp in Fahinehan to custody of Linud 100 in Fahinehan church, Fatuberliu; reported to have been killed at Ailui, Fahinehan	Linud 100	HRVD 05759; Testimony of Maria da Costa; CAVR Interview with Bernardo da Costa: AI (1985)
Domingos	Bodyguard	January 1979; captured/ surrendered in Aituha/ Raimaliak, Alas?	Disappeared February–March 1979 after being transferred from resettlement camp in Fahinehan to custody of Linud 100 in Fahinehan church, Fatuberliu; reported to have been killed at Ailui, Fahinehan	Linud 100	CAVR Interview with Bernardo da Costa
Pedro Kulo		January 1979; captured/ surrendered in Aituha/ Raimaliak, Alas?	Disappeared February–March 1979 after being transferred from resettlement camp in Fahinehan to custody of Linud 100 in Fahinehan church, Fatuberliu; reported to have been killed at Ailui, Fahinehan	Linud 100	CAVR Interview with Bernardo da Costa
Cancio		January 1979; captured/ surrendered in Aituha/ Raimaliak, Alas?	Disappeared February–March 1979 after being transferred from resettlement camp in Fahinehan to custody of Linud 100 in Fahinehan church, Fatuberliu; reported to have been killed at Ailui, Fahinehan	Linud 100	CAVR Interview with Bernardo da Costa

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Same
Pedro Maumanas	Comandante, Armas Brancas	Wounded and captured in Dolok, Alas by ABRI, 1978	Killed by ABRI in Betano,1978	ABRI	Community Profile, Debu-Waen, Mahaquidan, Alas
Mali Mau		Captured in Likbau, Ulu, Same, 1978	Killed on spot after capture by Hansip	Hansip	HRVD 04918
Mau Buti	Falintil		Taken from home by Hansip on orders of ABRI and killed in Bukuil Ulun, Rototu, Same, February 1978(9?)		HRVD 04765
Lelo Sea	Falintil		Taken from home by Hansip on orders of ABRI and killed in Bukuil Ulun, Rototu, Same, February 1978(9?)		HRVD 04765
Alcino da Costa Vidal	Fretilin delegado, Aldeia Biti-Makerek, Alas		Killed by ABRI on 7 August 1978 in Betano	ABRI	HRVD 05434
Luis Gonzaga			Killed by Hansip in Same Town shortly after surrender, 1979	Hansip	HRVD 04727, 04732
Mário Fernandes			Killed by Hansip in Same Town shortly after surrender, 1979	Hansip	HRVD 04727, 04732
Quei No	Fretilin, chefe de suco Tutuloro		Killed by ABRI in 1979 in Daisua, Same	ABRI	HRVD 05421
Kotimeta			Killed by Hansip in Daisua, Same, 1979	Hansip	Community Profile, Daisua, Same
Kosteti			Killed by Hansip in Daisua, Same, 1979	Hansip	Community Profile, Daisua, Same
Baresi			Killed by Hansip in Daisua, Same, 1979	Hansip	Community Profile, Daisua, Same

Name	Position	Date and place of capture/ surrender	Date of execution/ disappearance	Perpetrator	Source(s)
Daukolik			Killed by Hansip in Daisua, Same, 1979	Hansip	Community Profile, Daisua, Same
Raimundo			Beaten to death by Hansip in Betano, 1979	Hansip	HRVD 04091
About 20 people			Disappeared from Same school building, 1979	Hansip/ABRI	HRVD 05408

315. By late 1978, many inhabitants of the sub-districts of Turiscai, Same, and Fatuberliu had fled to the sub-district of Alas to escape the Indonesian occupation forces. During the years since the invasion, many villagers had taken a tortuous route, including diversions west to Mount Kablaki and east to Lequidoe, before reaching Alas. Much of the population of Alas itself had stayed in the sub-district throughout the years since the invasion, although after ABRI entered Betano in early 1976 many had fled north and west to the mountains before returning to Alas by the time of the Indonesian offensive in 1978. The population of Alas had also been swelled by people from other districts, including Aileu, Manatuto, Ainaro, Dili, Liquiçá and Viqueque.[328] On surrender or capture in late 1978 and early 1979, many of those who had come from Turiscai, Same and Fatuberliu were returned to the sub-district postos, where they were concentrated under ABRI control. However, large numbers of outsiders were not returned to their home sub-districts, but were forced to remain in Alas. The largest concentration of these people was held in Uma Metan on the slopes of Mount Lebos. By early 1979 a mixed detachment of ABRI forces was holding around 8,000 displaced people in Uma Metan from all these areas. (see Vol. II, Part 7.4: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances)

316. Following the surrenders and captures of late 1978 and early 1979, large numbers of people were killed or disappeared in Manufahi. In the course of its research the Commission was given the names of 140 people from all the sub-districts of Manufahi who were killed or disappeared during this period. The largest number of deaths occurred in the sub-district of Alas, particularly in or around Uma Metan. The sub-district of Fatuberliu is believed to have suffered the second largest number of killings in the district.* In each of the sub-districts of Manufahi specific groups of Hansip acting on the orders of ABRI units were the direct perpetrators of many of the killings reported to the Commission. A large number of the victims were people who had been active in the Resistance as Fretilin officials or Falintil commanders.

* Although there were relatively fewer cases in Same Sub-district, there were some [see HRVD Statements 07021, 04765, 04727, and 04732; and CAVR Community Profile, Daisua Village, Same Sub-district, Manufahi District, 3 July 2003]. The relatively small number of cases reported to have occurred in Same is probably accounted for by the proximity of Uma Metan, to which a number of victims originating from Same were reported to have been transferred.

Alas

317. According to information received by the Commission, several groups of people were executed in or disappeared from Uma Metan shortly after their surrender or capture in early 1979.*

318. The community of Manus came out of the forest in February 1979 and surrendered in the area of Tutuloro in Alas. Shortly after, four men from Uma Metan, viz Duarte Almeida, João da Silva, Martins Fernandes and Remigio Baptista, were taken by Hansip led by Capela Ferrão and disappeared. A fifth man, Luis Monteiro, fled and sought refuge in Hato-Udo (Ainaro), but was tracked down by M249 and his men and killed.†[329]

319. A group of at least 12 Fretilin officials and Falintil commanders from the sub-districts of Same and Alas were reportedly executed at Uma Metan after being captured in March 1979. They were: Antonio Cepeda, Same Zone Secretary; Antonio Lisboa, Falintil platoon commander; Luis Marçal, village secretary of Letefoho (Same); José Henrique, a Falintil company commander; Mateus Cortereal, commander of the Same Zone; Jaime Sarmento, commander of Maubisse Zone; Pedro Cortereal, secretary of the village of Hola Rua (Same); and Martinho Cortereal, a platoon commander; Armando da Silva; Jaime; Vidal; and Luciano.

320. All had reportedly been taken to the Kodim in Same after capture and held there for several days. While in the Same Kodim they were reportedly tortured by the Kodim commander, Lieutenant Colonel M250, and members of Kopassandha. They were then transferred to the custody of the Kopassandha commander at Uma Metan, Captain M251. From there they were transferred to a Hansip team led by M249, and executed.[330]

321. Separately a group of Falintil members from Alas were also reportedly killed at or near Uma Metan. They included João Bosco Fernandes, colaborador for the Alas sector; Placido da Costa, Falintil Company Commander; Hepolito Fernandes, a platoon commander; Benjamin da Costa, a commander; Isidoro Fernandes, a member of Falintil; and Antonio Vicente, deputy Zone commander.[331]

322. Among the last to surrender in the sub-district of Alas were the Adjunto Mausiri (José Maria), a Fretilin Central Committee member, Eduardo dos Anjos (Kakuk), and

* In addition to the groups whose cases are described below, cases of individuals who were executed or disappeared were also reported to the Commission, such as the disappearances of the commander of the Força Defesa (FADE, Armas Brancas) in Alas, Pedro Matumanas [CAVR, Community Profile, Debu-Waen, Mahaquidan, Alas Sub-district, Manufahi District, 3 December 2003 and the execution of José Nascimento Pires, who was reportedly picked up by Hansip and taken on patrol to Turiscai where he was shot dead. [HRVD Statements 00802, 03433, and 03442].

† The killing of these four was apparently the continuation of a cycle of violence that dated back to the civil war. M249's father, M254, a UDT leader in Alas, was believed to have been implicated in the killing of 11 Fretilin activists in Wedauberek on 27 August 1975 (Alas, Manufahi). When Fretilin took control of Alas in early September 1975, they arrested M254. He managed to escape but was found by a group of Fretilin activists that included M255, M256, M256 Fernandes and M257, and killed [see section 7.2.4.5, above, and HRVD Statements 01585, 01597, 01599 and 03426].

an 18-year-old OPMT official, Siri Lou (Ermelita Coelho). Several groups of those who surrendered were sent back into the forest to find them. In March 1979 seven people were ordered by Airborne Infantry battalion Infantry 700 to go back into the forest to look for the three. They found them at a place called Kolkeu. All three were severely wounded and were easily persuaded to give up their firearms. A helicopter was sent in to bring them back to Uma Metan. According to a statement given to the Commission by Alfredo da Costa Coelho, father of Ermelita Coelho, she had been "sent to school" in February 1979, meaning that she had been killed with Adjunto Mausiri by Armed 10 (Artileri Medan, Field Artillery) and Hansip (M249, M252 and M253) after Kopasssandha had handed them over.[332]

323. In March 1979 a Hansip, Luciano Ribeiro, was asked to draw up a list naming those among the people who had surrendered in Betano in late 1978 who were Fretilin leaders. Among those on the list were: Francisco da Conceição, a former delegado; Franco da Costa, a former assistente; Paulino Verdial (Paulino Teli) a former delegado, Martinho Pereira Aulaku, a former delegado; and Sebastião Nunes, a deputy delegado. For a time some of them were put to work building roads with a 200-strong gang of those who had surrendered, while others, including Sebastião Nunes, went as TBOs on an operation in Alas, Tutuluru and Mindelo. Then in March, 13 people, including the five on the list, were summoned by the liurai, M258 and the village chief, M31, and told that they were going to be "sent to school". The five came home to pick up their clothes. They have not been seen since. They were reportedly killed at the Karan Ulun River in Betano.[333]

324. Around 10 March 1979 another group of 14 men, all of whom had been members of Falintil, were taken from Betano to Uma Metan. They included three section commanders, Vidal da Cruz, Herminio da Costa (from Selihasan) and Estevão da Costa (from Wedauberek), and Maliuca, Francisco da Silva and Pedro Pereira. According to eyewitnesses, Vidal da Cruz and Francisco da Silva were picked out by Indonesian soldiers from a group of prisoners that was cutting grass, saying that they were going to cut wood. Shortly after the rest of group heard gun shots. Then the Indonesian soldiers called out Maliuca and Pedro Pereira, and again the group heard gun shots. The following day, while the rest of the group was being given maps and travel passes (surat jalan) in preparation for going out to search for Mausiri and Kakuk, the Indonesian soldiers selected Estevão da Costa and Herminio da Costa. As the rest of the group left Uma Metan to look for Mausiri and Kakuk, they heard the sound of gun shots coming from the direction of Lebos.[334]

Turiscai

325. A similar pattern of targeted killings of surrendered and captured people with leadership positions in Fretilin and Falintil also emerges in Turiscai. One delegado, Alucio Barbosa from Foholau, was reportedly shot dead by ABRI or Hansip, reportedly for complaining about the small amount of food given to a group forced to build roads, which gave rise to the accusation that he was "making politics".[335] The local Hansip under the command of M260 (see section on Massacre in Foholau, above) also reportedly beat to death another delegado, João Dias, in Manumera and shot dead two other Fretilin activists, Armindo Godinho and Berehunuk.[336]

Fatuberliu

326. In Fatuberliu the local Koramil, the Airborne Infantry battalion battalions, Airborne Infantry battalion Battalion 100, and Airborne Infantry battalion Battalion 745, again with Hansip support, executed many people formerly associated with Fretilin or Falintil, including ordinary members of both organisations, as well as ordinary people. After the people of the sub-district had been concentrated in the town of Fatuberliu, the Koramil commander picked out supposed Fretilin and Falintil leaders with the help of the sub-district administrator, M261. Those selected were Umberto Hornai, a Falintil company commander, Augusto de Jesus, a FADE commander, Francisco Ximenes, a platoon commander, and José Ximenes, described as "one of the people". They were handed over to a Hansip unit from Soibada (Manatuto), led by M262 and M263, and shot dead.[337]

327. The same Hansip unit is reported to have also killed another mixed group of Falintil commanders and ordinary people in Fatuberliu. It consisted of three commanders, Luis Amatuak, Jorgé da Costa and Hilario, three Falintil soldiers and four others, three of whose ages are given as 70.[338]

328. A similar pattern of gross violence directed primarily but not exclusively at Fretilin and Falintil members and their families emerges from the accounts from Fatuberliu from this time. Thus, for example:

- After a group of Falintil surrendered in Fatucahi, Fatuberliu, in February 1979, they were disarmed and beaten. Four of them, Caetano de Araújo, Tobias da Costa, Martins and João Marmede, reportedly after giving false information about the whereabouts of Fretilin, were taken out and disappeared.[339]
- Another group of Fretilin and Falintil leaders, comprising an assistente Marcos da Costa, a battalion commander, Antonio Fernandes, and two other commanders, Zaulino Torrezão and Francisco Fernandes were captured in Wemerek (Alas) and sent to Fatuberliu where they were reportedly killed by Hansip led by M262. According to a statement given to the Commission, Marcos had been told by his captors to take a letter to M262. When he handed over the letter, he was beaten with a hammer on his forehead, his ears were cut off and he was ordered to eat them, and a few hours later he was shot dead.[340]
- Fifty-year-old DO, a Falintil commander, came to surrender with his family in Riamori (Fahinehan, Fatuberliu) in 1979. The village chief, M270, told members of Airborne Infantry Battalion (Linud Yonif) 100 that as a commander, he had to be killed or his womenfolk raped. He was in fact killed, but subsequently Infantry Battalion 100 repeatedly raped two of his daughters until Infantry Battalion 100 was replaced by another battalion, 643, in 1980. The daughters were told that they were being raped because one of their brothers was still in forest.[341]
- In 1979 Francisco Lopes, a Falintil platoon commander, came down from the mountains to surrender to the TNI. He was ordered to go home. Later two of the Hansip from Soibada, took Francisco to Fatuk Mutin (Welaluhu, Fatuberliu), where he was shot dead by M271.[342]

- On 15 April, Prudencio Maia, a former Falintil colaborador for the South Central Sector, was captured by Airborne Infantry battalion 700 troops. After nine days in detention, he was allowed back to his home in Fatuberliu to visit his family. On 24 April, Hansip, led by M271 and M263, came to Prudencio's house and took Prudencio to a place called Fatubessi (Welaluhu, Caicasa, Fatuberliu), where the seven ordered him to turn his back to them and shot him dead. His family were brought to witness the killing.*

A mass execution in Fahinehan

In February or March 1979, 12-14 people, including seven members of a single family, were executed at Ailui, about one kilometre from the Fahinehan resettlement camp in Fatuberliu. Among those killed were the father of the family, Felisberto Gouveia Leite, who had worked as a nurse in the forest, and three of his daughters, who had worked with the Comissão de Apoio e Solidaridade (Solidarity and Support Committee, CAS), which had provided food for those in need in the forest (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). One of the daughters, Maria Auxiliadora Filomena Pires, was the wife of Rogério Lobato. The Commission was told that until they were executed, they had been living with everybody else in the Fahinehan resettlement camp after surrendering in January 1979. The Commission was also told that Indonesian soldiers had persistently harassed Filomena, trying to get her to be an ABRI wife, but she had persistently rejected them. One day the family were told that they were going to be taken to Dili by plane. They were escorted out of the camp by troops from Airborne Infantry Battalion 100. When the people in the camp heard gun shots, they thought that it was nothing unusual, just that ABRI was killing buffalo again. The Commission has received the names of ten of the people who were shot dead:

- Felisberto Gouveia Leite, husband
- Alexandrina Amelia Augusta Pires Leite, wife
- Maria Auxiliadora Filomena Pires Leite (Karilesu), child and wife of Rogério Lobato
- Dulce Maria Pires Leite (Ililoe), child
- Rui Manuel Baptista Pires Leite, child

* HRVD Statement 04030. Other killings in Fatuberliu are reported in HRVD Statements 03464, 03470 and 03455.

- Maria de Fatima Baptista Pires Leite, child
- Aurea Fontes Gusmão (Olo Bere), foster child
- Domingos, family bodyguard
- Pedro Kulo, "a Portuguese"
- Cancio, "a Portuguese".[343]

Uatolari, Viqueque

Table 16: Persons reported to CAVR to have been killed/disappeared after detention in Uatolari, November–December 1978 and March–April 1979

Name	Position	Place of origin	Date of killing/ disappearance	Circumstance of killing/ disappearance
Acacio
Acacio de Carvalho	Fretilin/OPJT Matahoi	Afaloicai
Adelino de Carvalho	Fretilin soldier	Afaloicai, Lena	January–April 1980 (1979?)
Adolfo		Uato Carbau
Afonso		Matahoi	1979
Afonso Barreiro			1983
Afonso Henrique Freitas		Matahoi
Afonso Manu Uai		Ossu	Feb-79
Afonso Menezes	Fretilin		25/11/78
Agapito Aquino	Falintil		15/3/79
Alfredo	Fretilin	Afaloicai, Uatolari	January–April 1980 (1979?)
Alfredo Pereira			Feb-79
Alfredo Ribeiro			23/11/78
Amaro		Bobo Laco, Macadique
Amaro Lourenço Ximenes	Falintil	Macadique
Amelia			25/3/92
Antonio da Costa		Ossu, Uaibobo
Antonio da Costa		Afaloicai, Uatolari

Name	Position	Place of origin	Date of killing/ disappearance	Circumstance of killing/ disappearance
Antonio do Rosario		Afaloicai
Antonio Miguel		Ossu, Uaibobo
Antonio Naco Lai		Ossoai Ua, Afaloicai
Armando		Afaloicai, Uatolari
Armindo		Afaloicai
Bobu		Aba Dere, Babulo	1978
Cai Mau		Vessoru, Bahabuga
Cai Mau		Aba Dere, Babulo
Cai Mau		Macadique
Celestino		Caidana Lari, Macadique
Chiquito		Bai Uari, Matahoi
David Lebre		Uato Carbau	January–April 1980 (1979?)	Detention/ disappearance
David Loi Siba	Comandante Zona Uato Carbau		23/11/78	Disappearance
Domingos		Uma Kiik, Uaitame
Domingos Hernani			Feb-79	Detention (Ossu)/ Disappearance
Domingos Rosario		Afaloicai	00/00/78	Killing
Domingos Torres		Sana, Uaitame
Duarte da Costa			Jan-79	Killing
Eduardo	Falintil		1979	Killed outside combat
Ereleto	Fretilin		1976	Detention/ killing
Feliciano	Falintil	Sana, Uaitame	1979	Detention/ torture/killing
Fernando da Silva		Uaitame
Francisco Soares		Matahoi
Gaspar	Fretilin	Uatolari	January–April 1979	Detention/ disappearance
Gaspar		Afaloicai, Uatolari
Gaspar		Uai Cai, Afaloicai
Gaspar		Bai Uari, Matahoi
Gaspar Pinto	Delegado	Matahoi	25/11/78	Detention/ torture/killing

Name	Position	Place of origin	Date of killing/ disappearance	Circumstance of killing/ disappearance
Gaspar Raileki			Feb-79	Detention (Ossu)/ disappearance
Germano Fernandes		Balabaciba, Vessoro
Gregorio		Ossurua, Ossu
Gregorio Maulelo (Gregorio Cai Kuli Oho)	Delegado Baguia	From Caicoli-Ho Baguia	1979	Detention/ torture/killing
Helena	OPMT	Afaloicai
Hermenegildo		Sana, Uaitame
Ildefonso		Uato Carbau
Isabel de Sousa		Afaloicai
Jacinto		Afaloicai, Uatolari
Jacob		Nuno Malau, Afaloicai
Januario		Nuno Malau, Afaloicai
Jeremias		Bai Uari, Matahoi
Jeremias Amaral		Matahoi
Joao	Falintil	Sana, Uaitame	1979	Detention/ torture/killing
Joao		Lia Sidi, Babulo
Joao Baptista		Baha Buga, Vessoro
Joao Bercamas (Joao Berchmans)		Matahoi
Joao de Menezes		Ossocai Ua, Afaloicai
Joao Gamu Noko			Feb-79	Detention (Ossu)/ disappearance
Joao Miguel	Delegado	Babulu, Liaside	25/11/78	Detention/ torture/killing
Joao Soares		Beli, Babulo
Jorge		Afaloicai, Uatolari
Jorge Barros		Macadique
José Samor			1978?	Killing
Juliao Sarmento		Baki Laco, Macadique
Julio Baptista Makikit	Fretilin	Uatolari	January–April 1980 (1979?)	Detention/ disappearance
Julio Pires	Delcom Builale	Afaloicai, Uatolari	23/11/78	Disappearance

Name	Position	Place of origin	Date of killing/ disappearance	Circumstance of killing/ disappearance
Julio Soares		Osso Bubo, Afaloicai
Juvenal Inacio		Viqueque
Kong Sung		Baha O, Vessoro
Lafaek	Falintil	Uatolari	January–April 1980 (1979?)	Detention/ disappearance
Leao		Uani Uma, Matahoi
Leao de Jesus		Matahoi
Leao Ximenes		From Sana, Uaitame	1979	Detention/ torture/killing
Lequede	Fretilin		1976	Killing
Lequibere		Macadique
Lequi-Tek			1978
Lino		Ossu
Lino Alokasa		Ossu de Cima
Loi Cou		Babulu, Abadere
Luis			1976	Killing
Luis	Falintil		1976	Detention/ killing
Luis	Falintil	Uatolari	January–April 1980 (1979?)	Detention/ disappearance
Luis			1978
Luis		Uato Carbau
Luis		Lacarato, Macadique
Luis Freitas		Matahoi
Luis Loi Leki		Matahoi
Luis Pinto		Macadique
Luis Ualisakar		Macadique
Manuel	Falintil		1976	Detention/ killing
Manuel		Lari, Afaloicai, Uatolari
Manuel		Ua Sufa, Matahoi
Manuel Braga		Goni Uro, Macadique
Manuel da Costa		Matahoi
Manuel da Silva			Feb-79	Detention (Ossu)/ disappearance

Name	Position	Place of origin	Date of killing/ disappearance	Circumstance of killing/ disappearance
Manuel Manezes			1976	Killing
Manuel Manumau		Macadique
Manuel Manusu			Feb-79	Detention (Ossu)/ disappearance
Manuel Soares		Macadique
Manuel Uaisanua			Feb-79	Detention (Ossu)/ disappearance
Mariano Loi Lequi		Macadique
Mário		Uai Cai, Afaloicai
Martins		Lugasa, Viqueque
Mau Kili		Matau, Vessoro
Mau Rubi		Uatolari, Macadique
Miguel		Ossu, Nahareka
Miguel		Ua Sufa, Matahoi
Miguel		Matahoi
Miguel Cai Rubi		Macadique
Miguel da Silva		Matahoi
Nau Rubi		Macadique
Nogueira Freitas		Uatolo, Matahoi
Oka			1978	Killing
Olokasa	Falintil		Dec-78	Detention/ killing
Palmira		Matahoi
Paulo Freitas			1976	Detention/ killing
Pedro			1979	Killing
Pedro Nahaloi			1979	Killing
Ricardo	Falintil	From Sana, Uaitame	1979	Detention/ torture/killing
Roberto		Matahoi, Uaniuma
Roberto Menezes	Falintil	Sana, Uaitame	1979	Detention/ torture/killing
Salvador da Silva		Foho Mano, Uaitame
Saua Dara		Matahoi
Sebastiao		Uaitame

Name	Position	Place of origin	Date of killing/ disappearance	Circumstance of killing/ disappearance
Sebastiao		Caidana Lari Macadique
Sebastiao Alves da Silva	Delegado Matahoi	Matahoi	23/11/79	Disappearance
Sebastiao Boruloi		Vessoru, Baha O
Sebastiao Uatocai		Macadique
Sequito	Assistente		25/11/78	Detention/ torture/killing
Silvino	Falintil	Uatolari	January–April 1980 (1979?)	Detention/ disappearance
Solan	Adjunto	Lospalos	Dec-78	Detention
Tana Mota		Dili
Tawameta		Dili
Teofilo Duarte		Matau, Vessoro
Valente	Falintil	Uatolari	January–April 1980 (1979?)	Detention/ disappearance
Valente		Uato Carbau

Sources: HRVD Statements 07278, 07450, 07451, 07441, 07528, 04185, 04200, 07459, 03145, 07485, 08069, 06804, 06010, 07331, 07528 and 05252, 03145-2, 07278-4; Community Profile, Uaimori-Tul (Viqueque, Viqueque); Informação Sobre A Situação De Algunas Zonas de Timor Leste, Dili, 13 May 1982; and Informacões, Submission of Napoleão de Almeida to CAVR, 25 May 2004.

329. The Commission has received the names of about 140 persons who were executed or disappeared after being detained in Uatolari. These detainees had been held in one of two places before their execution or disappearance: the Uatolari Koramil, which had been an elementary school in Portuguese times, and a house formerly owned by a Chinese called Mo Tem-Po, which had been requisitioned by Battalions 202 and 721 as the Kotis (Komando Taktis) headquarters for the interrogation of those who had been captured or had surrendered in late 1978. Around 300 people from Uatolari itself, from other parts of Viqueque District and from other districts, including Dili and Baucau, were selected for detention after surrender or capture. Some of these detainees were executed or disappeared soon after.[344] * Many of them were released over the following three months; and others continued to be held and were still in detention in March–April 1979 when most of the killings and disappearances took place.[345] In March–April ABRI ordered the re-arrest of released detainees, who had held positions in the Fretilin and Falintil structures and then embarked on a campaign of killings and disappearances.

* In addition to persons who were executed soon after being taken into detention in Uatolari, there were also cases of people who were killed immediately after surrender [see, for example, HRVD Statements 06804 and 07363].

330. Some of these detainees were reported to have been taken to places outside Uatolari to be killed, including the Kodim in Viqueque and Lacudala in Quelicai (Baucau), and others disappeared.* The killings reportedly started in March, but most probably took place in April.[346] They were carried out at various sites in Uatolari.

331. From a local perspective, two events seem to have triggered the killings. In February 1979 there had been a Falintil attack in Salerin in which four East Timorese and one Indonesian soldier were killed.[347] Shortly after the attack, a meeting may have taken place between six East Timorese who had surrendered the previous November and Kalasa, a Falintil commander still in the forest. Hansip and village officials who had been told about the supposed meeting, reported it to ABRI.†

332. These incidents would have indicated to ABRI that the Resistance was still alive in the sub-district and enjoying the support of surrendered and captured East Timorese people who had been released from detention. However, as in other districts, the victims appear to have been selected not because they were directly implicated in recent resistance activity, but because they had been active members of the Resistance before surrender or capture. They included many people who had been continuously detained since the previous November. For example, one night in March 1979, a group of nine people comprising five delegados, one aldeia secretary, one assistente, one Falintil Zone commander and an OPJT official, were taken from their place of detention and never returned.‡

333. The executions started at around the same time that killings and disappearances of people who had been active in the Resistance before surrender or capture, were also getting underway in other districts. According to one account, it was not until 9 April that they began to be fully organised. On that date, the commander of Battalion 721 reportedly summoned Indonesian-appointed local leaders to a meeting at which he

* Among those who were reported to have passed through the detention centres in Uatolari were two senior Resistance leaders, Solan (Inácio Fonseca) and Olakasa, both of whom are believed to have been executed at Lacudala in Quelicai in March–May 1979 [see below and HRVD Statement 06093]. Brigadier General Taur Matan Ruak told the Commission that he understood that Sera Key (Juvenal Inácio) was killed in Uatolari. Brigadier General Taur Matan Ruak was captured with Sera Key in Ossu in early 1979; he later escaped and personally investigated Sera Key's death. [CAVR Interview with Brigadier General Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 9 June 2004]. The killing of detainees who had been held in the Viqueque Kodim is reported in HRVD Statement 03602 by a deponent who himself was transferred from Uatolari to the Kodim.

† Whether the meeting really took place is in some doubt. According to the account of Napoleão de Almeida, the information about the meeting came from two men who were caught, apparently looking for buffalo to till their fields. The two had been brought before six village leaders and had told them that they had not been looking for buffalo but for "men in the forest" (ema ailaran) and had chanced upon the alleged meeting [Informações, Submission of Napoleão de Almeida to CAVR, 25 May 2004]. The six men they claimed to have seen talking to the Falintil commander – Adelino de Carvalho, João Bercamas, Luis Uaisakar Lakarate, Sebastião da Silva, Manuel Braga and Julião Sarmento – were all former Fretilin leaders or Falintil commanders and were all reportedly killed or disappeared in April 1979 [see Table below].

‡ They were: Adelino Umu Segue (secretario de aldeia), David Loisiba (Falintil Zone commander, Uatu Carbau), Gregório Maulelo (delegado, Baguia), Sebastião Alves da Silva (delegado, Matahoi), Acacio de Carvalho (OPJT Matahoi), Julio Pires (delegado commissariado, Builale), Sequito (assistente), Gaspar Pinto (delegado) and João Miguel (delegado) [HRVD Statement 07451].

told them to re-arrest the detainees who had come down from Matebian the previous November, most but not all of whom had been released in January. On 15 April at another meeting, attended by 63 members of Hansip, village officials and other East Timorese, the Battalion 721 commander announced that the Fretilin and Falintil members who had been re-arrested were to be killed.[348] The ABRI commanders re-activated the teams composed of East Timorese which had been formed to interrogate those who had been captured or surrendered in November 1978 and to decide "whether we should live or die".[349*] A wave of killing then started on 15 April and continued over the next two days in Ulusu, Uatolari, Lia Sidi, Saqueto and Beaço.[†]

334. The scale and timing of the executions suggest to the Commission that while local factors certainly played a part in the decision to carry them out, they were implemented as part of a larger, centrally coordinated strategy, aimed at eliminating the Resistance once and for all.

335. Lucio Meneses Lopes, one of several prisoners who had never been released from detention since his surrender in Uatolari in November 1978, survived one of the mass executions at Ulusu. He described what happened to the Commission's National Public Hearing on Massacres:

> Two Hansip brought a list of names of prisoners and called them one by one. This list had been given to the Hansip by the Indonesian military… [My] name was not on the list. But later two Hansip came into the detention centre and added my name to the bottom of the list, which was number 28. They called us and said: "Now we will go to find Fretilin in the forest."
>
> The people who escorted the prisoners were [currently still in Kupang] and [who has died in Kupang]. On the way nothing happened to us. Sometimes the Hansip walked ahead of us, and then sometimes we were ahead of them, and they followed us from behind. We walked for two hours on the road to Ulusu. When we arrived in Ulusu, they handed us over to ABRI Battalion 721. When we arrived there, the Bapak [the word meaning father commonly used by East Timorese to refer to Indonesian soldiers] said: "Please rest first. Sit down!" Everyone sat down, [but] a friend and I decided to keep standing. Then they gave us Blue Ribbon cigarettes. The Bapak began to speak: "Now we will go and look for Fretilin"…About 15 minutes later, they spoke again: "Now we will leave to go and search for Fretilin."

* In November 1978 there were three teams operating at the Kotis headquarters in Uatolari: a ten-person civilian team headed by a village chief of Babulo, M272; a nine-person military team headed by the Sub-district administrator of Uatolari, M273; and a women's team, which seems to have consisted solely of M277 [CAVR, Community Profiles for Matahoi and Macadique Villages, Uatolari sub-district, Viqueque District]. When they were reactivated in March 1979 members of all three teams are reported to have jointly interrogated – and ill-treated – the detainees [HRVD Statement 03602].

† Informação Sobre A Situação De Algunas Zonas de Timor Leste, op.cit; The CAVR Community Profile of Matahoi Village, Uatolari Sub-district, Viqueque District gives the places where the executions took place as Ulusu, Munu-Malau, Beaço, Uai-Mahu and Kaidawa Marak. The CAVR Community Profile of Macadique Village, Uatolari Sub-district, Viqueque District gives the execution sites as: Ulusu, Uatu Ila, Liasidi, Hunu Malau, Uatolari Leten and Beaço.

The 14 of us were divided into two groups. Seven were sent to the 17 August Zone, and the others were taken down the hill. We began to walk to a place where the troops were getting ready. Half-way down, my friend Adelino de Carvalho who was with me, said: "Lopes maybe this is the time when we will die." I answered: "Only God can decide whether we live." When we arrived on a hill, they [the Indonesian military] commanded us: "Everyone sit down! Look, there is Fretilin over there!" We sat down. But I did not sit on the ground. I just squatted to be ready, in case something bad would happen. Shortly after that the guns started firing. And I immediately jumped down the hill. They rained bullets on us. A bullet brushed against my head and scratched it. Below the hill, I hid in a hole in the rock. I saw them [the Indonesian troops] were looking for me, but they could not find me.[350]

Table 17: Killings in Manatuto District, February–April 1979

	Position	Date of capture/ surrender	Place of capture	Date of killing/ disappear-ance	Place of killing/ disappear-ance	Perpetrator(s)
Barique
Francisco Barros	Vice-secretario da Zona	9/3/1978	Casohan, Barique	Soon after capture	Casohan, Barique
		9/3/1978	Casohan, Barique	Soon after capture	Casohan, Barique
Laleia
João Baptista	Secretario da Zona	3/1/1979	Laleia	Soon after capture	Raimea	Btn 745
Antonio da Costa	Comandante de Companhia	3/1/1979	Laleia	Soon after capture	Unknown (TBO dis)	Btn 745
Salvador da Costa	Comandante de Companhia	3/1/1979	Laleia		Unknown (TBO dis)	?
Valdemiro Andre Viegas	Comandante de Companhia	3/1/1979	Laleia		Unknown (TBO dis)	?
Francisco Ximenes	Comandante de Companhia	3/1/1979	Laleia		Unknown (TBO dis)	?
Mariano da Sousa	Comandante de pelatão/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Clementino José Branco Ximenes	Comandante de pelatão/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745

	Position	Date of capture/ surrender	Place of capture	Date of killing/ disappear-ance	Place of killing/ disappear-ance	Perpetrator(s)
João de Brito Ximenes	Comandante de pelatão/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Gregorio Soares	Comandante de secção/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Antonio Rufino da Costa	Comandante de secção/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Felisberto Viegas	Vice-secretario da Zona/Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
João Viegas	OPJT, Responsavel da Zona/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Sebastião Gusmão	Secretario de Suco/Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Mario Ximenes	Chefe de Suco/Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Domingos Bartos Ximenes	Falintil member/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Sergio da Costa Gusmão	Falintil member/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Felipe da Costa	Falintil member/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Filomeno Gusmão	Falintil member/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
José Bento	Falintil member/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
José Vong	Falintil member/ Hansip	1/1/1979		February 1979	Laleia?	Btn 745
Paul Malati Soares				February 1979	Laleia	Btn 745/631
Salvador Ximenes				February 1979	Laleia	Btn 745/631

	Position	Date of capture/ surrender	Place of capture	Date of killing/ disappear-ance	Place of killing/ disappear-ance	Perpetrator(s)
Salvador Ximenes	Delegado de Suco			4/1/1979	Karkida (on Laleia-Manatuto road)	?
Antonio Virgilio da Costa Freitas	Soldier			4/1/1979	Karkida (on Laleia-Manatuto road)	?
Manuel Boavida	Soldier			4/1/1979	Karkida (on Laleia-Manatuto road)	?
Francisco Inacio	Soldier			4/1/1979	Karkida (on Laleia-Manatuto road)	?
Tomas Bonaparte Soares	Soldier			4/1/1979	Karkida (on Laleia-Manatuto road)	?
Antonio Soares	Soldier			4/1/1979	Karkida (on Laleia-Manatuto road)	?

Sources: HRVD Statements 03058, 09194, 03190, 05305; CRRN Communiqué, n.d.

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances by Fretilin/Falintil 1976–1979

336. The Commission heard extensive testimony about the killing of non-combatants perpetrated by Fretilin and Falintil during the period February 1976-79.* During this period leaders and members of both organisations were implicated in fatal violations in most districts across the territory, although the geographical focus of these killings shifted over time. Senior Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders ordered many of the killings reported to the Commission, and in some instances themselves perpetrated them.

337. Broadly the targets of the killing can be broken down into several categories: those who had belonged to political parties, primarily UDT and Apodeti, which had come into conflict with Fretilin in the months leading up to full-scale Indonesian invasion, both as participants in the civil war and as auxiliaries of the Indonesian forces' infiltrating the territory of Timor-Leste; members of the civilian population in Fretilin areas suspected of having contact with the Indonesians or wanting to surrender; suspected and known collaborators; and those caught up on the wrong side of internal conflicts within the Resistance.

* Killings by Fretilin/Falintil during the period December 1975–January 1976 are covered above, par. 172-207.

338. In early 1976, after the killings described above (par. 172-207) that took place in the weeks immediately after the Indonesian invasion, Fretilin members continued to kill persons associated with UDT and other political parties. During the course of 1976 tensions within the Resistance developed, between the dominant faction of Fretilin and other nationalists who opposed that faction's strategies and leadership, and exploded late in the year into confrontations that resulted in the execution of a number of prominent members of the internal opposition within Fretilin and their supporters. In the second half of 1977, long-standing differences within the leadership over ideology and military strategy sparked another internal purge, in which those associated with the President of Fretilin and the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste, Francisco Xavier do Amaral, were the chief targets.

339. While it is possible to identify these three broad phases, they were not in fact clearly distinct. In 1976, one of the areas of dispute between the most prominent of the dissidents, Aquiles Freitas Soares, and the mainstream Fretilin leadership concerned the question of how willing the Resistance should be to work with members of UDT and other political parties. The Commission heard of cases of people formerly associated with UDT and other parties being targeted after 1976. The differences over strategy that underlay the purges of 1976 and 1977 were largely the same, and it is therefore not surprising that survivors of the first round of infighting in 1976 often became targets again one year later.

340. The violence was sparked by differences within the leadership. However, these differences were largely over the role of the civilian population in the Resistance and they often had a damaging and sometimes fatal impact on the already disrupted lives of ordinary people who had evacuated to the mountains and forests with Fretilin. Throughout these years, like their leaders, ordinary civilians, particularly those suspected of wanting to leave the Fretilin base areas and return to their homes, also risked being dubbed "traitors", one consequence of which might be their execution or their death in detention.

341. This section consists of two parts. First it describes the killings committed by Fretilin/Falintil in their political context. The second part summarises the information gathered by the Commission about how people who were ordinary members of the civilian population or of Fretilin and Falintil also became victims of killing during this period.

Fretilin/Falintil killings: the political context

Fretilin/Falintil killings of UDT and Apodeti members

342. During 1976 Fretilin remained in control of large areas of Timor-Leste. The Commission heard of a number of killings during this time committed by Fretilin against persons who were associated with other parties. Most of the victims known to the Commission were associated with UDT.[351] The killings tended to occur in areas where support for both UDT and Fretilin had been strong and the level of violence during the civil war had been particularly intense.

343. In one case described to the Commission, on 4 March 1976 ten members of Fretilin went to the house of a UDT member named Pedro in the village of Matata (Railaco, Ermera) and arrested him. The members of Fretilin bound his hands and legs with rope then took him in a pick-up truck to Mautaimate in Matata, where they killed him.[352] Other deponents reported other killings and disappearances perpetrated in the Matata area by Fretiliin/ Falintil at around this time.[353] A number of deponents reported that during the period of the UDT armed movement and Fretilin armed insurrection of August–September 1975 both UDT and Fretilin killed people belonging to the other party in Matata.*

344. The collaboration of members of UDT and Apodeti with the Indonesians in the lead-up to and during and after the invasion of 7 December 1975, added a fresh dimension to the hostility between Fretilin and those parties.

345. In some instances members of UDT were killed by ordinary Fretilin members motivated by feelings of revenge. In July 1976, in Carlilo (Aiteas, Manatuto) four Fretilin members reportedly killed an elderly couple, Francisco Soares and Ingracia Soares, who had supported UDT.[354] In other cases there is evidence of higher-level involvement.

346. Soon after ABRI Battalion 330 had passed through Venilale (Baucau) en route to Viqueque in late December 1975, local Fretilin leaders in Venilale took it upon themselves to arrest, beat and kill UDT and Apodeti members, whom they accused of having fraternised with the Indonesians. In five separate incidents between 1–12 February 1976 local Fretilin officials ordered the killing of a total of at least nine people who were believed to be UDT sympathisers.[355] Among the victims were six members of one family; a husband and wife, Claudino Guterres and Maria Boavida, three of their sons, José (Azeca), Faustino and Crisogno, and Claudino's uncle.

347. The killings in Venilale fuelled the conflict between the Fretilin leadership of the Central Eastern Sector (Sector Centro Leste), then based in Lobito (Vemasse, Baucau), and the dissident group that had formed in Quelicai (Baucau) around Aquiles Freitas Soares, the Falintil deputy regional commander of the Baucau Zone. Maria Boavida was the younger sister of one of Aquiles's closest associates, Antonio Freitas. On 23 February 1976, M231 took some of his men to Uaimori where they shot dead two commanders, Januario Ximenes and Julio da Silva, whom M231 believed responsible for the killings in Venilale.[356] Three days later, on 26 February, Aquiles Freitas set up the semi-autonomous Boru-Quere Command with M231 as his vice-president (see below).

348. Persons previously associated with UDT were also suspected of spying for the Indonesians. A former member of UDT, Marçal da Costa, was arrested in Soibada (Manatuto) by five members of Fretilin in 1977 and accused of acting as a spy for ABRI.

* See HRVD Statements 01020, 03509, 03510 and 06203, and Section: Unlawful killings between 18-20 August.

He was beaten and then brought for interrogation to a Falintil commander, M232. After five days in detention Marçal da Costa was tied up, hanged and shot dead by a member of Fretilin, M233.[357]

349. Frequently the targets of these killings were deemed guilty by association, being linked to UDT or Apodeti through a relative or friend who was a member of those parties, rather than being members of those parties themselves. As during the conflict within the Resistance in 1976, Fretilin attacks on persons associated with UDT and Apodeti again fed into and fed on the tensions within the Resistance during 1977.

350. On 8 May 1977, Maria Antonia, an OPMT delegada, was detained at Haturui, Laclo, on suspicion of having been in contact with ABRI and was brought to the Mahadik Sub-Committee office in Aldeia Fitun. There she saw her uncles, Alexandre, Maharek, Masanak, Makai and Miguel, and other members of her family, and her cousins Maria Fatima and Paulino, who showed signs of already having been tortured. All of them were interrogated, beaten and tortured with hot irons before being tied to trees. The whole family was accused of being traitors. Maria Fatima and Maria Antonia were accused of having been in contact with Maria Antonia's father, Antonio Gregório, who had been a UDT delegado. They were then brought to the Fretilin prison at Welihumetan (Hatuconan, Laclo).

351. After a few days they were taken to Roluli, also in Laclo, where they were held for one night and interrogated by, among others, the Vice President of Fretilin, M234. Maria Antonia confessed that she had been in contact with her father. The detainees were then brought to the Fretilin detention centre (Campos de Rehabilitação Nacional, Renal) in Aikurus (Remexio, Aileu).* While they were in the Renal 12 members of the family died as a result of ill-treatment in detention or were killed.†

352. The targeting of former UDT and Apodeti members reportedly continued to occur as late as 1978. For example in that year Matias Amari Pinto and Father João Martins were arrested by Fretilin in the Bautae Zone in Uatolari (Viqueque). Matias Amari Pinto told the Commission that the two were put in a pig pen together with several Apodeti and UDT detainees, and held there for seven months. At different times during that period an Apodeti detainee, Alberto Maupelo, and a UDT detainee, João Brito, tried to escape; both were caught and shot dead.[358]

Killings resulting from the internal Fretilin conflict of 1976

353. Conflict within the Resistance surfaced soon after the invasion and persisted throughout the period that ended with the destruction of the bases de apoio. At the core of these ultimately lethal disputes was the mainstream Fretilin leadership's belief

* For further information on the Renal, see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment, section on Renal.

† Those who were killed or died in detention were Maria Fatima (a cousin of Maria Antonia), Paulino (another cousin), Libadasi (her grandmother), Maharek (an uncle), Masanak (an uncle), Makai (an uncle), Miguel (an uncle), Alexandre (an uncle), Biliba (an aunt), Paulina (an aunt), Maria Sibak (an aunt) and Bikristi (an aunt). [HRVD Statements 06498 and 07990; and CAVR Interview with Maria Antonia, Laclo (Manatuto), 20 March 2003].

that "politics commands the gun". One implication of this doctrine was that Fretilin was simultaneously waging both a war and a revolution and that to pursue both these goals at the same time required that it retain a large population base. At the same time ideological differences of other kinds—over the degree to which the Resistance should be centrally controlled, over the extent to which Marxism was compatible with East Timorese culture and religion, over the role of traditional leaders and over how inclusive the nationalist movement should be—also fuelled the conflict. From testimony received from a variety of sources it was also evident to the Commission that while these disputes were expressed ideologically, they frequently had a more personal basis, whether due to personal antagonisms and ambitions, or differences of background, generation and perspective. The course of the war itself also exacerbated the underlying differences within the Resistance; military reverses suffered by the Resistance and the worsening plight of the population in the interior hardened the positions of both sides and sharpened their disagreements.

354. As the rift developed between the Fretilin leadership attached to the Cascol (Comissariado do Sector Centro Leste) in Lobito and Sergeant Aquiles Freitas Soares and his followers during February 1976, the latter set up their own semi-autonomous command, called the Comando da Luta Boru-Quere, in Uaibitae on the slopes of Mount Matebian. Aquiles himself became President of the Comando da Luta Boru-Quere with M231 as his deputy. Aquiles Freitas Soares's authority derived both from his status as the progressive heir to the princedom of Letemumu in Quelicai (Baucau) and his 12-year service in the Portuguese army, most recently with the 6th Cavalry Company in Atabae (Bobonaro) where he had further enhanced his standing after the departure of the Portuguese by his heroic role in the resistance to the Indonesian incursions into Bobonaro in October–November 1975.[359]

355. When Atabae fell to the Indonesians on 26 November, Aquiles, his followers and 64 children from Quelicai who had been sent to Atabae to be educated there under Aquiles's guidance started a long trek eastwards through Dili and Aileu that ended when they reached Quelicai in early January 1976. The group were well-armed; weapons and ammunition brought by Aquiles from Atabae were supplemented by weapons captured by his ally, Sergeant Ponciano dos Santos, who had led a raid at the arsenal at the Portuguese Quartel Geral in Taibessi at the time of the Fretilin armed insurrection, most but not all of which he had handed over to Fretilin forces.

356. Ponciano dos Santos was appointed head of the Command's Security Committee. Two brothers and former UDT leaders, João Teodosio de Lima and Augusto Pires, were put in charge of the Political and Administrative Committee. Two priests, Father Eligio Locatelli and Father Luis da Costa, were named as advisors.[360]

357. In May 1976, the Comando da Luta Boru-Quere and representatives of Fretilin held a three-day meeting at the school house in Quelicai to try to resolve their differences. The Political Commissar for the Centro Leste Sector, Vicente Reis (Sahe), headed the Fretilin delegation. At the meeting Aquiles proposed that he be promoted to commander of Region II (Baucau), refused a Fretilin request that he share his weapons with other Falintil units, and asked that the people from Venilale who had sought refuge in Uaibitae after the February violence be allowed to return to their homes. Fretilin's Marxist-Leninist orientation was also discussed.[361]

358. Aquiles's stance persuaded members of the Fretilin Central Committee that his refusal to give up any of his large stock of arms meant that he was planning a coup. Rumours also began to spread that Aquiles was planning to murder Vicente Reis.[362]

359. The situation came to a head on 28 October 1976 when, after an armed confrontation between the two sides, another meeting was held, this time in Uaibitae. Before the meeting the Boru-Quere group had been persuaded to disarm. The Lobito group then arrested Aquiles and the other leaders of the Boru-Quere group together with several of their followers and suspected allies, including two liurai from the district of Viqueque, Fernando da Sousa from Uato Carbau and Adelino de Carvalho from Uatolari.* Some of them, including Antonio Freitas and Augusto Pires, were taken to Baguia (Baucau); others, including Aquiles, Ponciano dos Santos and João Teodosio de Lima, were taken to Ulusu (Uatolari, Viqueque), and then to Lobito, where they were handed over to members of the Fretilin Central Committee.[363] The Committee was apparently divided on how to deal with Aquiles; one faction wanted him executed while others suggested some form of rehabilitation.[364] Some time in December members of the Central Committee decided to execute Aquiles and his key associates.[365] Aquiles, Ponciano dos Santos and João Teodoso de Lima were executed at Lobito, while Antonio Freitas was executed in Baguia, either in December 1976 or January 1977.[366] Others, including Fernando da Sousa and Adelino de Carvalho, were sent for political education.

360. Various sources have reported that Aquiles was condemned because of his opposition to Fretilin ideology, or that he had betrayed the Resistance by actively collaborating with the Indonesian occupation forces.[367] The Commission has not found any evidence that this accusation had any substance.

361. Testimony received by the Commission has implicated Vicente Reis, the commander for the Central Eastern Sector, Maubrani (Cirilo Nunes), the commander of the Baucau Region, Kilik Waigae (Reinaldo Correia), the commander of the Bautae Zone, João Meneses (Darloi), and the commander of the intervention force, José Lemorai, in the capture of the Boru-Quero group on 28 October 1976. According to other testimony received by the Commission from Valente de Sousa Guterres, who was detained with Antonio Freitas in Baguia, those who were brought to Baguia were interrogated by M278 and M279.Their chief executioner was M280.[368] The Commission has not been able to establish who was responsible for the executions of Aquiles Freitas, Ponciano dos Santos and João Teodosio de Lima at Lobito.

362. While these events were unfolding in Quelicai, a similar and related confrontation was developing in the sub-district of Iliomar in Lautém. This conflict pitted another traditional leader, Francisco Ruas Hornay, who had also served in the Portuguese army,

* According to Marito Reis, 36 of the Lobito group were arrested in Uaibitae (CAVR Interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 23 September 2003). A document in CAVR's possession gives the names of 34 people who were arrested, of whom six were executed, but indicates that the list of detainees is not complete [Document: Quelicai Uaibitae, 28 October 1976, submitted to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone].

against the local and sectoral leadership of Fretilin and Falintil, and caused a deep rift within the villages of the sub-district of Iliomar.

363. Like Aquiles, Francisco Ruas Hornay had demonstrated his commitment to the nationalist cause by resisting the Indonesian incursions into Bobonaro in September–November 1975. He had defended Balibó against Indonesian attacks, and after Balibó fell in mid-October he had joined forces with Aquiles Freitas in Atabae. After the full-scale invasion he too had returned to his home base in Iliomar where he soon came into conflict with the Fretilin Comite da Zona and the local Falintil command. He objected to the Fretilin policy of concentrating the population of Iliomar in encampments (acampamentos) on both military and ideological grounds. In June 1976 the political commissar for the Ponta Leste Sector, Sera Key (Juvenal Inácio), and the adjunto, Fernando Txay, ordered Francisco Hornay to perform a self-criticism and sent him and his closest followers to the Renal at Belta Tres near Lospalos (Lautém) for 14 days for justo correctivo.

364. However, after Francisco Ruas Hornay and his followers returned from Belta Tres to Iliomar the conflict erupted again. Several of his followers were arrested at a meeting organised by the Central Committee in early October 1976, and believing that he himself was about to be arrested, Francisco Ruas Hornay went to visit Aquiles Freitas in Uaibitae. Aquiles agreed to a request from Hornay for arms. As the situation deteriorated, Francisco Ruas Hornay and his followers fled to Mount Paitah. Sera Key and Fernando Txay mobilised the remaining population of Iliomar to encircle Francisco Hornay's followers on Mount Paitah. As a result of this operation most of those who had fled to the mountain surrendered and returned to their villages, but Francisco Hornay and several dozen of his followers escaped to Kuladera in Uato Carbau.

365. Two weeks later in mid-November 1976, Fretilin/Falintil again mobilised the population of Iliomar, this time to capture Francisco Hornay and his followers in Uato Carbau. On 13 November the first killing took place. En route to Uato Carbau, in the area of Irafok in the aldeia of Larimi (Cainliu, Iliomar), the Fretilin force captured Paul Hornay and hacked him to death.[369] Shortly after, the force entered Uato Carbau and captured Francisco Ruas Hornay and his followers. On 17 November eight of them – Antonio Oliveira, Oscar Ferreira, Angelo Pinto, Antonio Soares, Silvino Ximenes, Libertino Barros, Bernardo Soares and Juli Ximenes – were reportedly taken to Lore in the sub-district of Lospalos and killed.[370] On 24 November 1976, Francisco Hornay and five others – Duarte Ximenes Pinto, José Nunes, Dinis de Castro, Marcos Pintos and Manuel Sarmento – were reportedly taken to a place called Muapetiti for execution. All but one of the six, Manuel Sarmento, were reportedly executed there. Manuel Sarmento managed to escape, but was found and killed one week later.[371]

366. In October 1976, in the same month that the confrontations with Aquiles Freitas and Francisco Ruas Hornay and their followers reached their climax, in the North Frontier Sector (Sector Fronteira Norte), another, apparently unrelated dispute within the Resistance also ended in fatal violence including executions. On 5 October, the Falintil Deputy Chief of Staff, José da Silva, and around 40 followers, including women belonging to the OPMT, left their base in Fatubessi (Hatolia, Ermera) for Neorema (Asulai/Sare, Hatolia, Ermera), the joint headquarters of the sectoral military command and the political commissariat. José da Silva's purpose was to contest his demotion from the position of Falintil Deputy Chief of Staff.

367. Sources interviewed by the Commission differ on what José da Silva intended to do once he arrived in Neorema, whether he wanted to discuss his demotion with the leadership and acted against them when they refused, or whether he went there intent on violence.* Whatever his intentions, soon after his arrival in Noerema there was a violent confrontation, during which there were several fatalities and the Fatubessi group arrested the whole sectoral leadership including the Political Commissar, Helio Pina (Mau Kruma), the Sectoral Commander, Martinho da Silva, and his deputy, Sebastião Sarmento.

368. On 6 October, a group loyal to the Neorema Command from Poerema in the sub-district of Ermera, led by Pedro Lemos, counterattacked.[372] They succeeded in securing the release of the detained leadership and capturing many of the Fatubessi force. José da Silva and several others managed to escape to Ponilala (Ermera, Ermera), but were captured there by local troops loyal to the Sectoral Command and brought back to Neorema. Three of those who had been captured were reportedly executed in Neorema on 8 October.[373]

369. During the following year the surviving detainees, who included several of the OPMT women, were continually moved from one place of detention to another, some being eventually released, some dying in detention and some being executed. The Commission heard that in total as many as 40 of them died of deprivation and ill-treatment or were executed.[374] José da Silva was reportedly shot on 15 August 1977, in Fatubessi, allegedly by Helio Pina's bodyguards, M235 and M236. [375] At least one other person, Mateus Alves, was executed in Fatubessi at around the same time.[376] José da Silva was accused of planning to surrender to ABRI and of encouraging others to do likewise, although his surviving followers denied to the Commission that he did these things.[377]

Killings resulting from the internal Fretilin conflict of 1977

370. On 19 September 1977, the Fretilin Central Committee issued a communiqué announcing Francisco Xavier do Amaral's arrest ten days earlier and his impending trial. Calling Francisco Xavier do Amaral "the vilest traitor that our history has known", it recounted a whole range of serious offences that he and his followers were alleged to have committed, including planning the elimination of the leadership of the Central Committee and a number of deviations from Fretilin ideology, including trying to "separate the civil from the military tasks". The communiqué announced that the President of Fretilin had committed the crime of high treason and had been expelled from the party.[378]

371. The communiqué of 19 September alleged that Francisco Xavier do Amaral's support was concentrated in his home area of Turiscai and Fahinehan in Manufahi,

* For these contrasting views, see CAVR Interview with Celestino de Carvalho Alves and HRVD Statement 08385.

Remexio and Lequidoe in Aileu, Laclo, Ilimano and Laclubar in Manatuto, and Maubisse in Ainaro.[379] The campaign against Amaral's supporters was also concentrated in these areas, although it also spread east to Quelicai in Baucau District and Uato Carbau and Uatolari in Viqueque District and reached into areas such as Alas (Manufahi), where Amaral was alleged to be seeking to build up his influence.[380] In all of these areas, alleged Amaral supporters were arrested, and many of them were subsequently executed or died in detention.

372. The communiqué also named a number of "traitors" who had acted as Amaral's "pawns" They included two members of the Central Committee and several middle-level cadres (quadros medios). Most of those named were also executed or died during or soon after a period of detention.*

373. Scepticism among the professional soldiers who had joined the Resistance about the wisdom of trying to sustain a large civilian population at the same time as it was pursuing the military struggle intensified during 1977, as both the military situation and the living conditions of the civilian population worsened and it became clear that the Resistance could not rely on outside help to win the war. From their different perspectives, the professional soldiers and Francisco Xavier do Amaral were in agreement on this question.† Several senior commanders were replaced as part of the purge of Amaral supporters that started in August 1977. Two sector commanders Martinho Soares of the North Frontier Sector (Sector Fronteira Norte) and Agustinho Espirito Santo of the South Frontier Sector (Sector Fronteira Sul), both of whose relationships with their sectoral Political Commissar had been tense for some time, fell victim to these sharpening differences. Martinho Soares was taken prisoner in or around October 1977 and held by Fretilin in Abat (Fatubessi, Ermera) because he was allegedly planning to surrender to the Indonesians. One witness told the Commission that the last time he saw Martinho Soares alive he was being tortured, with the lower half of his standing body buried in the ground while his upper body was being burned with melting rubber. It is probable he was then executed.[381]

374. The decision to remove Agustinho Espirito Santo as commander of the South Frontier Sector was taken at the meeting of the Fretilin Central Committee held in Herluli (Remexio, Aileu) at the end of July 1977, at which it was also decided to expel

* The named members of the Central Committee were Mário Bonifacio do Rego, secretary of the Regional Committee of Manatuto, and Diogo Monis da Silva, commander in the Laclubar area. "Middle-level cadres", both civilian and military, mentioned by name were: José Vicente, secretary of the Laclo Zone; the Vice-Secretary of the Laclo Zone, Antonio Heu; the Secretary of the Laclubar Zone, Afonso do Rego; the Secretary of the Remexio Zona, Ananias da Silva, and the Vice-Secretary of the Remexio Zone, Tobias Mendonça (Fretilin Central Committee communiqué "A Nossa Vitoria", p. 10). It was reported to the Commission that at least four of these seven named people were executed or died as a result of ill-treatment in detention.

† In one of his interviews with the Commission, Xanana Gusmão stated that he believed that Francisco Xavier do Amaral's thinking on this question was in fact the result of pressure from military commanders [CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004]. Francisco Xavier do Amaral himself claimed that he had reached the conclusion that the civilian population should be allowed to surrender independently [Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003].

Francisco Xavier do Amaral.* The Commission was told that Agustinho Espirito Santo was arrested with about 85 of his followers soon after on the orders of the Political Commissar for the South Frontier Sector, César Mau Laka, and brought to Zulo (Lepo, Mape/Zumalai, Covalima).[382] Tensions had been rising between the two for some time over Fretilin policy towards civilians. Agustinho Espirito Santo and his deputy, João Baptista Soares de Jesus (Bere Loco Meo), were in favour of allowing the civilian population to surrender, both to alleviate their suffering and to give the Resistance forces greater freedom of action.[383] João Baptista, who as a regular in the Portuguese army had fought guerrilla wars in Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique and Angola, was regarded as the foremost military advocate of this view, although he was not touched by the purge.[384] Agustinho Espirito Santo was taken to Fahinehan (Fatuberliu, Manufahi) where he and four others (Juvenal Belo, Alexandre, Paul and Ramerio) were reportedly executed on the orders of the two Central Committee members, M170 and M171 at a site in Mirik Lout in Fahinehan Village.[385] Other Falintil commanders and their troops were arrested and executed or died of ill-treatment in detention during the anti-Amaral campaign.

375. Arrests of Amaral sympathisers began in August soon after the Central Committee held a meeting in Herluli. In Herluli alone, by late August, several hundred prisoners from Remexio, Laclo, Laclubar, Turiscai and Maubisse were being held in a hastily constructed prison which consisted of large holes covered by logs.[386]

376. Francisco Xavier do Amaral himself was arrested by the RDTL Minister of Public Security and Information, M172, at the end of a meeting of the Fretilin Central Committee in Tutuloro (Turiscai, Manufahi) on 9 September 1977. His wife and children, his closest associates and his bodyguards were arrested at the same time.[387]

377. Francisco Xavier do Amaral told the Commission that in the month after his arrest he and the other detainees were taken on a long journey by foot through the villages of Soibada, Fatumakerek, Laclubar in Manatuto and back to Turiscai before being brought to the Renal in Aikurus. Along the way his escort arrested more people so that by time they reached Aikurus the number of detainees in the group had risen to around 50. Every day 4-5 people died, and prisoners who could not walk would be killed.[388]

378. Amaral suffered severe torture and deprivation (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment, section on Renals), but survived. Several of those closest to him, including his bodyguards, were executed and two of his children are reported to have died in detention of hunger.[389]

379. However, the discovery of “traitors” within Fretilin and their public execution did not begin on 20 August 1977. The divisions within the Central Committee that were evident as early as the Soibada Conference of March–April 1976 had grown acute by the time of the Laline Conference in May–June 1977, which was boycotted by Francisco Xavier do Amaral (see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structures and Strategies).

* CAVR Interviews with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004; and Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, 6 November 2003. It is unclear whether the decision to remove Martinho Soares was taken at this meeting, although one person who was present told the Commission that the Central Committee decided during the meeting to dismiss several commanders [CAVR Interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004].

380. Accusations of treason were already common by this time, particularly in the North Central Sector. Several months before the purge of Amaral supporters began in August, several killings were reported to have occurred in March–June at the Nundamar Renal (Remexio, Aileu). In March a total of 26 people were reportedly arrested in Aldeia Fitun in Laclo (Manatuto) and brought to Fretilin's Lima Leu base in Remexio (Aileu). They were accused of being traitors who had been in contact with former members of UDT, including Francisco Lopes da Cruz and Cancio Noronha, who were by then working within the Indonesian administration. Three of the detainees – João Adolfo Conceição Cabral de Deus, Manuel Rodrigues Pereira and Mau-Huli – were reported to have died under torture at the Lima Leu base. In April the group was moved to the Renal in Remexio where 21 of them were reportedly killed. During July there were further arrests in Laclo. Three of those arrested at this time – Filomeno Faria Lobato, Bernadino Carceres and Jacinto Correia – were also reportedly killed.[390]

381. Numerous sources also told the Commission about the execution of two people, Maria Fatima and Zacarias, during this period.

382. The two were arrested in Berahu, Aldeia 8 de Março (Liurai) in March 1977, apparently because they had tried to run away from a Fretilin base in Dali. They were accused of being spies and brought to the Nundamar Renal. The population living nearby was told that there was going to be a party. During the party Fretilin leaders asked for volunteers to kill Maria Fatima and Zacarias. No one stepped forward, so a Falintil platoon commander M173 shot the two. Maria died immediately, but Zacarias did not and was dispatched by Adjunto M176. Not long after Maria Fatima's execution her younger brother, Luis Pereira, who had been arrested with her, died in the Renal, reportedly overwhelmed by grief at his sister's death.[391] At around the same time another person from Liurai, João Freitas, was arrested and put in the underground prison, Renal Nundamar, on the orders of Adjunto M176. On 20 May he was taken out of the Renal and stabbed to death by two Falintil soldiers, M176 and M175.[392]

383. According to information received by the Commission, the first mass execution in Herluli itself was carried out in public on 20 August 1977, the second anniversary of the founding of Falintil. Several witnesses described this mass execution to the Commission.[393]

384. Antonio Amado JR Guterres gave the following description:

> I still remember clearly what happened at midnight on 19 August 1977 during the Fretilin leaders meeting when M234 announced to the public that Francisco Xavier do Amaral was a traitor. At that time Xavier had not yet been captured by Fretilin. On 20 August 1977, at exactly 12 o'clock midday, Fretilin killed seven people at one time in a hole in the ground. Of the seven the only one I knew was Paulina Soares. We had been teachers together during Portuguese times.
>
> The executions happened at Herluli… on Falintil's anniversary, 20 August. During the flag-raising ceremony the order was given to prepare the hole. Once the flag ceremony was over the seven of them were put in the hole and everyone was asked to come to the site to witness the execution taking place. Once the seven were in the hole, M178 said to them: "You have no more time left. Now you have to prepare yourselves." Before the massacre Paulina Soares said: "Comrades, I am about to die and do not have anything. All I have is a piece of clothing which I give to my mother, who will stay with you to struggle for independence."

After Paulina had delivered her message, she took off her clothes and gave them to someone. Then they spewed out a volley of bullets. I watched them all die except for one large man. The man said: "I am about to die, but you will not win." After this M178 took his bayonet and hacked at the victim's body, which spilled lots of blood. Seeing so much blood pouring out of that man's body I fainted. I must have been unconscious for a long time because I do not know whether those seven people were buried.[394]

385. Another witness said that several of Francisco Xavier do Amaral's bodyguards were among those executed on 20 August.*

386. Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan) described to the Commission the execution of 10 people, whom he said were killed on the orders of Fretilin Minister of Public Security and Information M172:

The next day they ordered six militia to dig a hole to bury the detainees who were to be killed. At noon they lined up 20 people and took 10 who were going to be killed to the river bank near the office…Then the people were ordered outside to witness [the killing].

M172 ordered the people to pray. Only after they had finished praying did we show the place to them. Their eyes were covered and adjunto M238] was the one who shot them. Two people brought another person; M177 ordered his eyes to be covered, and then M238 shot him. So it went on until all 10 people had been executed. Among the 10 was a woman called Albertina. As she was dragged away, she shouted abuse at the important people who were there:

"All of you important people are pursuing a political line that is wrong. The party you have created is a mess. All you have done is to make us leave our families and our belongings. We are living together, eating and drinking together, but we are killing each other like animals. Those who are innocent are said to be guilty, but what is it that they have betrayed? Those who try to negotiate are also called traitors…"

M172 and his companions answered: "We give you the best place." Then they ordered Albertina to stand on top of the corpses of her friends, but she refused. So they threw her on top of the pile of corpses, but she got down again and went on hurling insults at the big shots. They ordered her eyes to be covered, but she refused that too. When they ordered her to say her final words, she also refused. Albertina even refused to pray when they told her to. Finally M238 shot her three times, but Albertina didn't die. She kept standing and talking, so they buried her alive.[395]

* CAVR Interview with Maria Antonia, Laclo, Manatuto, 20 March 2003. Several sources reported the execution of one of Francisco Xavier do Amaral's bodyguards, called Rafael, but that execution seems to have occurred after Amaral was brought to Beutlala, Remexio, in September 1977 [HRVD Statement 08010].

387. Several more mass executions followed in Herluli. According to Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan), public executions became a weekly event during this period.* The Commission received several statements attesting to the public execution of a group of between six and ten people who were arrested in Faturasa (Remexio, Aileu) and then executed in the vicinity of the Renal.† At least some members of this group, José Mendonça, Alarico, Manuel da Silva, Zacarias Mendonça and Francelino Mendonça, were reportedly arrested after writing a letter calling for the removal of Alarico Fernandes.[396] The Vice President of Fretilin M234, who was present at the execution, then reportedly told the people who had been assembled for the execution that they too faced a similar fate if they followed the example of the men who had just been killed.[397]

388. According to statements and interviews given to the Commission, executions continued during the rest of 1977 and into 1978 in Herluli and elsewhere. These reports indicate that senior members of Fretilin and Falintil were directly involved in the killing with the names most often mentioned being those of M172, M176, M177, M178 and M179. During a meeting of the Central Committee in Ailaran, about 10 kilometres from Metinaro (Dili), in October 1977, Alexandre Lemos, who worked as a technician with the Fretilin radio, Radio Maubere, was reportedly beaten to death by M172.[398] Around this time M172 also reportedly killed one of his own bodyguards named Alik in Beutlala, Liurai (Remexio, Aileu). Alik was bound and hanged as a traitor.[399] Probably around the same time five more people, Moises, Mataran, Gaspar, Mauduan, and Beremau from Laclo (Manatuto), were reportedly killed on the orders of M176 near the Renal at Nundamar. Before being killed, the five were told to dig their own graves in the shape of a "T" (for "traidor"= traitor).[400]

389. Aside from the killings in Herluli and Aikurus, the Commission was also told of several other killings and deaths in detention that took place in the area of Remexio during this period. Ananias da Silva, the expelled secretary of the Remexio Zone, his deputy, Tobias Mendonça, and Beremau, a Fretilin delegado, were arrested by Fretilin commander M180 and his troops at Aimetalau, Remexio, probably in August 1977. They

* Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan) told the Commission that after 20 August "every week my name was on the list of people who were going to be killed, but when we got to the killing site, my name suddenly was dropped and they called someone further down the list than me." [Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan), testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003].

† The various statements attesting to this mass execution [HRVD Statements 05807, 08100, 05812, and 01502] name a total of 10 victims: José Mendonça, João Nenito, Francelino Mendonça, Sebastião Castro, Manuel da Silva, Alarico, Zacarias, João Rumão, Eduardo, and Domingos. The Central Committee communiqué of 19 September accused Domingos Simões of attempting to assassinate Alarico Fernandes on 7 August 1977 ("A Nossa Victoria", p. 19).

were held in Furi, Faturasa (Remexio, Aileu) where the two members of the Central Committee, Mário Bonifacio and Diogo Monis, were also being held. M172 reportedly beat Diogo Moniz and Ananias da Silva, and Diogo Moniz was also reportedly burnt with hot coals. Ananias da Silva and Beremau both reportedly died as a result of their treatment while in detention.*

390. On an unknown date in 1977, M172 ordered the arrest of two women, Ilda Mendonça and Dominggas, who were OPMT office-holders in Aimetalau (Raimerhei, Remexio, Aileu). They were accused of being traitors. They were taken to a Fretilin base located at a place called Kaitasu (Aileu). Ilda Mendonça was hanged to death, while Dominggas was clubbed by M172 until she lost consciousness, but survived.[401]

391. The Commission received reports of executions in the area of Lebutu (Hautuho, Remexio, Aileu). In 1976 the Sector Commander M179 ordered the arrest of Gaspar whom he accused of being a traitor. He was taken to Lebutu (Aileu), where he was imprisoned in a hole in the ground. After two days he was taken out of the hole and shot dead.[402] On 15 August 1978, Falintil reportedly killed five other people in Lebutu: Ana Maria Soares, Domingos Savio dos Santos and his wife, Elsa da Luz, João and an unidentified 16 year old.[403]

392. Killings and deaths in detention were also reported to have occurred in Liquidoe, the sub-district of Aileu to which Fretilin had moved much of the population living in the district under its control earlier in 1977.[404] Several arrests were reported to have been made in the sub-district in August 1977 resulting in executions, deaths in detention and disappearances.[405]

393. The Commission also received testimony about a number of deaths either by execution or as a result of ill-treatment in Laclo (Manatuto). José Vicente (also identified as Vicente Rodrigues Pereira), the former secretary of the Laclo Zone and his deputy, Antonio Heu, had both been denounced by name as "traitors" in the Central Committee's communiqué of 19 September 1977. With several others, including Thomás de Carvalho, Frederico de Carvalho and Felipe dos Santos, they were reportedly arrested in Zona Modok (Laclo). They were held at the Zone headquarters in Aslaran (Uma Kaduak, Laclo), where they all died, reportedly after being severely beaten and burned by Falintil troops under the supervision of the Zone Commander, M150, his deputy, M157, a company commander, M226, and his deputy, M237, who were themselves reportedly acting on the orders of M176 and Adjunto M178.[406]

394. Another person held at Aslaran in 1977, Thomás Antonio Ribeiro, told the Commission that he was detained there with five family members, Antonio, Domingos, Marçal, Orlando and João, after they had been pronounced traitors by Adjunto M178 and Adjunto M177. While in detention, they were not fed. Thomás Antonio Ribeiro was the only member of the group to survive.[407]

* HRVD Statements 05811, 09120, 04815, and 04882; and CAVR Interview with Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 6 November 2003. According to HRVD Statement 09120, Ananias da Silva died after open wounds in his legs resulting from torture became infested with maggots; another account says that an untreated snake-bite killed him [HRVD Statement 04882].

395. Though Turiscai (Manufahi) as the home of Xavier do Amaral was identified by the Central Committee as a hotbed of support for the Fretilin President, most detainees from Turiscai who died during the purges met their fate in Aileu. However, in one case reported to the Commission, members of a group of detainees from Aileta (Liurai, Aileu) died of ill-treatment or were killed in Turiscai. A Fretilin commander, M193, ordered Fretilin troops to arrest Manuel Oliveira from Aileta on suspicion of being a traitor who wanted to bring the people of Aileta to surrender to ABRI. The commander ordered that Jeronimo from Dili be killed. When that happened, the deponent and six others went to Turiscai, hoping to tell Francisco Xavier do Amaral what had happened. After they had been in Turiscai for one week, Commander M193 arrived and arrested them. They were held in a small room for seven days. On the eighth day they were allowed out and ordered to look for food in the forest for the Fretilin troops. A few days later one member of the group, Henrique from Dili, was killed by M195 with a spear. Another member of the group, Maunfoni, died of an illness that was not treated. After four months the deponent was released and returned to Liurai.[408]

396. The Commission also received accounts of killings in Laclubar and Barique (Natabora, Manatuto) both also identified as areas of support for Amaral, and in Metinaro (Dili) in 1977-78 that may well have been part of the anti-Amaral campaign. However, there was not sufficient detail in the statements to determine whether these deaths were in fact associated with the campaign against Amaral and his followers in those areas.[409]

The execution and death in detention of prisoners moved to Ermera and Viqueque

397. As the Indonesians advanced on the area in early 1978, many of the detainees were moved from the Renal in Remexio to places of detention elsewhere. One group of 10-15 prisoners was moved to the district of Ermera, first to Sare (Hatolia) and then to Abat in the sub-district of Fatubessi.[410] Another group of about 30 prisoners, who included Francisco Xavier do Amaral, was evacuated eastwards through Barique and Natarbora in Manatuto and then into the district of Viqueque.[411] Some members of both these groups survived; but others did not.[412] At least five members of the Ermera group, including Mário Bonifacio do Rego and Domingos, were killed at a place called Kakehe Mota Laran (Fatubessi, Ermera).[413] Three other detainees from Ermera, Maliban, Bernadino and Leki Liban, were taken away by an assistente called M282 and disappeared.[414]

398. After an arduous journey that took them through Cairui, Barique, Natarbora (in Manatuto) and Uaimori (Viqueque), the group of prisoners who were evacuated east with Francisco Xavier do Amaral were eventually detained in a Renal in Wesoko in the area of the Cai-Ua (Dilor, Lacluta, Viqueque) where the East Central Sector Commissariat (Cascol) had established a new base after the Laline Conference.[415] There they joined a number of other detainees from the Viqueque area.*

* CAVR, Community Profile, Ahic Village, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District identifies José Monteiro (ex-commander of the Viqueque Region), Antonio Guterres (from Ossu) and Lourenço dos Reis Amaral (from Luca) as detainees who were held with Francisco Xavier do Amaral at Wesoko.

399. The Commission has received the names of 14 persons who did not survive the transfer to Wesoko. They were: João Bosco, Domingos Mendonça (the husband of Ilda Mendonça, who was hanged in Kaitasu), Mauhui, Maumali, Vicente, Berloek, Mauleki, Maune Fatu, Mateus, José Karamba, José dos Santos, Leki Timur, Lequibere and Mateus Mendonça.[416] Those who reported these deaths to the Commission did not know how the victims died. The hardships endured on the journey to Wesoko and the subsequent evacuation of the detainees from the Renal in Lacluta to the southern coast of Viqueque pursued by Indonesian forces may well have taken the lives of many of these victims, just as many had reportedly died on the journey from Turiscai to Aikurus after the arrest of Xavier do Amaral and his closest cohorts in September 1977.*

The execution and death in detention of prisoners in the eastern districts

400. The killing of persons who had allegedly collaborated with Francisco Xavier do Amaral spread to the east. Aside from the deaths of those who had been transferred to Viqueque from the districts of Manufahi, Aileu and Manatuto with Francisco Xavier do Amaral (see par. 348 above), people from the districts of Viqueque, Baucau and Lautém, including some who had been arrested during the crackdown on Aquiles Freitas, his allies and followers the previous year, local people also fell victim to the crackdown. The killings that were reported to the Commission were committed in Uatolari (Viqueque), Quelicai (Baucau) and Luro (Lospalos, Lautém). Unlike in other parts of the country, the intervention of senior Fretilin officials, in particular Xanana Gusmão, put a stop to the killing in December 1977. According to one source, on 17 December 1977 the Secretary of the 17 August Zone, João Meneses, ordered that the killings cease, saying that henceforth camps would be used for education and rehabilitation and not for killing.[417]

401. In October 1977, Fernando da Sousa, the Secretario da Zona (Secretary of the Zone) in Uato Carbau (Viqueque), and several others were arrested and executed in Uatolari (Viqueque) as suspected Amaral supporters. In the year since he had been arrested and taken to Lobito with Aquiles Freitas, Fernando da Sousa had been given political education and then appointed Secretario da Zona. He was accused by the Uato Carbau commander, David Lebre, of having made contact with ABRI to discuss surrender.[418] According to an informant who was held with 23 others in a pig-sty in the Zona 17 de Agosto (Zona Bautae), in Uatolari on the orders of three delegados, M238, M239 and M240, among those executed were three women, named Alice, Angelina and Coubae, who were taken away and executed in the middle of the night. According to another source, Alice came under suspicion because she had received a letter from her family in the town.[419] The same three delegados were also reported to have killed Fernando da

* Then the Fretilin Central Committee decided that Francisco Xavier do Amaral and 20 others, including Diogo Monis, should be sent to the Centro Leste. Where they stopped, the prisoners had to dig holes for themselves. In Uaimori (Viqueque), Francisco Xavier do Amaral had to stay in one of these holes for 1-2 weeks because ABRI was close by. Diogo Monis survived, and was part of the group that was captured by ABRI with Fraqncisco Xavier do Amaral on the south coast of Viqueque in 1978. [See CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier Amaral, Dili 18 June 2004]

Sousa.[420] The decision to execute him was reportedly delegated to Zone level by higher levels of the Fretilin administration.[421]

402. In addition to Fernando da Sousa and the three women, the Commission was told of 15 other persons who were executed or died as a result of severe ill-treatment in the Zona 17 de Agosto during this period: Mateus Alves (a Falintil platoon commander), his son, Agustinho, Lino Mau-Saba (a Falintil soldier), Mário Mascarenhas (of the Zone Political Propaganda Section), Loi-Siba, Sousa, Germano Xavier, Se-Boro, Germano dos Santos, Labi-Cati, Lobo-Loi, Mateus Cabral, Naua-Cai, Co'o-Nau and Uato-Labi (the last eight were from Quelicai). All the victims had been members of Fretilin or Falintil.[422] The killings reportedly stopped and the 300 or so prisoners held at the base were released after Xanana Gusmão reprimanded the local leadership for their treatment of the prisoners.[423]

403. At around the same time, two groups of high-ranking Fretilin and Falintil officials were arrested as "agents of Xavier". On 19 December 1977, a group of eastern commanders and Fretilin officials, including the Commander of the Ponta Leste Sector, José dos Santos, his deputy, Pedro Sanches, the Regional Secretary for Ponta Leste, Pedro's brothers, Afonso Savio and Benedito Savio, Adão Amaral, Gil Fernandes, Raul dos Santos and Victor Gandara, were summoned to a meeting at the Unit 3 (Unidade Tres) headquarters on Mount Matebian where they were detained on the orders of three members of the Fretilin Central Committee, M208, M209 and M210. A second group, including José da Conceição, Dinis de Carvalho and João Ernestino de Andrade Sarmento, was arrested shortly after.[424] All but one of these detainees, José dos Santos, escaped execution, though all of them were reportedly severely tortured. The Commission received testimony that shortly before the others were released, José dos Santos was stripped naked, and then beaten and burned before being shot dead.[425] The others were released after Xanana Gusmão again intervened on their behalf with his Central Committee and military colleagues.*

404. In Quelicai persons suspected of pro-Amaral sympathies or simply of planning to surrender were also killed during these months. Some were killed in their villages. On 20 October 1977 the local commander, M200, reportedly killed the liurai of Uaitame, Francisco Moreira, and two chefes de povoação, Francisco Urbano Moreira and Manuel dos Santos, because they were suspected of telling the people of Uaitame to surrender. M200 and his unit also reportedly killed 10 members of the Fretilin administration in Laisorolai (Quelicai), including two named Lucas and Paulo.[426]

405. Others were brought to the 15 August Zone (Zona 15 de Agosto) base in Osso-Mesa (Bualale, Quelicai) or sent to the 17 August Zone (Zona 17 de Agosto) in Bautae (Uatolari). In September 1977 a Falintil commander, Manuel, and one of his men, Ricardo, were arrested in the area of Akauata (Uaioli, Venilale, Baucau) by a Falintil unit commanded by M211. They were eventually brought to the Zona 15 de Agosto base

* Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!: The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, p. 50; and HRVD Statement 00095. All but three of the survivors, Gil Fernandes, José da Conceição and Dinis de Carvalho, disappeared in 1979 during the Indonesian campaign against former Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders [see 7.2.3.4) where they were put in a pig pen with five other detainees for 30 days. The two underwent severe beatings over a period of six days during which they regularly lost consciousness as they were interrogated about their alleged activities as spies for the Indonesians. One evening in November 1977, at around 7.00pm, six of the detainees—Alexandre, Loi-Tai, Clementino, Modo-Olo, Joaquim, Luliba and Loi-watu—were taken away, supposedly to receive an education in Fretilin doctrine. They never reappeared.[427] Another deponent, Cecilia da Costa, reported the case of Naha Boru Kili, who was arrested in his garden and brought to the Bautae Zone base where he was held for three months and subjected to repeated beating and kicking until he died.[428]

406. The Commission received the names of 16 other people who were reportedly executed or disappeared at the Zona 15 de Agosto base in October 1977:

1. Manuel dos Santos (Lorico)
2. Mano-Sala
3. Gamo-Sala
4. Ce-Boro (Celestino)
5. Co'o-Quele
6. Gamo-Quele
7. Ano-Quele
8. Bernadino (Tai-Loi)
9. Afonso (Dara-Cai)
10. João dos Santos
11. Nuno Belo
12. Rafael Ximenes
13. Venancio Ximenes
14. Rai-Loi
15. Sedelizio dos Santos
16. Cosme Sarmento.[429]

407. In November 1977, soon after news of Xavier do Amaral's arrest had reached Lautém, another witness, Zeferino Freitas, was detained twice in Luro (Lautém). The second time he was arrested by the Central Committee member and adjunto, M242, and taken with another detainee, Cristovão, and their families to Lalapu (Lore I, Lospalos, Lautém) and then to Kaulai on the border between Lore I and Iliomar. Indonesian military attacks in the area forced their evacuation to Besi Manas in Luro Sub-district with three other detainees: Oracio Savio, Alcino Savio, and Julião. The 40 or so detainees held in Besi Manas at the time were subjected to continual beatings and received only one small meal a day. During the month that they were held there, two of the detainees, Julião and Cristovão, died, reportedly as a result of the beatings. The witness attributes the release of the detainees to the arrival of Adjunto Xanana Gusmão.[430]

The killing and disappearance of non-combatants by Fretilin/Falintil

408. The Commission received abundant testimonies about the execution or death perpetrated in other ways of people accused of being ABRI spies. Many of these cases are difficult to assess, although the dates and places in which they occurred sometimes suggest that they may have been related to internal political conflicts within Fretilin.[431] However, it is also often evident that people were accused of being in contact with the Indonesians when they simply wanted to surrender or were engaged in innocent contact with friends or relatives in Indonesian-controlled areas.

Deaths and executions in Renal and other Fretilin detention centres

409. The Commission received extensive testimony describing the extremely brutal experience of prisoners who were held in the Renal and in other detention centres run by Fretilin. The Commission received numerous testimonies describing victims who were arrested as traitors and subsequently died as a result of ill-treatment, were executed or disappeared.[432] Often the victims of this treatment were ordinary civilians, Fretilin members or Falintil soldiers. As with their higher-level counterparts, in a number of cases where ordinary people fell victim to the purge, it was senior Fretilin leaders who ordered the execution of the victims.

410. A large number of these testimonies described deaths in detention due to ill-treatment and deprivation as well as executions and disappearances.[433] Sometimes prisoners were condemned through a crude form of justice, which, rather than protecting the rights of the accused, grossly violated their rights by subjecting suspects to interrogation routinely involving beatings, burning with hot irons, hangings from trees and other types of ill-treatment and to a process of summary "popular justice". Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, who was present at many interrogations as a note-taker, described them in the following terms: "Victims were forced to admit to something which they knew nothing about and to name people who had nothing to do with the case [under investigation]."[434]

411. Whether a prisoner lived or died was arbitrary in several senses. Conditions in the Renal varied but were almost always life-threatening, since the food, shelter, sanitation and medical treatment that prisoners were afforded were usually grossly inadequate, their inadequacy seemingly being an intrinsic part of the prison regime. Those who died in detention might equally have been arrested for the serious crime of treason or for a minor offence, such as petty theft or being found in prohibited areas looking for food. They might also have been arrested simply because of a family or other relationship to a person deemed guilty of treason or some other crime. The nature of the proceedings to which prisoners might be subjected meant that decisions on the fate of prisoners were often personalised: the inclinations of individual leaders or commanders could determine whether a prisoner lived or died.*

412. The Commission heard an account of Fretilin's justice system from a former Fretilin Assistente who recalled:

> [T]he guilty person would be brought before the public. There many people would say that he was guilty; nobody challenged it even if we were innocent, and no judge would defend us. I witnessed about three cases. People who looked suspicious would be captured in the guerrilla zone… and the commander would accuse him of being a spy. The commander said: "This man was captured in the guerrilla zone. He is a spy." Then people said: "If he is a spy, he must die." A Falintil commander usually handled cases like these and people just went along with him.[435]

* Aside from the interventions of Xanana Gusmão and others during the purge of Amaral followers in the east, other such instances are described in HRVD Statements 02195 (Liquiçá) and CAVR Interview with Elias Quintão Laclubar, Manatuto, 1 October 2003.

413. Immediate public execution conducted with the utmost cruelty often followed these proceedings (see, for example, the accounts of the executions in Herluli, par. 384 above). Victims could just as easily be summarily executed without undergoing a period of detention followed by a judicial proceeding.

414. Most of the deaths of persons held in Renal reported to the Commission were not the outcome of such judicial proceedings in which the victim was sentenced to death, but occurred either as a result of ill-treatment or of an execution which had not been preceded by any judicial process.

415. One deponent described the events surrounding the killing of his uncle, Agapito Soares, in Laclo (Manatuto):

In April 1979 my uncle, Agapito Soares, who was 26 years old and a Fretilin delegado, was suspected by M243, Fretilin Commander M95 and Fretilin Commander M244 of being a traitor…One night at about 12 o'clock, M243, M95 and four of M244's men came with weapons… [They] tied Agapito Soares's hands with rope and then brought him on foot to meet Commander M244…Agapito Soares was tied to a tree and then interrogated by Commander M244…Then Commander M244 handed over Agapito Soares to M30, a Fretilin member from Sanarin, Laclubar, to be killed. Because this was an order from Commander M244, M30 escorted Agapito Soares to a spot on top of the mountain, with his hands tied… M30 stabbed Agapito Soares with a bayonet…in the ribs, three times on the left side and three times on the right side, and then once in the heart. Agapito Soares was still speaking to M30, saying: "I have done no wrong; I did nothing to be suspected of collaborating with ABRI." M30 kicked Agapito Soares once in the stomach. Agapito Soares fell and died.[436]

416. A corroborated case of deaths in detention, reported to have occurred in Ossu (Viqueque) in 1977 contains many of the elements described above.

417. In 1977, after the defection to the Indonesian-controlled town of Ossu (Viqueque) of a liurai called Gaspar Reis, 11 people, including children, were detained in the Renal at Leki-Loho on the orders of the Adjunto M245 and three of his assistants, M246, M247 and M248. On the basis of their association with the liurai Gaspar Reis, the 11 were accused of being spies and reactionaries. They were kept in a pig pen. During that time the detainees were beaten, slapped and kicked, and given salt water to drink. Reportedly as a result of this treatment at least two of the detainees, Ologari and Loi-Dasi, died. Those who survived were kept in the pig pen for one year and four months.[437]

418. Other cases of deaths in detention resulting from ill-treatment were reported to have occurred in Renal in the districts of Aileu, Manatuto, Viqueque, Liquiçá, and Dili.[438]

419. In other cases deponents reported only that the victim or victims had disappeared after being taken into detention.[439]

420. As during the initial invasion period (see Vol I, Part 3, paragraphs 172-207), the approach of Indonesian forces could result in Fretilin killing its detainees. Two sources reported that in 1978 in the Renal at Aikurus (Remexio, Aileu) members of Fretilin killed detainees by throwing grenades into the holes in which they were confined. The wife of one of the victims testified:

> We heard that ABRI was going to attack the place where the Renal was. So my husband was put in his hole. Then the assistente, M249, dropped a grenade into the hole. As a result my husband, Mau-Sera, died in that hole.[440]

421. Prisoners held in at least one other Renal were also reportedly executed or disappeared when Indonesian forces attacked the area.[441]

422. As its name suggests, part of the supposed function of Renal was the rehabilitation through political education of people accused of a range of crimes ranging from ideological ones such as reactionary behaviour to breaches of discipline (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).[442] The outcome of custody in a Renal for "political education" was often the death under torture, execution or disappearance of the victim.[443] In some cases, the Commission was told, victims did not receive the political education that was given as the reason for their detention; in these cases being "taken away for political education" was in fact a euphemism for execution or disappearance. One such case was the disappearance already described of seven persons taken from the 15 de Agosto base in Bualale (Quelicai, Baucau) in November 1977 during the purge of people suspected of being supporters of Francisco Xavier do Amaral.[444] Similar cases were reported from Liquidoe (Aileu) and Laclo (Manatuto) in the North Central Sector and Quelicai in the Central Eastern Sector.[445]

423. Miguel Soares and a husband and wife, Lorenço and Albertina, were arrested separately by Fretilin cadres in Laclo in 1977. They were ostensibly being taken away for political education. Neither Lorenço nor Albertina received political education. Instead they were taken to Hatuconan (Laclo, Manatuto) where they were tortured and ordered to perform forced labour. Both survived. However, Miguel, who was also taken to Hatuconan "for political education", was tortured and subsequently disappeared.[446]

424. What appear to have been purely ideological differences could also be grounds for condemnation as a traitor followed by execution. A group of teachers, Antonio dos Santos, Domingos Temenai, Jorgé, Domingos Pereira Montalvão and Domingos Sousa were detained in the Renal near Metinaro (Dili) where they died or were killed. According to the deponent, they were arrested primarily because of their opposition to the Fretilin doctrine on property.[447]

Killings related to civilian surrender to Indonesian forces

425. The Commission received information of instances where civilians who were suspected of planning to surrender, were in the process of surrendering, or who had actually surrendered, died in detention after arrest or were executed.[448]

426. Fretilin members, Falintil troops and ordinary civilians suspected of planning to surrender were liable to arrest, which could end in their deaths. The suspicion that people were planning to surrender might or might not be well-founded. Sometimes the basis for an arrest and subsequent execution might simply be the victim's relationship to somebody else who was discovered to be genuinely planning to surrender.

427. In 1979, driven by hunger, Elizio decided to surrender to ABRI. His plan was discovered and he was detained in Talik-Wetin (Uma Beco, Barique, Manatuto). Shortly after, his parents, Camilo and Faustina, his three siblings and two of his friends, Estevão and Mateus, were also arrested. While they were detained in Talik-Wetin, Estevão and Mateus were shot dead.[449]

428. In areas where disagreement over whether to surrender or not was particularly acute and pressure from the Indonesian military had become intense, such as in the Northern Frontier Sector (Sector Fronteira Norte) in late 1978, relatives of people who had already been captured or had surrendered might come under suspicion. In October 1978, in Matata (Railaco, Ermera) two Falintil soldiers, Felix da Conceição and Domingos Terlego, came under suspicion of wanting to surrender shortly after Felix's mother, Alda Exposto, and his cousin, Agapito, had been captured by ABRI in Leorema (Bazartete, Liquiçá). The Fretilin secretary, M250, and a section commander (commandante de secção), M251, ordered Falintil troops to capture the two. They were shot and hacked to death by the Tihar River in Matata.[450]

429. In some of these cases the victims were local Fretilin or Falintil leaders or members who had encouraged the civilian population to surrender.

430. In 1978 in Railaco (Ermera), because the civilian population was starving, their delegado, Eduardo Madeira Soares, told people to surrender. Because of his action, two Falintil members detained him and killed him at Fatumere (Taraso, Railaco) as a traitor.[451]

431. The information that individuals were planning to surrender might not be well-founded, but could still lead to execution. In some instances there were also indications that people were executed simply to discourage further surrenders.

432. In April 1977, soon after the Fretilin base at Tatabei (Atabae, Bobonaro) had been taken by the Indonesians, causing many of its inhabitants to scatter, the Fretilin commander, M252, and the assistente, M253, in Guico (Maubara, Liquiçá) ordered the arrest of three men, Lacu Ana, Mateus and Mau-Busa, after receiving the apparently false information that they were planning to surrender. Despite their strenuous denials under interrogation that they were planning to surrender, the three were executed.[452]

Killings during surrender

433. People who actually took steps to surrender also faced execution if they were intercepted by Falintil troops.

434. In 1977, a family decided to surrender after two aunts were killed during an Indonesian attack from the air. However as they walked down to surrender, they were intercepted by two Falintil soldiers at Raiketan (Covalima). The soldiers took them to a nearby river bank and shot dead three of them. The deponent survived only because he fell into the river and was carried to safety by the current.[453]

435. In 1978, Zeferino Freitas and his family were hiding on Mount Matebian. The people on the mountain were coming under relentless attack by the Indonesian military from land, sea and air. The family decided to come down from the mountain and surrender. They headed for Mount Builo (Ossu, Viqueque). On the way five Falintil members stopped them, and shot dead one member of the group whom they accused of spying for the Indonesians.[454]

Killings after surrender

436. The Commission received several testimonies about the killing by Fretilin/Falintil of people who had surrendered to the Indonesians soon after the invasion.

437. A family of about 12 people were allowed by ABRI to go to live in Manatuto Town unescorted after they surrendered in Casohan (Barique, Manatuto) in 1976. They had not even left the Barique area when they were captured by eight Falintil who took their possessions and brought them to their post. They tied one of the family members, Leonardo, to a banyan tree and tortured him by scraping his face with a knife. In the middle of the night they took Leonardo away and killed him. The rest of the family was able to escape and make their way to Manatuto when the Falintil post came under attack by Indonesian forces. [455]

438. Most of the population of Raça Village (Lospalos, Lautém) surrendered to Indonesian forces soon after ABRI entered Lospalos in February 1976. In the aftermath of the Indonesian capture of Raça the people of the village suffered at the hands of both ABRI and Falintil forces. During this time both ABRI and Falintil are reported to have killed villagers suspected of working with the other side.[456]

439. Local Falintil forces disapproved of the decision of large numbers of people from the sub-district of Bobonaro to come down and surrender to the Indonesians in Bobonaro Town in February 1976. Falintil troops reportedly shot dead several of those who had surrendered.*

440. The Commission was informed of victims who after surrender were ordered by ABRI, Hansip or members of the civil administration to return to the interior to try to persuade people still holding out to surrender and who were killed by Falintil when they did so.

* See CAVR Interview with Sister Consuelo Martinez, Dili, 4 July 2003. For a fuller account, see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment.

441. In February 1976, M254, the then sub-district administrator of Moro (Lautém), ordered four men from the aldeia of Soloresi (Maina I, Moro), Albino da Cruz, Koupono, Celestino and Tito, to persuade the people of Payahara to come out of the forest and move to Soloresi. When the four reached Payahara, they were arrested by a group of Fretilin supporters led by M255. Celestino and Tito managed to escape, but Albino da Cruz and Koupono were reportedly taken to a forest area of Leuro (Lospalos, Lautém) where they were killed.[457]

442. The father of one deponent was captured by ABRI in Colocau (Wetare, Besusu, Uma Berloik, Alas, Manufahi) in 1978. He was taken to the transit camp at Uma Metan (Mahaquidan, Alas) (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment) and ordered to look for the rest of his family who were still in the forest. While in the forest he was killed on the orders of the Fretilin adjunto, M256, on suspicion of spying for ABRI.*

443. Persons who rejoined the Resistance after previously surrendering or being captured by the Indonesians might also be suspected of spying for the Indonesians. In February 1976 Miguel Marques, who had surrendered to the Indonesians, stole some arms from ABRI and went back to the forest with them. In the forest he met two former Falintil comrades in arms, M257 and M258. M257 and M258 took Miguel Marques to their base in Uaimori (Viqueque), handed him over to three other Falintil members, and left. The three killed Miguel Marques on suspicion that he was spying for ABRI.[458]

444. In 1979, some time after surrendering to ABRI Battalion 401 in the area of Lacluta (Viqueque), Lauriano Marques, a Falintil fighter, decided to return to the forest with his younger brother because he feared that the battalion troops were about to kill him. He ran into a Falintil squad, none of whom were known to him. They tied him up and took him to a place called Halifutu Manu where they took out their machetes and killed him. They also hacked at his younger brother's neck, but he survived.[459]

445. Killings also occurred long after surrender. It is not always clear what the motive was for these killings: although in some cases those targeted were clearly collaborating with the Indonesians, this was not always the case.

446. One case that clearly involved the killing of a collaborator occurred in Fuat (Iliomar, Lautém) in 1979. The village chief of Fuat, Francisco Ferreira, went to his garden with five other men to harvest corn. Falintil troops commanded by M270 captured them, tied them up and brought them to a place on the outskirts of Fuat called Korufira. They were told that they could be allowed just to return to the village because if they did, Francisco Ferreira would only oppress the people. They were brought to a place called A'hasan where M270 and M271 killed Francisco Ferreira and two of the other men.[460]

447. In many other cases the motivation for the killing is not clear. After surrender in 1978 Artur Moreira and his family went looking for food. They encountered a member

* HRVD Statement 04303. Almost exactly the same fate may have been met by Duarte Almeida and others in 1979 [see HRVD Statements 01587]. However, two other accounts of the killing or disappearance of Duarte Almeida say that the perpetrator was not Fretilin but Hansip in Alas under the command of Capela Ferrão [see HRVD Statements 01506 and 01576].

of Fretilin called M260, who invited two of them, Gamulabi and Koubou, to look for food in the aldeia of Titilari (Ililai, Moro, Lautém). The two never returned. Artur Moreira was later told by another Fretilin member who had recently surrendered to the Indonesians that Fretilin had killed both of them.*

448. As Indonesian forces intensified their operations against the Resistance during 1977 and 1978, Fretilin found it increasingly difficult to maintain their bases. In many areas the population concentrations under Fretilin leadership broke up as increasing numbers of civilians either scattered to locations where they felt safer, or surrendered.† In some areas, such the Northern Central and Southern Central Sectors, it resorted to increasingly harsh measures to prevent their disintegration. The Commission was told of instances where groups of people who broke away from the main population concentrations were captured and some or all of their members executed.

449. The largest-scale killing of this type reported to the Commission was the mass execution of 43 civilians in Manufahi in 1978. The 43 were part of a group of civilians who had taken refuge in the forest in the area of Aituha (Alas, Manufahi) to escape advancing Indonesian troops. There they were arrested by a Falintil unit under the command of M272 and accused of being traitors. After being beaten, the 43 were bound and brought to Laututo in the area of Fahinehan (Fatuberliu, Manufahi) where they were executed.‡

450. Though the executions in Laututo were exceptional in their scale, there were other killings of this type. In the same year, in Laclo (Atsabe, Ermera), as Indonesian forces established a blanket presence in the area, a group of 10 people took refuge in an isolated area in the forest. Falintil troops came and took them from their hiding place. The following day two members of the group, Pedro and Celestino, were shot dead.[461]

* HRVD Statement 02021. Other such cases are described in HRVD Statements 03562 and 03597.

† Many of the Commission's Community Profiles describe this process. Representative examples include the Community Profiles of Hoholau Village, Aileu Town Sub-district, Aileu District; Liurai Village, Turiscai Sub-district, Manufahi District; Baboi Leten Village, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District; Beidasi Village and Aldeia Beco, Fatululik Sub-district, Covalima District; Defawasi Village, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, Orlalan Village, Laclubar Sub-district, Manatuto District, Aldeia Puno, Pairara Village, Moro Sub-district, Lautém District; and Bibileo Village, Viqueque Sub-district, Viqueque District.

‡ Statements made to the Commission identify the following 43 people as the victims of this mass execution: Graciano da Costa, Rui Luis da Costa, Anita da Costa, Agusto da Costa, Adriano da Costa, Inacia da Costa, Francisco da Costa, Costa, Eugenia da Costa, Jaimito da Costa, Leki Berek, Catarina da Costa, Carlos da Costa, Francisco Lorença, Hermenegildo, Castela da Costa, Anibal da Costa, Cristovão da Costa, Domingos Bere-Malik, Sia-lelok, Maria da Costa, Ernesto da Costa, Miguel da Costa, Cai Uka, Bi Malik, Loa Kolik, Sui Mauk, Coli Malik, Bere Leki, Seu Berek, Duarte Mau Seran, Antonio da Costa, Marcos da Costa, Antonio Bere Malik, Bere Colik, Luis, Filipe da Costa, Maria da Costa, Pedro da Costa, Juliana da Costa, Sara Mauk, Bui Leki Bere Leki. They also identify the following as perpetrators: M272, M302, M303,M304, M305. M306. M307. M308. M309, M310, M311, M312, M313, M314. [HRVD Statements 04802 and 04776].

Executions related to Indonesian attacks and offensives

451. The Commission received reports of killings of civilians by Fretilin/Falintil which occurred as ABRI advanced into an area.

452. Fretilin troops and auxiliaries reportedly killed an estimated 37 people in Kooleu in the village of Lore I (Lospalos, Lautém) as the Indonesians advanced into the sub-district of Lospalos in early 1976. Angelo Araújo Fernandes, who lost nine members of his own family, told the Commission:

> Fretilin troops, along with the Spear Troops [Pasukan Tombak] led by Commander M303, ordered me and my father and my two older siblings together with five of our friends to go to the village of Pasikenu in Souro, Lospalos to meet with Fretilin leaders. The nine of us immediately left with [the troops], but in the middle of our journey they tied our hands behind us with rope that in the Fataluku language is called "tanu"…When we arrived in Pasikenu, Commander M303 ordered us to stop and he went to see whether or not the Fretilin leaders were there. Not long afterwards he returned and said that the Fretilin leaders were not there. After that he ordered his men to take us under a tree, then to tie people together in pairs with rope so that they were one, something called "kawaha-waha" in the language of Fataluku.
>
> I was tied to my older brother. At about 10.00am they began to shoot us and a bullet hit my older brother. The two of us were lifted three to four metres into the air before we fell into a gorge so that the rope that held us together broke. I immediately ran with my hands tied behind me while my friends, including my father and two older siblings were shot…After I managed to run, the Fretilin and Spear troops shot at me. I took off the sarong I was wearing so that I had on only my underpants. I kept running and went into a river so they couldn't see me anymore.
>
> In 24 years, I still have not been able to reclaim my family. I want to know who sent [the troops]…to kill my family. Why were they sent? I cannot tell my children who killed their grandparents. My child asks me "Dad, why was our family killed?" I cannot explain it to him.[462]

453. The Commission received several reports of cases in which failed Fretilin attacks on Indonesian bases and successful Indonesian attacks on Fretilin and Falintil bases were followed by the arrest of alleged saboteurs.

454. Among the many crimes of which the Central Committee accused Francisco Xavier do Amaral and his followers, one of the most serious was the allegation that they had sabotaged the Resistance's capacity as a fighting force, specifically in the areas of Laclubar, Soibada, Turiscai and Maubisse. Amaral's allies were alleged to have "physically eliminated" several commanders, including the legendary Leonardo Alves (Ramahana) in September 1976, and to have failed to put up resistance to the Indonesians when they advanced through Turiscai and into Same (Manufahi).* The Commission has found no evidence to support these charges.†

455. However, the Commission did receive one report of an execution in the Soibada area (Manatuto) in which the victim was a Falintil soldier alleged to have assisted the Indonesians mount an attack in which a senior commander was killed.

456. In October 1976, Falintil troops under the command of Antonio Lobato (Calohan, younger brother of Nicolau Lobato) went to Lakero, Fatumakerek (Soibada, Manatuto), intending to attack Indonesian troops they believed to be there. When they entered the village, there was no sign of any Indonesian troops, so the Falintil unit returned to its base in Au-Abut. That night Indonesian forces attacked Au-Abut, and Calohan was killed in the fighting.

457. After the attack two Falintil soldiers, João Nifa and João Manufahi, were arrested on suspicion of passing information to the Indonesians. On the orders of the assistente, M261, they were bound and put in bamboo stocks and burned with red-hot irons to make them talk. After one month Boru Metan (Caicasa Fatuberliu, Manufahi) came under Indonesian attack, and the two were moved with other detainees to a place called Kian-soru. João Manufahi was brought back to Au-Abut and killed by Falintil troops. After two months of constant movement to escape advancing Indonesian forces, João Nifa and the other detainees were released on the orders of the Minister of Justice, Kakuk (Eduardo dos Anjos). After his release João Nifa discovered that his wife had been unable to find sufficient food while he was in detention and as a result two of their children had died.[463]

458. During the intense bombardment of Mount Matebian, which took many lives, there were instances in which individual soldiers were blamed for the attacks and were executed or disappeared.[464]

459. Any kind of contact with people in Indonesian-controlled areas could arouse suspicions about a person's loyalty and could also prove fatal. The execution of Alice in Uatolari (Viqueque) in November 1977 after she was discovered to have received a letter from relatives in the town has already been described. Even apparently innocent actions that could be interpreted as evidence that the victim had been in touch with the Indonesians could have serious consequences, including the victim's death. In at least one case the possession of a ball was grounds for arrest and execution. Two school-teachers, Miguel dos Santos and Manuel Pereira, were executed after bringing a ball

* "A Nossa Vitoria", pp. 11 and 18-19; and CAVR, Community Profiles of Liurai, Beremeana, Caimauk and Manumera Villages, all in Turiscai Sub-district, Manufahi District put the date of the Indonesian advance into Turiscai as March–April 1976.

† The Indonesian version of the death of Ramahana is that he was killed in Funar (Laclubar, Manatuto) on 23 September 1976 in an Indonesian operation in which Indonesian Kopassandha troops and East Timorese belonging to the Laclubar-based Tonsus participated [Ken Conboy, Kopassus, p. 268]. The same source describes a "black letter" campaign, conducted by Kopassus in December 1976. The campaign was designed to sow mistrust among the leadership of the Resistance, and, it is claimed, resulted in the execution by Fretilin/Falintil of at least one commander [ibid. pp. 269-270].

that they had found nearby back to the Fretilin base. Their executioners took the ball as evidence that they had been in contact with ABRI.*

460. In January 1976, ABRI troops entered Dare (Hato Builico, Ainaro) causing many residents to flee to the forest. The deponent asked two members of his family, Benjamin and Bernardo, to return to Dare to assess the situation and make contact with the local priest, Father Ricardo. However, on their way to Dare the two were caught by Falintil who thought them to be trying to make contact with the Indonesian military and shot them dead.[465]

461. As was the case for Maria Antonia's family (see par. 350 above), having relatives who were collaborating with the Indonesians could also have fatal consequences. In another case that ended in executions in Laclo (Manatuto), from where Maria Antonia's family also came, parents whose son had been recruited into ABRI Battalion 744 were interrogated on suspicion of passing information to him and were executed.[466]

Killings of civilians after the fall of the bases de apoio

462. After the collapse of the major base areas in late 1978 and early 1979 and the surrender of most civilians, the Resistance began the slow process of reorganisation. Despite the Indonesian policy of relocating civilians in closely guarded settlements and restricting their movement, civilians in the settlements did manage to organise clandestinely. In some instances members of the nascent clandestine movement killed persons who were thought to be collaborating with the Indonesians.

463. One victim of these killings was Alberto Correia, who was active in the clandestine movement in Vemasse (Baucau) but came to be suspected of being an agent of Indonesian intelligence. At a meeting with Falintil in June 1979, he was shot dead by two Falintil soldiers on the orders of Commander M304.[467]

464. In Aubaca, Bucoli (Baucau, Baucau) in January 1979 three clandestine members killed a man called Mario da Costa Ximenes who was suspected of collaborating with ABRI intelligence. One of the youths put his arms around the victim, while another stabbed him in the back killing him on the spot.[468]

465. Falintil killed a prominent local leader with links to Indonesian authorities in Fuat (Iliomar, Lautém) in 1979. The village chief of Fuat, Francisco Ferreira, went to his garden with five other men to harvest corn. Falintil troops commanded by M270 captured them, tied them up and brought them to a place on the outskirts of Fuat called Korufira. They were told that they could be allowed just to return to the village but, if they did, Francisco Ferreira would only oppress the people. They were brought to a place called A'hasan where M270 and M271 killed Francisco Ferreira and two of the other men.[469]

* HRVD Statements 00124 and 00166 both describe the execution in Remexio of persons found with a ball. It is unclear whether the statements relate to the same or different incidents. The latter seems possible: the first statement gives the date of the incident as 1976, the second as 1977; in the first there is one victim, in the second two. In another case, also in the North Central Sector, a man called Gaspar was arrested in March 1977 and detained in the Renal on the orders of the M176, after he returned from Dili with new clothes. Gaspar, however, was released after one month.

466. One deponent told the Commission that after surrendering to the Indonesian military in 1979, he and several relatives were allowed to search for their grandparents in Bibileo (Viqueque):

> On the road to Bibileo, right at Fetu Beu, we meet seven Falintil troops led by M236. Commander M236 shot my grandmother, Sahe Naha, in the chest. Because she wasn't dead, a Falintil soldier named M264 cut her neck with a sword [surik] until [the head] was severed and [she] died. Meanwhile, five members of my family, Cai Rubik, Laku Fonok, Napoleão, Noko Labu, Julião and Bosi Naha escaped.
>
> The rest of my family members were tied to each other with a rope, then they were forced to walk to a place called Wemaran. In Wemaran, they untied the rope and they forced four of my sisters, Luru Caik Etalina, Olinda Rangel, Petrolina Rangel, Clementina Gomes, to cook for them… Commander M236 interrogated my father, Cai Rubik…he was accused of being a spy or a guide for the Indonesian military. Out of fear, he admitted to the accusation. The next day, they were taken to Fatu Uani, Bibileo. There they met my uncle and my aunt, Leki Bosi and Dasi Labu. The two were caught and asked if they had ever met with ABRI or given food to ABRI. They answered: "If we met Falintil we gave them food; the same thing with ABRI." Hearing this, the Falintil troops used a piece of bamboo to hit them. Dasi Labu died immediately. Because Leki Bosi was not yet dead, Falintil troops heated some metal in the fire, then set his body on fire. The corpse of my aunt was simply tossed aside.[470]

Killings of civilians looking for food or carrying out daily activities

467. Many of the killings by Falintil described to the Commission occurred when Falintil units encountered civilians who had strayed outside areas where they were permitted to go.[471] Very often civilians killed in these circumstances were people living in the Resistance bases who, driven by hunger, returned to their own gardens or went to look for food in areas not controlled by either side. They also included people living under Indonesian control or in areas not fully under the control of either side. Technically, any person found to have ventured beyond the boundaries of the Resistance zone could be accused of making contact with the enemy.[472] Such killings were reported to the Commission to have occurred regularly in a wide variety of circumstances across the territory between 1976 and 1979.

468. During this period both ABRI and Falintil killed civilians caught in areas they did not control, and most killings appear to have been motivated by the suspicion that the civilians were working for the other side.[473] However, on the Fretilin side the desire to prevent a breakdown in discipline in general and to stem the flow of surrenders was also an important factor, particular in the later years of the period. In late 1977 the Fretilin Central Committee introduced formal restrictions on freedom of movement in response to growing Indonesian military pressure, increasing numbers of unauthorised surrenders amid widespread hunger, and widening divisions within the leadership over the right of people to surrender.[474] A large number of the cases reported to the Commission occurred in 1977-78.

469. An early case of the killing by Fretilin of civilians who went looking for food occurred on Mount Matebian in 1976. Feliciana da Costa and her family had been evacuated by Fretilin to Mount Matebian because ABRI was advancing on the area where they lived. However life was difficult and four members of the family died due to hunger. Two other family members, Naha Saba and Luis Lequi, decided to go with a friend, Agusto, to look for food in the area of Salaek-Lequeissi (Ossu, Viqueque). Falintil soldiers found and captured Naha Saba and Luis Lequi and brought them back to the Falintil headquarters where they were killed. After the killings Feliciana da Costa and the sister of Agusto, who had escaped, underwent torture and interrogation by Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders at the 16 August Zone headquarters. Specifically they were questioned about the loyalty of the three men to the independence cause.[475]

470. In 1977, many of the people from the aldeia of Puno, Pairara (Moro, Lautém) were dying of hunger in the area to which Fretilin had evacuated them. Out of desperation some went to collect food from their gardens in Sikai. On their return five of them were arrested, two of whom were shot dead on the orders of the Fretilin delegado.[476]

471. In 1978, in the area of Remexio (Aileu), because they had no food, a group of people that included Bastião da Silva went to find some in the area of Lismori. When they came back to the base, Falintil troops arrested them and put them in the Renal. Some time later all of them except Bastião da Silva were released from the Renal. He continued to be detained on suspicion of having been in contact with ABRI, and eventually died of sickness in the Renal.[477]

472. Persons living in Indonesian-controlled areas who went to work in their gardens were also at risk.* For example, three civilians were shot dead in 1977 by Falintil when they went to harvest corn in an area of Betano, Manufahi where Falintil were present:

> In March 1977 my three older sisters – Seubere [15 years old], Cotu-Bau [15 years old] and Edumau [16 years old]…went to our garden in Aidere, Bemetan [Betano, Manufahi] to harvest corn. Suddenly Falintil members who were in Bemetan ambushed them in the corn field. My sister, Seubere, was shot and died on the spot. My other two sisters who were still alive, Cotu-Bau and Edumau, cried and screamed so that Falintil troops came and captured the two in the garden. They were taken by Falintil to another location in the region of Aidere. There the two were shot dead by Falintil. After they died, [Falintil] took off their clothes.[478]

473. Several of these cases were reported to have occurred after the fall of the bases de apoio. As in the killing of the village chief of Fuat (Iliomar, Lautém) cited above, the victim in some of these cases may have been targeted as a collaborator. In one instance,

* For examples other those cited in the text, see also HRVD Statements 01711, 03027, 05567 (Bobonaro 1979), 06490 (Carlilo, Manatuto, July 1976).

on 25 October 1979 at Mariasa in the village of Uairoke (Luro, Lautém), Thomás Pinto and his two younger brothers were gathering tubers to eat when they were arrested by a group of eight Falintil members. The Falintil group accused them of working for ABRI. They were bound, then shortly after were released and ordered to dig a shallow hole. Then they were tied up again and all three were shot. Thomás managed to escape, but his brothers died.[479]

474. However, it is often not possible to determine from the information available what motivated the killing. For example, in 1979 Francisco Cardoso and his brother Antonio Tai went to Omelai Guda in Lolotoe (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) to look for food. There they were arrested by Falintil, who took them to the Tepa River and shot at them. Francisco Cardoso died, but Antonio Tai survived.[480]

475. In one case the parents of a deponent were killed in two separate incidents, both occurring while they were carrying out their daily activities. The father, Ricardo Freitas, described as an ordinary member of the public, was shot dead on 17 June 1977 on the shore at Lautém Village (Moro, Lautém) in the presence of his wife, Felicidade de Xavier, as he was about to go fishing. Two years later, in August 1979, Felicidade and a friend were out looking for tubers near their aldeia of Solerasi (Maina I, Moro, Lautém) when they ran into a Falintil patrol. Felicidade was arrested and shot dead two days later.[481]

476. Killings of people working in their gardens were sometimes associated with robbery. Recalling another case where Falintil soldiers killed civilians who were gathering food, Marta Ximenes in Lautém told the Commission that:

> On 17 August 1979, at around 6.00pm, me (Marta Ximenes), my husband Luis Lopes, and our two children, Cicilio Lopes dan Oktavio Lopes, were in the garden at Paitaal, Bauro. Suddenly three Falintil soldiers, one of whom was called Gil, appeared and asked Luis for our travel papers. I was in the field hut at the time while Cicilio and Oktavio were with their father, Luis. He gave the travel papers to Gil, but he tore them up and shot at Luis, but the bullet didn't touch him. Finally they took the linggis [metal digging stick] and used it to stab Luis in the chest…Luis called my name, "Marta." I looked out [of the hut] and saw him. He said, "I'm dying. Take care of the children well." When he stopped speaking they shot at the hut where I was staying and the bullet grazed my left leg so that my leg went out at an angle and I fell. After that Falintil entered the garden and took all of our corn and cassava.[482]

Killings related to infractions of discipline

477. The Commission also received testimony about executions of Falintil soldiers who had refused to carry out orders[483] and of alleged thieves.[484]

478. In March 1978, in Laclubar (Manatuto), Maukaho and Abrão were arrested by M308 because they had stolen corn belonging to M308. Five Fretilin troops took the two to the Zona Kalohan base. There the men were tied up and stripped. Then the adjunto,

M309, announced to the people in Zona Kalohan that the next day two buffaloes would be slaughtered for a party. The following day the two men rather than the buffaloes were killed.[485]

Other killings

479. Some of the killings reported to the Commission do not fit into any of the above categories. For example, the Commission received statements describing several incidents that occurred in 1976 and 1979 in the Natarbora and Soibada Sub-district in Manatuto, in which Fretilin members were reported to have killed people who were accused of being witches (buan, swanggi).[486] It is unclear from the statements whether these killings had the institutional support of Fretilin. However, there is at least one instance where the Central Committee is reported to have banned a cult movement called Siloko Nailoko that had gained support in Fretilin-controlled areas in the Central Region in 1977. Its supporters were reportedly arrested and some were reportedly killed.[487]

480. Some other cases defy categorisation. One is the case of Alarico Tilman from Same (Manufahi) who had a habit of going out of the house at night while asleep. One night in 1978 he wandered in his sleep into the forest and walked up to a Falintil post. The Falintil troops captured him and killed him.[488]

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances by ABRI/TNI 1980–1984

481. In the early 1980s, Resistance forces began to regroup in the interior and attack vulnerable Indonesian military posts, as part of a strategy of conducting guerrilla warfare while mobilising clandestine networks in population centres to provide material support and intelligence.[489] The Indonesian military retaliated by attacking not only Resistance fighters, but also civilian populations throughout the country, and by targeting both combatants and non-combatant members of the clandestine movement. Analysis of the data gathered by the Commission shows an increase in both unlawful killings and disappearances between 1982 and 1984, peaking in 1983. Some testimony submitted to the Commission suggests the increase in executions in the early 1980s was explicitly intended as retaliation for specific Falintil attacks.

482. From 1980 to 1984, the armed Resistance continued to organise and attack vulnerable Indonesian military posts throughout the country. Falintil attacks in Dili, Ainaro, Covalima, Viqueque and Lautém Districts took the lives of Indonesian troops. The Indonesian military retaliated indiscriminately against combatants and civilians alike. After the ceasefire of March–August 1983 broke down, the recently-appointed commander-in-chief of the Indonesian armed forces, General Benny Moerdani, announced that the Indonesian military was launching a new operation, Operasi Persatuan (Operation Unity), and that "this time we're going to hit them without mercy".[490]

Killings and disappearances after the Resistance attacks in Dili on 10 June 1980

483. During the night of 10 June, Falintil troops from the North Frontier and South Central Sectors and members of clandestine networks in Dili launched attacks on the Indonesian post at the broadcasting transmitter in Marabia near Dare and raided the armoury of Company B of Battalion 744 in Becora in eastern Dili.* In the attack on Marabia several Indonesian soldiers were killed.[491] In the aftermath of the attacks hundreds of people were arrested in a massive operation that involved virtually the entire security apparatus in Dili, including units of the territorial structure (the Korem, the Kodim, the Koramils and the Babinsa), the Dili-based Battalion 744, Special Forces (Kopassandha) and Hansip.

484. Among those arrested or captured were Falintil commanders and troops and others directly involved in the attacks, persons belonging to clandestine networks and a large number of people regarded by the Indonesian security forces as having pro-independence sympathies. The Commission received the names of 121 people who were killed, disappeared or died in detention either as a result of torture or severe deprivation in the weeks after 10 June. Most of the victims died in Dili. However, the Commission also received information about the killing or disappearance of people in the districts of Aileu, Manufahi, and Manatuto outside Dili, who were either captured after fleeing Dili following the attacks or who were suspected of being members of clandestine networks which had played a role in the planning of the attacks. The attacks had a serious impact on the wider population, but particularly on ordinary civilians living in the areas close to where the attacks had taken place. Several hundred people, many of them women and children on their own, were sent to Ataúro,[492] The Indonesian military tightened the already tight security conditions under which ordinary people lived: in the aftermath of the attacks ABRI interrogated women and children, and stepped up the frequency of compulsory night-time guard duties.[493] Several communities in East Dili underwent the kind of forced displacement from which they had only recently been relieved.*

* According to some sources, on 10 June there were also attacks on ABRI posts in Dare and Lahane [HRVD Statements 06983]. The Commission was unable to resolve many questions about the attacks. It is unclear, for example, which elements of the Resistance in Dili and neighbouring districts were the moving forces behind the decision to bring the date of the attacks forward to 10 June when it would supposedly coincide with a visit to Dili by a US Congressional delegation (which was in fact never scheduled to happen). Elements of the clandestine movement were heavily involved in the attacks, but it is also unclear whether they had the movement's united support. According to Xanana Gusmão, the decision to launch the attacks on 10 June was taken by a group of Falintil commanders despite opposition from the clandestine organisation in Dili. Xanana Gusmão, who had agreed in principle to the operation and whose own forces from the east were heading for Dili when it took place, was very critical of the decision to bring the date forward. He characterised the episode as one of the "bitter experiences" (amargas experiências) of the war in which the primary objective of the plan – the capture of arms and ammunition – had been sacrificed to lesser objectives such as that of gaining international attention. It is also unclear how whole-hearted the support of Falintil troops, particularly those from the North Frontier Sector, really was. [For Xanana Gusmão's views on 10 June, see "Companheiro Terus", Timor Leste – Um Povo, Uma Pátria, pp. 129-132; and CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004. Other sources which throw some light on the events of 10 June include Neil Barrett, Interview with David Ximenes; CAVR Interview with Bernadino Villanova; HRVD Statements 05655 and 06983 and CAVR Community Profiles, Nazare Village, Dom Aleixo Sub-district, Dili District, and Bairro Alto Village and Alto Hospital Village, Vera Cruz, Mascarenhas, Dili District].

485. Following the attacks, the security forces indiscriminately rounded up persons connected to the Resistance. In Becora and Culuhun, two of the areas targeted during the crackdown, people who had been "marked" by ABRI when they surrendered were reportedly arrested en masse.[494] Those who disappeared or were executed came from a wide spectrum of backgrounds, ranging from former members of the Fretilin Central Committee to children.

Table 18: Persons reported to have been executed or "disappeared" after the 10 June attacks

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Abilio Loli Rai	Manatuto	Manatuto		7/1/1980	Captured in Manatuto; disappeared on night of 8 August 1980
Adão Mendonça	Aileu	Dili	Former District Secretary of Fretilin, Aileu; assistente and commander	01/06/1980 (PL); arrested on 12 June by four soldiers from Koramil Becora at house in Lahane Barat, taken to Kodim (CAVR Interview with Maria de Fatima Martins, Aileu, nd)	Disappeared from the Comarca; taken to Kodim on 12 June (03217)
Adriano dos Santos	Tutuala	Dili		11/06/1980 (HRVD)	Disappeared from the Comarca (PL); disappeared from Kopassandha base, Colmera (HRVD)

* People living on the edges of Balibar (Cristo Rei, East Dili) and Ailok (Becora, Cristo Rei, East Dili) were concentrated in Fatu-Loda in Balibar where they had to stay until 1986 under tight security restrictions that caused many deaths. They had to report to the Babinsa (Village NCO) if they wanted to move out of the area and were not allowed to leave it between 4.00pm and 8.00am [CAVR Community Profile, Balibar/Ailok, Becora, Cristo Rei Sub-district, East Dili]. Shortly after the attacks Hansip burned down houses in Suhu-Rama and forced the people from there to move to Santa Cruz [HRVD Statement 08037]. Conditions that were similar in many respects to those reported in the Balibar/Ailok CAVR Community Profile are also reported in the CAVR Community Profile, Florestal/Laulara and 10 de Junho/Nahaek neighbourhood, Vera Cruz Sub-district, West Dili, Dili District].

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Adriano Mesquita	Dili	Dare		6/1/1980	Disappreared from the Comarca; confirmed in 00072
Afonso Moniz	Dili	Santa Cruz		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca, some time after 18 June with Agusto, Tomas, Mau Quinta, Camilo, Pedro Lemos and Agusto (08063)
Agostinho Cabral					Disappeared
Agosto Sousa	Dili	Balibar		6/1/1980	Disappeared from Comarca some time after 18 June with Afonso Moniz, Tomas, Mau Quinta, Camilo, Pedro Lemos and Jeronimo (08063)
Agustinho		Dili	Dare	7/1/1980	Killed by Hansip in Dare
Agustinho Soares Laca		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis (former Hotel Askeu) in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Alberto Monteiro	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappreared from the Comarca
Anastacio Sarmento	Dili	Dare		7/1/1980	Killed in Dare cemetery by three Hansip named Venancio, Januario and Jorge, on 11 June after being arrested at home the previous night
Angelina Soares		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis (former Hotel Askeu) in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Antonio	Ossu	Dili/Bautu		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca; probably the Emilio Antonio in HRVD 08108

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Antonio de Carvalho		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis (former Hotel Askeu) in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Antonio da Cunha		Ailili, Manatuto	"Clandestine chairman"	6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis (former Hotel Askeu) in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Antonio Leki Mali	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Antonio Soares Mau Lalan		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis (former Hotel Askeu) in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Asubere					Disappeared from Comarca (00072)
Bere Loek					Reportedly killed by Btn 744
Bere Mali					Reportedly killed by Btn 744
Bere Mali Soares					Reportedly killed by Btn 744
Caetano	Quelicai	Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Camilo					Disappeared from Comarca some time after 18 June with Afonso Moniz, Tomas, Mau Quinta, Pedro Lemos, and Agusto (08063)
Carlos de Araújo	Dili/ Madaneno	Madaheno		6/1/1980	Died in Comarca due to beatings and hunger
Celestino Maubere	Aileu	Besilau, Aileu		8/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Daholo	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca; arrested on 14 June by two soldiers from Btn 744 and six other TNI with six others: Joaquim RT, Antonio Bernadino, Paulo Hansip, Joao Hansip, Amandio da Silva Carvalho and Joao Lacoto, and taken to Balibar post. They were tortured from morning to 1 pm. Daholo died under torture (HRVD 06983).
Danilo Coelho					Disappeared from the Comarca
Danilo da Silva	Ossu	Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared in the Korem
Dau Molik Inan	Dili	Dare		7/1/1980	Killed by Hansip in Dare
Domingos				6/1/1980	Disappeared from Kodim Aileu
Domingos	Manatuto	Manatuto		6/1/1980	Died in Comarca due to beatings and hunger
Domingos Borromeu	Same	Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Domingos Caldeira	Turiscai	Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Domingos Castro					Disappeared after arrest in Toko Baru, Culuhun; reportedly killed by Btn 744 with seven others
Domingos Fatima (Mau Nugo Aman)	Dare/Dili	Tiluri		6/1/1980	Disappeared in the Korem
Domingos Mau Nuca	Dili	Hospital		6/1/1980	Disappeared from his home
Domingos Soares		Culuhun		6/12/1980	Disappeared after arrest in Toko Baru, Culuhun; 06955: reportedly killed by Btn 744 with seven others (Gaspar da Costa, Gaspar, Bere Mali, Bere Mali Soares, Bere Loek, Maurais, and Vidal Soares) and bodies dumped in Fatu Bangku.

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Domingos Soares (Coli Lac)		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Domingos Soares Bac		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Edmundo	Ossu	Dili/Bautu		6/1/1980	Disappeared in the Comarca
Eduardo Freitas	Quelicai	Dili		6/1/1980	Died in Comarca due to beatings and hunger
Elias Alves					Disappeared from the Comarca
Francisco	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Francisco Araújo	Atsabe	Atsabe		6/2/1980	Captured in Atsabe; brought to Dili; disappeared
Francisco Gusmão					Captured in Atsabe; brought to Dili; disappeared
Francisco Soares Laco		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks
Francisco Soares Luli		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks
Francisco Soares Mean		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks
Gaspar
Gaspar Araújo
Gaspar Carvalho

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Gaspar José Soares Guterres
Guilherme	Balibar	Dili/Bidau		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Hermenegildo	Same	Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Isabel Soares		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks
Jeronimo					Disappeared from Comarca
Joanico Soares		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks
João Batista				6/1/1980	Taken to Comoro Koramil and disappeared
João Barreto	Dili	Vila Verde		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
João Bosco				6/11/1980	Disappeared from Comarca on 13 June after being taken by Captain Mustari of Intel (05666)
João Cristo Rei	Manatuto	Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
João da Costa	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
João Exposto	Dili	Balibar		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca; wounded by soldiers from Btn 744 on 10 June, surrendered by Dom Martinho to Comarca on 19 June, and then disappeared (04864)
João Mau Duan	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Joaquim Assis					Mentioned in Hera, Cristo Rei Community Profile as being killed with Mario do Carmo and Joaquim Soares; all three were former Falintil commanders
Joaquim Soares					Mentioned in Hera, Cristo Rei Community Profile as being killed with Joaquim Assis and Mario do Carmo; all three were former Falintil commanders
Jordão Fernandes	Dili	Lahane		6/1/1980	Disappeared in Korem; confirmed as Mes Korem in 00072, but says that he was strangled in front of the other prisoners on 20 June; 00076-5: Jordao and Mau Meta Luis were killed in Mes Korem by having their heads submerged in water until they died some time between arrest of deponent on 10 July and his transfer to Comarca on 19 July.
José	Remexio	Remexio		8/17/1980	Died in Comarca due to beatings and hunger
José da Sousa	Laleia	Dili		7/1/1980	Disappeared on 8 August
José Manuel	Dili	Dare		7/1/1980	Killed by Hansip in Dare
José Ramos Soares		Ailili, Manatuto	"Clandestine chairman"	6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Leão Macedo	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Lino	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Luan Berek	Fatumean	Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca; 00076-5: Several of the detainees were taken from the Comarca and disappeared, among them Luan Berek, Danilo Coelho and Elias Alves.
Luciano Soares	Manatuto	Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Malaquias Alves	Dili	Bibi Ruak		6/1/1980	Died in Comarca due to beatings and hunger
Mali Mau	Lequidoe	Fahisoi		8/17/1980	Died in Comarca due to beatings and hunger
Manuel	Dili	Ramelau/ Dare		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Marcos Soares	Dili	Dare		6/13/1980	Tortured in Korem; stabbed all over his body; disappeared; possibly killed in Balibar
Maria Barreto	Dare	Dare		7/1/1980	Killed by Hansip in Dare
Maria Teresa		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Mariano Soares		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Mário do Carmo		Hera			Mentioned in Hera, Cristo Rei Ccmmunity Profile as being killed with Joaquim Assis and Joaquim Soares; all three were former Falintil commanders
Martinho Saldanha	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca; Suco Nazare, according to Dom Aleixo Community Profile

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Mateus da Costa					Disappeared with four others after arrest in Dulaco, Fatuberliu (Manufahi)
Mateus Saldanha	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Korem
Mateus Soares	Dili	Balibar		6/14/1980	Disappeared after arrest in Balibar by Btn 744.
Mau Buti	Dili	Marabia		6/11/1980	Disappeared in the Comarca; described as RT in Suhurama, Inur Fuik, Nain Feto Community Profile
Mau Leki	Lequidoe	Fahisoi		8/17/1980	Died in Aileu due to beatings and hunger
Mau Mali	Lequidoe	Fahisoi		8/17/1980	Died in Comarca due to beatings and hunger
Mau Malik Metan	Dili	Lacoto		8/17/1980	Died in Korem due to beatings and hunger
Mau Quinta (Resta Parte)					Disappeared from Comarca
Mau Ranek	Dili	Dare		7/1/1980	Killed by Hansip in Dare
Mau Siri		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Maubere	Aileu	Besilau, Aileu		8/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Mausabu					Disappeared from Aileu Kodim after arrest in Rairema, Aileu
Moises					Disappeared with four others after arrest in Dulaco, Faturberliu (Manufahi).
Morais					Disappeared after arrest by Btn 744 in Ailo'ok (Balibar)
Norberto Fernandes	Dili	Dare		6/10/1980	Stabbed to death by Hansip
Paulo Xavier	Dili	Lahane		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Pedro Gusmão					Disappeared after arrest in Dulaco, Faturberliu (Manufahi)
Pedro Lemos	Ermera	Ermera		6/14/1980	Captured in Ermera; disappeared from Comarca on night of 8 August 1980
Pedro Manek	Dili	Dili		8/1/1980	Disappeared in the Korem
Raimundo Fatima	Dili	Dare		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Romaldo	Lequidoe	Fahisoi		8/17/1980	Died in Comarca due to beatings and hunger
Romão Nunes	Dili	Lahane		6/1/1980	Disappeared in Korem
Rosalino Bonaparte Soares	Manatuto	Santana/ Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Salvador da Rosa de Fatima (Salvador Fatima do Rego)	Tibar	Tibar		6/2/1980	Guerrilla captured in Tibar; reportedly beaten to death in Comarca
Sancho	Venilale	Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Sanchos Lasikona		Quintal Boot, Dili		7/12/1980	Disappeared after arrest by police and ABRI at home in Quintal Boot
Sertorio Marques Soares		Ailili, Manatuto		6/28/1980	Disappeared with 16 others after arrest by Btn 121 after detention in the Btn 121 Kotis in Manatuto Town for three weeks.
Silverio dos Santos		Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Sismundo	Ossu	Dili/Bautu		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Tiago Loi Sara	Dili	Santa Cruz		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Tito	Ossu	Dili		6/1/1980	Disappeared from Comarca
Tomás	Aileu	Besilau, Aileu		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Tomás					Reportedly killed

Name	Place of birth	Place of residence	Position	Date of arrest	Other information
Tomás Soares	Dili	Dare		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Tomás Tilman	Dili	Lacoto		6/1/1980	Disappeared from the Comarca
Venancio Gomes (Mau Seran)	Tibar	Dili		6/1/1980	Reportedly taken from his home Remexio where executed.
Vidal Soares		Culuhun		6/12/1980	Disappeared after arrest in Toko Baru, Culuhun, by Btn 744

Sources: HRVD Statements 03217, 03809, 01626, 08063, 06961, 00072, 00076, 06959, 05738, 05020, 05666, 04864, 08063 and 01439; Neil Barret Interview with Maria Imaculada Araújo, Dili [date?]; CAVR Interview with Maria Fatima Martins, Seloi Malere (Aileu), n.d.; En Nome de Presos de 10 June 1980, CRRN Communiqué, 13 July 1983; Community Profiles, Suhurama, Inur Fuik (Nain Feto, Dili) and Balibar/Ailok (Dili).

486. Venancio Gomes (Mau Seran), a former member of the Fretilin Central Committee who was arrested and detained in Dili in December 1975, was reportedly taken from his home near the Comoro market on 15 June by an Apodeti member called M281 and taken to the Dili Kodim headquarters in a taxi driven by M282. That evening he was taken by helicopter to Remexio and shot dead by a member of the local Koramil called M283. According to a TBO who witnessed the execution, his body was left on the ground and was eaten by dogs.[495]

487. Pedro Lemos (Teki), a former Falintil commander in the North Frontier Sector, was arrested in Ermera on 14 June 1980 and brought to Dili. He appears to have been held in the Dili Kodim before being transferred to the Mes Korem and then to the Comarca (Balide). One night, possibly on 8 August he was taken out of the Comarca and disappeared. According to some accounts, several others, including Asubere, Jeronimo, Thomás, Afonso Moniz, Agusto, Mauquinta, Camilo, and Adriano Mesquita, disappeared at the same time.[496] In the month before the attacks, like Adão Mendonça (see par. 480 below), Pedro Lemos had been in Liquiçá attending an ABRI-run indoctrination course for former Fretilin/Falintil leaders and commanders, which seems to have ended after the 10 June attacks.[497]

488. Adão Mendonça, the former Fretilin Secretary for Aileu District (see Table 18: Persons reported to have been executed or "disappeared" after the 10 June attacks above), was arrested at his house in Lahane (East Dili) by four soldiers from the Becora Koramil and taken to the Dili Kodim. He never returned.[498]

489. Four former Falintil commanders – Joaquim Soares, Mário do Carmo, Bernardo Soares and Joaquim Assis – who had reportedly surrendered in September 1979, were arrested in Hera and told that they were going on a carpentry course at the sub-district office. Only one of them, Bernardo Soares, ever came home.[499]

490. Adriano dos Santos had recently moved to Dili from Tutuala (Lautém) where he had been actively involved in the clandestine movement. He was living with his brother in Colmera at the time of the attacks. On 11 June he was arrested by Special Forces troops and taken to their headquarters nearby. After having visited him regularly at the Kopassandha headquarters, his brother was told one day that Adriano was no longer there. He has never discovered what happened to him. According to another source, he was taken to the Comarca (Balide) and disappeared from there.[500]

491. However, whether or not someone disappeared or was executed, was largely arbitrary. All four of the alleged Falintil commanders who led the attacks were captured, but only one, Pedro Manek, was executed or disappeared. Clandestine leaders who were alleged to have masterminded the attacks, including Mariano Bonaparte Soares and David Ximenes, survived. Yet, among the hundreds of people who were arrested were three brothers from Ossu, 20-year-old Antonio, 18-year-old Sismundo and 16-year-old Edmundo, all of whom disappeared from the Comarca.[501]

492. As in earlier times, if approached by friends or relatives, authorities would say that the victim had "gone to school" or had become a TBO. The wife of Adão Mendonça told the Commission:

> *When I went to the house of the village head to ask about the whereabouts of my husband, he said to me: "Don't worry about him. The bapaks have sent many of them to school and they haven't come back yet. Let's just wait." To this moment I don't know for sure where my husband has gone. He's disappeared for good.

493. Members of the security apparatus carried out disappearances and executions in many different parts of Dili. Several hundred of those arrested were brought to the Mes Korem (later the Kartika Sari nursing home) in Mandarin. The Commission has received the names of nine people who were reportedly killed or disappeared from there. Those who survived were either released, sent to Ataúro or transferred to the Comarca (Balide), where another 48 are reported to have either disappeared or died from ill-treatment, including severe beatings and lack of food.†

494. By 16 June 1980, when David Ximenes was taken there, about 200 people were being held in the Mes Korem.[502] Interrogations at the Mes Korem, routinely involving severe and sometimes fatal torture, were reported to have been conducted by a Special Forces (Kopassandha) commander named M284, another Special Forces officer called M285, and officers from the Korem and Kodim intelligence sections, M286, M287, and M288.[503] David Ximenes says that his first interrogation after arriving at the Mes Korem, during which he was not tortured, was conducted by the Korem commander, Colonel Adolf Sahala Radjagukguk. Methods of torture used against detainees included electric

* CAVR Interview with Maria de Fatima Martins, Seloi Malere, Aileu, undated; for other examples of disappeared people being "sent to school" after the 10 June attacks, see HRVD Statement 06961; and CAVR Community Profile, Liurai Village, Aileu Town Sub-district, Aileu District; HRVD Statement 00949 cites the case of a disappeared person who was said to have become a TBO.

† Statements received by the Commission also report about detainees being held in the Dili Kodim before being transferred to the Mes Korem or disappearing [HRVD Statements 00949, 08275 and 08108].

shocks to the genitals and other forms of sexual torture, submersion in water tanks, and strangling (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment). Jordão Fernandes is reported to have been strangled to death in front of other prisoners.[504] Luis Mau Metan is reported to have died as a result of being submerged in a water tank.[505]

495. Throughout late June, July and August detainees were being transferred from the Mes Korem to the Comarca, although newly arrested suspects were being taken to the Mes Korem as late as November. Once there many of them were reportedly tortured, again sometimes fatally.* By late August about 200 detainees arrested in connection with the June attacks were held in Block 2, while others were held in the "Maubutar" and isolation cells.[506] Over this period groups of detainees were taken out of the Comarca in groups at night and disappeared.[507] At least nine others were either beaten to death or died from a combination of forms of ill-treatment, including beatings and deprivation of food.[508] Overcrowded cells and inadequate provision of food were acute problems. The new detainees were reportedly fed only once a day at best: some reported not being fed at all, resulting in deaths from hunger.[509] The increased prisoner population combined with a fixed allocation of food for the prison meant that prisoners who had been in detention before 10 June also complained of cutbacks in their food.[510]

496. Maria Immaculada, a young woman who belonged to a clandestine cell, was detained on 12 June 1980. After she was interrogated and tortured at the Mes Korem, she was transferred to the Comarca in Balide where she witnessed other prisoners being taken out of the prison at night and disappearing:

> They would take people out after 10 o'clock at night. Two or three vehicles would be waiting outside the Comarca. The lights would go off. The detainees they would take out would have their mouths covered and be handcuffed. Then they would be taken away in the vehicles. Then the lights would come on again. They might take detainees out like that two or three times a night. Among people I knew who were taken out in this way were Afonso Moniz, João Barreto, José da Sousa, who had been in the military police, and the son of a nurse called Tito who died. His three brothers, Antonio, Xismundo, and Edmundo, also disappeared till this day.[511]

497. The Commission did not generally receive corroborated information about the place of execution of those who disappeared. Deponents reported that victims were taken to Areia Branca to the east of Dili, Tacitolu to the west of Dili, Metinaro, and Hera. One said that he had been taken from detention in the Dili Kodim to Tacitolu where he expected to be executed. He was not in fact executed, for reasons that are unclear.[512]

498. However, the Commission believes there is strong evidence that many of those who disappeared were executed at sites in Hera. Large numbers of people were taken to Hera after the 10 June attacks. They were held there for up to 40 days during which they were required to perform forced labour. Most of them appear to have survived.[513] One of them told the Commission that he was taken to Fatuahi where he saw a truckload of people with their mouths sealed. He assigned his brother, a now deceased former Falintil commander, to spy on the executions taking place there. The brother reported back that executions were being carried out at Besukaer, Fatu Banko, and Rikalai Mate.[514] The Commission was told that the bodies of eight people who were arrested in Toko Baru were reportedly disposed of in Fatu Banko (see par. 504 below).

* HRVD Statement 00949 and eight other persons cited in "En Nome de Presos de 10/6/80", CRRN Communiqué, 13 July 1983.

499. People living in areas, such as Dare and Becora, near the sites of the attacks, were particularly liable to be targeted by the security forces deployed in their area.

500. In a letter to Archbishop Leo Soekoto of Jakarta, written on 12 July 1980, the Apostolic Administrator of Dili, Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes, described five of the killings that occurred in Dare in the aftermath of the 10 June attacks:

> Friday 13/6/80: Norberto [Fernandes] surrendered to the military command (Korem) escorted by the Bishop of Dili Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes, Father Ricardo, Vicar General of the Diocese of Dili, and Father J Falgueiras SJ, Rector of the Seminary of Our Lady of Fatima [in Dare]. Monsignor Martinho urged one of the commanders to protect Norberto, asking that he should not be beaten or killed. The commander agreed to this request and promised not to ill-treat Norberto.
>
> A few days later Norberto was taken to Dare. There, in the hall of the Seminary…members of Hansip beat and tortured him until he was near death…
>
> Saturday 21/6/1980: Norberto was put to death and his body thrown into a ravine to the north of the Seminary of Our Lady of Fatima.
>
> Wednesday 2/7/1980: Anastacio [Sarmento] was brutally ill-treated in the yard of the Dare seminary. He was tied to a volleyball post and beaten before a large crowd of people. After that he was taken to a spot in the Seminary garden to be killed. There a grave had been dug for him because, before his public beating, the Hansip had ordered local people to dig a hole.
>
> Thursday 3/7/1980 José Manuel Martins (a relative of Anastacio), Maria Barreto (wife of José Manuel Martins) and Agustinho (a relative of hers) were murdered in Dare Seminary after undergoing severe torture from local Hansip.[515]

501. Both Norberto Fernandes and Anastacio Sarmento were reportedly killed by Hansip under the command of M289.[516] Two other people, Mau Ranik and Dau Molik Inan, were reportedly killed by Hansip in Dare.[517]

502. Others from Dare were reportedly taken to the Mes Korem and then to the Comarca from where they disappeared. They included: Gaspar José Soares Guterres, Adriano Mesquita, Marcos Soares, Raimundo Fatima, and Tomás Soares.[518]

503. Others near the scene of the attacks also came under suspicion and some of them disappeared. In the early morning of 10 June, when the attack took place, three brothers, Agusto Monteiro, Alberto Monteiro and Francisco Restoparte, were on compulsory guard duty at the post in Fatuloda (Balibar, East Dili). While on guard they heard gunfire, but did not know where it was coming from or the reason for it. The next morning four Hansip and two ABRI, all fully armed, came to their house and immediately started beating up Agusto and Alberto. The two were bound and tied to a tree. When their sister, Amelia, tried to intervene, she was stabbed and threatened with being shot. Augusto and Alberto were then taken away and disappeared. A few days later Francisco was arrested and he too disappeared.[519] Others arrested in Balibar by the same Hansip unit included Antonio Xavier, Martinho Saldanha and Domingos Caldeiras. They too disappeared.[520]

504. Battalion 744 troops arrested many people living in the area of the Company B barracks in Becora. Several of those taken into the custody of Battalion 744 were reportedly executed or disappeared. They included a group of eight men from Aiturilaran and Mota Ulun – Vidal Soares, Domingos Soares, Bere Mali, Bere Mali Soares, Gaspar Araújo, Maurais, Bere Loek, and Gaspar – who were hiding in a house in Toko Baru (Culuhun) and were arrested by troops of Battalion 744 on 12 June, and disappeared. The Battalion 744 soldiers killed them in Becora and disposed of their bodies in Fatu Banko, according to one deponent, who was given this information by a member of Battalion 744.[521] It also mobilised troops from its headquarters in Taibessi, who also arrested people who later disappeared. In Suhu-Rama (Inur Fuik, Nain Feto, East Dili) troops from the battalion arrested about 40 people, among whom at least five disappeared.[*] [522] Battalion 744 also set up a post in a chapel in Balibar where it also detained people after 10 June. One of them was Mateus Soares who disappeared after being taken from his home in Fatuloda to the chapel in Balibar.[523]

505. Local Koramils also carried out arrests. The Becora Koramil was particularly active. Some of those it arrested subsequently disappeared or died under torture.[†]

September 1981: Executions at Aitana during the Fence of Legs Operation

506. Between June and September 1981, the Indonesian military forcibly recruited tens of thousands of East Timorese civilians to participate in a massive military operation to search out and destroy the remaining armed resistance in the mountains. The operation was officially dubbed Operation Security (Operasi Keamanan), but is known to most East Timorese as the Kikis Operation (Operasi Kikis), the Fence of Legs Operation (Pagar Betis) or the Aitana Movement (Gerakan Aitana) (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict).

* The five reported to have disappeared were: Domingos de Fatima de Carvalho (reported to have disappeared from the Mes Korem) and Jeronimo, José da Sousa, Maubuti, and Tomás (all reportedly disappeared from the Comarca) [CAVR Community Profile, Suhu-Rama, Inuk Fuik, Nain Feto Sub-district, East Dili; and "En Nome de Presos de 10 Junho 1980", CRRN Communiqué, 13 July 1983].

† HRVD Statements 05666, 06983 and 08037. The Comoro Koramil is also reported to have arrested a person who disappeared [HRVD Statement 05020].

507. Some witnesses told the Commission that the group they were with did not engage in armed conflict with Falintil, did not make any arrests and did not kill anyone during the entire operation. Nevertheless, the Commission received information about several fatal violations during the operation. Anselmo Fernandes Xavier, for example, told the Commission that he was with a group of "Partisans" that arrested and immediately executed seven individuals near Cacavem in the sub-district of Lospalos (Lautém).[524] Abilio Quintão Pinto told the Commission that a Falintil member attacked his group at night, killing four ABRI members before being shot to death.[525] Another informant told the Commission that the soldiers he was with captured and killed two civilians in Uato Carbau (Viqueque).[526] The Commission also heard the testimony of Domingos Guterres who was forcibly recruited in the Aitana operation. He witnessed the arrest and execution of an old man, and saw a corpse that was beheaded, somewhere during their march to Aitana.[527] Another witness told the Commission about the killing of a female school teacher, by members of Battalion 744, who then took away her two children. Their whereabouts are unknown.[528] Several informants reported that when they reached Aitana they saw two persons being captured, bound and killed.[529] One informant told the Commission that he saw three corpses while walking home from Aitana to Ossu.[530]

508. Operasi Kikis reached its culmination in September 1981 when military units and TBOs, including members of Battalions 321, 744, 745, Hansip and Indonesian marine units, converged on the region around Mount Aitana on the rugged border between the Districts of Viqueque and Manatuto. A large number of Fretilin and Falintil leaders and members had gathered in the area the previous May together with family members and other civilians to hold a conference at Maubai.[531] During its march from Laleia in Manatuto towards the north side of Mount Aitana, Battalion 744, and possibly Battalion 745,[532] accompanied by Indonesian marines, engaged Falintil near the Waidada River, located just below Mount Aitana and Mount Santo António. Nearby, Fretilin/Falintil had recently concluded its national conference at Maubai. By 17 September only Fera Lafaek's Company 4 remained in the area of Aitana with a large number of civilians. According to accounts received by the Commission, a large number of civilians, including women and children, were killed when Battalion 744 reached the Aitana region and engaged armed Resistance fighters over a period of several days.* In addition, the Commission was told that and at least 20 of them were executed near Waidada River by members of Battalion 744.[533] The Commission also received testimony suggesting that more than 100 people, including women and children, were subsequently killed on the slopes of Mount Aitana and Mount San António, either by being shot or being burned to death in the grassland to which ABRI had set fire. After the surrender or capture of the survivors another 25 people, all of them reportedly wounded, by the Waidada River, and five others were reportedly killed at the Kotis headquarters in Waidada.[534]

* CAVR Interview with José de Jesus dos Santos, Dili, 28 June 2004. He says that the engagement took place between 1 and 10 September.

Witnesses to the mass killing around Mount Aitana, September 1981

Sebastião da Cunha, a Hansip member who participated in the Fence of Legs Operation, told the Commission about the massacre in Aitana:

Operation Fence of Legs was held in 1981. All Hansip members were obliged to participate in the operation. For two or three days people were forcibly taken to participate in this operation…My fellow members of Hansip on duty in Laleia were transported with me to Manatuto and we stayed there for two days. From Manatuto we were brought to Remexio near Aileu. After three days in Remexio, Battalion 744 came…and divided us into groups to carry out the Fence of Legs Operation. Two Hansip members were assigned to each group, joined with ABRI and other people…Then we started advancing from Remexio in the direction of Cribas. We operated each day, moving east, resting only at night…

After several days, we reached Mount Betuto near Aitana. Mount Coibere is located between Mount Betuto and Aitana. We rested there for a while, but not long afterwards we heard the sound of gunfire. It seems there was armed contact between Falintil and ABRI in Oedada. We were ordered to remain behind with the people. As Hansip members we couldn't do anything. The armed contact began at 8.00am and lasted until late in the afternoon. ABRI broke through because they were far more powerful than us. Lots of Falintil members were shot dead on the spot. Battalion 744 and Marines from Barique advanced....

Then ABRI called members of Hansip and civilians to go down to Waidada River. We saw lots of civilians had been killed, including men, women and children. We couldn't count the number of people who had been killed… We were ordered to stop at that place and prepare sleeping places.

The next day, ABRI launched another operation in the area and killed many of the civilians who had survived. Among these victims there was a tall white man who had already been buried by the locals. But ABRI ordered me and some others to exhume the body and take it to Kotis at the Waidada River because they thought this man was Xanana Gusmão. When we arrived at the Kotis headquarters, we saw lots of bodies without heads on the floor, in several lines. I couldn't count them. Many civilians who had survived were summoned to the headquarters. They said that these people would be put in a helicopter, but this didn't happen. They were shot dead with a machine gun and noone survived. I was standing quite far away but I could see how they were shot. There were more than 20 people. The people who were killed in Waidada were from several places.

People who were wounded during the attack were not given any medical treatment, but instead they were killed in the headquarters…

We stayed for three days in Waidada. We couldn't eat or drink because the spring water in the area was full of human blood from those who had been killed by ABRI. After that we went toward a place called Santo António near Aitana and Laline. We stayed in Aitana for a week. Many civilians were also killed in Aitana. I couldn't count them. I saw five civilians brought to Kotis and then killed…the killings did not only take place in Waidada, but also in the surrounding area. I would estimate the total killings at more than a hundred. The killings started from Santo António, then in Waidada, in Aitana, and finally in Fatuk-Kado.[535]

Anacleto Ximenes was only about ten years old when he witnessed this mass killing. He was among the hundreds of civilians with Fretilin/ Falintil in Mount Aitana:

In the morning we heard gun shots and we realised that we were encircled. Not long after that, we were attacked, we were shot at. At that time Indonesian military was mixed with civilians. The civilians were placed in the front line and at the same time were ordered to beat drums all along the road. We were many people at that time, including women and children. They [ABRI] screamed while they shot at us, but we could do nothing to defend ourselves. I tried to run to the river, but ABRI started shooting at others in the river and lots of them died…I was with a friend who was my age and a Falintil soldier, but both of them were hit by bullets and died…I was still chased and shot at. I somersaulted into a small river. There was lots of thick grass, and I hid in the grass…

I was still hiding in the grass when I heard the pregnant wife of commander Maukalo run and collapse under a eucalyptus tree. She had been shot in her belly…and her unborn baby was also hit. I watched this from [my hiding place] in the grass, and I was so scared.

They [ABRI] then shouted out "Burn the grass! There are some people hiding in the grass!" I thought the fire would flare up in a minute. Rather than be burned like a snake, I preferred to get up and be shot. Lots of soldiers were standing and watching for us to come out. Before I came out, I took four boxes of bullets and a knife out of my bag. Then I came out and stood still with my hands in the air and said: "I surrender, Sir."

I saw and I know that there were 160 people [killed]. The 160 were not only Falintil soldiers, but also women and children. We took the bodies of the victims and gathered them at Waidada River. We were ordered to carry the bodies on our shoulders and bring them to the Waidada River. They then took photos of the dead bodies. There were 25 people who had been captured, all of them wounded. The got medical treatment and were held by the military. I was under the control of Iswanto, the Commander of Battalion 745. These 25 people were shot dead in that place. I saw with my own eyes they were ordered to form in lines of four and were shot.[536]

509. The Commission received testimonies about several other unlawful killings and disappearances that occurred during 1981-82. In 1981 members of Battalion 521 arrested and executed five civilians in Bualale, Baucau District.[537] In the same year, in Lautém, 13 people were sent to the island of Jaco where they were executed. They comprised two groups of six men, one from Luro, of whom only Mateus, João Reis, José Reis and Adelino Moreira were identified by name, and a second from Tutuala, including Carlos, Coroso, Cristovão, Reimalai, Pailuan and Gilberto, and one individual called Macario Ximenes from Maluro (Lore I, Lospalos).[538]

510. In 1982, in Fuiloro (Lospalos, Lautém) a group of men and women were arrested by Hansip, detained and tortured at the Kodim Lospalos; two of these men were killed and another disappeared.[539] In May of that year, members of Battalion 745 killed a pregnant woman who was searching for tubers in the forest in Wairoke (Luro, Lautém).[540] In June, two more civilians, also searching for tubers, were killed by Indonesian troops in the sub-district of Moro.[541] In Uato Carbau (Viqueque) the sub-district administrator (camat) ordered local Hansip members to arrest 12 individuals. These men were beaten and two died while in detention.[542]

August–December 1982: Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances after Falintil attacks in the area of Mount Kablaki

511. In late 1982, in the aftermath of Falintil attacks on Indonesian security forces in the area around Mount Kablaki (in Ainaro and Manufahi Districts) on August 20,[*] Indonesian military personnel were responsible for the murder and disappearance of many civilians in Ainaro District.[543] When Indonesian military units from Maubisse and Ainaro converged on Dare and Mau Chiga (Ainaro) and Rotuto (Manufahi), resistance fighters and a large proportion of the local population fled to Mount Kablaki. Many of those remaining were detained at the Kodim in Ainaro. After Mau Chiga was razed in a retaliatory action by the military, several hundred people were relocated to the island of Ataúro, leaving the village nearly empty (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).[544] In the weeks and months after the attack, Indonesian military personnel, in particular those from Kodim Ainaro, Koramil Dare and the 5th Combat Engineering Battalion (Zipur 5), made many arrests, resorted to torture and rape during interrogations, burned hundreds of houses to the ground, and killed civilians, sometimes in public (see Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations; Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment; Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence).

* Attacks were conducted by Falintil and villagers from Mau Chiga, Rotuto who targeted the Koramil in Dare, the Koramil and Kapolsek in Hato Builico (Ainaro) and the Hansip posts in Aitutu, Raimerhei and Rotutu (Manufahi).

512. The Commission received many accounts of unlawful killings during this period. According to several accounts, the Commander or Deputy Commander of Battalion Zipur 5 publicly executed a man by cutting off his head with an axe, forced members of his own battalion to eat parts of the head, and displayed pictures of the severed head to the local population.[545] A man suspected of having supplied food to Falintil was arrested by Hansip and held at the Koramil in Dare. After one or two months of detention, he was taken to a public place near the Koramil headquarters, stripped naked and questioned in public in the presence of Hansip, Koramil and Zipur 5 personnel. With each question, a soldier chopped at his fingers, hands, arms, cheeks and forehead. A local villager was then reportedly forced to kill him, and his hands were then hung from a tree, which the people were afraid to remove.[546] Other reports of executions received by the Commission include that of a man who had been detained at the Koramil in Dare being lashed onto a motor bike and burned alive, and of another man "tied up like Jesus" and shot at the elementary school in Dare.[547] The resistance organisation, the CRRN, also reported that two members of the armed Resistance were captured or surrendered between 22 and 24 August, and were tortured and executed at the Koramil in Ainaro.[548]

513. In retaliation for the August attack, in the neighbouring village of Rotuto (Manufahi), members of the Indonesian military lined up civilians and threatened to kill them. Alberto Alves told the Commission:

> In 1982, the ceasefire between Falintil and ABRI and Hansip ended in Rotuto. After Falintil returned to the jungle, Battalion 745 and Hansip ordered us to line up, women and children in one line, men in a separate line., After we lined up, Battalion 745 wanted to shoot us. However, because a member of the Battalion from Bobonaro objected, the killing was halted.[549]

514. ABRI searched for civilians who had fled, killing some in the process. Laurinda dos Santos recalled:

> I ran away with 95 civilians to Kablaki on the Same side of the mountain. ABRI chased after us and killed my friend Domingos Lobato. Then they arrested me and the 95 other civilians.[550]

515. Another deponent told the Commission that an East Timorese Hansip who was operating with Indonesian troops accidentally shot an Indonesian soldier and was immediately executed.[551] Other individuals were executed while under detention in Dare.

> In the (Battalion) 321 Dare Post, I saw Hansip M290 and members of Battalion 321 hit my friend Alberto. I saw M290 strike Alberto in the chest with his weapon, then his forehead, hands and feet until he died. M290,

M291 and M302 dug a hole to bury Alberto but suddenly Alberto revived and made to run away. Hansip M291 caught him… M290 took a machete and beheaded him, then Hansip Orlando cut his ten fingers off for M291 to cook and forced us to take them to the ABRI Post in Dare..[552]

516. According to another report, one man was doused with kerosene and set on fire by a soldier from Battalion 321.[553] Other individuals were taken by Indonesian security forces, including members of the Special Forces (Kopassandha) and Hansip, to Builico and executed at a location commonly referred to as Jakarta 2.[554]

Jakarta 2: A site of execution

In the weeks after the Falintil attack on Mau Chiga many civilians suspected of sympathising with the Resistance were detained at the Kodim in Ainaro and executed at Builico, a cliff about 300 metres high, south of the town of Ainaro, named Jakarta 2 by the Indonesian military.* The Commission received accounts from Mau Chiga, Hato Builico and Dare of people being executed and having their bodies thrown over the cliff at Jakarta 2, sometimes after being burned alive. According to one account, a child from the school in Dare was wrapped in a plastic bag, doused with petrol and set on fire before being thrown over the precipice at Jakarta 2.[555] In another account, four people were detained at the Kodim in Ainaro and subsequently taken to Jakarta 2, where three of them - one from Zumalai and two from Dare - were executed.[556] According to testimony given to the Commission, detainees held in Ainaro were typically tied up and taken to the cliff in the middle of the night where they were stabbed and thrown off the cliff.

At 1.00am the detainees were put into sacks, tied up tight and taken in a blue-coloured Kijang vehicle to the edge of the road; the sacks were opene; they were ordered to stand up and were stabbed with knives… These people were thrown from the steep cliff.[557]

The Commission also received accounts about the execution of villagers from Mulo, Nunumogue and Mau Chiga at Jakarta 2 shortly after the August attack. For one woman during this time, the only alternative to death at Jakarta 2 was rape and sexual slavery.[558]

* Among those detained at the Kodim in Ainaro and killed at Builico in the aftermath of the August 1982 attack were Ouei-Beri, Adelina Barbosa (female), Mateus Jeronimo, Leto-Mali, Cirilio Alves, Gabriel, Lorenço, Daniel de Araújo, Oscar Araújo, Antonio Mau Kura [see Appendix G, CAVR Women's Research Team, Women and Conflict, April 1974-October 1999, February 2004].

In addition to extra-judicial executions at Jakarta 2, a large number of people in Ainaro disappeared during this period. According to testimony given to the Commission, throughout the 1980s and 1990s Indonesian military personnel and civilian government officials continued to threaten people with the prospect of being "taken to Jakarta". The Commission received information suggesting that the TNI may have disposed of the body of at least one victim of violence in September 1999 by throwing the corpse over the precipice at Jakarta 2:

On 21 September 1999, a militia/TNI member, M304 and four others forced people to go to Atambua. They shot at the chief of the sub-village of Lebulau, Liquiçá, but missed. They ordered a man named Felix de Aldoreida to climb a flagpole. They shot him until his intestines spilled out and they threw a sword at him. He fell down. They got rid of his body by tossing it over Jakarta 2.[559]

517. Testimonies received by the Commission in connection with the Mau Chiga attacks and military reprisals report the unlawful killing of about 20 males. The Commission also received a list that identifies 14 Falintil members and 18 civilians who were reportedly killed or disappeared in relation to the incident.[560] In all, the Commission received reports that the following civilians were either killed or disappeared:

Table 19: Civilians killed or disappeared from Ainaro and Manufahi, 1982, as reported to the CAVR*

Name	Date	Location	Age	Description	Sources
Buimali	c. 20 Aug 1982	Mau Chiga	-	Shot	07231
João Tilman	20 Aug 1982	Mau Chiga	32	Beheaded	07191, 07269
Ernesto	Aug 1982	Kodim Ainaro	-	Shot	07191, 07269
Domingos Lobato	1982	Kablaki	-	Shot	07241
Gebo Antonio José	1982	Kablaki	-	Disappeared	09018
Trindade	1982	Kablaki	-	Beheaded	04923
Kusia	1982	Daisua	-	Beheaded	04923, Community Profile (CP) Mau Chiga
Alarico	1982	Daisua	25	Shot	List; CP Mau Chiga

* HRVD Statements 07177; 07186; 07204; 0723; 07231; 07241; 07242; 07253; 07255; 07256; 07258; 07191; 07269; 04923; 06257; 09018; List of victims at Mau Chiga, 1982, Submission to CAVR from Abilio dos Santos Belo, 3 June 2003.

Name	Date	Location	Age	Description	Sources
Mau-Sur	1982	Daisua	50	Beheaded	List; CP Mau Chiga
Mateus	1982	Daisua	55	Beheaded	List; CP Mau Chiga
Manuel Berelau	1982	Daisua	-	Killed	CP Mau Chiga
Verdial Lopes	1982	Daisua	-	Killed	CP Mau Chiga
Armando	1982	Nunomogue	-	Shot	07242; CP Nunomogue
Paulino	1982	Nunomogue	-	Shot	07255
Alberto	1982	Dare	-	Beheaded?	07258, 07253
Tomás Tilman	1982	Dare	-	Burned alive	Women's Research Team
Quei-Bere	1982	Dare	35	Executed	List; CP Dare
Clementino Baloc	1982	Casa	-	Killed	06257
Cristina Lawa	1982	Casa	-	Killed	06257
Antonio Mau-Kura	1982	Jakarta 2	-	Burned to death	List, 07256
Beremali	1982	Jakarta 2	-	Executed	04923
Berleki	1982	Jakarta 2	-	Executed	04923, 07204
Besimau	1982	Jakarta 2	-	Executed	04923
Mau Felix	1982	Jakarta 2	-	Executed	04923
Adelina Barbosa	1982	Jakarta 2	25	Executed	List
Mateus Jeronimo	1982	Jakarta 2	35	Executed	List
Leto Mali	1982	Jakarta 2	40	Executed	List
Daniel de Araújo	1982	Jakarta 2	50	Executed	List
Oscar Araújo	1982	Jakarta 2	25	Burned to death	List; CP Nunomogue
Cirilio Alves	1982	Jakarta 2	39	Executed	List, CP Dare
Lourenço Soares	1982	Jakarta 2	39	Executed	List, 07186
Gabriel da Costa	1982	Jakarta 2	41	Executed	List, 07177
Orlando Tilman	1982	Lisuati	50	Shot	List
Rodolfo Tilman	1982	Lisuati Balisa	49	Shot	List
Valente	1982	Hatuquero	35	Shot	List
Bere Mau	1982	Rotuto	45	Shot	List

518. According to reports received by the Commission, the unlawful killing of pro-independence supporters, including public executions and killings in detention, continued well after the 1982 attacks. For instance, the Commission received reports that in 1983 an East Timorese police officer was tied to the back of a vehicle and driven around the city for an entire day, after which his body was burned in front of the market in Ainaro.[561] The Commission also learned that four men suspected of being members of the clandestine movement – Moises Araújo, Lourenço Araújo, João Xavier and Oscar – were detained and held in custody for several weeks,[562] most likely by officers of Chandraca 11, a Special Forces unit. The men were executed by officers in Hatu-Udo some time between May and July 1984 and their bodies were subsequently buried in Hatu-Udo.[563]

August–October 1983: Killings in Viqueque after the Kraras incident

Violations before the Kraras uprising

519. From 1976 until 1978-79, most of the residents of Bibileo lived in the mountains outside of Indonesian control. Those who surrendered or were captured in 1978-79 were relocated to the town of Viqueque where they lived for several years. In 1981 they were relocated to a flat plain north of the Viqueque-Luca Road, but well south of Bibileo, which is further north in the mountains. This new settlement was called Kraras.

520. The Commission received reports of human rights violations in the Kraras region in 1982 and early 1983. ABRI began to suspect that the local Ratih were working clandestinely for the Resistance and in late 1982, 80 of them were sent to Tacitolu (Dili) where they were supervised by members of Battalion 744 who "punished" them. Around the same time two people from Kraras – Loi Rubik and Susukai – were killed because they were suspected of being "two-headed"; Loi Rubik was a Ratih.[564]

521. A series of meetings between the Indonesian military and Fretilin/Falintil led in late March 1983 to a ceasefire agreement, resulting in a marked decrease in hostilities and relative freedom of movement for both Resistance fighters and civilians (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Resistance). During the ceasefire, Resistance fighters operating in the mountains above Viqueque met with the Indonesian military and also held flag-raising ceremonies attended by members of the local Hansip forces and civilians from Bibileo/Kraras.

522. Nevertheless, tensions between the Indonesian military and the local people persisted. There are also reports of conflict between East Timorese members of Hansip and the Indonesian military. At the time of the ceasefire, the Indonesian military was in the process of reorganising the various civil defence forces in Timor-Leste. This reorganisation included downgrading some civil defence personnel from Hansip, who were armed and paid, to civilian defence Ratih (Rakyat Terlatih, "trained people"), who were unarmed and did not receive a regular salary. The community of Bibileo told the Commission that the Ratih had refused to hand in their weapons after a detachment of the Airborne Battalion 100 had shot and killed four local people.[565] Several sources also told the Commission that in July 1983 Indonesian soldiers sexually harassed local women, including the wife of an East Timorese Ratih member.[566]

Uprisings in Viqueque

523. On 8 August 1983, Falintil forces and local Ratih members under the command of Virgilio dos Anjos (Ular) staged a joint attack on an Indonesian military post in Kraras. Fourteen Indonesian soldiers from the 9th Combat Engineering Battalion (Zipur 9) were killed; one or two escaped alive. The Ratih members fled, together with other clandestine activists from the village, into the mountains to join Fretilin. Soon thereafter hundreds of villagers from Kraras and neighbouring aldeias also fled into the forest. A day later another group of Ratih in the village of Buanurak (Ossu, Viqueque), led by Domingos Raul (Falur) also defected from the Indonesian security forces and joined Fretilin/Falintil.[567]

524. The Commission received reports about four other Falintil attacks in Viqueque District in the first month after the Kraras attack. In Lacluta, Falintil reportedly attacked an Indonesian post, killing three East Timorese. On 10 August 1983, Falintil engaged in a fire-fight with troops from Battalion 745 in Nahareka, during which an East Timorese man was wounded and subsequently executed by Indonesian forces. On 19 August 1983, Falintil forces reportedly staged an attack in Bahatata (Uato Carbau) killing one civilian. And on 6 September, Falintil attacked Indonesian troops at a place called Sukar Oan in the village of Caraubalau, but there were no casualties.[568]

Indonesian retaliation in the vicinity of Kraras

525. On 7 September 1983, one day after the Falintil attack in Caraubalau, Indonesian troops entered the nearly empty village of Kraras and burned most of the houses. The Commission was told that that 4-5 people who had stayed behind in the village, including an old woman, were killed in this attack. The bodies of several of those killed were allegedly left in their houses, which were then burned.[569] In the following weeks Indonesian soldiers conducted patrols throughout the neighbouring mountains and forced those who had fled to return to the villages of Kraras and Buikaren, and to the town of Viqueque. The Commission received reports that a number of individuals were executed during these operations, including a 15-year-old boy on or about 12 September, and three other individuals on 15 September.[570] During this time a large number of people were also detained and tortured, many at Olobai, where a company of Battalion 745 was based.

Massacre at Caraubalau

Table 20: Individuals killed in the Kraras area, September 1983, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Joaquim Amaral	7 Sept. 1983	Kraras	-		Shot/burned?
Funu Lequi	7 Sept. 1983	Kraras	-		Shot/burned
Ana Maria	7 Sept. 1983	Kraras	-		Shot/burned
Namo Funuk	7 Sept. 1983	Kraras	80		Shot/burned
Domingos Gomes	12 Sept. 1983	Uma Ki'ik	~15		Shot

Euclides da Costa S.	15 Sept. 1983	Haiboho	-		Shot
Wailiba	15 Sept. 1983	Haiboho	-		Shot
Nahamodo	15 Sept. 1983	Olobai	-	Ratih	Shot

526. The Commission received reports of a mass killing that occurred in the village of Caraubalau on 16 September 1983.* According to one account, a large number of villagers from Kraras who had initially fled to Bibileo were captured by Indonesian soldiers and taken to Viqueque, where they were housed in a school building in Beloi. On the morning of 16 September, Indonesian soldiers and Hansip reportedly took at least 18 of them, including women and children, to the village of Caraubalau. The villagers were allegedly handed over to Indonesian soldiers from a different unit, then taken to a location called Welamo where they were told to stand in a hole created by a landslide and executed.[571] An eyewitness told UN investigators in later years:

> Three Hansip led the way and other military personnel surrounded the group of people so no one could escape… We started to walk at around 3.00pm and arrived at the location on the mountain at approximately 4.00pm…We sat down and again military personnel surrounded us to avoid any escapes…Then more Indonesian soldiers arrived…When they arrived we were given the order to stand up. I was standing, along with everyone else, facing the valley. Then we were told to walk. I took one step and the Indonesian soldiers opened fire on us. I fell to the ground, along with my brother. People who had been shot fell on top of me. The Indonesian soldiers shot everyone in the back. Then the gunfire ceased and the soldiers were having a rest and a cigarette. One member of the Indonesian army told Jerónimo [a Hansip commander] to speak in his language, Tetum, and tell anyone who was still alive…to stand up. No one answered this command. Then the soldiers opened fire again, on the bodies lying there. Then I heard two small children, one girl and one boy, [who were] about 1-2 years old. When the soldiers fired they were not hit. Then Jerónimo…went over to the two babies and took a knife and stabbed them to death. Then the Indonesian [soldiers] and Hansip took a break and had another cigarette.[572]

527. Informants provided different figures for the number of victims, ranging from a low of 18 to a high of 54.† The Commission has compiled the following list of victims executed at Caraubalau:

* Other informants describe a massacre at "Casese," but this appears to be the Caraubalau incident. See CAVR Interview CAVR José Gomes, Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque, 8 December 2003, who said that 50 people were killed on 15–16 September.

† This account is based on the Serious Crimes Unit interview with José da Costa Carvalho; see also CAVR Interview with Jeronimo da Costa Amaral, Viqueque, 10 March 2004, who said there were 18 victims; Filomena de Jesus Sousa, Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque, 10 March 2004, who said there were 26 victims; and Silvino das Dores Soares, Viqueque, 10 March 2004, who said there were 54 victims.

Table 21: Civilians executed at Caraubalau, Viqueque, 16 September 1983, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Age	Gender	Name	Age	Gender
Basi Nono	56	Male	Kai Uai	32	-
Bere Nahak	33	Male	Kena Kaik	3	Female
Bere Lirik	21	Male	Kena Liri	24	Female
Bosi Dasi	48	Male	Kena Liri	35	Female
Bosi Naha	16	Male	Lau Loi	35	Female
Bui Nahak	7	Female	Labu Olo	36	Female
Builai	50	Female	Leki Labu	61	Male
Builoi	29	Female	Leki Mono	48	Male
Dare Modo	-	Female	Leki Uai	2	Male
Dasi Leki	46	Female	Liba Bosi	21	Female
Child of Dasi Leki	-	-	Loi Uai	1	Male
Child of Dasi Leki	-	-	Madalena A. Sousa	31	Female
Dasi Rubik	35	Female	Martinha Amaral	27	Female
Filomena Amaral	27	Female	Martinha Tilman	26	Female
Francisca	19	Female	Naha Bosi	36	Male
Hae Boe	17	-	Naha Lirik	27	Male
Hare Kaik	28	Female	Olo Berek	61	Male
Hari Lequi	25	Female	Olo Bosi	4	Male
Hare Loi	46	Female	Olo Lohi	7
Hare Modo	40	Female	Pai Rubik	31	Male
Hia Lequi	23	-	Sahe Mau	49	Female
José Soares	17	Male	Sahe Uai	40	Female
Kai Bosi	6	Male	Siba Labu	49	Female
Kai Ho'o	11	Male	Tali Bai	25	Female
Kai Ho'o	51	Male	Tali Bosi	16	Male
Kai Mui	14	Male	Tali Dasi	24	Female
Kai Rubik	28	Male	Tali Deki	34	Female
			Wono Kai	3	Male

Massacre at Tahu Bein

528. On 17 September 1983, Indonesian military personnel approached a large group of refugees from Kraras who had fled to the nearby village of Buicarin. The village of Buicarin was surrounded and those from Kraras were rounded up. The men were separated from the women and were told that they would be marched to Kraras under the supervision of the military to carry food. According to one report, 6-8 Indonesian soldiers and two East Timorese Hansip escorted dozens of men to Wetuku River in an area known as Tahubein, where they were surrounded and shot. Only four people are reported to have survived the massacre. One informant provided this description:

> The men were ordered to march from Buicarin to get food in Kraras. When we started out from Buicarin [we] were escorted closely by Hansip, police and soldiers from the Kodim. When we arrived in an area called Tahubein the troops ordered us to sing Foho Ramelau. But no one sang the song. Then they asked us to count. We started to count "one", "two", "three". After we had counted up to three, they fired on us. I threw myself to the ground. My friends fell on me, and my body was smeared with blood. After the shooting, ABRI started to check us. They wanted to make sure that we were all dead. I heard a voice of [a member] of Hansip say " If anybody is still alive, stand up and go with us" [ABRI]. I heard that but did not move. Then I sensed that two of my friends stood up, and then were shot dead. The soldiers then left the massacre site. [When] I thought that there were no soldiers around, I got up and ran away to the forest.[573]

529. The Commission received reports about the involvement of various ABRI units in this massacre, including members of Kodim 1630/Viqueque, Infantry Battalions 328, 501 and 745, and the Secret Warfare Command (Kopassandha). There are conflicting reports about the number of victims killed at Tahubein, with figures ranging from a low of 26 to a high of 181.* The Commission received the names of 141 victims, all of whom were male.

Table 22: Civilians executed at Tahu Bein, Viqueque, 17 September 1983, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Age	Name	Age	Name	Age
Abel Soares	40	António Alves	28	Bosi Nahak	37
Abilio Baptista	28	Armando	29	Cai Fonok	29
Abílio Gomes	17	Armando Bau Dai	40	Camilio Guterres	39
Agustinho Gomes	31	Bai Alak	42	Cancio Gomes	20
Agusto Gomes	17	Bai Lekik	15	Carlos Soares	51
Alak Nahak	50	Basi Dero	58	Constantino Gomes	27
Alfredo Nunes	28	Be Kikik	29	Daniel Braz	25
Alcino Gomes	15	Belarmino	31	Daniel Gomes	20
Ana Maria	25	Beni Kaik	27	Diku Funuk	49
Angelo Amaral	27	Beni Nahak	18	Dau Kaik	59

* CAVR Interview with Miguel Viana, Viqueque, 17 July 2003, who cited 181 killed; CAVR Interview with Silvino das Dores Soares, Viqueque, 10 March 2004, who cited 143 killed; CAVR Interview with Manuel de Jesus Pinto, Buikaren, Viqueque, 20 March 2004, who said he counted 82 bodies; see also HRVD Statement 04146, which states 23 individuals were killed and three men – Antonio Naha Fahik, Toni Rubik and Leki Rubik – survived. See also HRVD Statement 00155.

Name	Age
António	30
Domingos Gomes	30
Domingos Gomes	17
Dom. Naha Fonok	30
Domingos Ventura	-
Duarte Tilman	35
Ernesto A. B.	30
Eugenio Marques	17
Feliciano Amaral	20
Feliciano Gomes	50
Fernando	42
Fino Lekik	15
Fino Lekik	35
Fino Olok	40
Fono Leik	37
Gaspar Nunes	29
Gilberto	30
Hana Rubik	60
Heu Supu	50
Hia Bosi	34
Ilidio	28
Jacob Gomes	60
Jaime de Jesus	24
João Gomes	33
João Soares	28
Joaquim Baptista	23
Joaquim Gomes	18
Joaquim Guterres	-
Joolino (Filo Fuhuk)	70
José Ole Leki	29
José Susu Nahak	34
Julio Alves	40
Kai Dokik	40
Kai Fromok	47
Kai Labu	41
Kai Lirik	45
Kai Mauk	-

Name	Age
Benjamim Alves	49
Kai Nahak	30
Kalti Leki	18
Labu Dekik	62
Lau Kau	10
Leandro Gomes	50
Leki Kaik	42
Leki Lerik	20
Leki Mauk	45
Lemo Rai	29
Leopoldo Amaral	28
Leopoldo Brandão	40
Lihu Modo	50
Liku Lobu	45
Loi Kaik	47
Lui Nahak	45
Manuel Soares	49
Manuk Sesan	45
Marcelino Gomes	29
Marciano Baptista	40
Marcus Amaral	18
Martinho Gomes	40
Mau Kaik	25
Miguel Gomes	51
Miguel Rangel	25
Miguel Soares	39
Modo Liba	54
Naha Dedak	27
Naha Kaik	59
Naha Lirik	40
Naha Mauk	20
Naha Rubik	35
Napoledo	43
Noegeria Amaral	28
Noema Baptista	24
Nono Kai	25
Nono Kaik	38

Name	Age
Dirgo Amaral	33
Nono Modo	48
Olimpio Amaral	23
Olo Lirik	38
Olo Susuk	46
Paulino Gomes	29
Pedro	42
Pedro de Araújo	38
Pedro F. Amaral	23
Raimundo Baptista	62
Rogéria Amaral	23
Rubi Berek	37
Rubi Dahik	60
Rubi Domok	30
Rubi Fonok	39
Rubi Heuk	45
Rubi Kaik	45
Rubi Katik	34
Rubi Laik	61
Rubi Lerik	40
Rubi Modo	27
Rubi Nahak	39
Siko Loik	49
Susu Beik	35
Susu Bosi	37
Tedi Susuk	35
Teofilo	30
Tomás Brandão	20
Tomás Guterres	50
Tomás Soares	49
Tomás Tilman A.	39
Tui Saan	17
Vasco Gomes	41
Vitolimo Ribeiro	54
Vitorino Monteiro	23
Wai Dirik	36
Watu Bata	50

Other killings in the Kraras region

530. The Commission also received information about a number of other executions of civilians in the Kraras region, including at Mali Aba Ulu and Kaken Kilat.[574]

531. The Commission received information that on 22 September Hare Cae and Celestino dos Anjos, the wife and father of the former Ratih commander of Kraras, Virgilio dos Anjos (Ular) were killed by Hansip members near Kaijun Laran, and that a man named Abel was executed nearby.[575] A deponent told the Commission that Cipriano Pereira was arrested in Kaijun Laran, detained in the Kodim headquarters and subsequently disappeared.[576] Another deponent told the Commission that Indonesian soldiers and the village policeman (Bimpolda) arrested her husband, Antonio Carada, and four of his friends, Agustinho Amaral, Daniel Amaral, Cipriano Pereira and Serafin Soares, and took them away in the direction of the town of Viqueque. None of them was seen again.[577]

Table 23: Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances in the Kraras area, 1983, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Susuki	19 Sept. 1983	Sukar Oan	-	-	Disappeared
Hare Cae (Alda)	22 Sept. 1983	Kaijun Laran	-	-	Killed
Celestino dos Anjos	22 Sept. 1983	Kaijun Laran	-	-	Killed
Abel	22 Sept. 1983	Kaijun Laran	-	-	Killed
Albino Soares	17 Oct. 1983	Lalerek Mutin	-	-	Disappeared
Bosi Modo	17 Oct. 1983	Lalerek Mutin	-	-	Disappeared
Daniel	17 Oct. 1983	Lalerek Mutin	-	-	Disappeared
Lacaros	17 Oct. 1983	Lalerek Mutin	-	-	Disappeared
Manuel	17 Oct. 1983	Lalerek Mutin	-	-	Disappeared
Toni Siku	17 Oct. 1983	Lalerek Mutin	-	-	Disappeared
Rubi Bere	17 Oct. 1983	Lalerek Mutin	-	-	Disappeared
Wai Bosi	17 Oct. 1983	Lalerek Mutin	-	-	Disappeared
Cipriano Pereira	1983	Viqueque	-	-	Disappeared
Antonio Carado	1983	-	-	-	Disappeared

Other unlawful killings and enforced disappearances in the eastern region (1983–1984)

Viqueque

532. The Commission received copies of lists of persons suspected of being active in the Resistance that were drawn up in late 1983 by village authorities. The Commission also has evidence that, on the basis of these lists of members of the "GPK" (Gerombolan Pengacau Keamanan, Security Disturbance Group, i.e. Falintil), the military targeted individuals who were then executed or disappeared. The Commission possesses lists from seven villages in the sub-district of Uato Carbau (Viqueque) with a total of 182 names. Among them is one signed by Francisco Pinto, head of Bahatata Village in 1983, that lists 13 former members of the "GPK". Besides names, the list provides information about the age, year of surrender, former positions while in the mountains, current employment and current residence.

533. The Commission received corroborating evidence regarding the role of Indonesian security forces in the disappearance of people listed as "GPK". For example, in a military document dated 19 April 1984, a group of 11 detainees were to be transferred from Piton 12, a Kopassus unit, to Battalion 511 in Viqueque, and then to Dili. The Commission received a number of testimonies which show that the 11 individuals listed in this document all disappeared after being handed over to Battalion 511.[578] One witness told the Commission:

> On 19 April 1984, at 9.00am, troops from Battalion 511 brought out my husband and 10 detainees, including Ermenegildo da Conceicao, Jeremias Xavier, Gaspar de Carvalho (my brother), and Francisco Lebre Correia,(my husband). I was bringing a meal, seprei and a mat for my husband at the time. But when I got there, my husband and the other captives were already in the vehicle, their eyes and hands bound… I asked the TNI: "Where are you taking my husband?" They said they were being taken to Viqueque to own up to their mistakes but then would be freed. It was only an excuse and my husband was taken who knows where and has never come back.[*]

534. According to one testimony, these men were ordered to look for Falintil in the forests. During this time one of the men, Ricardo Madeira, ran off. When the group reported back to Piton 12, they were ordered to find Ricardo and kill him. He was killed in late March 1984 by his friends.[579]

535. The Commission also received information about several other killings and disappearances in the district of Viqueque. In 1983 the Hansip commander in Ossu arrested Celestino dos Reis and he subsequently disappeared.[580] On 20 March 1984, Cipriano Uala was arrested in Ossu by members of the Kodim, taken to a place called Leque Meta and executed.[581]

536. In 1983 Antonio, Manuel, Miguel, José and a woman called Hare Nahak were reportedly shot to death by members of Infantry Battalion 742 and Marine Battalion 503 in Uma Kiik (Viqueque).[582] In October of that year, a man named Antonio was reportedly arrested and killed in Buikarin.[583] On 23 November 1983, five men were

* HRVD Statements 06957, 07335, 07521, and 06786. The four names mentioned all appear in "Daftar Nama Anggota Ex-GPK di Desa Bahatata Kecamatan Uato Carbau diturun Tahun 1978," (List of Names of Ex-GPK Members in Bahatata Village, Uato Carbau Sub-district) signed by Bahatata village head, M305 and dated 11 November 1983. See also CAVR Interview with Mateus Pinto, Uato Carbau, Viqueque, 5 October 2003.

reportedly arrested by members of Chandraca 7, taken to the Kodim in Viqueque and subsequently disappeared.[584] And on or about 28 March 1983, two men, Jeremias Soares Pinto and Caetano de Fátima, are reported to have disappeared from the Kodim in Viqueque.[585]

537. The Commission received various reports that on or about 21 March 1984 16-18 individuals disappeared after being taken into custody at the Chandraca 7 post in Uaitame.[586]

538. In Matahoi (Uatolari, Viqueque), men named Domingos and Pedro were allegedly killed by members of Battalion 511.[587] In Makadiqui (Uatolari, Viqueque) a man named Julio da Silva was reported to have been forcibly recruited as a TBO by Battalion 406 and then disappeared.[588]

539. In 1984, a captured Falintil combatant was reported to have disappeared from the Kodim headquarters in Viqueque.[589] In February 1984, Calistro Soares, Benjamin and Paulo Gusmão were arrested by members of the Special Forces (Kopassus) members, detained at the Kodim office in Viqueque and subsequently executed in Olobai.[590]

Table 24: Individuals executed and disappeared in Viqueque, 1983–1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Celestino dos Reis	1983	Ossu	-	-	Disappeared
Antonio	1983	Uma Kiik	-	-	Killed
Manuel	1983	Uma Kiik	-	-	Killed
Miguel	1983	Uma Kiik	-	-	Killed
José	1983	Uma Kiik	-	-	Killed
Hare Nahak	1983	Uma Kiik	-	-	Killed
Domingos	1983?	Matahoi	-	-	Killed
Pedro	1983?	Matahoi	-	-	Killed
Julio da Silva	1983	Makadique	28	-	Disappeared
Manuel Soares	23 Nov. 1983	Lugasa	-	RK	Disappeared
Manuel Soares	23 Nov. 1983	Lugasa	-	Village Sec.	Disappeared
Mariano Meneses	23 Nov. 1983	Lugasa	-	-	Disappeared
Armindo Rangel	23 Nov. 1983	Lugasa	-	-	Disappeared
Gregório da Cruz	23 Nov. 1983	Lugasa	-	-	Disappeared
Calistro	11 Feb. 1984	Haderai	-	-	Executed
Benjamin	11 Feb. 1984	Haderai	-	-	Executed
Paulo Gusmão	11 Feb. 1984	Haderai	-	-	Executed
Cipriano Uala	20 Mar. 1984	Ossu	-	-	Executed
Jeremias S. Pinto	28 Mar. 1984	Kodim Viq.	-	-	Disappeared

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Caetano de Fatima	28 Mar. 1984	Kodim Viq.	-	-	Disappeared
Mateus do Rosario	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Katorje	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Manuel	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Alberto	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Rui	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Paulo 1	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Paulo 2	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Caetano	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Angelina	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Adriano	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Lino	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Luis	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Afonso Pereira	Mar. 1984	Uaitame	-	-	Disappeared
Ricardo Maderia	31 Mar. 1984	Uani Uma	-	-	Beaten to death

Lautém

540. During the 1983 ceasefire Fretilin/Falintil had also been in contact with East Timorese members of Hansip and the civil administration in the sub-district of Iliomar (Lautém) and an uprising of Hansip was scheduled to take place on 8 August. However, before the plan could be carried out, Hansip members loyal to the Indonesian military killed two members of the Resistance, Amilcar Rodrigues and Venancio Savio, during a meeting.*

541. At around the same time as the uprising was taking place in Kraras and the one planned for Iliomar was discovered, Miguel dos Santos, the liurai of Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém) organised and led the defection of Hansip members in the village of Mehara. One deponent told the Commission that 33 Hansip defected with weapons taken from the Indonesian military and the police, together with 40 civilians, including a number of children.[591] Antonio dos Santos told the Commission:

> In 1982 many people already knew about the connection between Raja [King] Miguel and Xanana, including the meeting with Bishop Dom Martinho held here (Mehara). Many people also passed information to the Indonesian military about the activities of (Raja Miguel) so that after the meeting with Dom Martinho, Raja Miguel was terrorised and he was almost arrested. Because of that, in 1983 he ran away…he run away to the forest on 9 August…taking several members of Hansip with him.[592]

* For a description of events, see CAVR Community Profiles for Cainliu, Ailebere, Iliomar I and Iliomar II, all Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District; CAVR, Field Report of the Displacement and Famine Research Team on the sub-district of Iliomar, 27 May–4 June 2003; HRVD Statements 03930 and 04008; and Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar: Resistance in Rural East Timor, 2003, p. 24.

542. The Commission also received information about uprisings in Leuro, in the Lospalos sub-district, where ten Hansip defected on 8 August 1983, and in Serelau, Moro sub-district. [593]

543. ABRI's response to these events was extremely harsh. Its tactics included purging the ranks of Hansip and the civil administration of possible Falintil sympathisers and the execution of suspected clandestine members, sometimes in public. Many ordinary civilians were also caught up in the crackdown that followed.

544. After the killing of Amilcar Rodrigues and Venancio Savio in Iliomar, their bodies were brought to the Koramil headquarters. The Koramil commander ordered the Hansip to summon the population by sounding a bell. When the people came, the arrests started. Among those arrested were the heads of all six villages in the sub-district, who had been involved in contacts with Fretilin during the ceasefire.[594]

545. In Iliomar, the military response was particularly brutal including multiple arrests and the sending of about 300 families from the sub-district to the island of Ataúro, ill-treatment and torture, killings and public executions. The repression was most intense in the villages of Iliomar I, Cainliu, Fuat and Ailebere, although it reached all the villages in the sub-district.[595] Although village officials and Hansip and Ratih were among the chief targets of the repression, the arrests spread far wider than this group, and the whole population suffered from the reimposition of restrictions on their freedom of movement, which often made farming impossible and forced the population to scavenge for roots and leaves to survive. In 1983-84, 97 people are reported to have died from hunger and disease.[596] As in earlier times there were cases of people going out in search of food being shot dead.[597]

546. Many Hansip and members of the civil administration were arrested in the second half of October. Among them were three persons who were working in the local government, including the chief of the aldeia of Leilor in the village of Ailebere, Francisco Serpa Rosa, and a fourth man Manuel da Costa, who was a carpenter. The four had all reportedly been appointed to act as go-betweens between ABRI and Falintil during the ceasefire.[598] After all four had been severely tortured by Hansip attached to the Iliomar Koramil, Francisco Serpa Rosa and Manuel da Costa were handed over to the Battalion 315 post in Hiilari, from where they were taken out and killed.* In November 1983 Hansip members Carlos da Costa, Luis Lopes and Ernesto Madeira were killed by other Hansip members in Dirilofo (Iliomar I, Iliomar).[599] Probably in the same month another Hansip member, Filomeno da Gama, who also worked in the sub-district administrator's office, was executed, reportedly on the football field in Iliomar.[600] This was followed by the arrest, release, and re-arrest of several individuals,

* HRVD Statement 04393 and CAVR Community Profile, Ailebere (Iliomar, Lautém). The other two, Americo Jeronimo and Fernando da Costa, were taken to Dili where they were subsequently tried.

including women who were ill-treated. On 3 December, in the presence of the Koramil commander and a Special Forces officer, the village head ordered six of the women detainees to bludgeon Belmonte Jeronimo, a deputy village head, to death. One of the women told the Commission:

> Two Hansip arrested me and took me to the Iliomar Koramil. I saw a man called Belmonte who had been beaten, tortured and fallen unconscious. There was also the head of village, M306, and a Nanggala member called M307 standing where Belmonte had fallen. M306 called me "You stand here". He gave me a piece of wood. Then he called M308 and M309. They were also pieces of wood. Then we were ordered to beat Belmonte to death.[601]

547. Soon after, possibly the following day, Fernando dos Santos was killed by a Hansip member in Uatamatar (Ailebere, Iliomar), and Joachim dos Santos was killed by another Hansip member in Titililo Village.[602] On 9 December, two more men were executed. A deponent told the Commission:

> My two friends Humberto and Marcelino were interrogated in the village of Cainliu. During the interrogation both mentioned my name (Lourenco, that I was involved in clandestine activities. Then my two friends Humberto and Martinho, were taken by Hansip to Cainalor, in the area of Cainliu, and killed. [603]

548. Koramil and Hansip forces also ordered villagers in Cainliu to beat Margarida da Costa and her husband, Paulo Fernandes, to death. A deponent told the Commission:

> In 1983… M310 arrested Margarida da Costa and her husband, Paulo Fernandes, and detained them in the Cainliu Village office in Iliomar. For seven days both were undressed and they were only allowed to wear underpants. M310 then gathered the Cainliu community and displayed both victims. After they were displayed to the Cainliu community, Paulo Fernandes and his wife Margarida da Costa were taken to Suamutur in the Cainliu area to be killed. Their grave had been dug the previous day. They were killed with blows to the neck. Margarida fell into the prepared hole, as did her husband Paulo Fernandes. The community of Cainliu were told by M310, M311 and M312 to witness the executions.[604]

549. Soon after the killing of Margarida da Costa and Paulo Fernandes, their seven-month-old baby, Carsolita, reportedly died from lack of milk.[605]

550. At about the same time the Iliomar Koramil and Hansip also forced civilians in Cainliu to kill Martinho, Venancio and Americo in public.[606] Carlos Correia, Joaquim Sanches, José Anunciacão and Antonio Jeronimo were beaten to death in public in Dirilofo (Iliomar I, Iliomar).[607]

Table 25: Individuals executed in Iliomar, 1983–1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Filomeno da Gama	9 Sept. 1983	Iliomar	26	Hansip	Killed
Carlos da Costa	Nov. 1983	Dirilofo	27	Hansip	Killed
Luis Lopes	Nov. 1983	Dirilofo	24	Hansip	Killed
Ernesto Madeira	Nov. 1983	Dirilofo	23?	Hansip	Killed
Manuel da Costa	Nov. 1983	Larimata, Ailebere	-	-	Killed
Francisco Serpa Rosa	Nov. 1983	Larimata, Ailebere	-	-	Killed
Belmonte Jeronimo	3 Dec. 1983	Iliomar	-	Deputy Village Chief	Fatal beating
Fernando dos Santos	4 Dec. 1983	Tirililo	25	-	Shot
Joachim dos Santos	4 Dec. 1983	Tirililo	20	-	Shot
Marcelino Hornay	9 Dec. 1983	Cainliu	22	-	Shot
Margarida da Costa	14 Dec. 1983	Cainliu	24	-	Public execution
Paul Fernandes	14 Dec. 1983	Cainliu	37	-	Public execution
Martinho Monteiro	22 Dec. 1983	Cainliu	-	Hansip	Public execution
Humberto da Cruz	22 Dec. 1983	Cainliu	-	Hansip	Executed
Venancio da Costa	22 Dec. 1983	Cainliu	24	-	Public execution
Americo Cipriano	22 Dec. 1983	Cainliu	25	-	Public execution
Carlos Correia	22 Dec. 1983	Dirilofo	35	Fretilin Sec.	Public execution
Joaquim Sanches	22 Dec. 1983	Dirilofo	36	Catechist	Public execution
José Anunciacão	22 Dec. 1983	Dirilofo	20	-	Public execution
Antonio Jeronimo	22 Dec. 1983	Dirilofo	-	-	Public execution
Claudio Fereira	Dec. 1983	Iliomar II	-	-	Disappeared
Amilcar dos Santos	1983	Iliomar I	34	***
Ernesto dos Santos	1983	Iliomar I	35	***
Mateus Pinto	1983	Iliomar I	48	***
Alfredo Pinto	1983	Iliomar I	51	***
Joao Ruas	1983	Iliomar I	30	***
Raimundo Pinto	1983	Iliomar I	56	***
Antonio da Costa	1983	Iliomar I	34	***

551. In Mehara, from where Hansip led by Miguel dos Santos had defected, there were also large-scale reprisals. Indonesian troops are reported to have killed João Albuqueque in late August 1983.[608] A number of military units were despatched to the village, including Sater 515, Battalion, 641, Special Forces (Kopassus) and Airborne Battalion

100. They carried out arrests and torture and sexual violence as well as killings and disappearances. People from the aldeia of Loikere and Porlamano were moved to the primary school and the church in Mehara where they were kept for several months.[609]

552. Battalion 641 and Airborne Battalion 100 are reported to have perpetrated many executions and disappearances against the villagers. Airborne Battalion 100 is reported to have executed one man on 7 October,[610] another on 15 November and on 20 November,[611] and two more on 25 November.[612] Sabina das Dores told the Commission about one of these executions:

> On 14 November 1983 I was arrested and taken to the Infantry Battalion 641 post and Airborne Battalion 100 in Mehara. I was tortured by being burnt with cigarettes and other things…On the same day Mateus was killed. His body was just thrown away, and until today we don't know where it is.[613]

553. In Poros (Mehara, Tutuala, Lautém), in late 1983, the Indonesian military conducted public executions and a number of individuals disappeared after being taken into custody.[614] In October, seven individuals, including one Hansip member, were taken to the Kodim and Battalion 100 base in Lospalos and disappeared.[615] On 13 November 1983 five persons, Karasu Malay, Frederico do Carmo, Francisco Cristovão, Gilberto and Manuel de Jesus, were publicly executed one by one by the Macakuro Cave in Poros, reportedly by members of Battalion 641. The killing was reportedly in reprisal for the Falintil killing of a TBO.[616] On 25 December 1983, three men, Oscar Lopes, Alvaro Gomes and Francisco Lopes, were arrested in Poros by members of Battalion 641, taken to the Kodim headquarters in Lospalos and subsequently disappeared. The wife of Oscar Lopes, Gracilda Guimarães, spoke at a Commission national public hearing about the detention and disappearence of her husband.*

> My husband was a primary school teacher in Poros and a leader of the clandestine organisation called Loriku Assuwain. In 1983 a group of Hansip from Poros joined Falintil in the forest. Several weeks later the military Commander of Tutuala forced my husband to take part in a Fence of Legs operation for one month to look for the Hansip members who had run away. On 13 November 1983 Hansip, together with ABRI 641 in Poros, came to the house to arrest my husband. Several days later he was released. [After being detained for three nights] my husband…and several of his friends were taken to Kodim Post 1629 in Lospalos. To this day my husband and two of his friends have never returned. A third friend was released and returned to live in Poros.[617]

554. The Commission received information about the execution or disappearences of the following people in Mehara in late 1983 and early 1984:

* Gracilda Guimarães was also detained and became a victim of sexual harassment. She was detained together with her baby. Her baby became ill with malaria (see Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence)

Table 26: Individuals executed in Mehara, 1983–1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
João Albuqueque	Aug. 83	Mehara	30	Peasant	Shot
Jorgé Nascimento	7 Oct. 83	Loikere	~50	Peasant	Burned to death
Mateus Gonzaga	15 Nov. 83	Loikere	~63	-	Executed
Orlando	20 Nov. 83	Tolofai	-	-	Shot
Gaspar Nunes	25 Nov. 83	Porlamano	37	-	Burned to death
José Manuel Inacio	25 Nov. 83	Loikere	42	-	Burned to death
Alexandre Correia	1983	Porlamano	-	-	Shot
Ernesto da Americo	1983	Loikere	-	-	Shot
Francisco Lopes	Oct. 83	Poros	29	RT head	Shot
Cristovão Lopes	Oct. 83	Poros	30	-	Disappeared
Constantino da Costa	Oct. 83	Poros	24	-	Disappeared
Damião Lopes	Oct. 83	Poros	24	Hansip	Disappeared
Loureiro	Oct. 83	Poros	28	-	Disappeared
Alvaro dos Santos	Oct. 83	Poros	31	-	Disappeared
Antonio Soares	Oct. 83	Poros	19	-	Shot
Karasu Malay	13 Nov. 83	Poros	50	-	Executed
Francisco Cristovão	13 Nov. 83	Poros	30	-	Executed
Frederico	13 Nov. 83	Poros	32	-	Executed
Gilberto	13 Nov. 83	Poros	28	-	Executed
Manuel de Jesus	13 Nov. 83	Poros	34	-	Executed
Oscar Lopes	7 Jan. 84	Poros	25	Teacher	Disappeared
Alvaro Gomes	7 Jan. 84	Poros	32	-	Disappeared
Mateus Pedro	11 Jan. 84	Poros	23	commander	Disappeared
Raul dos Santos	11 Jan. 84	Poros	-	-	Disappeared
Amancio	11 Jan. 84	Poros	18	student	Disappeared
Joaquim	11 Jan. 84	Poros	17	student	Disappeared
Olinda	11 Jan. 84	Poros	22	-	Disappeared
Ermelinda	11 Jan. 84	Poros	22	-	Disappeared

555. The crackdown extended to places in Lautém where there had been no uprising. Members of Hansip/Ratih and the civil administration, suspected members of clandestine networks and the families of people with relatives in the Resistance, including above all those who had recently fled to the forest, were particular targets.

556. For example, on 28 August 1983, members of Battalion 745 arrested Paulo Marques, a 24-year-old member of Hansip in Home, near Lospalos, and subsequently executed him. On 5 September, Kodim personnel arrested Nicolau Flores, a Ratih member in Moro and executed him several days later. In early January another Ratih member named Tiago Bandeira dos Dores was arrested and tortured. In late January 1984, in Moro, a third Ratih member named Alfredo Coutinho was arrested and tortured. His wife, who had regularly been bringing him meals, reported that he disappeared from detention in April.[618]

557. In Lore (Lospalos, Lautém) in August 1983, the Indonesian military responded to the Hansip uprising by arresting a number of women suspected of having relatives in the Resistance. Some time thereafter, Falintil attacked the Indonesian forces in the Lore area. Battalion 641 retaliated by firing mortars into the Maluro settlement camp (Lore I, Lospalos), killing nine individuals between the ages of three and 50. In November 1983, four individuals were arrested, one of whom was executed.[619] In late 1983 Kopassus members arrested six men. The body of one of these individuals was subsequently paraded through the village; the other five are reported to have been disappeared. According to Raul da Costa Pite:

> After the [Falintil] attack, Commando members named M313 and M314 brought me and my friends to the Commando Post…When we arrived at the post, we were tied by the hands and left out in the sun. The Commando members threw stones at us.
>
> The next morning, they gathered all the people of Maluro for an assembly. The inhabitants brought Antonio's body and buried it. But to this day I don't know the whereabouts of the others.[620]

558. Two other people, Amando Castanheira and Jeferino, are also reported to have been killed by a "Komando" (a term usually applied to members of the Special Forces, Kopassandha/Kopassus) and local Hansip in Lore in 1983.[621] In February 1984, one man was executed and a Ratih member was arrested. Deponent IA told the Commission that in 1984 members of the Special Forces arrested five men in Maluro and executed them.[622] Another deponent told the Commission that Hansip members killed Mário Nogueira in Maluro in 1984.[623]

Table 27: Individuals killed in Lore, 1983–1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
J. Levano	4 Nov. 1983	Maluro, Lore I	40	-	Mortar
Ana Moe	4 Nov. 1983	Maluro, Lore I	18	-	Mortar
Halu Palinu	4 Nov. 1983	Maluro, Lore I	12	-	Mortar
Kaia Moe	4 Nov. 1983	Maluro, Lore I	20	-	Mortar
Paia Moe	4 Nov. 1983	Maluro, Lore I	15	-	Mortar
Jacinta Ximenes	4 Nov. 1983	Maluro, Lore I	26	-	Mortar
Celia Ximenes	4 Nov. 1983	Maluro, Lore I	3	-	Mortar

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
J Romono	4 Nov. 1983	Maluro, Lore I	16	-	Mortar
Kulu Leve	4 Nov. 1983	Maluro, Lore I	50	-	Mortar
Amand Castanheira	17 Nov. 1983	Horo Lata, Lore I	28	Teacher	Executed
Jaime Castelo	6 Feb. 1984	Lore 2	23	Mechanic	Executed
Antonio Pinto	1984	Maluro, Lore I	-	-	Killed
Luis Bianco	1984	Maluro, Lore I	-	-	Killed
Ratumkia	1984	Maluro, Lore I	-	-	Killed
Mauromonu	1984	Maluro, Lore I	-	-	Killed
Letilere	1984	Maluro, Lore I	-	-	Killed
Mário Nogueira	1984	Maluro, Lore I	-	-	Killed

559. The Commission also received information that many individuals were killed at or disappeared from the Kodim headquarters in Lautém during 1983. This includes a group of four individuals detained at Kodim headquarters who were subsequently executed,[624] a group of six who were killed or disappeared,[625] an individual named Armindo da Silva who disappeared,[626] a man named Damião Dias Martins who was detained and disappeared,[627] and a man named José from Com who disappeared.[628] In 1984, Pedro Cardoso, Gabriel Correia and Antonio Oliveira reportedly disappeared from the Kodim in Lospalos.[629] Three more individuals – Antonio, Gabriel and Pedro – are reported to have been detained at the Kodim in Lospalos and to have subsequently been executed on or about 28 July 1984.[630] Finally, in December 1984, a man named Teodoro was reportedly killed by members of the 131st Infantry Battalion in Serlau Village (Lospalos, Lautém).[631]

Table 28: Individuals executed or disappeared in Lospalos, 1983, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
José Monteiro	1983	-	-	-	Executed
Sebastião	1983	-	-	-	Executed
Raimundo	1983	-	-	-	Executed
Risantula	1983	-	-	-	Executed
Armindo da Silva	1983	-	-	-	Disappeared
Damião Dias Martins	Sept. 1983	Kerana	-	-	Disappeared
Antonio de Oliveira	14 Oct. 1983	-	-	-	Disappeared
Pedro dos Santos	14 Oct. 1983	-	-	-	Disappeared
Mário Pinto	14 Oct. 1983	-	-	-	Disappeared
Orlando Mendes	14 Oct. 1983	-	-	-	Disappeared

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
José Eurico	14 Oct. 1983	-	-	-	Disappeared
Antonio da Silva	14 Oct. 1983	-	-	-	Disappeared
Fernão F. Gusmão	Feb. 1984	-	-	-	Lethal injection
Antonio	28 July 1984	Kodim Lospalos	-	-	Killed
Gabriel	28 July 1984	Kodim Lospalos	-	-	Killed
Pedro	28 July 1984	Kodim Lospalos	-	-	Killed

560. In Fuiloro, a man named Fernando da Conceição was killed by a Kopassandha officer in 1983.[632] Also in Fuiloro, a man named Agustinho was reportedly killed by Nanggala troops on 25 August 1984.[633]

561. In Raça Village Luis Silveiro, a member of the local parliament was arrested and taken to Kodim headquarters in Lospalos where he was tortured and subsequently disappeared on or around 4 December 1983. One deponent told the Commission:

> On 20 September 1983, Babinsa M315, Police officer M316 and a TNI soldier broke into Luis Silveiro's house and took all the clandestine-related documents and cassettes. Several hours later a Military Police officer and five Hansip came and arrested him. When he was arrested the perpetrators said to Luis's wife, Casilda Serra, that Luis was being taken away to study… Luis was taken to the Lospalos Kodim and put in a cell. After one month cell occupied by Luis was empty. Luis disappeared until today.[634]

Public execution in Muapitine

In a particularly brutal incident in Muapitine (Lospalos, Lautém) in late 1983, Indonesian soldiers forced local villagers to murder other villagers suspected of sympathising with Falintil.[635] The following account was given by Mariana Marques, the wife of one of the victims, at the Commission's National Public Hearing on Massacres:

On 25 November 1983, three ABRI members from Kodim 1629 Lospalos came and captured my husband, Angelo da Costa, and two of his friends: Lino Xavier and Alvaro Pereira. ABRI also arrested Alberto, José Vicente, Gilberto, Leonel Oliveira and Alarico. My husband was arrested because he was the Responsável Principal (Resistance leader) in Muapitine, while Lino Xavier was his deputy. Alvaro Pereira was a member of Ratih who often supplied bullets to Fretilin (Falintil). On 6 December 1983, ABRI released Gilberto, Alarico and José Vicente from detention in the Lospalos Kodim 1629. The next day, 7 December 1983, we heard an announcement by the Village Head of Muapitine that the next morning all the people of Muapitine… had to gather at the village office to wait for the ABRI commander, a colonel.

At around 6.00am, the people of Muapitine gathered at the village office to welcome the colonel with tebe-tebe dances. At 7.00am he arrived with Battalion 1629, the District Administrator of Lautém, Claudio Vieira, my husband, and my husband's four friends – Lino Xavier, Alvaro Pereira, Alberto and Leonel Oliveira.

When they arrived, the ABRI colonel and the District Administrator of Lautém placed three bottles of palm wine on the table and poured it into five glasses. Then they called my husband and the four others to drink it. When they had finished the wine, the District Administrator stood up and said that my husband and his four friends had committed crimes and were going to be killed.

Then they called my husband and ordered Julio, the head of Muapitine Village, to kill him. Julio stepped forward and said to my husband: "Angelo, lift your head because I am going to cut your throat." My husband lifted his head and Julio slashed his neck with a bayonet. My husband fell to the ground, still breathing. After that they called Lino Xavier and ordered Armando to kill him. Armando stabbed Lino's chest with his machete, but Lino did not die. Armando ordered the people who were present to cut Lino into pieces. Out of fear the people did what they were told.

Next they brought Leonel Oliveira. Aleixio stabbed Leonel's chest with a bayonet until he died. Then Verisimo stabbed Alberto to death. Then they called Alvaro who cried saying: "What crime have I committed to deserve public execution?" But they ignored him and the head of Muapitine Village killed Alvaro as instructed by the authorities.

After the five men were executed, the District Administrator of Lautém, Claudio Vieira, ordered the community of Muapitine to take the bodies to their home villages to be buried. [However, my husband] Angelo da Costa had not yet died. A member of Hansip from the Kodim, Victor, was ordered to stab my husband. Victor stabbed Angelo's body with a bayonet but still Angelo did not die. With the Puakelu community, I took Angelo to Puakelu aldeia. When we arrived in Puakelo, Angelo was still breathing. At 5.00pm we still had not buried him because he was still alive.

A member of Battalion 641 ordered them to bury my husband. But my husband said: "Why bury me, when I am still alive?" Then a member Battalion 641, who also a religion teacher, asked me to take off Angelo's shirt, clean up his blood and treat his wounds.

My husband asked me to talk to the Commander of Post 641 so that they would not bury him. I went to the 641 Post and gave the Commander my husband's message. The Post Commander asked me to wait while he reported Angelo's condition to the District Administrator in Lospalos by radio…The District Administrator insisted that Angelo be buried. The Post Commander told me the response from the District Administrator of Lautém, saying: "Even if only one of his arms was cut off, if the District Administrator gives the command to bury him, he must be buried".

Guarded by two members of Battalion 641, my husband,had to be buried. After he was put in a hole about half a metre deep, he raised his hand and said: "Kiss my hand. Go and care for our two children because I do not want my line to be lost". Hearing these last words from my husband, I approached and kissed his hand. After that Battalion 641 accompanied me home. My husband was buried alive at 6 pm in the aldeia of Puakelu.[636]

562. The Commission compiled the following information about the age and occupation of the five men executed in Muapitine.

Table 29: Individuals executed in Muapitine, December 1983, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Angelo da Costa	7 Dec. 1983	Malahara	29	Clerk	Public execution
Alvaro Freitas	7 Dec. 1983	Muapitine	30	Ratih	Public execution
Lino Xavier	7 Dec. 1983	Pefitu	30	RT head	Public execution
Alberto dos Santos	7 Dec. 1983	Vailoro	31	Wakil Kades	Public execution
Lionel Oliveira	7 Dec. 1983	Muapitine	36	-	Public execution

563. In March 1984, a large number of civilians, including Ratih members, were arrested in Luro by Special Forces personnel. Several of these individuals were executed or subsequently disappeared.* The Commission also received a report stating that in 1984 members of Battalion 315 killed a man named Felix da Costa in Lakawa,[637] and Luis Adelaida was arrested and subsequently disappeared.[638]

* HRVD Statements 02777; 02796; 02797; see also Document No. 4/Ag/84, Submission to CAVR, Anthony Goldstone, CAVR Archive, which reports the disappearance of a number of individuals who were apparently detained in Dili, but subsequently released.

Table 30: Individuals executed/disappeared from Luro Sub-district, 1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Ilifai [Elifahi]	3 Mar. 1984	Luro	-	-	Shot
João Freitas	3 Mar. 1984	Luro	28	-	Executed
Luis Ramos	3 Mar. 1984	Luro	-	Liurai	Death by torture
Felix da Costa	1984	Lakawa	-	-	Shot
Luis Adelaida	1984	Luro	-	-	Disappeared

564. Although the first killings in Lautém took place in late August and early September, the bulk of these cases occurred during the last three months of 1983, after which there was a sharp decrease in the number of extra-judicial executions and disappearances of civilians.

Table 31: Fatal violations and disappearances in Lautém, August 1983-March 1984, as reported to the CAVR

Location	Aug.	Sept.	Oct.	Nov.	Dec.	Jan.	Feb.	Mar.	month?	Total
Mehara	1	-	8	9	-	8	-	-	2	28
Moro	-	1	-	-	-	1	-	-	1	3
Home	1	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	1
Fuiloro	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	2	2
Raça	-	-	-	-	1	-	-	-	-	1
Muapitine	-	-	-	-	5	-	-	-	-	5
Lospalos	-	1	6	-	-	-	1	-	8	16
Lore	-	-	-	10	-	-	1	-	11	22
Iliomar	-	1	-	3	15	-	-	-	9	28
Luro	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	3	2	5
Total	2	3	14	22	21	9	2	3	35	111

Baucau

565. The Commission received information about unlawful killings and disappearances of at least 27 persons in Baucau District in 1983–1984. Of the 27 persons reported to the Commission as killed or disappeared, only eight cases did not involve detention before the fatal violation. This number does not include at least 20 people from Baucau who were taken first to Dili and Kupang where they were killed or disappeared. However, even if those persons are included in the total number of unlawful killings and disappearances that occurred in Baucau District in 1983-84, the Commission believes that the actual total is likely to have been considerably higher.

566. The Commission received information that in Osso-Ala (Vemasse) at least ten persons were detained by local Hansip members attached to a paramilitary unit called Team Lorico, in September 1983 and disappeared.[639] Francisco Sebastiao Gomes told the Commission:

> On 22 September 1983, Andre Gusmão was arrested by the Indonesian military in the village office of Osso-Ala together with his nephew Alexandre Gomes at 3.00pm. They were arrested with 9 other people, namely Alexandre da Costa Freitas, Celestino Pereira, Raimundo Pereira, Feliciano Correia, Jacob Correia, Mário Pereira Gusmão, Raimundo Freitas Correia, Cosme Gusmão, [and] Rui Francisco Correia by Team Lorico, one of the Hansip groups in Baucau. After that, the 10 detainees were taken on foot to Ostico with their hands tied together. They were arrested because they were [suspected of] often meeting the Falintil commander-in-chief Xanana Gusmão in Diuk. Since their arrest until now nothing is known of their whereabouts.[640]

Table 32: Individuals disappeared from Osso-Ala Village, 23 September 1983, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Mário P Gusmão	23 Sept. 83	Osso-Ala			Disappeared
Cosmé Gusmão	23 Sept. 83	Osso-Ala			Disappeared
Celestino Pereira	23 Sept. 83	Osso-Ala			Disappeared
Raimundo Pereira	23 Sept. 83	Osso-Ala			Disappeared
André Gusmão	23 Sept. 83	Osso-Ala			Disappeared
Felicano Correia	23 Sept. 83	Osso-Ala			Disappeared
Alexandre da Costa	23 Sept. 83	Osso-Ala			Disappeared
Raimundo F Correia	23 Sept. 83	Osso-Ala			Disappeared
Rui F Correia	23 Sept. 83	Osso-Ala			Disappeared
Jacob Correia	23 Sept. 83	Osso-Ala			Disappeared

567. José Meneses was reportedly tortured to death by the Indonesian military in July 1983 while in detention in Baucau.[641] A man named Sies Co'o Saba was reportedly arrested in Tekinomata (Laga); and taken to Lacudala where he was executed by the Indonesian military.[642] In Gariuai (Baucau) a man named João Bosco and four other individuals were reportedly executed by the Indonesian military in 1983.[643]

568. This pattern of detention and killing or disappearance continued in Baucau District into 1984. On 8 March 1984, Simplisio Guterres was reportedly arrested in Uailili (Baucau) by members of Hansip and disappeared.[644] According to reports, on 24 March 1984 Hermenegildo P. Guterres was reportedly killed by members of the Battalion 501 in Baguia.[645] Also in March the Indonesian military arrested Joaquim Neto da Costa in Triloka (Baucau); he was reportedly killed in May 1984.[646] On 13 May

1984 Falintil troops attacked Cairabela Taci (Vemasse) kiliing at least two Indonesian soldiers, two Hansip and three civilians. The Indonesian military retaliated by arresting and killing an unspecified number of people.[647] In Bucoli (Baucau), on 30 May 1984, the Indonesian military arrested Tomás da Silva, Jacinto da Silva and Vicente Freitas, and took them to Baucau. That night they were reportedly killed.[648]

569. Another deponent told the Commission that in May 1984 men named Antonio Ximenes and Domingos Castro disappeared from the Kodim in Baucau. Their wives were told that they had been sent to school.[649] The Commission also received a report that in August 1984 two men were killed in Baguia by members of Battalion 501 and another man named Leão was tortured and subsequently died in the hospital in Baucau.[650]

570. A typical occurrence of detention and disappearance took place at the Kodim in Baucau in November 1984. According to witness testimonies, six civilians were detained at the Kodim in Baucau, of whom two disappeared. A deponent told the Commission:

> On 1 November 1984, around 3.00pm in a place called Osso-Ala, Bimpolda of Tasi Village came with weapons and arrested us: me, Isabel Soares, Felizarda Soares, Juliana Soares, Faustino da Costa and Filomeno da Costa. [We] were taken to the Nanggala's place in Loihubu and then moved to the Baucau Kodim. One by one we were interrogated by a man called M320. He asked about our family who were still in the forest. In the Baucau Kodim we were detained separately. Two others, Filomeno da Costa and Faustino da Costa and I were detained at the Nanggala post for three days. [However] the whereabouts of the two others is not known to this day.[651]

571. The Commission also received information about the extra-judicial execution of a man named Raimundo Ximenes, who was detained from Manatuto and was reportedly executed at the Kodim headquarters in Baucau, possibly by members of Hansip.[652]

Table 33: Individuals executed or disappeared in Baucau, 1983–1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
João Bosco	1983	Gariuai			Executed
Sies Co'o Saba	1983	Lakudala			Executed
José Meneses	July 83	Baucau			Death by torture
Simplisio Guterres	8 Mar. 84	Wailili			Disappeared
Filomeno Guterres	8 Mar. 84	Osso-Ala			Disappeared
Hermenegildo. Guterres	24 Mar. 84	Baguia			Killed
Joaquim N da Costa	May 84	Triloka			Killed
Tomás da Silva	30 May 84	Baucau			Executed

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Jacinto da Silva	30 May 84	Baucau			Executed
Antonio	May 84	Kodim Baucau			Disappeared
Domingos	May 84	Kodim Baucau			Disappeared
Gaspar	1984	Kodim Baucau			Killed
Jacinta	1984	Kodim Baucau			Disappeared
Hermenegildo	Aug. 84	Baguia			Killed
Leão	c. Aug. 84	Baucau hospital			Death by torture
Filomeno da Costa	Nov. 84	Kodim Baucau			Disappeared
Faustino da Costa	Nov. 84	Kodim Baucau			Disappeared
Raimundo Ximenes		Kodim Baucau			Executed

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances in Dili and the Central Region 1983–1984

572. Dili and the central districts showed relatively lower incidences of fatal violations during this period compared to the high number of killings and disappearances reported to the Commission during this period in the eastern region.

Dili

573. In Dili District, most fatal violations followed a period of detention. For example, the Commission received a report that in 1983 eleven unidentified civilians detained in the Balide Prison were taken out and subsequently disappeared.[653] Another informant told the Commission that a man named Antonio Mesquito was disappeared from Balide Prison in October 1983 by the Korem commander.[654]Yet another informant told the Commission that João Soares (from Viqueque), Antonio Piedade (from Ossu, Viqueque) and Helder Jordão (from Dili) were disappeared from the Sang Tai Hoo detention centre in Dili in December 1983 or early 1984.[655]

574. Other disappearances reported to the Commission include a man named Julio Maia who was disappeared from Dili, allegedly by the Special Warfare Command, in 1984.[656] In early January 1984, Francisco de Jesus was arrested and then disappeared from the Koramil headquarters in East Dili.[657] On 4 February 1984, Laurindo Sarmento Tilman was allegedly disappeared by the Indonesian military in Dili.[658]

575. Many of those caught up in the nationwide crackdown were brought from their home districts to Dili for interrogation. Among them were some who disappeared or were killed while in detention. About 25 members of a group of about 40 people who had been detained in Dili were killed after being transferred to Penfui Prison in Kupang (West Timor, Indonesia) in late August 1983. They included members of clandestine organisations from Viqueque, Baucau and Dili itself as well as about 17 persons from Laga (Baucau) who had been arrested with the Falintil commander, Cancio Gama (Lima Gama). This group included 15 Falintil troops, one woman and a child.* The first of the transferred prisoners to be taken out of the prison and disappear were these 17 people. Others reported to the Commission to have disappeared were five members of the clandestine network from Baucau: Antonio Espirito Santo, Isidoro Caibada, Benjamin Leki Osso, Carlos Nahareka (Carlos Alves) and Adolfo Fraga from Uailili. In addition to detainees who were taken out of Penfui Prison and disappeared, there was at least one member of the group, Duarte Ximenes from Bazartete (Liquiçá) who died because of the grossly inadequate food at the prison.

576. Only 14 of the original group of 40 survived. They almost certainly owe their survival to prisoners on Ataúro who told the ICRC about the plight of the Penfui detainees. The ICRC secured their return to Dili in July 1984. On their return several of them were tried and sentenced.[659]

Table 34: Individuals executed or disappeared from detention in Dili, 1983–1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Antonio Mesquito	Oct. 1983	Balide Prison			Disappeared
João Soares	Late 1983 or 1984	Sang Tai Hoo			Disappeared
Antonio Piedade	Late 1983 or 1984	Sang Tai Hoo			Disappeared
Helder Jordão	Late 1983 or 1984	Sang Tai Hoo			Disappeared
Julio Maia	1984	Dili			Disappeared
Francisco de Jesus	Jan 1984	Koramil			Disappeared
Laurindo S. Tilman	4 Feb 1984	Dili			Disappeared
Cancio Gama	Aug-Sept 1983	Kupang, West Timor		Falintil	Disappeared
Antonio Espirito Santo	March 1984	Kupang, West Timor			Disappeared
Isidoro Caibada	March 1984	Kupang, West Timor			Disappeared
Benjamin Leki Osso	March 1984	Kupang, West Timor		Teacher	Disappeared
Carlos Nahareka	March 1984	Kupang, West Timor			Disappeared
Adolfo Fraga	March 1984	Kupang, West Timor			Disappeared
Duarte Ximenes	1983-84	Kupang, West Timor			Died in detention

* According one source, Cancio Gama and his followers had been captured at the time of the breakdown of the ceasefire because he had been too slow to leave Laga where he had been living during much of the ceasefire [CAVR Interview with Justo Talenta, 3 November 2001]. The extremely harsh treatment he and his group received may have been connected to his "chance" meeting with an Australian parliamentary delegation on the road near Soba on 29 July 1983 at which he held a conversation with and presented a letter to the delegation's leader, Senator Bill Morrison [see Official Report of the Australian Parliamentary Delegation to Indonesia, Appendix 22: Documents Associated with Chance Meeting with Fretilin, Friday 29 July 1983 at Soba, East Timor, pp. 154-171].

Aileu

577. Similarly in Aileu District during this period, military operations resulted in detention and subsequent killing or enforced disappearances of civilians. On 30 August 1983, at least 16 men were arrested and detained by the Indonesian military at the Kodim headquarters in Aileu. Four of them were killed, and one, Moises Sarmento, disappeared. According to a witness testimony they were detained because they were suspected of helping Falintil around the time of the ceasefire. A deponent told the Commission:

> On 2 September 1983, I was arrested with my friends Luis Mouzinho, Mariano de Deus, Agustinho Pereira, Caitano Soares, Joaquim Hendrique, Crispin dos Santos, Paul Soares, Moises Sarmento, Graciano Pinto, Antonio de Deus, Bernardino, Victor Augusto, Afonso and Ananias by Kodim troops and a [member of] Hansip. They took us to Likerelau, Fatisi Village. There, Luis Mouzinho was beaten with an iron stick until his forehead was torn and bleeding. Then he was taken by the troops to Ruasu and was shot dead.[660]

578. Four other individuals were reported killed or disappeared from this group of detainees.[661] On 16 October 1983, Felix Amaral was reportedly executed by the Indonesian military in Laulara (Dili, on the border with Aileu). The Commission identified the following victims in Aileu:

Table 35: Individuals executed or disappeared in Aileu, 1983–1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Luis Mouzinho	2 Sept. 1983				Shot
Ananias Soares	3 Sept. 1983				Disappeared?
Antonio	Sept. 1983				Beaten to death
Afonso	Sept. 1983				Beaten to death
Moises Sarmento	1983				Disappeared
Felix Amaral	16 Oct. 1983	Laulara			Executed

Manufahi

579. The targeting of whole families by Indonesian security forces meant that some families experienced multiple loss and suffering, as described in the following two examples from Manufahi District. The deponent told the Commission about the detention and disappearances of his family members:

> In 1983 TNI arrested 12 civilians, including my family members Francisco da Costa, Erminia da Costa, Pedro da Costa, Frederico da Costa, Filomena da Costa, and Maria da Costa. I don't know the names of the other victims.

They were arrested at the Same District police station, and then ABRI took them out and killed them in an unknown place. Only Maria da Costa survived these killings…

Then, in the same year, my younger brother Domingos Ribeiro was arrested by members of Same Kodim and members of Same District police in Ailau, Letefoho. They told me that he was "taken to school in Dili". After two weeks, I went to visit him and brought him food but he wasn't to be found. Later I heard from someone that my brother and two other people had died in a cave in Same.[662]

580. Moises Fernandes told the Commission how he and his family were detained by Indonesian soldiers in Alas. While in detention, he witnessed the killing of a detainee from repeated beatings. His own daughter died from illness in detention:

On 1 May 1984, I was arrested with my family members, Lucia Maria de Fatima and Nijela Libania, by Battalion 512. We were detained for 4 days in Taitudak [Alas, Manufahi] with two others named Paul and Zacarias. On 4 May 1984 Paul and Zacarias and I were forced to move to the Manufahi Kodim. We were interrogated by Section Head I of the Manufahi Kodim who was named M321. Three days later a member of TNI put me in a pond for 3 hours. After that they beat, punch and kicked me. I was burned with cigarettes, hit with a buffalo horn and weapons. I was detained in the Manufahi Kodim for 3 months. Around that time, a detainee called João Guido was tortured and kicked by a policeman until he died. In the same year my daughter Nijela died in detention because of sickness.[663]

581. On 7 August 1983, Domingos, Agusto and Leopoldino were allegedly killed by members of the Special Forces (Kopassandha) in Hola Rua.[664] In September 1983, members of the Kodim killed Jaime da Costa, aged 20, and Américo Tomás, aged 32, in Tutuloro.[665] The Commission also received a report about the execution of three unnamed individuals in Babulo, Manufahi in 1983.[666]

582. In April 1984, Filomeno de Jesus Borges, Mateus and Manuel were reportedly beaten to death by members of the Indonesian military in Manumera.[667] In 1984, an individual named João Zino is also reported to have died while detained at the Same Kodim headquarters.[668]

Table 36: Individuals executed or disappeared in Manufahi, 1983–1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Domingos	7 Aug. 1983	Hola Rua			Killed
Agusto	7 Aug. 1983	Hola Rua			Killed
Leopoldino	7 Aug. 1983	Hola Rua			Killed

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Jaime da Costa	Sept. 1983	Tutuloro	20		Killed
Américo Tomás	Sept. 1983	Tutuloro	32		Killed
Francisco da Costa	1983	Same			Killed
Erminia da Costa	1983	Same			Killed
Pedro da Costa	1983	Same			Killed
Frederico da Costa	1983	Same			Killed
Filomeno da Costa	1983	Same			Killed
Domingos Ribeiro	1983	Same			Killed
Filomeno Borges	April 1984	Manumera			Beaten to death
Mateus	April 1984	Manumera			Beaten to death
Manuel	April 1984	Manumera			Beaten to death
João Zino	May 1984?	Same			In detention

Ainaro

583. The Commission did not receive reports of fatal violations occurring in Ainaro District in 1983. However, during the first half of 1984, Indonesian security forces tortured and executed a number of individuals in Ainaro. On 20 February 1984, Silvano de Araújo was reportedly killed in his garden in Soro Village by a member of Babinsa and a member of Hansip.[669] On 19 March 1984, a man named Manuel, aged 42, was killed, and on 29 March 1984, a man named Nuno was killed.[670] On 29 May 1984, members of a Nanggala unit allegedly arrested and executed Lourenço dos Reis in Hato Udo.[671]

584. Duarte Gaspar Corte Real told the Commission that in 1984 a Nanggala unit entered Hato Udo and killed many people. As the head of the village Institute for Community Sustainability (Lembaga Ketahanan Masyarakat Desa, LKMD), Duarte was asked to make a list of 50 names and give it to the head of Chandraca 11 in May 1984. Between June and July 1984, Nanggala 11 killed at least four civilians in Hato Udo.[672] According to Duarte, another four civilians were also targeted to be killed. However, when new troops arrived to replace Chandraca 11, the four names were not handed over to the new troops as a going-away party was organised by the community to distract them from this task.[673]

Table 37: Individuals executed in Ainaro, 1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Silvano de Araújo	20 Feb. 1984	Soro			Killed
Manuel	19 March 1984	Ainaro	42		Killed
Nuno	29 March 1984	Ainaro			Killed

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Lourenco dos Reis	29 May 1984?	Hato Udo			Executed
Valente Amaral	29 May 1984	Hato Udo	50s		Executed
João Xavier	29 May 1984	Hato Udo	60s		Executed
Moises Marineiro	29 May 1984	Hato Udo	45		Executed

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances in the Western Region (1983–1984)

Covalima, Bobonaro and Liquiçá Districts

585. After an attack by Falintil during which seven Indonesian military personnel were killed in Zolo (Zumalai) on 7 December 1983,[674] Indonesian military personnel in Bobonaro District arrested a large number of people in the sub-district of Bobonaro as well as in the neighboring sub-district of Zumalai (Covalima). They were subsequently detained at the Koramil headquarters in Bobonaro.[675] Both men and women were subject to arbitrary arrest, sometimes merely because their names were similar to those suspected of aiding the Resistance. Among those detained, many were brutally beaten or tortured, others were executed or disappeared.[676]

586. According to some accounts, Indonesian military personnel and Hansip members would remove four prisoners at a time from the prison in Bobonaro at night, tie them up with rope and take them to be executed. When the military personnel and Hansip returned to the prison, they told the other detainees that those taken "have already moved to a new house". Armando dos Santos, a teacher of religion, told the Commission:

> I was arrested…on 20 April 1984. Before I was detained I had already heard that [ABRI] had brought people out and killed them six times in a month. Each time they brought out four people. I saw it with my own eyes when I was in the jail. The next victims [of disappearance] were José, Marcello, João Mauati and João Dasimau. This was the last killing at Easter time in Bobonaro. Before they were killed, we gathered together, embraced each other and cried. I knew them well because they are my students. They were taken out to be killed after the Easter Mass.[677]

587. The Commission has reason to believe that as many as 40 civilians were killed or disappeared in the Bobonaro Koramil in 1984.*

* See list of 40 victims titled "Daftar Nama Korban yang Dibantai Tahun 1984 di Bobonaro" ("List of Names of Victims in Bobonaro in 1984") provided by Olandino Guterres, in "Laporan Distrik Bobonaro, CAVR" (CAVR Research Report, Bobonaro District), 11–14 June 2003; see also HRVD Statements 05169; 08182; 08143; see also Amnesty International Report, 1985, pp. 216-217.

Table 38: Names of individuals executed or disappeared from the Koramil Bobonaro, 1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Address	Age	Occupation
Miguel Bere Loco	Colimau, Bobonaro	45	Hansip
Alcino Dato Daci	Colimau, Bobonaro	34
Cipriano de Araújo	Malibu, Bobonaro	32
Armindo Ati Mau	Malibu, Bobonaro	29
Armindo Mau Mali	Malibu, Bobonaro	16	Student
Armando Malilesu	Malibu, Bobonaro	17	Student
Afonso Beremali	Malibu, Bobonaro	15	Student
Marcus Mauleto	Malibu, Bobonaro	56
Abel Bere Dasi	Colimau, Bobonaro	24
Manule Bere Sura	Colimau, Bobonaro	26
Clementino Bere	Colimau, Bobonaro	36
José Ati Mali	Colimau, Bobonaro	45
Afonso Mali Tai	Kotabot, Bobonaro	46	Hansip
Florindo Mau Ati	Kotabot, Bobonaro	41
Pedro Noronha	Kotabot, Bobonaro	14	Student
Julio Mau Loko	Kotabot, Bobonaro	35
José Rasi Bere	Kotabot, Bobonaro	21
Mateus Sina Boe	Kotabot, Bobonaro	38
Mariano Bere Tai	Colimau, Bobonaro	18
Afonso Mau pelu	Kotabot, Bobonaro	53
Dominggos Bere Tai	Carabau, Bobonaro	49
Marcelo Pereira	Carabau, Bobonaro	27
João Manu Tai	Carabau, Bobonaro	24
João Francolin	Carabau, Bobonaro	28
Mateus Malimau	Carabau, Bobonaro	30
Mateus Maia	Tasibalu Carabau, Bobonaro	45
Daniel Maubere	Uduhai, Carabau, Bobonaro	16	Student
Carlito Tasi	Uduhai, Carabau, Bobonaro	18	Student
Tailoko Baluk	Tasibalu, Carabau, Bobonaro	35
Anastacio A das Neves	Tasibau, Carabau, Bobonaro	48
Francisco Bere Mau	Lefo, Zumalai-Suai	48
Angelino Mauleso	Lefo, Zumalai-Suai	19
Martinho Bere Mau	Lefo, Zumalai-Suai	26

Name	Address	Age	Occupation
Ernesto Bere Dasi	Lefo, Zumalai-Suai	39
Felix Mau Loko	Lefo, Zumalai-Suai	15	Student
Alfredo Soares	Lefo, Zumalai-Suai	35
Paul Bere	Lefo, Zumalai-Suai	49
Fernando de Sena	Lefo, Zumalai-Suai	50
Agustino L	Lefo, Zumalai-Suai	53
Felisiano Mau Ati	Lefo, Zumalai-Suai	42

588. According to one informant, members of the Indonesian military executed Afonso Maia, Alfedo Nascimento, José de Sena and Martinho de Sena at the Lomea River in 1984.[678] Another informant told the Commission that in 1984 Rojito dos Santos, Carlos Magno and João Magno were detained at the Zumalai Koramil and subsequently executed at the Lomea River.[679] Yet another informant told the Commission that eight unidentified individuals were executed by the 412th Infantry Battalion in Talegol Lolo Leten in early 1984.[680] In late February 1984, Afonso da Cruz was arrested, interrogated, forced to help ABRI search for Fretilin/Falintil and then killed by Hansip members in Baganasa (Zumalai). On 8 March 1984, José Cardoso was arrested in Lour Village for hiding a Fretilin flag in his house. He was taken to the Koramil office, tortured and then executed.[681]

589. The Commission received reports about further arrests and killings in Lour following a major confrontation between ABRI and Falintil there in July 1984. On 13 July, Simião Pereira, Miguel Pereira and Jaime de Jesus were arrested in Lour and taken to Bobonaro where they were killed by the Indonesian military.[682] At least 20 people from Lour were arrested and killed by the Indonesian military, including Special Forces based in Bobonaro. Olandino Guterres told the Commission:

> On July 1984, ABRI troops from Infantry Battalion 407 together with members of Hansip came to Pelek, [Lour]…They came with SKS and AR-16 weapons. About 20 people were arrested. I knew some of them: Vitorino, Joaquim and Luis. After being arrested, they were beaten until black and blue then separated: seven victims were handed over to Infantry Battalion 412 to be killed, while 13 other people were taken by Infantry Battalion 407 to be handed in to the Sub-district administrator of Bobonaro. All the victims were killed there.[683]

Table 39: Individuals executed or disappeared in Covalima and Bobonaro Districts, 1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Afonso Maia	1984	Lomea			Killed
Alfredo Nascimento	1984	Lomea			Killed
José de Sena	1984	Lomea			Killed
Martinho de Sena	1984	Lomea			killed

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Rojito dos Santos	1984	Lomea			Killed
Carlos Magno	1984	Lomea			Killed
João Magno	1984	Lomea			Killed
Afonso da Cruz	Feb. 1984	Baganasa			Killed
José Cardoso	8 Mar. 1984	Zumalai			Executed
José	March–May 1984	Bobonaro			Executed
Marcello	March–May 1984	Bobonaro			Executed
João Mauati	March–May 1984	Bobonaro			Executed
João Dasimau	March–May 1984	Bobonaro			Executed
Simião Pereira	July 1984	Bobonaro			Executed
Miguel Pereira	July 1984	Bobonaro			Executed
Jaime de Jesus	July 1984	Bobonaro			Executed
Vitorino	July 1984	Bobonaro			Executed
Joaquim	July 1984	Bobonaro			Executed
Luis	July 1984	Bobonaro			Executed

591. The Commission also received a list of 40 individuals from Bobonaro and Covalima Districts reportedly killed by the Indonesian military in 1984.[684]

591. The Commission received information about a number of people who were executed or disappeared after being taken into custody by the Infantry Battalion 412. Alberto was killed in Tibar (Liquiçá) in 1984;[685] Domingos Lobato was killed in Ulmera in 1984;[686] on 14 February members of this battalion disappeared a man named Lekimosu in Tibar (Liquiçá);[687] in April a man named Mausera disappeared in Riheu;[688] and Afonso de Araújo disappeared in Liquiçá;[689] and in November 1984 Cananti da Silva was arrested, reportedly taken to Dili and then disappeared.[690] Other reports of disappearance in Liquiçá which were received by the Commission include the disappearance of Manuel Soares from Ulmera in 1983;[691] the arrest and disappearance of João Martins Pereira from his home in Tibar on 22 April 1984; and, on 27 April 1983, the arrest and disappearance of Maubere and Orlando in Fahilebo (Bazartete) by members of the Special Forces (Kopassandha).[692]

Table 40: Individuals executed or disappeared in Liquiçá, 1983–1984, as reported to the CAVR

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Manuel Soares	1983	Ulmera			Disappeared
Alberto	1984	Tibar			Killed
Domingos Lobato	1984	Ulmera			Killed

Name	Date	Location	Age	Occupation	Description
Lekimosu	14 Feb. 1984	Tibar			Disappeared
Mausera	April 1984	Riheu			Disappeared
Afonso de Araújo	April 1984	Liquiçá			Disappeared
João Martins Pereira	22 April 1984	Tibar			Disappeared
Maubere	27 April 1984	Fahilebo			Disappeared
Orlando	27 April 1984	Fahilebo			Disappeared
Cananti da Silva	12 Nov. 1984	Tibar			Disappeared

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances by TNI 1985–1989

592. In contrast to the previous period, extra-judicial executions and disappearances from 1985-88 decreased sharply. Most of the cases documented by the Commission occurred in the eastern districts (Lautém, Baucau and Viqueque) with only a small number occurring in other districts. Many of the victims during the late 1980s were targeted because they were members of clandestine networks or because they were related to members of Fretilin or Falintil. During this period the peak military command, Koopskam, was run by Kostrad's 1st Infantry Division, which conducted Operations Watumisa 1 and 2. Military publications report the arrest of large numbers of alleged "GPK" (Gerombolan Pengacau Keamanan, Bands of Security Disruptors – generally the name used to refer to the Resistance or those suspected of links to the Resistance): 328 in 1985, 364 in 1986, 327 in 1987, and 98 between January and 8 July 1988. However, skirmishes between Falintil and Indonesian forces continued during this period. During these years, ABRI lost 122 personnel in 1985, 169 in 1986, 92 in 1987 and 66 during the first six months of 1988.*

593. The December 1988 decision to "open" Timor-Leste was accompanied by the adoption of a new, "softer" military policy (see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation), which was reflected in a further decrease in fatal violations commited by ABRI towards the end of the 1980s.

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances in Eastern Region (1985–1989)

594. The Commission received reports of at least 42 persons being killed or "disappearing" during this period in Lautém, Baucau and Viqueque Districts. The majority of these cases involved the detention and subsequent killing or disappearance of the victim as shown in the examples below:

* 35 Tahun Darma Bakti Kostrad, [no bibliographic information available], pp. 86-88.

- In 1988 a woman named Carmila Cabral was taken from the home of Alcina Maria in Lore I (Lospalos, Lautém) by members of a combat engineering battalion (Zipur). She had been staying at Alcina Maria's house for two months after her mother, Rosa Maria, went to hide in the forest. She was handed over to Battalion 744, and never returned.[693]
- On 15 August 1985 Adolfo Fraga, coordinator of the clandestine network in Baucau, was arrested by a Kodim intelligence officer at the house of the Sub-district administrator of Baucau in Bahu, Baucau, where he was hiding. He was taken to the Kodim in Baucau, and subsequently disappeared.[694]
- In March 1988, four men were arrested in the aldeia of Fatulia (Venilale, Baucau) by members of Infantry Battalion 328 and the village head of Uatulia. They were detained at the battalion post in Ubanakala and were tortured when they refused to give information about the whereabouts of Falintil. One of them named Joaquim was reportedly executed.[695]
- On 7 March 1985 Miguel Soares and his friend Luis - both of whom were active in the clandestine movement - were arrested in Babulo (Uatolari, Viqueque) by the hamlet chief (chefe de povoção), and taken to the security post in the aldeia of Aliambata. There both were severely beaten. Miguel died as a result of the beating.[696]
- On 8 March 1985, José da Costa, the head of the aldeia of Iralafai (Bauro, Lospalos, Lautém), and five others, Cristovão Caetano, Francisco dos Santos, João Graciano, Pancracio Pereira and Leopoldino, were summoned by the local Babinsa and executed.[697]
- In 1986, a man called Armando was reportedly arrested and killed by Indonesian military in Ossu (Viqueque).[698]
- On 7 April 1986, a group of men were reportedly arrested in Buicaren (Viqueque, Viqueque) where they were detained by a Nanggala (Kopassus, Special Forces) unit. Luis Pinto was allegedly tortured and subsequently died.[699]
- In Viqueque, in December 1986, after a Falintil attack, members of Battalion 122 summoned a number of men in Beaço to be interrogated. One informant told the Commission:

> On 16 February 1986, Fretilin forces attacked a number of students (junior and senior high school) in Wenara. The students were: Armindo Almeida, Julio da Silva, Alipio Soares, Jeronimo, Lourenco, José Mariano and José. During the attack two of the students – Julio da Silva and José Mariano – were shot dead by Fretilin forces, while the others managed to escape. As a result of that attack, on 18 December 1986 TNI forces from Battalion 122 arrested 6 people from Beaço; among others: Pedro Martins, Raul Izak, Alberto Sequilari, Miguel Gusmão, Paul de Araújo and Paul da Silva. I don't know where they were taken after their arrest, they just disappeared, and their whereabouts are unknown to this day.[700]

595. Another pattern was the killing of civilians who had been forcibly recruited to take part in military operations, as occurred in the earlier years of the occupation. For example:

- In September 1986, members of Kopassus arrested Martinho Madeira, the chief of the aldeia of Fuat (Iliomar, Lautém). He was taken to Baucau and then returned to Iliomar. On his return to Iliomar he was ordered to look for Falintil in the forest, accompanied by members of the military. Once in the forest, the soldiers killed him and burned his body, according to two eye-witnesses.[701]
- In 1987 Sergeant Bayani, commander of the Kopassus post in Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém) ordered a woman rape victim to search for her husband, a member of Falintil, in the forest. As this woman, Josefina, looked for her husband, members of Battalion 144 found her and shot her dead.[702]
- In February 1987, Elias Fernandes was forced to join Hansip members in Vessoru (Uatolari), but was then killed by members of the Indonesian military.[703]
- In 1988, members of Infantry Battalion 726 and members of Tim Makikit allegedly killed Luis da Cruz and Carlos da Silva as they were going to do guard duty in Lacluta, Viqueque.[704]
- Also in Viqueque, on 14 July 1985, members of the Infantry Battalion 321 killed an East Timorese man involved in a military exercise in Afaloicai (Uato Carbau). A deponent explained what happened:

  On 14 July 1985 the Indonesian Army from Battalion 321 shot Adelino Boro Kili dead in the sub-district of Uato Carbau, the village of Afaloicai, to be precise in the area known as Betu Ana. At the time, the victim had been ordered by Battalion 321 to undertake anti-guerilla training. The training was in anticipation of an attack by Falintil. Some TNI from Battalion 321 disguised themselves as Falintil and attacked Afaloicai at 3.00am. The victim and his friends were acting as village security, and were composing a plan to capture Battalion 321, who were disguised as Fretilin. Just as the victim moved to capture the enemy, he was shot dead by one of the members of Battalion 321, in the area of Betu Ana Ho'o. [705]

596. Most of the victims of these fatal violations had some connection to Fretilin/Falintil. Carlos dos Santos, for example, was killed by ABRI troops in Lautém in 1986 when he was running to the forest to join Falintil forces.[706] On 4 March 1987, in Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém), Francisco Teles met another man to discuss setting up a clandestine cell. The man denounced him to Battalion 745. Members of Battalion 745 came and shot dead Francisco Teles and his friend Pedro Secundo.[707]

597. However, other fatal violations seemed to be random cases of the killing of civilians who were simply at the wrong place at the wrong time or for some reason antagonised a member of the security apparatus. Such cases are illustrated in the table below.

Table 41: Summaries of random fatal violations against civilians in the eastern area, 1985–1989

District	Summary
Lautém	Following a Falintil attack on the village of Ailebere in January 1985, a man named Zeferino Hornay injured his leg as he was rebuilding his house which had been burned, along with many others, in the attack. Members of the Indonesian military brought him on consecutive days to the Indonesian military command post in Iliomar to be treated for the injury. After his second visit to the command post he never reappeared.[708] Also in 1987, Infante Pereira was killed by members of Battalion 327 in Lore, Lospalos. He was killed at their base on Mount Maureno by being stabbed in the stomach with a bayonet.[709] In August 1987, members of Battalion 745 killed Manuel Mesquita in Fuiloro (Lospalos).[710] On 7 August 1988, members of Battalion 511 were reported to have fired on a group of four men from Duadere (Moro), who were out looking for food. One of the four, Victor Morais, was wounded in the leg and, unlike the other three, was unable to escape. Members of Battalion 511 then shot Victor Morais dead.[711] On 28 March 1988 Lamberto Nunes, Angelo Baptista and Albino were ordered by troops from Kodim 1629 to fetch some bamboo in the forest. On their way home Albino climbed a coconut tree. Albino taunted some Indonesian soldiers by challenging them to attack. Suddenly a member of Battalion 315 stationed in a fort about 300 metres away began shooting at them and Lamberto Nunes was shot dead.[712]
Viqueque	On 13 March 1987, members of the Kopassus unit Nanggala 15, allegedly shot and killed Domingos da Costa who was with his father in their garden in Beto-Abu (Ossurua, Ossu).[713] Some time in 1988, Julio Amaral went with his dog to work in his rice field in Daibonubai (Uaibobo, Ossu). Soon after his family heard gunfire, and some time later his dog returned without his master. His wife went to the rice field and found her husband dead with a cloth tied over his eyes. His widow suspects that troops from Battalions 328 and 215 were the perpetrators because they were on an operation in the area at the time.[714] On 6 May 1988, members of Battalion 407 are reported to have fired on four civilians in Ossu, killing a man named Ernesto. Two of the others were wounded and taken to the Battalion 407 post, while the fourth man escaped to the forest. The two captured men were interrogated about the whereabouts of Falintil and released after receiving treatment for their wounds.[715]
Baucau	In 1986 or 1987, members of Battalion 516 from Lariguto (Asalaitula) are reported to have shot dead Mateus do Régo and another man also named Mateus. After they were killed, their mouths and throats were reportedly slashed with machetes, and their legs riddled with bullets. A third man, Abel Sico Lai, who was with the other two, was taken away and disappeared. The three were digging cassava in their gardens in the aldeia of Ro'o Isi (Uai-Oli, Venilale) when the soldiers opened fire on them.[716] Also in 1987, in Ossohuna (Baguia, Baucau), Domingos da Costa was killed by members of Battalion 713 while on his way to his garden.[717] In 1988, members of the Infantry Battalion 713 are reported to have summoned Julião Ximenes from Samaguia (Tequinomata, Baguia) to go with them to Indonesia. He has not been seen since.[718] On 12 January 1988, Francisco and Domingos were reportedly killed by members of Battalion 315 in Badoho'o (Venilale) while on their way to their rice field.[719]

Other killings and disappearances (1985–1989)

598. Many victims in districts outside the eastern region were also targeted because of their clandestine activities or family relationships to persons still in the forest. However, other victims were peasants who had started to work land further from population centres who were killed at random by frustrated or suspicious military personnel. The following table shows fatal violations reported to the Commission during this period.

Table 42: Summaries of random fatal violations against civilians in other districts, 1985–1989

District	Summary
Manufahi	On 15 December 1985, members of Battalion 410 are reported to have killed Julio Tilman in Betano because he was suspected of working with Falintil.[720] In January 1986, a Hansip member beat Raimundo Sarmento, aged 58, in Raifusa (Betano, Same) because he was suspected of making contact with Falintil. He was rushed to hospital but the doctor said that his condition was terminal; he was taken home and died one week later.[721]
Ainaro	In 1986, Hansip members in Manetu (Maubisse) arrested Abrão Rodrigues on the orders of the village head. He was held in the village office for one year where he was beaten continually and deprived of food and water until he eventually died.[722] In September 1986, Julião de Araújo was ordered to go hunting with the village head and a Hansip in Hato Udo. He never returned.[723]
Ermera	In 1987 members of the Indonesian military allegedly killed six youths in Atara, (Atsabe, Ermera).[724] The Commission received an unconfirmed report that in 1988 members of the Indonesian military burned Maubere Ketil and Alberto alive in the aldeia of Leimea, Sarin Balu (Letefoho).[725]
Dili	On 28 August 1985, Antonio Simões was reportedly killed by members of the Indonesian military in Kampung Alor. He had been told by an Indonesian soldier to attend school in Dili, but had argued with the soldier before he was killed.[726] On 17 August 1987 Paul de Jesus, a member of Hansip, was shot in Vila Verde by members of the Indonesian military who found out that his father was a clandestine leader.[727]

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances by Indonesian security forces, 1990–1998

599. The Commission found that from the late 1980s until the explosion of violence in 1999, significantly fewer unlawful killings and massacres were reported, with the dramatic exception of the Santa Cruz Massacre of 12 November 1991. Despite the decrease in reported executions, even excluding the executions and disappearances that occurred during and after the Santa Cruz Massacre, the Commission received testimonies from most districts regarding at least 185 killings and disappearances during this period. The Indonesian military responded to the activities of a small number of armed Resistance fighters and an increasingly sophisticated clandestine movement by subjecting civilians sympathetic to the Resistance to arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment, and enforced disappearances and killings. The witness testimonies below show that the Indonesian military continued to terrorise the population and kill civilians.

Santa Cruz Massacre (November 1991)

600. On the morning of 12 November 1991, Indonesian security forces opened fire on a thousand or more demonstrators gathered at the Santa Cruz Cemetery in Dili. This demonstration against Indonesian occupation, led by clandestine groups in Dili, was the largest since 1975. Tensions in Dili heightened with the August announcement of a planned visit by a Portuguese parliamentary delegation. The Resistance was preparing a large demonstration to coincide with the visit, which was scheduled for 4 November. However, on 25 October the Portuguese parliament suspended the visit in protest at the Indonesian demand that journalists, including Jill Jolliffe and Rui Araújo, not be allowed to accompany the delegation. The cancellation of the visit disappointed the Resistance, especially as the preparations made by the clandestine movement throughout the country had risked exposing its networks to Indonesian intelligence. Towards the end of October, the military's harrassment of activists in Dili escalated, culminating in a raid on the Motael Church on 28 October. The raid left two dead, an East Timorese "intel" and a clandestine activist, Sebastião Gomes Rangel, whose funeral was held the next day. The Resistance decided to use the occasion of the flower-laying service for Sebastião Gomes on 12 November – while the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, Professor Pieter Kooijmans, was also in Dili – to demonstrate for independence.

601. Approximately 3,500 people attended a mass at the Motael Church that ended at about 7.00am on 12 November. A procession then started from the Church and headed towards the Santa Cruz Cemetery. It immediately turned into a demonstration. Activists displayed pro-independence banners and flags. After passing in front of the Governor's office the march turned south at the T-junction where the Kodim headquarters was located, because the road to Hotel Turismo was blocked by Brimob (Mobile Police Brigade). At about 7.15am, in front of the Dharma Wanita office, a scuffle occurred in which Major Andi Gerhan Lantara was stabbed and his assistant, Private Domingos, was also injured. Leonardo de Araújo, a demonstrator, told the Commission that he was also stabbed in the right leg by a man in a camouflage uniform just near the Kodim.* As the demonstration proceeded, some marchers threw stones at the Summa Bank and the Regional Police (Polwil) headquarters on Bispo Madeiros Avenue. The march turned east at the intersection of the Military Police Detachment and the Balide Church, and arrived at Santa Cruz Cemetery at approximately 7.50am where some 500 other demonstrators were already waiting.

602. In 2004, the Commission obtained six Indonesian military documents concerning the events of 12 November 1991 that list the units which were mobilised for the demonstration.[*] They included the following:

* CAVR Interview with Leonardo de Araújo, Dili, 27 November 2004.

- A platoon from Brimob 5486 under the command of First Lieutenant (Police) Maman Hermawan.
- A Combined Company led by Second Lieutenant Sugiman Mursanib comprising a platoon of Brimob 5486 under the command of Second Lieutenant Rudolf A. Roja and three platoons from Battalion 303 comprising Company C under the command of Second Lieutenant John Aritonang, Company D under the command of Lieutenant Handrianus Eddy Sunaryo and another company whose commander is not known.
- A group of about 24 soldiers from Company A, Battalion 303 under Captain Yustin Dino. This included at least three Milsas (East Timorese recruited from civil defence units, such as Hansip, into the regular military structure), namely Second Privates Jorge Barreto, Domingos da Conceição and Financio Barreto.
- An anti-riot detachment from Battalion 744.

603. The Military Police (Pom) investigation identified First Sergeant Udin Syukur as the first soldier to open fire.[†] At his trial Sergeant Syukur said that he and the demonstrators had had an altercation, which, he claimed, led him to shoot either side of them though he claimed no one was hit. Marito Mota told the Commission that he saw one of the demonstrators approach the soldiers and try to say something. This person was the first to be shot and he said that after this the demonstrators began to flee in panic.[‡]

604. A period of intense firing quickly followed. Russell Anderson, one of the foreign eyewitnesses of the massacre, described this sudden escalation of firing by the soldiers.

> Bob Muntz and I decided we should leave. I had taken ten hurried steps north along the cemetery wall and was glancing back to see the helmets of the military front line bobbing up and down, jogging or marching towards the crowd. The crowd began to walk backwards, walk away, some were already running.
>
> Suddenly a few shots rang out, continued by an explosive volley of automatic rifle fire that persisted for two to three minutes. It sounded

* Two of the documents were issued by the Regional Military Command IX Udayana, East Timor Operation Implementation Command (Kolakops): as follows: 1: Special Report on the 12 November 1991 Incident in Dili, East Timor, No. Lapsus/26/XI/1991, 13 November 1991; 2: Special Report on Uncovering Rioters Involved in the Demonstration of 12 November 1991 Incident at Santa Cruz, Dili, East Timor, December 1991.
Four documents were issued by the Regional Military Command IX Udayana, Military Police Detachment IX/4: *1. Special Report on the Brief Resumé of the Investigation of Riot Control Officers relating to the Demonstration by Anti-Integration Group and its Supporters on 12 November 1991, No. Lapsus/487/XI/199*1, 26 November 1991; 2. Report on Investigation into the 12 November 1991 Incident, No. R/488/XII/1991, December 1991; 3. Special Report on the Result of the Investigation of Riot-Control Officers at the 12 November 1991 Demonstration, No. Lapsus/03/XII/1991, January 1992; 4. Case Investigation File Concerning the Case of the Accused: First Sergeant Aloysius Rani, Denpasar, No. DPP-10/A-09/Military Police Regional Command IX/1992, April 1992.

† Special Report on the Result of the Investigation of Riot-Control Officers at the 12 November 1991 Demonstration, No. Lapsus/03/XII/1991, January 1992 > like the whole 15 in the front row had their fingers pressed firmly on the trigger. They were firing directly into the crowd. *

‡ CAVR Interview with Marito Mota, 28 November 2004.

605. The Third Military Police Report concluded that "elements" of Battalion 303's two platoons, under Second Lieutenant Mursanib, along with the Battalion 303 company from Taibessi, overtook the Brimob platoon because the latter looked as if they were hesitant to proceed. These "elements" formed into a unit in front of the Brimob platoon. Mursanib ordered two warning shots, but by the second shot troops, including three East Timorese auxiliaries to Battalion 303, were already shooting directly into the crowd. Jacinto Alves, a clandestine activist involved in organising the demonstration, heard the order to shoot as he passed troops coming from Taibessi. Many years later, he told UN investigators:

> On reaching a bridge called "My Friend", which is about 100 metres from the cemetery, a group of Indonesian soldiers, bare-chested and armed, passed me and stopped two metres ahead. I identified them as Battalion 744 members because of the direction they were coming from. One of them, whom I do not know, instructed his colleagues to shoot the demonstrators on the spot. I did not expect the orders to be carried out owing to the presence of the [UN] human rights rapporteur in Dili at the time…[A]fter I heard these orders I turned and started heading for my residence. After walking approximately 200 metres, I heard rapid gun-shots for about five minutes, followed by isolated single shots that continued long after I reached my house.[728]

606. The bare-chested troops Jacinto Alves saw advancing were in fact a group of soldiers under the command of Yustin Dino from Battalion 303. At least four Brimob members testified to the military investigators that they saw shots fired by bare-chested soldiers.[729] Soldiers also started shooting from inside the Indonesian Seroja Heroes' Cemetery directly opposite Santa Cruz Cemetery. Marcio Cipriano Gonçalves told the Commission that he saw soldiers inside the Heroes' Cemetery pointing their guns at the demonstrators and that he was almost hit by a bullet fired from that direction.[730]

607. Many witnesses recalled that they continued to hear shooting for some time.[731] Simplicio Celestino de Deus told the Commission that many were killed during the main burst of firing, but that many others were also killed in various ways in its immediate aftermath:

> When I got into the cemetery, the guns were still being fired and continued to be for about 10 minutes. Inside the cemetery I looked for a place to hide. Then the military stormed in, beating victims with rifles and kicking them. Many were killed in the cemetery, but many more were killed outside the cemetery as they tried to run away or were taken from their homes and other places where they were hiding, and murdered.
>
> The military found me, beat me and wounded my ear. Later a policeman came and severed it completely…Because of all the blood they threw me into the back of an Indonesian military truck full of dead bodies. When the truck started moving I realised that one of the people in the truck was still alive. He tried to get up and asked the guards for water. Instead of giving him water, the soldier in charge slashed his throat with a bayonet.[732]

* Russell Anderson, Statement on the Massacre in East Timor on 12 November 1991, first submitted to the Joint Parliamentary Committee for Trade and Defence (Australia), 2 December 1991.

608. Medical files presented at the trial of Gregório da Cunha Saldanha, a clandestine leader involved in organising the 12 November demonstration, list 19 dead and 91 wounded. They also indicate the general pattern of the shootings.[733] Of the 17 victims listed as shot at the cemetery, six were hit by bullets fired from in front of them and which lodged in the upper part of the body, mostly around the chest. This suggests deliberate firing directed at the demonstrators' bodies. Of the 91 wounded victims, 43 sustained bullet wounds, 21 of those with bullet wounds were shot from behind and were hit in the back, the buttocks, and the back of their legs and necks.

The death of Kamal Bamadhaj

Kamal bin Ahmed Bamadhaj, 21, was the only foreigner who lost his life in Dili on 12 November 1991. He was watching the demonstration at Santa Cruz Cemetery together with six other foreigners. It is likely he was standing close to the front line of demonstrators, as security forces were gathering at the T-junction. He somehow escaped the massacre and reached Bispo Madeiros Avenue where he was shot by a passing patrol. The Indonesian military court-martialed two low-ranking East Timorese soldiers – Second Private Afonso de Jesus and Second Private Mateus Maia – on charges related to the death of Kamal.

Helen Todd, Kamal's mother, spoke about his death during the Commission's Public Hearing on Massacres:

Kamal was a student who was born and educated in Malaysia. He was a Muslim. At the time of the Santa Cruz Massacre, Kamal was a second year university student in Australia. When he moved to Australia to study, he was shocked to learn of the situation in Timor. In neighbouring Malaysia he had never heard about East Timor.

Kamal was not shot at Santa Cruz. After the shooting at the cemetery he was walking along the road of the old market. As you know, an "intel" agent had earlier been stabbed. The ABRI unit that took him to the hospital was returning and saw Kamal walking alone and shot him. A member of the International Red Cross tried to take the bleeding Kamal to the civilian hospital, but was refused entry and obliged to go the military hospital, losing precious time. He died after admission from loss of blood. Kamal's death was one small part in the struggle of thousands and thousands. A small thing, but you will understand that it is important to me.

There were so many lies after Kamal's killing. Max Stahl was graphic about the lies told after the Santa Cruz Massacre. I can testify that this is true. For three days the Indonesians denied that any internationals had been killed. Then the official Indonesian report was that Kamal was killed in the crossfire. Then it was suggested that he was some sort of stupid tourist, killed because he should not have been there.

The New Zealand government was initially very helpful in terms of the retrieval of the body, but once this was done it was back to business as usual, [doing] anything to please Indonesia. Malaysia barely acknowledged the killing. The major English-language newspaper wrote of the killing, editorialising generally that young people should not get mixed up in politics, that if they do they are somehow troublemakers.

The Red Cross in Dili was a great help. Kamal was first buried in an unmarked grave in Hera. It was only because of the efforts of the Red Cross representative, Anton Manti, that we had his body removed and were able to have him buried in Malaysia.

This year, on the anniversary [of the massacre], I walked to the place where Kamal was shot. People came out to tell me that the place was a little further along the road. Later that day, I came back to the place. Somebody had come and placed flowers and candles at this place. I thank you.[*]

Alleged killings at Wirahusada Hospital

609. In 1994, two people came forward to claim that they witnessed the killing of people who had been taken to the Wirahusada military hospital after being wounded at Santa Cruz. At the time of the massacre Aviano Antonio Faria was a pupil at the Santo Yosef senior high school and João Antonio Dias a laboratory technician at the Wirahusada Hospital. The two were smuggled out of Timor-Leste and testified to the 50th session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in 1994. The Commission interviewed the two witnesses and a new witness, Inocêncio da Costa Maria Freitas, who had worked for the intelligence branch of the Dili Kodim.

610. Aviano Antonio Faria told the Commission that after he was wounded at Santa Cruz, he was taken from the cemetery to the Wirahusada Hospital and not long afterwards was placed in the morgue.[734] Two Indonesian soldiers came into the room. One had a big stone and the other had two plastic bottles that contained water and some kind of medicine. The soldier with a big stone dropped it on the heads of the seriously wounded. When Faria's turn came, he suddenly stood up and lied to the soldiers that he was an informer for Kopassus, who had been sent to monitor the demonstration. The soldiers allowed him to go, but before that they ordered him to take the medicine. After the medicine induced vomiting, he was taken to the hospital and received treatment. On the night of 12 November, soldiers came into the room where Aviano Antonio Faria and other patients were sleeping. They asked which of them had come from the morgue. Faria remained silent, and they did not take him.

* Helen Todd, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003.

611. João Antonio Dias told the Commission that tablets of formaldehyde were given to the wounded.[735] He told the Commission that he was ordered to help take the bodies brought in to the hospital on trucks. This made him feel sick and he went to the bathroom of the laboratory where he heard a conversation between his supervisor and a group of four soldiers who had come to the laboratory to get sulphuric acid. The soldiers said they wanted to kill the wounded quickly and silently. His supervisor told them that people would scream if they were given sulphuric acid, so the soldiers left and returned later with a drug. When this was administered to the victims, many screamed and then fell silent. The soldiers took away and burned the clothes and shoes of the dead in front of the morgue. Then a water truck came and washed the ground.

612. Inocêncio da Costa Maria Freitas, a member of the Kodim intelligence section, reported to the Commission that he came to Wirahusada Hospital that morning carrying Major Gerhan Lantara who was wounded.[736] While he was there, Kamal Bamadhaj and Gerhan Lantara's assistant, Private Domingos, were brought to the hospital. Hino trucks began arriving and he saw about 200 bodies carried into the hospital. He went to the morgue and there he saw two Indonesian soldiers crushing the heads of the wounded lying on the floor with a stone.

Culpability

613. The Indonesian military and civilian investigations described the demonstrators as bringas or "wild" and claimed they were armed with rifles, pistols, grenades, swords and knives. Both investigations also claimed that the demonstrators threw a grenade and attempted to seize firearms from the soldiers. One witness told the Commission that some of the demonstrators had grenades.[737] Fernando Tilman, a witness at the trial of Gregório da Cunha Saldanha, is recorded as having told the court that he saw a demonstrator, Atino Brewok, shoot a weapon and saw two other demonstrators carrying rifles.[738] However, he told the Commission that what he had told the court was false.[739] The Indonesian investigations failed to present evidence such as photographs or film that showed armed demonstrators. Adding to the sense that these allegations were frabricated was the fact that the Indonesian list of weapons supposedly seized frequently changed.

614. Because the massacre was filmed by the British film-maker Max Stahl and shown around the world it caused unprecedented international outrage, which the Indonesian government could not ignore. The military's strategic intelligence agency, Bais, immediately started an internal investigation, but never announced its findings.[740] A National Commission of Inquiry (NCI) was appointed by President Soeharto to carry out an investigation. Its advance report, issued on 26 December 1991, assigned most of the blame to the demonstrators. It concluded that the response of the Indonesian security personnel was a spontaneous reaction to defend themselves, and, because it had occurred without orders from above had resulted in excessive shooting at the demonstrators.[741] Its full report was not made public. In 1992, ten low-ranking members of the security forces were court-martialed and received sentences of from eight to 18 months. The Indonesian government put the number of confirmed deaths at 19 and those missing at 56 as of 29 November 1991.[742] However, other sources put the death toll far higher. For instance, the list of victims compiled by two Portuguese non-government organisations, published in 1993, contains the names of 271 dead, 382 wounded and 250 missing.[743]

615. The figure for the number of wounded on the list compiled by the Portuguese NGOs was confirmed by an internal Indonesian military investigation, which put the number of wounded taken to Wirahusada Hospital at about 400.[744] In a brief survey of selected Dili neighbourhoods the Commission was able to establish that the whereabouts of 59 people on the Portuguese list of missing people were still unknown. In addition it received the names of a further 18 missing people through its statement-taking process. Excluding duplicated names that were given to the Commission through both processes, the Commission collected the names of a total of 72 people who have been missing since November 1991. It is clear to the Commission that the total number of missing people must be much higher. The Commission's survey was far from comprehensive, covering only a few of Dili's neighbourhoods and excluding much of the area immediately around the Santa Cruz Cemetery itself. Moreover, it is clear that many of those who joined the demonstration came from outside Dili and though it is known that several of them too were killed or disappeared, their number is not known.[745] The Commission has no way of judging how many are still missing, but it believes that a figure of 200 is not an unreasonable estimate.

616. The Commission has also received several reports of extra-judicial executions outside Dili at around the date of the Santa Cruz Massacre. In Sorolau (Ainaro, Ainaro) four clandestine activists were killed by soldiers identified as members of Kopassus and East Timorese Milsas.[746] In Maubisse (Ainaro) a group of 14 men were arrested by East Timorese Sukarelawan acting on the orders of the Maubisse Koramil. They were taken to the local Koramil where they were bound and beaten, and interrogated about their supposed clandestine connections. Two of the men died as a result of the beatings.[747]

617. The Commission believes that a more comprehensive survey than its own is needed. It finds credible reports there is at least one mass grave in Tibar and possibly another one in Hera and believes that a more rigorous investigation is required.[748] The Commission recalls that in his report to the United Nations on his mission to Indonesia and Timor-Leste, the Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions, Bacre Waly Ndiaye, cited Article 17, Paragraph 1 of the Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, which states: "Acts constituting enforced disappearance shall be considered a continuing offence as long as the perpetrators continue to conceal the fate and the whereabouts of persons who have disappeared and these facts remain unclarified."[749]

Case study: Indonesian investigations into the events at Santa Cruz Cemetery on 12 November, 1991

Introduction:

618. When film footage of the massacre at Santa Cruz* was broadcast to audiences around the world it provoked a significant international outcry against the practices of the Indonesian military in Timor-Leste. It brought an unprecedented level of pressure upon Indonesia about the actions of its armed forces in Timor-Leste. However, as the research presented in this section demonstrates, even in the face of strong international demands to bring those who had killed unarmed demonstrators to account, the institutional practices of ABRI/TNI provided the majority of perpetrators who were most responsible with effective impunity.

619. As reported in this section, scores of unarmed demonstrators were executed by heavily armed members of the Indonesian military forces in the course of what has come to be known as the Santa Cruz Massacre. This included shooting civilians in the back when they were running away, stabbing wounded civilians to death, or killing the wounded who were incapacitated by blows to the head. However, the series of subsequent investigations which were carried out by civilian police, military police and the local military command resulted in the demonstrators, who were the victims of the massacre, suffering even further punishment. Demonstrators were variously killed, rounded up, arrested, or faced unfair trials designed to guarantee convictions and ensure long prison sentences.

620. The investigations were not carried out by independent authorities, but were conducted by persons who were connected institutionally to those under investigation. The investigations were thus designed to condemn the demonstrators and in turn exonerate those responsible for the violence. Ultimately, those military officers who were directly involved in shooting or commanded troops who shot the unarmed demonstrators were protected, with only a few low ranking officers facing court martial on relatively minor charges.

Background:

621. The events leading up to and including the killings at the Santa Cruz Cemetery on 12 November 1991, as well as the trials of demonstrators, are examined at length in other parts of this Report.* The United Nations Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions, Mr Bacre Waly Ndiaye (Senegal) visited Indonesia and East Timor from 3 to 13 July 1994 and examined the events of the massacre at Santa Cruz. He presented his report to the UN Commission on Human Rights in February 1995.[750] The evidence which has been presented to the Commission generally confirms the findings of UN Special Rapporteur Ndiaye in his 1994 report on the extra-judicial killings at Santa Cruz.

* Cameraman Max Stahl filmed the demonstration and the reaction by the Indonesian military on 12 November 1991. The film was smuggled out of Timor-Leste within days and broadcast on networks across the world. The Commission has examined this film footage, and holds copies in its Archive. José Ramos-Horta told the Commission that this film footage had changed international perceptions of the situation in Timor-Leste (José Ramos-Horta, Closing Address to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Famine and Forced Displacement, 2003).

622. In particular, the UN Special Rapporteur found that:

- The procession was a peaceful demonstration of political dissent.
- The claims of some officials that the security forces had fired in self-defence and had respected the principles of necessity and the proportionality of use of lethal force were unsubstantiated.
- Security forces had used unnecessary force beyond the extent needed for the performance of their duties.
- The security forces had advance information of the preparations for the demonstration.
- The demonstrators carried no firearms.
- The only act of violence by demonstrators, namely, the stabbing of Major Andi Gerhan Lantara and his assistant, Private Domingos, took place some time before the crowd reached Santa Cruz cemetery.
- No security forces had been killed at or around the cemetery, the site at which they opened fire.[751]

623. The established international standards for assessment of investigations involving possible violation of the right to life are set out in the Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions.[752]

624. According to these principles, the massacre at Santa Cruz required a thorough, prompt and impartial investigation. In line with Principle 9, the purpose of the investigation should have been:

> [T]o determine the cause, manner and time of death, the person[s] responsible, and any pattern or practice which may have brought about that death. It shall include an adequate autopsy, collection and analysis of all physical and documentary evidence and statements from witnesses.

625. On this basis, the Indonesian investigations should have attempted to:

- Identify the numbers and identities of the dead and missing.
- Distinguish between the different reasons for death: natural death, accidental death, suicide and homicide.
- Assess whether a person's right to life was unlawfully taken, that is, taken arbitrarily, for a non-lawful purpose, or in a disproportionate way, or taken summarily.

* See in particular, Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials; Part 7.4: Detention Torture and Ill-treatment; and Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict.

- Determine to a sufficient degree individual and/or command responsibility of person(s) under review in order to recommend further action where such action is justified.

626. This section examines the extent to which the various investigations and actions by Indonesian authorities in response to the killings at the Santa Cruz Cemetery satisfied these standards and therefore discharged Indonesia's duty to hold the perpetrators accountable through a genuine process of investigation, prosecution and punishment of perpetrators.

627. The Commission has considered:

- The investigations conducted by the civilian police in Timor-Leste.
- The investigations conducted by the military in Timor-Leste.
- The investigations conducted by the military police into the actions of military personnel at the incident.
- The investigation of the National Commission of Inquiry (NSI).
- Action taken against members of the armed forces, including the trials of members of the armed forces.

Civilian police investigation*

628. The Indonesian legal system did not provide the police with authority over the military, and so they could only investigate the actions of civilians. In this case the civilians were the demonstrators and victims of crimes allegedly committed by security forces. Nevertheless, the police were required to undertake a fair and diligent investigation into the entire circumstances of the events before they decided that criminal action against the demonstrators was required.

629. It is clear that the police undertook a large-scale investigation. On 13 December the Chief of Police for Timor-Leste (Kepala Kepolisian Wilayah Timor-Timur), Drs. Ishak Kodijat, formally opened an investigation by a 28-person team.[753] However, this investigation was focused from the beginning on bringing the demonstrators to trial. Indeed, on the day of the demonstration and before the investigation had even commenced, the civilian police concluded that subversive crimes had been committed.[754] As a result, the investigation was neither comprehensively nor impartially conducted. The impartiality of the police was further compromised by the fact that the police force was part of the Indonesian armed forces apparatus.

630. The failings in the investigation into the demonstrator's conduct have been discussed in detail in Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials. The evidence examined by the Commission, which included hundreds of official court files and the evidence of witnesses, clearly demonstrated that the court proceedings were designed and implemented to guarantee the conviction of those demonstrators who were charged. Many confessions were obtained through torture, evidence was fabricated, in most cases no defence witnesses were called by court appointed lawyers, none of those charged were acquitted and no appeals were successful. The findings of the Commission included the following:

* The Commission uses this terminology to distinguish the "civilian police" from "military police". At the time of the incident and until 1999, both were part of the armed forces.

- The investigation was directed at punishing the demonstration organisers for their defiance and then to pin blame for events at the cemetery on the demonstrators. The Records of Interview and the court transcripts show that the authorities went to great lengths to draw out details about the alleged brutality of the demonstrators and how the security forces were attacked and provoked into shooting in self-defence, while avoiding the issue of what actually happened at the cemetery when dealing with demonstrators or organisers.
- There is nothing on the files of the defendants to indicate that police investigators attended, let alone secured and conducted a forensic investigation, at the site of the mass killings at the Santa Cruz Cemetery.[*] Further, the materials examined by the Commission also do not indicate that any investigation into the alleged stabbings of the two ABRI soldiers outside the Kodim was carried out.[†]
- Admissions made during interviews by suspects were made under conditions of duress, sometimes torture, and in the absence of obligatory defence lawyers (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).
- The court files contain the medical reports for the two ABRI members who were attacked by demonstrators, but there was no documentation whatsoever about the demonstrators who were killed or wounded by security forces. There were not even details of the 19 persons (18 unidentified persons plus the Malaysian student Kamal Bamadhaj) that the authorities alleged were the only persons who were killed that day. UN Special Rapporteur Ndiaye concluded the following:

> According to the Chief of the East Timor Police, the bodies of the acknowledged 19 victims were buried at Hera on 13 November, one day after the killings. No adequate autopsy had been performed, no pictures of the corpses had been taken and,

* The Santa Cruz files in the District Court of Dili reveal that on 12 November the police were gathering items in relation to the stoning of the Bank Summa and the old Regional Police Station (Polwil Lama): Achmad Bey, Kebag Serse (head of the investigation section), issued an order for the seizure of a rock and shards of glass from the Bank Summa and five rocks and shards of glass from the Polwil Lama [Surat Perintah Penyitaan, No. Pol. SPPNY/illegible/XI/1991/Serse, 12 Nopember 1991, Kebag Serse, Achmad Bey]. The next day, the police informed the District Court of Dili that they had identified José Francisco da Costa in relation to the stone-throwing and sought to have the confiscation of the rock and shards of glass legitimised [Mohon Persetujuan Penyitaan Barang Bukti, No.Pol. B/1294/XI/1991/Serse. Under the KUHAP, confiscation of evidence requires a court order. An immediate confiscation requires retrospective approval of the court. This was provided by the District Court of Dili on 17 December 1991 in its Penetapan No. 154/Pen.Pid/1991/PN.DIL.]. The same was done in relation to José Barreto, suspected of having thrown the rocks at the Polwil Lama. [Mohon Persetujuan Penyitaan Barang Bukti, No. Pol. B/1243/XI/1991/Serse. Approval was granted by the District Court of Dili on 17 December 1991 in its Penetapan No: 153/Pen.Pid/1991/PN.DIL.].

† However, the Second Warouw Report, infra, states that Major Gerhan Lentara was stabbed by Mariano and Siko (witness Julio da Costa) and Private Dominggos da Costa was attacked by Francisco Amaral, p.4.

to date, 18 of the bodies remain unidentified. It is not known what measures were taken as regards the bodies of victims allegedly buried in mass graves. The Special Rapporteur therefore reached the same conclusion as the NCI, which reported that "there was careless handling of those who died, because although the visum et repertums were performed the deceased were not properly identified. Little opportunity was given to the families/friends of the victims to identify the bodies."*

- No photographs of the allegedly armed, violent and "brutal" demonstrators, who taunted and attacked the security forces, were included in the files. This is particularly surprising given the number of intelligence officers who were monitoring the movements of the crowd (one of whom was Major Gerhan Lentara, who was taking photographs when he was stabbed).† Only manually drawn diagrammes of events were included. The Commission observes that audio and visual recordings and equipment were confiscated and there was one video in wide circulation showing what happened at Santa Cruz – that made by Max Stahl and shown by Yorkshire Television of the United Kingdom. This was never taken into consideration.‡ Likewise, neither military nor police case files contain statements from any of the foreigners who were present.
- The police failed to properly identify the weapons said to have been seized at the Santa Cruz Cemetery and used against the security forces by demonstrators. There is nothing to indicate who found what, where and when, and thus nothing to show that the items were actually found at the cemetery or on the persons of demonstrators. There is only a list of items on the files accompanied by the description:

> Some of the items of evidence were found in the TKP by members of Brimob, and then handed to the Sub-Regional Police of East Timor, then confiscated by Investigators.

- Specific notes were made about items seized from the Bank Summa and the old Sub-Regional Police Station, as well as items seized from the home of

* Ndiaye Report, para 56. The Special Rapporteur reported that all the East Timorese witnesses whom he met said that there had been no public appeal for families to come and identify the bodies, as had been claimed by East Timor's Chief of Police.

† The absence of this material puts it out of the usual pattern of virtually all the political trials that the Commission has examined. For instance, the case file of Inacio de Jesus dos Santos in relation to a demonstration at the University of East Timor on 9 January 1995, contains several photographs of the demonstration and the arrest of the accused. [Inacio de Jesus dos Santos, Case File: 36/PID.B/1995/PN.DIL].

‡ The Commission observes that the failure to use relevant evidence was also a feature at the trials in Jakarta conducted by the Ad Hoc Human Rights Court on East Timor in 2002 and 2003 – perhaps the most striking being the failure to consider film footage showing militia leader Eurico Guterres' addressing a crowd of militia, in the presence of senior Indonesian officials, just prior to militia going on a rampage around Dili, attacking the home of Manuel Carrascalão and killing at least 12 people. The Commission has also examined this film footage and holds copies of the footage in its Archive.

accused demonstrators Francisco Branco and Jacinto Alves.[755] The list of items that the police entered in evidence was different from the several military lists (see below), above all for containing no firearms. This discrepancy is significant, for it was the police who were said by the military police to have been in possession of the firearms.[756]

631. The United Nations Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions found that the civilian police investigations were inadequate because:

- As a part of the armed forces, they lacked independence and impartiality.
- Forensic examinations, in particular autopsies and ballistics tests, were inadequate: "The Chief of Police told the Special Rapporteur that the necessary technological means were not available in East Timor."
- The criminal investigation was inadequate, failing to identify either perpetrators or victims, nor even the number of victims or ascertain the number and whereabouts of missing persons. He particularly noted that the police simply focused on investigating the demonstrators.[757]
- There was careless handling of the bodies of the deceased, including burial of the bodies one day after the killings without adequate autopsies, photographs or thorough identification.[758]
- Little effort went into identification of bodies and the Rapporteur did not accept that any public appeal had been made for families of the missing to examine bodies at the morgue.[759]

Reports by the military command in Timor-Leste

632. The military command in Timor-Leste conducted its own investigations into the events at Santa Cruz. Two reports were prepared by the head of the Operations Implementation Command in East Timor (Komando Operasi Pelaksana Timor Timur, Kolakops Timor Timur, Kolakops), Brigadier General Rudolf S. Warouw, and sent to the Regional Military Command based in Bali. These reports, dated 13 November 1991 and 30 December 1991, presented the official military version of what happened at the demonstration and explained the response of the security forces.* They are referred to here as the First and Second Warouw Report respectively.† No attempt appears to have been made by the military to investigate the unlawful killings on 12 November 1991 or the other serious human rights violations which took place there.

* These documents were submitted to the Commission by the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation of the RDTL, José Ramos-Horta, and are held in the CAVR Archive. They were among those requested, but never received, by Special Rapporteur Ndiaye.

† Laporan Khusus Lapsus/26/XI/1991 tentang Peristiwa '12 November 1991' di Dili, Timor Timur, Special Report Lapsus/26/XI/1991 regarding the '12 November incident' in Dili, East Timor dated 13 November, from Komando Pelaksanana Operasi Timor Timur (Pangkolakops). The 22-page report from the chief of Kolakops was sent to the commander-in-chief of the Regional Military Command, based in Bali, and copied to 10 others including the Commander-in-Chief of the Indonesian Armed Forces (Panglima ABRI), and the Chief of Staff of the Army (Kepala Staf Angkatan Darat); Laporan Khusus Tentang Pengungkapan Para Perusuh Yang Terlibat Dalam Peristiwa Demonstrasi 12 Nopember 1991 Di Santa Cruz, Dili, Timor Timur, [Special report on the disclosure of the rioters of 12 November 1991 demonstration in Santa Cruz, Dili, East Timor] dated December 1991 (no day entered) signed and sealed by Komando Pelaksana Operasi.

633. The District of Dili was designated "Sector C" by Kolakops and the sector was under the command of Infantry Colonel Binsar Aruan. Colonel Binsar formed the Combined Company on the night of 11 November to manage the flower-laying ceremony for Sebastião Gomes Rangel, which the military was aware was to happen the next day. The Combined Company was composed of one platoon of the Police Mobile Brigade (Brimob) and two platoons of soldiers from Battalion 303. Some soldiers apparently also came from the Dili District Military Command (Kodim Dili), as well as from Battalion 744.

The First Warouw Report

634. The First Warouw Report reveals that military investigations were carried out immediately after the incident but that only members of the security forces were interviewed. The Report contains a 22-page document signed by Brigadier General Warouw, which is based on a 12-page accompanying document by Colonel Binsar Aruan. Colonel Binsar was the commander of Sector C, the military area covering Dili. He had formed the Combined Company, comprising two platoons from Battalion 303 and one Brimob platoon, the evening before the demonstration. The Combined Company was commanded by Second Lieutenant Mursanib.

635. As well as the two written documents, the First Warouw Report also contains diagrammes showing troop movements in relation to the visit of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture, Professor Pieter Kooijmans, which was taking place at the time, and in anticipation of and following the demonstration. It contains details of weapons seized from the Santa Cruz Cemetery and reports that the injured were taken to hospital and 308 persons were taken to police headquarters. Of those, 49 were kept in detention and 259 returned to their families.

636. It is clear that this investigation was not impartial. First, it was made by the person in charge of the armed forces in Timor-Leste, and therefore responsible for the actions of the military at the cemetery. Second, from the outset the military assumed that the demonstration was organised by the Resistance, providing justification for the military's conduct. The First Warouw Report's stated aim was to:

> [R]eport to the Command on the case of the demonstration by an anti-integration group with the support of GPK Fretilin…with the purpose of becoming material for consideration in determining what policy should follow.*

637. The military's analysis of the incident relies on the notion that the demonstration was planned by radical and criminal elements; it was not merely a peaceful commemoration mass. The First Warouw Report states that "those we faced were not demonstrators but were armed guerrillas". Two of the differences between this demonstration and a peaceful mass, which were noted by the First Warouw Report, were merely examples of the exercise of the right to freedom of expression:

* The Kolakops commander-in-chief, Brigadier General Rudolf Warouw, ordered an "investigation of the case of the demonstration by a Fretilin group and their supporters". See the First Warouw Report of 13 November.

- This was the first public display of Fretilin and Falintil flags.
- The demonstrators carried posters and banners of GPK leaders said to be symbols of the national unity of Timor-Leste.

638. It was alleged that the demonstration was part of a larger plan by the GPK (that is, the Resistance), to influence a small number of people, including students and youth, to conduct destructive anti-integration activities. This plan was said to include strategies of blowing issues out of proportion and using religion and the Church to influence people. The Report acknowledged that the cancellation of the visit of the Portuguese parliamentary delegation caused much disappointment. The military found that the leadership of the Resistance took the opportunity to plot destructive acts to provoke repressive actions from the security forces. It reported that the Resistance spread false rumours about ABRI. The Report indicates that members of ABRI viewed the demonstrators as part of the Resistance, and therefore as enemies. Demonstrators were therefore seen as deserving, if not legitimate, targets of attack.

639. This demonstration was also said to be different because "demonstrators deliberately attacked ABRI personnel, tried to grab their weapons and insult their honour. This sort of brutal demonstration was a typical insurgent ploy". The supposed armed and aggressive character of the demonstrators was the second key point in the military's analysis of the incident. According to the report, Mursanib ordered his men to fire warning shots into the air but the crowd surged forward again, there were shouts to attack and stones were thrown. After a second round of warning shots were fired a grenade with the pin intact was allegedly thrown at the military and caught by Second Lieutenant Mursanib. There were skirmishes as demonstrators tried to wrestle weapons from soldiers and one soldier's hand was hurt. Finally, given the critical situation, shots were fired for between six and eight seconds and then the crowd stampeded and many were crushed.

640. The Report's view, in light of this version of the facts, was that the security personnel acted in self-defence, without premeditation in a pressured situation where the attacking crowd was threatening their lives and shouting out very hurtful insults. It noted that professional soldiers are required to take firm, quick and precise action at critical moments when their lives and weapons are under threat. It reported that the developments were regretful, but this matter involved ABRI's efforts to defend the honour and sovereignty of the nation because GPK/Fretilin were a national enemy that had to be destroyed.*

641. Recommendations were to:

- Prosecute the leaders and participants in the disturbance for subversion.
- Bring those members of the security forces against whom there was evidence to a court, while those who took part and against whom there was insufficient evidence be sanctioned.
- Refuse entry to journalists pretending to be tourists because of operational reasons.

---

* The UN Special Rapporteur, who did not have access to the documents examined by the Commission, was nevertheless able to conclude that: "[T]he actions of the security forces were not a spontaneous reaction to a riotous mob, but rather a planned military operation designed to deal with a public expression of political dissent in a way not in accordance with international human rights standards." [Ndiaye Report].

Failures in the military investigation methods

642. The Commission has identified numerous gaps and failings in the way that the military went about its investigation. First, there were important issues of conflict of interest. The military relied on the officers responsible for the Combined Company for its version of what took place at the cemetery. Further, it used the security forces who had been involved in the massacre to investigate the scene of the crime. In the course of the "cleaning-up" operation, soldiers from Battalion 303 and Brimob gathered together evidence against the demonstrators. They also removed corpses and survivors before forensic investigation of the scene of the crime could be done.

643. The opportunities for planting or destroying evidence in such a situation were manifold. No proper chain of custody of evidence records were kept. There is one general diagramme on file showing where certain weapons were found, but only one weapon (the Mursanib grenade) was recorded as being found by an individual. Other weapons were simply marked as found by military unit, for example, Battalion 303 or Brimob. There was also a high risk of evidence being destroyed. Demonstrators have reported that before the security forces removed them from the cemetery, they saw blood being washed off the road.[760] In fact, this destruction was to continue into the next few days, as bodies of victims were secretly disposed of, without proper forensic handling and without being returned to their families.

644. No records were kept of where each body or injured person was found, or the condition of the body or person. The location of shot persons is particularly important given the claim of self-defence raised by the military. If the military genuinely fired in self-defence, then the victims would have been those closest to the security forces and there would not have been any victims of gunshot wounds inside the cemetery or away from the "confrontation line" between security forces and demonstrators.

The Second Warouw Report

645. The second report from the commander-in-chief of Kolakops in Timor-Leste, dated more than six weeks after the first report, focused on conveying the intelligence information that had been obtained from individuals charged and interrogated about the Resistance in Timor-Leste. It contained:

- Records showing who was arrested and released or still detained and the charges that had been laid against certain detainees.
- Hand-drawn diagrammes of the structure of the Resistance network.
- Intelligence reports on the activities of the foreigners who were present at the demonstration.

646. The report was not an investigation into responsibility for the killings and other serious human rights violations perpetrated by security forces at Santa Cruz. Rather, through its detailed descriptions of the structure and strategies of the clandestine network and summaries of testimonies extracted from detained demonstrators, it seems to suggest that this intelligence triumph was a justification for the killings at the Santa Cruz Cemetery.

Investigations by the Military Police

647. The investigations into the conduct of the military in Timor-Leste regarding the Santa Cruz killings were carried out by the military police operating out of the Regional Military Command (Kodam) in Bali. The Commission has come into possession of three reports by the military police commissioned to report on investigations into the actions of the Combined Company.* These reports, referred to here as the First, Second and Third Military Police Reports, were dated 26 November 1991, December 1991 and January 1992 respectively.[761]

The First Military Police Report

648. All three reports accept the Kolakops version of the facts of the demonstration, particularly the political background and the dangerous character of the demonstrators. The First Military Police Report states for example:

> The mass of Demonstrators carrying out the demonstration on 12 November 1991 were brutal, emotional and wild as a result of outside instigation from the Anti-Integration group, which is suspected of masterminding the demonstration.

649. The report confirms that the Combined Company members did everything possible to control the crowd through persuasive means, through positioning and warning shots in accordance with procedures. It states that the security forces could not have anticipated that the mob would get increasingly violent and attack them with sharp weapons, firearms, and grenades. The troops were forced to fire in self-defence. The report stressed that Article 49 of the Criminal Code (KUHP) provides that a person acting in self-defence to a direct threat to body, honour or personal property may not be punished. Exceeding the limits in self-defence is permissible when it is the "direct result of offence [lit. shakiness of heart] caused by the attack". So, the report concludes, the security forces acted in accordance with the law.

650. Further, it stated that the attacks by the demonstrators on Major Gerhan Lentara and Private Dominggos were criminal acts requiring legal processing.

The Second Military Police Report

651. The Second Military Police Report, at seven pages, presents a new explanation for the serious human rights violations perpetrated at Santa Cruz. It mentions members of the Combined Company and other ABRI members who acted outside of command. Three members of the Dili Kodim reportedly left the Kodim without being ordered to do so, went to the cemetery and fired at the crowd. The three men were Sergeant

* The Commission has examined the original report of the massacre, made to the Military Police, and contained in the Berkas Perkara of Sgt. Aloyisus Rani (see below). Police Report no. LP-28/A-22/Military Police Detachment IX/4/1991, was filed by Second Sergeant Zainuddin, reporting on: "a disturbance between security forces and demonstrators opposed to integration with Indonesia. The cause of the aforesaid disturbance was that a group of youths against integration with Indonesia carried out a violent and brutal demonstration that resulted in security forces opening fire".

Major Petrus Saul Meda, First Sergeant Aloysius Rani and First Sergeant Udin Syukur. A member of the police, First Corporal Marthin Alau, also went to the site without orders and stabbed a demonstrator because of his heightened emotion on seeing the actions of the crowd and the tearing of the Indonesian flag in front of the Dili Police Station. The report concludes that these personnel acted on their own initiative, and did so in violation of Article 103 Military Criminal Code (KUHPM).

652. The Commission observes that it is unclear why this element of the story only emerged in the Second Military Police Report in December 1991. All four of the "own initiative operators" say they reported back immediately on return to their respective bases on 12 November and surrendered the weapons they had taken to await disciplinary action. Their role would therefore have been known by the time that the Warouw reports and the First Military Police Report were prepared.[762]

653. Of serious concern in the Second Military Police Report is the alteration to an original statement given by witness Second Lieutenant Mursanib, who was eventually dismissed from his post. The Commission has examined an original signed copy of the first Mursanib record of interview. It has compared this to the copy of the statement that appears in the Second Military Police Report, a photocopy of the original. At two points in the copied document related to the finding of the grenade the wording has been blocked out and then typed over. These changes were not initialled by the deponent or the interrogators.

The Third Military Police Report

654. The Third Military Police Report, just five pages, introduces two major new features – the role of the Battalion 303 from Taibessi and six other soldiers who acted on their own initiative. It contains summaries of the statements of 36 witnesses and lists 12 potential accused. It highlights the roles of:

- Private Mateus Maia and Private Alfonso who shot dead a foreign journalist (Kamal Bamadhaj) in front of the office of the Dili Department of Information.
- Three Milsas who were attached to Battalion 303/SSM who shot at the crowd after passing Brimob at My Friend Bridge (in Taibessi, near the cemetery).
- Three members of Battalion 744/SYB named Sergeant Major Adolfo Tilman, Corporal Mustari, and Private Gomboh. They allegedly beat and jabbed their rifles towards some of the demonstrators.
- Second Lieutenant Alex Penpada, platoon commander for intelligence in the Sub-Regional Military Command 164/Wira Dharma. He allegedly beat demonstrators and saw a member of Railakan militia beat demonstrators.

655. New analysis was carried out revealing the role of Battalion 303/SSM that came from Taibessi on hearing about the developing situation at the cemetery:

> A unit of Battalion 303/SSM passed in front of SST Brimob from the direction of Taibessi and also from the military police detachment, which it is suspected occurred because SST Brimob appeared doubtful about facing the critical moment described above.[763]

656. It makes the point that because of this, Battalion 303/SSM arrived before Brimob to confront the demonstrators:

> [A]t the time of the second shots, some soldiers pointed directly at the target, some of [the soldiers] were ex-Milsas soldiers under the command of Battalion 303, which caused fatalities among the demonstrators. Besides the acts of the riot police above, which were inappropriate, some soldiers, without order, exacerbated the chaotic atmosphere and joined in shooting the demonstrators. When consolidation took place, where the prisoners were grouped together, some members of the security forces, in full uniform, not in full uniform and in civilian clothes, continued to ill-treat the demonstrators.[764]

657. According to the report, the change of status and tasks of Battalion 303/SSM played an important role in why personnel behaved the way they did. Battalion 303 was initially posted to Timor-Leste as a combat force "with the task of hunting, finding, and destroying the enemy". It was noted that the unit was not trained for Territorial duties such as riot control and that given their strong patriotism, the provocation they faced led them to act to solve the problem in the way they knew best.[765]

The military police method of investigation

658. The military police based their findings mainly on interviews. The First Report contains 38 Records of Interview (RoIs) with original signatures of the interviewees. The interviews were conducted with 30 members of the Combined Company, eight members of Brimob and 28 soldiers from Battalion 303, four members of Battalion 744 and four civilians. These civilians, Viktor Benovedes (sic, 15 years), Joaniko (sic) dos Santos, Yose (sic) Francisco da Costa, and Manuel Eduardo Dossantos (sic), were the first civilians to be interviewed in any of the military and police investigations. Their statements were made and signed at the Military Police Detachment Headquarters IX/4 but it is unclear if they were in detention at the time. The Rols confirm that the demonstrators were violent and aggressive and had weapons such as sticks, knives and rocks.

659. The Second Military Police Report contains five additional RoIs – those of the Kodim chief of staff, Pieter Lobo, and the members of ABRI suspected of acting outside of command.

660. The Commission observes that the statements of the security personnel were extremely consistent, often word-for-word, in describing the genuine threat to the security forces and how they acted in self-defence. All security personnel interviewed reported the same aggressive, "wild" and "brutal" crowd; they all heard the same taunts and saw or heard the same things. Such consistency may well be because it reflects the truth; but it may also reflect perversion of the course of justice through a common agreement on the version of events or one that was imposed by investigators. Given that independent witnesses, as reported by international organisations, report with equal consistency that the demonstrators were unarmed, non-violent and did nothing to provoke the security forces who gave no warning before opening fire, a genuine investigator should have considered both versions to make an objective and fair assessment of facts. The fact that the existence and consistency of other accounts was never even considered in the course of the Indonesian investigations is cause for genuine concern about the integrity of the process.

661. The military police apparently carried out a forensic investigation at the cemetery on 14 November 1991, but this investigation was far from comprehensive.[766] The extent of the investigation was the number of bullet marks noted down on a basic diagramme of the crime scene. Seventy-two bullet marks were counted. All except one were outside the cemetery and were on the cemetery's front wall, trees and electricity poles. However, angles of entry were not recorded and checked against troop locations and embedded bullets were not removed and taken for ballistics testing. There seem to have been no checks of the site for evidence of other ill-treatment that may have taken place, such as lacerations on the gravestones from sharp weapons or rifle butts. There were no conclusions drawn from the crime scene investigation.

Unanswered questions

The omissions in the investigations conducted by Indonesian security agencies provide valuable insight into the credibility of the process.

The Commission observes that some questions that should be basic to any genuine and impartial investigation into the lethal use of force by law enforcement officials do not seem to have been asked, and if asked, given appropriate consideration. This is particularly notable in light of the starkly opposed versions told of what happened. For example, it was never asked:

- What sort of forces were deployed to deal with the demonstrators and what sort of equipment were they given? Were these appropriate forces and equipment for the situation at hand? Were standard riot gear such as rubber bullets, water cannons and tear gas used?
- What exactly was the threat faced by the security forces? What evidence is there that the soldiers acted in self-defence?
- If the use of force and firearms was unavoidable, as alleged by the military and the NCI, did the security forces exercise restraint and act proportionally in relation to the threat against them and the legitimate objective to be achieved? Was the threat so great as to justify the number of shots that were fired?*

* The overall picture that emerges from the files is that about 140 shots were reported to have been fired. Weapons checks after the event reveal that those members of the Combined Company from Battalion 303 fired 73 times and those from Brimob fired 33 times. Nine warning shots were fired by Battalion 744. At least 25 shots were fired by the Battalion 303 who came from Taibessi. Thus, 140 shots are known to have been fired. In addition, 72 bullet marks were found at the site by military police.

- If the use of force was unavoidable and used in self-defence, why is it that, in accordance with questions raised by the UN Special Rapporteur:

[D]emonstrators who were trying to flee were shot in the back. Why, after the shooting had stopped, did soldiers continue stabbing, kicking and beating the survivors (including the wounded) inside the cemetery, on the way to the hospital and in neighbouring villages during the rest of the day, and possibly for several days?[767]

- Why were combat soldiers (Battalion 303) used and not simply Brimob who were trained to deal with riot situations?
- Was there anyone in overall control of the situation at the cemetery? Who should have been in overall control? What were the methods of coordination between the different forces present?
- What happened to the dead and disappeared?

Failure to question relevant actors

Although the statements taken by military investigators of lower ranking security force personnel appear to have been quite comprehensive, some senior officers involved in the incident were not interviewed by the military police. The commander of Sector C, Colonel Binsar Aruan, and the commander of Battalion 303, Asril H. Tanjung, do not appear to have been questioned as part of the fact-finding investigations that the Commission has been able to examine.* Neither were other relevant actors such as the Kodim and Battalion 744 commanders, and those involved in intelligence. The key questions of who was in charge, what was actually ordered on 12 November, and what was done to avert the violence, were, therefore, never clarified. Significantly, Colonel Binsar Aruan was the person responsible for writing the first military version of events, which was adopted in general by all later investigators, even though he was then dismissed.

The testimony of the foreigners who were with the demonstrators was not taken. They were eyewitnesses to what happened and some, such as Allan Nairn and Amy Goodman, were at the front of the demonstration and although not shot, were physically attacked by the security forces. No reason was apparent from the files why they were not formally interviewed or why their public statements were never considered by investigators.

* The Commission must assume that some kind of investigation into their roles was carried out because these commanders were eventually disciplined. However, it is notable that for some reason their evidence was not taken into account in an attempt to obtain an accurate picture of what happened at the demonstration.

Inconsistencies in the evidence

Investigators failed to resolve numerous inconsistencies in the evidence. Major inconsistencies included:

- Each of the reports from Kolakops, the military police and other statements and records of interview noted numbers and types of weapons recovered from the site. This is important because it goes to whether the demonstrators were indeed armed and whether the security forces had cause to shoot in self-defence. The civilian police found no firearms, only weapons including 26 machetes, 70 knives, one spear, and 19 sickles. A member of Brimob testifying in the trial of Jacinto Alves also mentioned only knives, spears, machetes, pipes, and flags.[768] Other witnesses and reports mentioned numerous firearms that were reportedly recovered from around the site of events, but these reports were also highly inconsistent. The commander of the Combined Company, Second Lieutenant Mursanib, described one G-3 rifle and two FN pistols.[769] This was confirmed in the First Military Police Report in late November. The earlier First Warouw Report, however, prepared the day after the demonstration, reported that as well as those firearms there was one Mauser rifle and one Smith and Weston gun found along with bullets. The Second Warouw Report added another Mauser and a Colt rifle, with the serial numbers of all weapons. No attempt to determine the reason for these inconsistencies appears to have been made by the investigators.
- There were also inconsistencies in the evidence given by individuals. Second Lieutenant Mursanib provided three written statements to military police investigators.* These statements had serious contradictions that were never resolved.† For example, in his first two records of interview, Mursanib states that he ordered the members of the Combined Company to fire warning shots

* 17 November 1991 [First Mursanib BAP], contained in First Military Police Report; 25 December 1991 [Second Mursanib BAP], contained in the Rani file; 21 March 1992 [Third Mursanib BAP], contained in Rani file. The Commission has observed that while Mursanib's later two statements were part of the dossier against Aloysius Rani, the First Mursanib BAP was never submitted to the Military Court.

† The documentary material examined by the Commission suggests that Mursanib's changes in testimony may have not been challenged by investigators because the whole exercise was engineered. This is supported by the leading nature of the questions put to him, and the pursuing of questions in supplementary issues when the matter appeared to have been well-settled in earlier interviews, as well as the failure to admit the original Mursanib statement as evidence in the Rani case.

into the air. In his third statement however, he denies having ordered any warning shots. In answer to the leading question: "Is it true that you gave the order to fire a warning shot and how did that command sound?" Mursanib replied:

> I did not give an order for a warning shot at that time because the crowd was making a racket. I heard shouts from the south of the small food stall, and the sound of weapons being loaded and members of the 303 that formed part of the Combined Company started firing. I saw members of 303 shooting and yelled at them to stop. [answer to q.6b5][770]

- Mursanib's role was described inconsistently. In the first RoI of 17 November 1991, Mursanib is clearly identified as the Commander of the Combined Company and this is how he is described in the second RoI of 25 December 1991. However, in the third RoI of March, he describes himself only as a Socio-Political officer, that he never gave any commands, and indeed says that there was never a Combined Company, that the term was possibly just used for convenience.[771]

The fact that these inconsistencies were ignored by investigators, when they are clearly crucial to whether the security forces acted according to procedure and how they were commanded, either reveals striking incompetence or a deliberate effort to obscure the truth.

Gaps in the forensic investigation

Similarly, investigators ignored important gaps in the forensic investigation. The projectiles in the bodies of the wounded and dead were vital evidence that should have been preserved and sent for ballistics testing for matching against the weapons that were fired by the security forces. The files contain no information on what happened to the projectiles removed from the wounded and made no attempt to match those to weapons.

Further, the position remains confused on what forensic work was done with the dead bodies - while members of the public claim was that there were no facilities for autopsy in Timor-Leste, the First Military Report claims an autopsy was carried out on a body on the day of the massacre itself and that the cause of death was a bullet that was not fired from a military issue weapon; also there are 110 names on a list in the court martial file of Aloysius Rani, said to be "autopsy reports". The UN Special Rapporteur was told by the chief of police that the 18 unidentified bodies and the body of Kamal

Bamadhaj were buried on 13 November 1991 because the morgue of the hospital could only accommodate three to four bodies. The chief of police also told the Special Rapporteur that medical certificates had been issued by the hospital concerning the 19 bodies.[772]

It is known that the bodies of these 19 persons were hurriedly disposed of at Hera cemetery and not returned to their families.* Further, this is not the complete death toll, and reports of mass burials of persons killed at, or after, the events at Santa Cruz were not followed up. The NCI exhumed a grave at Hera with a tractor. The UN Special Rapporteur was not impressed with those efforts:

> "The Special Rapporteur cannot help being surprised that such an indiscriminate means of digging, contrary to the basic methodology of any expert exhumation and likely to be detrimental to the outcome of any subsequent forensic analysis, was used. The conclusions drawn from this exhumation were irrelevant: the victim was buried in a coffin, completely dressed, and there was only one corpse in the grave. No autopsy was conducted on the body, and therefore no pertinent information, such as the identity of the corpse or the cause of death, was given."[773]

National Commission of Inquiry investigation and report

662. On 18 November 1991, through Presidential Decree No. 53, President Soeharto appointed a National Commission of Inquiry (Komisi Penyelidik Nasional, NCI).[774] The Commission's review of the NCI's inquiry is limited because it has had access only to the one-page conclusions of a nine-page preliminary report of the NCI dated 26 November 1991. These conclusions were published by Amnesty International and reproduced as an Annexe to the Ndiaye Report. The NCI's full report has never been made public. Nevertheless, it is clear from the conclusions to

* International standards, reflected in the United Nations Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions, for such investigations require that bodies may not be disposed of until an adequate autopsy is conducted by a suitably qualified expert. Those conducting the autopsy shall have the right of access to all investigative data, to the place where the body was discovered, and to the place where the death is thought to have occurred. If the body has been buried and it later appears that an investigation is required, the body shall be promptly and competently exhumed for an autopsy. Principle 13 states: "The body of the deceased shall be available to those conducting the autopsy for a sufficient amount of time to enable a thorough investigation to be carried out. The autopsy shall, at a minimum, attempt to establish the identity of the deceased and the cause and manner of death. The time and place of death shall also be determined to the extent possible. Detailed colour photographs of the deceased shall be included in the autopsy report in order to document and support the findings of the investigation. The autopsy report must describe any and all injuries to the deceased including any evidence of torture."

the preliminary report and the critiques by other human rights organisations, that the NCI investigation was not comprehensive or impartial. Indeed the NCI agreed with the military version of events without question, despite considerable evidence to the contrary.

663. One of the most serious concerns about the NCI was its lack of independence. It was composed of seven people representing different branches of the government and military establishment: it was headed by a Supreme Court judge with a military background, and members came from ABRI headquarters, the President's Supreme Advisory Council and the People's Representative Assembly, as well as the ministries of justice, foreign affairs and home affairs.* Amnesty International pointed out that this composition was perhaps the NCI's most intractable weakness and accordingly East Timorese did not perceive the commission as an impartial body but as a representative of the Indonesian government and military.[775] The NCI acknowledged that it faced difficulties in persuading East Timorese witnesses to deal with it:

> [B]ecause of doubt and concern that they would be directly incriminated in the 12 November 1991 Incident in Dili, or out of fear they would be regarded as belonging to the anti- integration group.[776]

664. The NCI methods of investigation are described in the report of the UN Special Rapporteur. Work, which commenced on 21 November 1991 after one week of research in Jakarta, was:

> [F]ollowed by an investigation in Timor-Leste from 28 November to 14 December 1991. The National Commission of Inquiry [NCI] met with a variety of representatives of the local authorities, members of the Church, members of the armed forces, private individuals and eye-witnesses; visited hospitals and police detention centres; inspected Santa Cruz Cemetery; exhumed one grave at Hera Cemetery; and carried out unsuccessful inspections and excavations at locations at Pasir Putih, Tasi Tolu [sic], and Tibar in response to information received from the local people alleging that those were places of mass burial of victims".[777]

665. Among the key officials who the NCI met were Governor Mario Carrascalão, Brigadier General Rudolf S. Warouw, and Bishop Carlos Ximenes Belo. It also interviewed 132 witnesses.[778]

666. The Commission observes that the Advance Report opted for the version of events set out in the early Warouw and Military Police Reports: the demonstration was not a religious ceremony in honour of the deceased Sebastião but a carefully planned criminal act, masterminded by Fretilin. Like the military, the NCI blamed the demonstrators for the attacks on the two security personnel outside the Kodim, and for provoking the security forces with their Fretilin flags, banners and shouts, by being belligerent, aggressive, and by attacking them. The security forces were therefore forced to defend themselves.

* This Commission consisted of: Djaelani, SH, Supreme Court Judge; Drs. Ben Mang Reng Say, Vice President of Supreme Advisory Council; Harisugiman, General Director of Politics and Social of Home Affairs Department; Hadi Wayarabi, Director of International Organisation of Foreign Affairs Department; Anton Sujata, SH, General Inspector of Justice Department; Rear Admiral Sumitro, General Inspector of ABRI.

667. Also like the military police reports, the NCI report found that there had been "a group" of rogue security forces ("pasukan liar") out of uniform and acting outside any control or command. It concluded that the killings were not an act ordered by or reflecting official policy, and what happened on 12 November 1991 was essentially a tragedy that should be deeply regretted. The report found that there were weaknesses in the implementation of proper riot-control procedures and some excesses by security personnel. The NCI did not accept the official figure of 19 casualties and 91 wounded, citing unspecified "strong grounds" for concluding that the death and wounded toll exceeded 50 and 91 respectively, but it did not identify those victims.

668. The NCI criticised the handling of the dead. While autopsies were conducted, families were not properly notified and identification was not correctly handled. The NCI recommended that:

> [I]n order to uphold justice, action must be taken against all who were involved in the 12 November 1991 Incident in Dili and suspected of having violated the law, and they must be brought to trial in accordance with the Rule of Law, Pancasila and the 1945 Constitution upon which the Republic of Indonesia is based.[779]

669. It did not substantiate this with recommendations of named individuals for further investigation and prosecution.

670. Based on its own investigations into the situation, Amnesty International was particularly strong in its condemnation of the NCI – stating that its composition and work were fatally flawed and the findings were "unacceptable".[780] According to Amnesty International, the NCI gave undue credence to military accounts while ignoring or misconstruing independent evidence to the contrary. Interviews with East Timorese eyewitnesses were not conducted in a safe and confidential environment. In fact, those of the 132 eyewitnesses who were not security personnel were either in hospital or in detention when they were interviewed.

671. Further, the NCI's conclusion that the demonstrators provoked the security forces was tantamount to saying that the expression of political dissent may serve as a justification for the use of lethal force or other unlawful measures against civilians. Criticism of the security forces by the NCI was kept to a minimum. Amnesty International accused the NCI of having failed to obtain accurate details of the numbers and identities of the dead and missing, how they died and their whereabouts, and of missing the point when conducting its one and only exhumation of a grave. There were no specific recommendations for prosecution, beyond the general statement that legal action should be taken against those "involved" in the "incident". Amnesty International also alleged deliberate obstruction of independent investigation and human rights monitoring following the massacre.*

672. UN Special Rapporteur Ndiaye found that while this first ever Indonesian commission of inquiry into gross violations of human rights was an encouraging initiative, there were fundamental flaws that rendered the investigation incompatible with international standards, specifically those set out in the United Nations Principles for the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-Legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions:

- The institution lacked credibility for lack of independence from the State and was not trusted by the East Timorese;
- Its members lacked the necessary technical skills and did not conduct their investigations in a professional manner, for example by using a tractor to excavate alleged burial sites;
- Most of the eye-witness investigations were held in prison or at the military hospital and appear to have been monitored by the security forces.

673. The Special Rapporteur's concerns were so serious that he recommended that a new commission of inquiry conduct an additional investigation.[781]

Action taken against those held responsible

674. Despite the failings in the investigative process, action was taken against both senior officers and members of the military in relation to the killings at Santa Cruz. Further, although the military structure in Timor-Leste did not change for another two years, there were shifts in personnel.

Action against senior officers

675. On 28 November 1991, before the NCI had issued its final report, the most senior military figures in the region, Major General Sintong Panjaitan (the commander-in-chief of the Regional Military Command Udayana IX) and Brigadier General Rudolf S. Warouw (the commander-in-chief of Kolakops Timor-Leste), were dismissed from their positions.[782]

676. In February 1992, the Chief of Staff of the Army found six officers guilty of misconduct on the basis of a report by a Military Honour Board that he had convened on instructions from President Soeharto. The disciplinary steps taken, as reported

* Amnesty International alleged that the ICRC was prevented from speaking privately to those detained in relation to the events, including those hospitalised; that "the authorities have taken measures to ensure that witnesses, human rights activists and independent observers are not in a position to dispute the official version of events. Some witnesses are said to have been killed and scores have been detained"; that NGOs were threatened, demonstrations were banned and newspapers threatened (in one case three journalists from Jakarta were dismissed after the weekly publication's publisher was officially warned for publishing the testimonies of 12 East Timorese who witnessed the massacre); that tight restrictions were imposed on access to and reporting about Timor-Leste by foreigners [Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor – Santa Cruz: The Government Response, AI Index: ASA 21/03/92, February 1992].

by Indonesia to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, resulted in the following: three officers were dismissed from military service, two were not given any post within the organisational structure of the Army although remaining on active duty, and one was temporarily not given a post within the organisational structure.[783] UN Special Rapporteur Ndiaye was informed that these six officers were responsible for intelligence and security in Timor-Leste and should have taken steps to forestall the demonstration.[784] Asia Watch reports that these officers were:

- Dismissed: Infantry Colonel Gatot Purwanto (Intelligence officer Kolakops Timor-Leste); Infantry Colonel Binsar Aruan (commander of Sector C); Brigadier General Rudy (sic) Warouw (commander-in-chief of Kolakops Timor-Leste).
- No post but still on active duty: Infantry Colonel Sepang (deputy commander-in-chief of Kolakops Timor-Leste and concurrently commander of the Sub-Regional Military Command 164/WD); Infantry Lieutenant Colonel Wahyu Hidayat (Commander of the Kodim 1627/Dili).
- Temporarily not posted but still on active duty: Major General Sintong Panjaitan (commander-in-chief of the Regional Military Command Udayana IX).[785] (Note that Sintong Panjaitan was reported by the same organisation to have been dismissed on 28 November 1991).

677. The Commission has not been able to obtain any information on the proceedings or examined any documents or material that may cast light on these disciplinary actions. However, the Commission notes that there was not an open and transparent judicial process, which victims and families had access to or were able to participate in. This in itself ensured the process was not an effective remedy for gross violations of human rights. The Commission is not in a position to assess if the accused officers enjoyed fairness and due process in the course of the proceedings against them.

Internal purges

678. Independent observers report that there were major personnel movements within the command of Timor-Leste following the massacre at Santa Cruz. Asia Watch reported that every single one of the six Kolakops assistants was transferred out of Timor-Leste, along with Kodim commanders. The commander of the Sub-regional Military Command was also replaced. Battalion 303 was deployed out of Timor-Leste in November 1991.[786]

679. Asia Watch also reported that three officers were given administrative sanction: Lieutenant Colonel Cherry Bolang, chief of staff at the Sub-regional Military Command; Infantry Colonel Dolgi Rondonuwu, operations assistant at Kolakops Timor-Leste; and Infantry Colonel Michael Suwito, territorial assistant at Kolakops Timor-Leste.[787]

The courts martial in Bali

680. Ten low-ranking members of the security personnel involved in the events of 12 November 1991 were tried and convicted before Military Courts in Denpasar, Bali. Sentences ranged from eight to 18 months and all those convicted were dishonourably discharged.

Table 43: Summaries of charges and sentences on ten security personnel in relation to the Santa Cruz Incident

Name	Unit	Charge	Verdict and sentence	Notes
Udin Syukur	Kodim 1627	Disobeying or exceeding orders (Article103 KUHPM)	Convicted 18 months	Acted on own initiative. Fired four shots or two shots* at the demonstrators, but not charged with killing.
Aloysius Rani	Kodim 1627	Disobeying or exceeding orders (Articles 103, 126, 124(1) KUHPM); Article 351 KUHP.	Convicted 14 months	Acted on own initiative. Fired two shots at the demonstrators, but not charged with killing.
Petrus Saul Meda	Kodim 1627	Disobeying or exceeding orders (Article103 KUHPM)	Convicted 12 months	Acted on own initiative. Fired either 10 or three shots at the demonstrators, but not charged with killing.
Mateus Maya (sic)	Kodim 1627/Dili	Disobeying or exceeding orders (Article103 KUHPM)	Convicted 8 months	On garrison patrol, shot a foreigner (Kamal Bamadhaj). Not charged with killing.
Afonso de Jesus	Kodim 1627/Dili	Disobeying or exceeding orders (Article103 KUHPM)	Convicted 8 months	On garrison patrol, shot at a foreigner (Kamal Bamadhaj) he had earlier seen in the crowd of demonstrators. Missed. Not charged with attempted murder.
Mursanib	Dan Ki Gab or Sospol officer †	Disobeying or exceeding orders (Article 103 KUHPM)	Convicted 14 months	Loss of control of troops.
John Harlan Aritonang	Platoon leader Battalion 303 II	Disobeying or exceeding orders (Article 103 KUHPM)	Convicted 12 months	Loss of control of troops.
Handrianus Eddy Sunaryo	Platoon leader Battalion 303 III	Disobeying or exceeding orders (Article103 KUHPM)	Convicted 12 months	Loss of control of troops.
Yohanes Alexander Penpada	Deputy Intel Officer for Korem 164	Disobeying or exceeding orders (Article103 KUHPM)	Convicted 8 months	Assault on a demonstrator after the shootings.

* Contradictory information on the Third Military Police Report.

† Contradictory information provided by Mursanib.

Name	Unit	Charge	Verdict and sentence	Notes
Martin Alau	Police	Assault, (Article 351 KUHP)	Convicted 17 months	Acted on own initiative. Stabbed twice, one cutting the ear of an identified demonstrator (Simplicio Celestino de Deus). All committed after the shootings.

Decision to charge

681. There were at least 72 security personnel directly involved in acts of violence at the Santa Cruz Cemetery, but only 10 were tried. All members of the Combined Company, other than the two Battalion 303 platoon commanders and Second Lieutenant Mursanib, escaped prosecution. It is notable that the Brimob platoon commander, whose men were reported to have fired 33 shots without order to shoot, was not prosecuted.

682. The failure to prosecute any of the Battalion 303 platoon from Taibessi is also remarkable, given that the Third Military Police Report specifically identified East Timorese soldiers from this battalion and their commander as suspects. Investigations found that they cut across hesitating Brimob and shot at the demonstrators. They included Private Jorge Barreto, Private Antoni Beretus, Januario Guterres, Venancio Barreto and Carlos Soares. All said that they were ordered to go to Santa Cruz by their company commander and they shot at the demonstrators upon his order.

683. Even if these men were not charged on the basis that they were following orders,* it is unclear why their commanding officer, Infantry Captain Yustin Dino (NRP.30011), was not tried. The Third Military Police Report recommended he be charged and a case was prepared against him on the grounds that it was he who ordered about 24 Battalion 303 soldiers from Taibessi to Santa Cruz and then ordered them to fire on the demonstrators. For some reason this case never went ahead.

684. As a consequence, the blame for the many deaths and injuries at Santa Cruz was shifted onto Second Lieutenant Mursanib, two out of three of his platoon commanders, and a collection of rogue elements comprising individual members of the Kodim, police and intelligence and two members of the Kodim garrison, all of whom acted "on their own initiative".

Appropriateness of the charges laid against members of the security forces and the punishment imposed

685. Serious violations of human rights including unlawful killing, enforced disappearance, torture and severe ill-treatment of civilian demonstrators occurred at

* Under Article 51 of the KUHP, one cannot be found guilty if one acted in pursuance of superior orders in certain circumstances. The United Nations Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions provides that an order from a superior officer or a public authority may not be invoked as a justification for extra-legal, arbitrary or summary executions.

Santa Cruz. This was not reflected in the charges filed against those members of the security forces who were put on trial. Only two individuals were prosecuted in relation to assaults committed in the cemetery itself, but they were only charged for failure to follow orders or control subordinates.

686. The reason given to UN Special Rapporteur Ndiaye for only minor charges being laid was that it was impossible to link individual killings to individual soldiers. This is not convincing for two reasons. First, it would have been possible to carry out ballistics testing on the bullets removed from the bodies that underwent an autopsy and the bullets matched to individual guns.* Second, some killings were clearly linked to individual perpetrators. The Third Military Police Report found that the Malaysian Kamal Bamadhaj was shot at by two soldiers but hit by the shot of Private Mateus Maya (sic), who was out patrolling with the garrison. Reports from the military proceedings in Bali indicate, however, that this evidence was ignored and Mateus Maya (sic) was described only as having fired at unidentified demonstrators when taking the wounded Major Gerhan Lentara to the hospital.†

687. The military trials underplayed the seriousness of what occurred at Santa Cruz on 12 November 1991, and light sentences were imposed. The Commission endorses the finding of UN Special Rapporteur Ndiaye that:

> [T]he inadequacy of the charges and the inappropriately light sentences imposed by the court martial on the few members of the armed forces accused of having been implicated in the 12 November 1991 incident are in no way a fulfilment of the obligation to punish perpetrators, and thus to provide a deterrent for the recurrence of a similar tragedy in the future. On the contrary, he feels that they illustrate that little importance is given to the respect of the right to life by Indonesian law enforcement officials in East Timor. On the other hand, the 13 civilians involved in the peaceful protest during and after 12 November 1991 were sentenced to terms of up to life imprisonment.[788]

688. Asia Watch also criticised the light sentences and the secrecy surrounding the questions of how the shooting started or what happened to the bodies of those killed:

> [T]he glimpse they offer into military behaviour on November 12 is a carefully managed one, which serves to strengthen the "official version" of events.[789]

The case against Aloysius Rani

689. The Commission obtained an English translation of the Case Dossier against

* The Commission notes that a bullet removed from the body of 19-year-old João Mica Alves was tested and found to have come from a Mauser, which evidence was used to incriminate the demonstrators.

† Asia Watch, The Massacre Courts-Martial, p. 4. The timing suggests that the shooting would have taken place on their return from the hospital, for the two Kodim staff were wounded about an hour before.

Aloysius Rani from his court martial in Bali.* The Commission has also examined the Asia Watch reports on the Court Martial held in Bali between 29 May and 6 June 1992, as well as its report Remembering History in East Timor, as well as the Commission's collection of military documents in relation to Santa Cruz and the Ndiaye Report by the UN Special Rapporteur.[790]

690. Aloysius Rani was a member of Kodim who worked on equipment maintenance, and one of four security force members who were alleged to have acted "spontaneously". He was tried for taking a weapon without permission, going on his own initiative to the Santa Cruz Cemetery and shooting at demonstrators on the basis that he was deeply offended by the actions of the demonstrators and their attack on the members of Kodim. This version of events can be traced back to the Second Military Police Report.[791]

691. The case against Rani was based primarily on witness testimony, from security forces and civilians, including demonstration organiser Gregório Saldanha.† The only evidence of Rani shooting any of the demonstrators comes from Rani's own admission that he fired two shots. Not one of the other witnesses saw Rani shoot anyone. Rani's admission was "supplemented" by a photograph of the gun he is supposed to have taken (G-3, Weapon number 059108, Rifle Butt Number 39) and two bullet cartridges. There were no ballistics tests to confirm if they were fired from the said gun, and there was no description of where, when or how the bullets were found or by whom and how it is known that those bullet cartridges were those fired by Rani.

692. The Commission is not persuaded by the factual scenario put forward by the military in Rani's case. Not only was this Kodim soldier not part of the Combined Company, but he worked on equipment maintenance at the Kodim. The Commission notes that after seeing the two wounded Kodim staff brought in, he was sufficiently composed to go back into the canteen to have some tea, not overcome with patriotic emotion as suggested. While in the canteen, someone is supposed to have come in to tell him he had been left behind so he grabbed a G-3 weapon from the guardroom without permission and headed out to the Santa Cruz Cemetery in a taxi. There, he was sufficiently composed to wait for the Combined Company, not his own unit, in the taxi before joining them in a formation. He then fired two shots, not an emotional outburst as portrayed.[792]

693. This explanation is so unlikely and convenient that the Commission concludes that it was devised by the military for the purpose of scape-goating an individual

* Regional Military Command, Udayana, Military Police, Case Investigation File, No. DPP-10/A-09/Military Police Regional Command IX/1992, April 1992. The documents in it are consistent with documents contained in the military documents on Santa Cruz in the Commission's possession [for example, statements on a particular date are satisfactorily translated when compared to original language versions]. The CAVR therefore believes it may consider this to be a reliable translation of a file which it has not cited in original form.

† In a 2001 interview with UNTAET Civpol (police), after relating how he was beaten many times in detention by Sergeant Martinus Wae and another, Gregório Saldanha stated that "I cannot remember the date but I was also made to sign a statement for Aloysius Rani, an Indonesian Army soldier who was charged by his superiors for acting without orders. I do not know the name of the person who made me sign the statement". [Gregório Saldanha, interview with UNTAET Civpol, 31 March 2001].

and thereby avoiding any responsibility being attributed to the military command structure.

Conclusions

694. The Indonesian authorities conducted investigations into the massacre at Santa Cruz through at least four channels: the civilian police, the local military command, the regional military police and a commission of inquiry appointed by the President. Despite the number of personnel involved and the number of reports produced through these investigations, the Commission is of the view that Indonesia did not meet the standards set out in the Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions. In particular there were inadequate efforts "to determine the cause, manner and time of death, the person responsible, and any pattern or practice which may have brought about that death. It shall include an adequate autopsy, collection and analysis of all physical and documentary evidence and statements from witnesses". The Commission notes in support of this that:

- Not one of the investigations was sufficiently impartial or independent to conduct an objective and credible investigation. The civilian police, the local military command in Timor-Leste and the military police were all part of the apparatus that was under investigation. Their findings and the way in which they carried out their investigations reveal that from the outset their role was to exonerate the military as an institution and condemn the demonstrators. This position was only confirmed by the report of the NCI, which was composed of individuals who were part of the Indonesian government and military establishment and thus insufficiently distanced from the State apparatus being investigated.
- The entire investigation process, including the NCI and various military and civilian investigations, was secretive and lacked transparency. Only the Advance NCI report was made public.[793] The courts martial of the eight low ranking officers were public, but the proceedings against senior officials were in secret.
- The previously confidential documents that the Commission has examined reveal that these investigations were wholly biased in favour of the security forces and focused on justifying the actions of the security forces. There was no examination of the contentions of both sides, rather the version of events provided by the military officers responsible for the incident was accepted without question. The First Warouw Report, which provided this version of events, was completed the day after the massacre and was based solely on military sources.
- There were striking inadequacies in the investigation of the crime scene by all investigators. The civilian police did not carry out any forensic examination at the scene of the deaths. The "clean-up" efforts of the military were inadequately documented and carried out in a way that left manifold opportunity for fabricating and/or destroying evidence.
- The evidence of the witnesses interviewed by investigators raised numerous questions about what occurred at the Santa Cruz Cemetery which were never adverted to by the investigators, let alone resolved satisfactorily. Further questions that were central to the claims of self-defence by the military personnel were never asked by any of the investigators during the course of the investigations, leaving the picture of what occurred vague and unconvincing. These irregularities are of such significance that the Commission concludes that they were part of an attempt at manufacturing an account of what happened on 12 November.

- The light charges (disobeying orders, assault) and sentences for the security forces were wholly disproportionate to what happened and are particularly objectionable given the serious charges and sentences imposed on the demonstrators. This reveals not just imbalance but deliberate and cynical manipulation of the criminal justice process. Even if the security personnel who were punished were involved in violations of human rights, it appears likely that they were scape-goated in order to shield others.

695. Overall, the complex tragedy of Santa Cruz was made all the more tangled by what appears to have been damage limitation and deliberate attempts to manufacture a version of what happened by representatives of the Indonesian security forces. The processes of accountability that were provided were deeply flawed and unbalanced, and involved collaboration between military, police and judiciary. The Commission is satisfied that a deliberately manipulated version of events at Santa Cruz was presented and accepted by both military and civilian courts dealing with the matter. The investigations and trials were not intended to seek the truth of why the massacre at Santa Cruz happened, how events unfolded and the full consequences in terms of human life. They were also not intended to bring those responsible to account, but rather served to continue and strengthen the institutional mechanisms of impunity which protected members of ABRI/TNI involved in serious human rights violations.

696. In 1994 UN Special Rapporteur Ndiaye concluded that the victims of human rights violations and their relatives had not had an effective remedy.[794] The Government of Indonesia has still not provided to the victims and families either basic information on the dead and disappeared or justice or reparation for harms suffered. The Government of Indonesia has not made public any information that would contribute to the public record of what happened, nor has it provided assistance with locating or identifying dead and missing persons. This uncertainty is the cause of continued suffering for the families of victims. This is a continuing violation of the right to an effective remedy, and the failure to resolve the issue of the disappeared is a continuing human rights violation, as well as of violation of Indonesia's international obligations.

697. The failure of the State of Indonesia to respond in an appropriate manner to the unlawful actions of its security forces violated its treaty obligation as an occupying power to investigate, prosecute and punish those responsible for grave breaches against civilians (Article 146, Geneva Convention IV).

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances (1992–1995)

698. In 1992 the number of fatal violations committed by ABRI again decreased significantly from their annual level in the previous decade. In March 1993, the Operations Implementation Command (Kolakops) in Timor-Leste was abolished and the Korem again became the peak military command responsible for the military's full territorial structure as well as for external troops deployed from outside Timor-Leste in both territorial and combat roles. During 1993 and 1994 the Indonesian military committed relatively few fatal violations.

699. In 1995, however, there was not only an increase in fatal violations committed by the Indonesian military, but also a marked shift westwards in their location to the districts of Ermera, Bobonaro and Liquiçá.

Executions in Gariana, Liquiçá (January 1995)

700. On 12 January 1995, members of the Liquiçá Kodim killed six unarmed men near the aldeia of Gariana, Vatuvou (Maubara, Liquiçá), allegedly while searching for Resistance fighters who had participated in an armed clash with ABRI the day before in Leotela Village (Liquiçá, Liquiçá). Those killed were: José Nunes, the sub-village head of Gariana, Agusto Pinto, Abel Nunes, Victor, Americo de Araújo and Osorio Soares. Eyewitnesses who later spoke to the Indonesian National Human Rights Commission (Komnas HAM) about the killings reported that five of the six were lined up in a ditch and executed.[795] Testimony given to the Commission confirms that all six were executed and that more than one may have been beaten before being killed.[796]

Testimony of Jacinta Alves Correia

One witness to the killings at Gariana was Jacinta Alves Correia. Jacinta, her mother and her father were beaten by Indonesian soldiers who searched her house in pursuit of a suspected member of Falintil. Two of those killed were her younger brothers, Americo and Osorio. She gave the following testimony about the incident to the Commission:

My father, mother, big sister, and little brothers Osorio and Americo, and me, all went to weed the corn field. In the afternoon, at around 5.00pm, we returned home. My mum and dad sent the five of us home first. When we got home, my little brothers, Osorio and Americo, put the buffalo in its pen. My sister and I hung the clothes out to dry on the fence. While we were hanging out clothes and bringing the soap back inside the house, suddenly we saw my Uncle Antonio, carrying his bag, running through the front door. Lots of soldiers were following behind him.

Antonio was a member of Falintil. He entered the house. The military began to surround our house. My two brothers, back from tending the buffalo, arrived and saluted the soldiers. The soldiers didn't accept their greetings, they were angry. My sister, her four-year-old child Joaquina, my brothers and me, approached a few steps and greeted the soldiers, but they said nothing and didn't accept our greetings. Among the military that came was one named Custodio, who had his weapon fully cocked, chasing Antonio. The two of them were fighting inside the house.

The five of us just stood there, shocked, watching. After that Antonio ran off, I don't know where. The soldiers shot at him from behind, but he wasn't hit. Then the soldiers came back with their guns and approached Osorio and Americo. The soldiers hit them with their guns, kicked them with their boots, and threw rocks at them. I came to say sorry to the soldiers, and said: "Sorry, soldier, sir, we were all in the fields, we just got back, and the boys were putting the buffalo away in its pen." They said "Am I your husband or boyfriend that you can speak to me like that ?

They hit me twice in the back with their guns, and twice in the face. They also hit my sister with their weapons. They said: "Kill them all, don't let these two live". Then they came running back carrying machetes to kill my sister and I. Luckily, however, they just hit us. After that, I saw the soldiers start hitting my two younger brothers. They hit them with guns, kicked them and threw rocks at them, until Osorio collapsed. It looked like Americo was still standing, but then they tied him up with four other people from Maubara: Abel, Victor, Augusto and José.

After being tied together, they were taken away. Just then my mum and dad came home. As they approached, a soldier lifted up his machete and said: "Old man you are lucky, if you had been here a few minutes ago, you would be dead by now." The soldier hit my mum and dad a couple of times with the machete…After that, they dragged the five young men into the gutter. They tied Osorio's feet up to some bamboo, and dragged all six of them into the gutter, and shot them on the spot.[797]

701. Four days later Indonesian soldiers returned and burned Jacinta Alves's house to the ground.[798] In June 1995, Jacinta Alves was flown to Bali where she gave testimony before a military commission. In the end, two of the perpetrators – First Lieutenant Jeremias Kase and an East Timorese, Private Rusdin Maubere – were sentenced to four-and-a-half, and four years in jail. Both men were dismissed from the military, but it is unclear whether either of them served any time of their sentences.[799]

Executions in Baucau and Manatuto during the visit of European Union (EU) representatives (June 1997)

702. East Timorese youth, particularly those who participated in rallies and demonstrations, were often the target of the Indonesian military violence during this period. For example, when a European Union delegation arrived in Baucau on 29 June 1997 to meet with Monsignor Basilio Nascimento, the Bishop of Baucau, a student demonstration in support of East Timorese independence was held outside of the Church of Santo Antonio. According to one report, shortly after the delegation entered the Church, a group of approximately five East Timorese and Indonesian men, dressed in black and armed with Indonesian military-issue weapons, arrived at the demonstration and began to threaten the youths gathered there.[800] One of the men reportedly shot and killed a student named Orlando da Costa. Approximately seven other youths were injured in the clash.[801] Shortly after the shooting, Indonesian trooops from the Baucau Kodim, led by Kodim Commander Lieutenant Colonel Wisnu, arrived on the scene. Rather than retrieve the body and pursue the killer, the commander instead warned church officials that they should not be harbouring pro-independence supporters in the Church. The parish priest of the Baucau had to intervene to prevent a further clash between Indonesian military personnel and the demonstrators.[724]

703. On 16 June 1997, shortly before the EU visit, another youth was shot dead by Indonesian military in Aitas (Manatuto). The killing led to protests in Dili and ultimately to an admission of responsibility by the Indonesian military.[803] A third youth was killed on 28 June during a clash between Indonesian military forces and protesters trying to make their way to Dili for the arrival of the EU delegation.[804]

Executions and disappearances in Alas, Manufahi (November 1998)

704. An Indonesian military crackdown in the sub-district of Alas, Manufahi District in November 1998 resulted in numerous extrajudicial killings as well as "disappearances" and unlawful detentions. It seems that these killings were retaliation for two attacks by the Resistance that caused the deaths of numerous Indonesian soldiers. In late October 1998, members of the Resistance executed four people suspected of being intelligence agents for the Indonesian Special Forces in Same and who had allegedly tried to infiltrate a clandestine meeting at a transmigration camp in Weberek, near Alas, (Manufahi).[805] The four men were reportedly captured, disarmed, bound with rope and stabbed with spears by Falintil troops. Three of the four men died immediately. The fourth allegedly escaped to Same, but subsequently died. In the aftermath of the killings, most of the villagers in Weberek fled to the mountains fearing retaliation by ABRI. Although a patrol of Indonesian soldiers reportedly visited Weberek shortly after the killings, there was no immediate retaliation until after a Falintil attack on the Koramil in Alas.[806]

705. On the morning of 9 November 1998, Falintil fighters and young civilians from the aldeia of Lurik, Taitudik (Alas, Manufahi) attacked the Koramil in Alas.[807] Three Indonesian soldiers were killed and at least 11 were taken into Falintil custody. After the attack the group of approximately 50 attackers fled in two groups toward Turiscai.

706. In the immediate aftermath of the Falintil attack, local residents fled to the church in Alas Town, located approximately 200 metres from the Koramil itself. On the afternoon of 9 November Adriano Fernandes, who had reportedly participated in the raid but was unarmed, was shot by ABRI soldiers from the Koramil in Alas as he ran towards the church to seek protection.[808] Reportedly, the body of Adriano Fernandes was hacked to pieces and left in a swamp 50 metres from the road, behind the military base near Dotik.[809] According to one report, shortly before the killing of

Adriano Fernandes, the Koramil commander, Antonio Pereira went to the church and demanded to know where to find the weapons stolen from the Koramil.[810] Soldiers from the Koramil subsequently forced those seeking shelter in the church to move to the school across from the Koramil.[811]

707. The Indonesian military intensified its operations in the aftermath of Falintil's attack on the Alas Koramil, detaining a large number of people during the following weeks and destroying the fields and livestock of many Alas residents.* Shortly after the attack, soldiers from Battalion 744 arrived in Alas and began to chase the group of attackers northward toward Turiscai.

708. On the morning of 13 November, Indonesian soldiers from Battalion 744 detained and executed Vicente Xavier, village head of Taitudak (Alas, Manufahi), for his alleged involvement in the 9 November attack. He was executed in the house of a friend in Bakiri, Fahenean (Faturberliu, Manufahi), where he had gone to hide after the incident.† On 13 and 14 November, ABRI soldiers from Battalions 744 and 745 also detained and beat numerous people in Alas Town and Lurin, and attempted to kill others. In one case, a man was reportedly tied up for a week until 19 November in Taitudak, when he was stabbed with a knife in the back which pierced his chest.[812] During this time Vicente Sarmento also disappeared from Dotik. It is suspected that he was killed by Indonesian soldiers from the Koramil in Alas. The Commission has received testimony that several days after the attack, military personnel also searched the home of a suspected Falintil sympathiser in the village of Bubususu (Fatuberliu, Manufahi). They were looking for documents and for youths injured during the attack in Alas. In the process they killed at least one person.[813]

709. After the killings in Alas and Fahinean, (Fatuberliu, Manufahi), Battalion 744 continued moving north, searching for clandestine members suspected of being involved in the attack. In an incident on 17 November, members of Battalion 744 shot Armando Enrique Pereira, also suspected of involvement in the attack, as well as Patriçio and another man who were with Armando at the time.[814] Patriçio died from the gunshot wound. Armando and a second man, Remecio, survived and then, reportedly, were beaten and tortured with machetes, put in a military helicopter and never seen again.[815]

710. The Commission has reason to believe that several other residents of the Alas area were executed or "disappeared" in the period from 9 November until December 1999. In the following weeks, a further 13 people are believed to have been killed, all of them known members of the Resistance.[816] A number of people who fled from Alas after the attack were reportedly among the refugees killed during the attack on Manuel Carrascalão's house on 17 April 1999.[817]

* Human Rights Watch, "East Timor Massacre Reports Still Unconfirmed, Both Sides Must Respect Rights". [date not listed], http://www.hrw.org/press98/nov/etimor1123.htm at 19 May 2005; according to HRVD Statement 01531, two people were detained for seven days beginning 9 November.

† HRVD Statements 01581 and 03483. The Korem commander, Colonel Tono Suratman, confirmed the death of Vicente Xavier in a statement published in the Dili daily newspaper Suara Timor Timor, November 1998.

Precursors to 1999 militia killings

711. Although most militia groups were formally established in 1999, some groups were already active before then. The fall of President Soeharto and the rise of the spirit of Reformasi in Jakarta led to more open campaigning by pro-independence supporters in Timor-Leste, including an increase in Falintil activities. The Commission has received reports of killings attributed to militia throughout 1998. Several of these militia were long-established, but new groups were also beginning to form. For example, the Commission received reports of killings by Halilintar militia, which had been active in Bobonaro since 1994, in January 1998, including the killing of four men in Atabae by Indonesian intelligence and a group of Halilintar militia led by Paul Gonçalves.[818] Militia activity was documented in the districts of Bobonaro, Baucau, Liquiçá, Oecussi, Covalima and Manufahi during this time. The Commission received testimonies which mention the Halilintar,[819] Tim Saka,[820] Dadurus Merah Putih,[821] Darah Merah,[822] Besi Merah Putih,[823] Sakunar, [824] Laksaur[825] and ABLAI[826] militias as perpetrators in extra-judicial executions during 1998. Most of these testimonies are about killings that occurred in the final months of 1998.

Table 44: Fatal violations and disappearances of civilians committed by ABRI, 1990–1994, as reported to the CAVR

Location	1990		1991		1992		1993		1994
	Killed	Dis.	Killed	Dis.	Killed	Dis.	Killed	Dis.	Killed	Dis.
Lautém	2	-	2	-	2	-		-	1	-
Viqueque	-	-	-	-	-	-		-	-	-
Baucau	-	1	1	1	2	1		-	-	-
Manatuto	-	-	2	-	-	-		1	-	-
Manufahi	-	-	1	-	-	-		1	-	-
Ainaro	2	-	7	-	-	-		-	-	-
Aileu	-	-	-	-	-	-		-	-	-
Ermera	-	-	-	-	-	-		-	1	-
Covalima	-	1	-	-	-	1		-	-	-
Bobonaro	-	1	-	-	-	-		-	2	-
Liquiçá	-	-	-	-	-	-		-	-	-
Dili	1	1	21-34	6	-	-		-	-	-
Total	5	4	34-47	7	4	2		2	4	-
Combined	9		41-54		6		11		4

Table 45: Fatal violations and disappearances of civilians committed by ABRI, 1994–1998, as reported to the CAVR

Location	1995		1996		1997		1998
	Killed	Dis.	Killed	Dis.	Killed	Dis.	Killed	Dis.
Lautém	-	-	1	-	-	-	-	-
Viqueque	2	-	1	-	1	-	-	-
Baucau	?	-	1	-	2	1	4	-
Manatuto	-	-	3	-	-	-	4	-
Manufahi	3	-	-	-	-	-	10	-
Ainaro	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Aileu	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Ermera	6	1	5	1	12	2	4	-
Covalima	-	-	-	-	2	-	-	-
Bobonaro	1	-	2	-	5	-	15	1
Liquiçá	7	-	-	-	2	-	-	-
Dili	-	5	1	-	4	1	1	-
Not known	-	-	1	2	-	-	-	-
Total	19	6	15	3	28	4	38	1
Combined	25		18		32		39

Fatal violations committed by Fretilin/Falintil, 1980–1999

712. Between 1980 and 1999 there were sharp fluctuations in the number of killings of civilians by Fretilin/Falintil. It is difficult to assess the number of unlawful killings of civilians by Fretilin/Falintil at any time for two conflicting reasons. On the one hand the Commission acknowledges that there may be under-reporting of fatal violations committed by Fretilin/Falintil because survivors, witnesses, or family members may be reluctant to implicate persons and institutions which played a critical role in the struggle for independence.

713. On the other hand, because East Timorese society became so heavily militarised during the Indonesian occupation, the status of many of the civilians who were killed by Fretilin/Falintil was often ambiguous. These included people who were forcibly put in harm's way, whether as Hansip, TBOs (tenaga bantuan operasi, operations assistants), members of militia groups or persons required to perform night guard duties. The Commission believes that responsibility for deaths in these circumstances should rest primarily with those who put the victim in harm's way. Moreover, roles which in most of Indonesia were not heavily militarised, including those of Hansip and village chiefs and other members of the civil administration, became highly militarised in occupied Timor-Leste.

714. Because the dividing line between combatants and non-combatants was often blurred, it has not always been possible for the Commission on the basis of the information available to it to judge whether a violation has in fact occurred, and if it has, where responsibility for it lies. All of the categories of victims discussed in this section—"civilians", "Hansip" and TBOs—should be regarded as subject to these caveats. According to data received by the Commission, the highest number of reported fatal violations by Fretilin/Falintil took place in 1982, 1984 and 1998–1999. There was a steady decrease in reported violations from 1985 to the early 1990s. However, after 1995 the number of fatal violations continued to rise, reaching a peak in 1999. In all years, however, the number of unlawful killings of civilians committed by Fretilin/Falintil was smaller than those committed by ABRI/TNI and its auxiliaries, and in almost all years it was much smaller.

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances by Fretilin/Falintil in 1980s

715. In the early 1980s, Falintil staged a large number of attacks on military-controlled settlements, often burning houses. It appears that these attacks were intended to demonstrate to the population now under Indonesian control that Falintil had survived and, at times, to warn, even threaten, that resistance would continue.[827] As more and more East Timorese civilians were forcibly recruited to take part in Indonesian military operations, Fretilin/Falintil forces began also to target them during skirmishes with Indonesian forces.

716. In August 1980, the Indonesian military forced civilians in Viqueque and Baucau to participate in the Operasi Kikis, to search for the remaining Falintil forces around Mount Matebian.[828] During the course of this operation a number of civilians were killed, some shot by Falintil and others killed in crossfire when ABRI and Falintil forces engaged in armed combat. For example, the Commission heard about the killing by Falintil forces of six East Timorese men who had been recruited as TBOs for Operasi Kikis in Quelicai (Baucau).[829] In another testimony, a deponent told the Commission about the killing of his brother, in similar circumstances:

> In July 1980, in Abere, Luro, Battalion 141 forced my brother Miguel, along with his friend Abilio Kuluina, to take their belongings and go to a place called Luturo, in the forest near Laga. Once there, they stayed three nights. Suddenly they were attacked by Fretilin forces, and there was shooting between ABRI/TNI and Fretilin. My brother was shot during that attack and later died from his wounds.[830]

717. The Commission has also received information about several cases in 1980 in which Indonesian military personnel ordered civilians to search for relatives in the forest on their own. Suspicious of informants and wary of being attacked, on occasion Fretilin/Falintil arrested, threatened and in some instances killed civilians. In Macadiqui (Uatolari, Viqueque), for instance, an informant told the Commission:

On 6 September 1980, Sebastião Mau Lequi, Manuel Kaidawalita, Julio Boru Kumu and Valente Noco Rau were forced by ABRI/TNI, the Vessoru Village Chief Jose Fernandes and the Neighbourhood Head of Waniuma, Afonso Mascarinhas, to go to the forest to look for Falintil. In an area called Makhili they encountered Falintil and Sebastião Mau Lequi was shot dead by Falintil. The four others successfully escaped to Uatolari town.[831]

718. Another deponent told the Commission about a similar case in Caicasa (Fatuberliu, Manufahi) in 1980.

In 1980, Miguel Maia, José Kehimau, and Domingos Berleik were forced by ABRI/TNI to look for weapons in the forest near Caicasa. When they arrived at Uma Creda, in the Caicasa area, all three were captured by Falintil. But Miguel Maia ran away and was shot by Falintil and wounded in the right arm. The other two others were bound and then killed by Falintil. Their bodies were beheaded and then dumped, in the same location.[832]

719. The Commission received only one report about the deliberate execution of a civilian by Falintil in 1980. In this case Falintil executed a man named Bere Alas, who was reported to be politically "opposed" to Fretilin, in Laclubar, Manatuto.[833]

720. In contrast with the year before, in 1981 Fretilin/Falintil carried out very few military actions. The Commission received only two reports of civilians killed by Fretilin/Falintil forces, both of which occurred in relation to Operation Security (Operasi Keamanan, also known as Operasi Kikis) and in both of which the victims were reported to be TBOs.[834]

721. There are several possible reasons for this lull in killings. First, in March 1981 Fretilin held a national conference at Mabai (Lacluta, Viqueque), meaning that many local commanders were either travelling or engaged in the political re-organisation that followed the conference. Second, between June and September the Indonesian military staged the massive Operation Security, during which Fretilin/Falintil forces were forced to lay low and find ways to avoid being detected. Third, Falintil suffered large-scale casualties in the Aitana region in September 1981, after which time was needed to consolidate forces and re-establish contact between commanders.

722. In 1982, however, there was a dramatic increase in Falintil attacks on both military and non-military targets. These cases are evenly distributed throughout the eastern half of the island (Manatuto, Manufahi, Viqueque, Baucau and Lautém). Some of these attacks were directed against village guard posts, resulting in the death of members of the civil defense force or other civilians posted on guard duty. The Commission heard the account of the victim of a Falintil attack on the village of Manumera (Turiscai, Manufahi) in 1982. Martinho de Jesus and three others, Manuel de Jesus, Filomeno de Jesus Borges and Mateus were on night guard duty in Talimera:

At the time the four of us were sound asleep. [Suddenly] we were woken by Falintil who had surrounded us. They tied our hands behind our backs. They said: "Normally you would run into the forest so that TNI would chase you and get us. Tonight you all must die". The Falintil commander, who wore white pants and had his face covered, then took a machete, cut Mateus' throat and threw him about 10 metres. After that he returned to cut Filomeno's throat and pushed him to the ground. He then bagain to my brother Manuel's throat and pushed him to ground. Then he came towards me and cut my throat three times and pushed me to the ground. But my throat was not severed. After they left, I tried to get up and saw my three friends were dead. I tried to get up and walked about 20 metres. I sat in a stream of water until morning. In the morning a man came to take the three corposes and me to Turiscai. I was then taken by plane to Dili for treatment.[835]

723. In early 1982 Falintil also allegedly attacked and killed a Hansip member named Gaspar Soares, who was walking home from the market with his wife in the sub-district of Baguia (Baucau).[836] In addition to attacks on guard posts, Fretilin/Falintil also killed a number of civilians in the eastern half of the territory. For example, the Commission heard about this attack in Lore, where a woman was killed:

In 1982 a Falintil member, I don't know his identity, entered Maloru village, in Lore I (Lospalos, Lautém) and approached the house of Cecilia Sarmento. He forced the door open, entered the house and beat Cecilia until she screamed but out fear no-one was game to come out of their houses to help her. Cecilia was then taken outside and the house was set on fire. Cecilia's husband, Marcos Sarmento, who was on night duty at the Neighbourhood Security Post, arrived and quarrelled with the Fretilin/Falintil. A member of Fretilin/Falintil wounded Marcos Sarmento's arm and his hands were tied behind his back. Cecilia Sarmento was killed with a machete in front of her husband and her body thrown into the burning house. The perpetrators went into the kitchen and took all the kitchenware, such as plates, pots, jerry-cans, and then the Fretilin/Falintil left the village shooting wildly.[837]

724. In 1982 the people of Timor-Leste took part in an Indonesian national election for the first time. Fretilin/Falintil carried out several attacks before and at the time of the election, apparently in an attempt to embarrass Indonesia and prove that the Resistance was still a force. On 14 April FaIintil attacked a guard post in Leohat (Soibada, Manatuto), killing Antonio Lopes and Antonio da Costa.[838] On 24 April 1982, Falintil attacked the village of Lugasa (Viqueque, Viqueque), burning homes and killing two people, João Soares and Labi Mau.[839] The day before the election Falintil reportedly carried out a number of attacks in Viqueque, causing the authorities to move all the voting centres into the town of Viqueque.[840]

725. On the day of the election Falintil reportedly killed four civilians in Bahoik (Iliheu, Manatuto, Manatuto). A deponent told the Commission:

On 5 May 1982, Falintil attacked the civilian community, taking their property and livestock. At the same time, they killed three people: Casametan, Marac Cipriano, and Olosaba.... In Metadolok, Falintil killed my father, Leki Mau, but my brother Altur Soares managed to escape. After this incident, ABRI/TNI moved the people of Bahadik to Laclo for three days. After three days, the community returned to their original village, because ABRI/TNI set up permanent security there.[841]

726. Falintil also staged attacks immediately before or on the day of Indonesian public holidays or important anniversaries in the Resistance calendar.* On 16 August, a day before Indonesian Independence Day, Falintil forces killed two Hansip members, Teofilo and Julio Mendes, who were travelling to the town of Laga (Baucau).[842]

727. The most dramatic Falintil attack occurred four days later, on 20 August, which was the anniversary of the founding of Falintil held in various locations in Ainaro and Manufahi Districts; however, no information is available about civilian casualties (see par. 511-517, above). A month after the attack, as the Indonesian military was conducting a brutal crackdown on civilians in Ainaro, Falintil forces staged another attack in Manufahi District. An informant told the Commission:

On 27 September 1982, Falintil attacked and burnt 13 civilian homes in the village of Lurin (Taitudak, Alas, Manufahi)... They arrested Marçal, Domingos da Costa, Domingos and Bernardo, and took them to the forest. After several days, three of the captives ran away and returned to the village. The fourth, Bernardo, had been killed already.[843]

728. Civilians who took positions in the Indonesian local government structure were targeted by Falintil. On 5 October 1982, Indonesian Armed Forces day, Falintil conducted a bold attack on Com (Moro, Lautém), killing the village secretary, along with two Hansip members. A deponent told the Commission:

On 5 October 1982, at 12.00 midnight, a group of Fretilin, 60 of them, led by M231, attacked the aldeia of Com. The community was assembled under a banyan tree in the village of Vailovaia. Then they [members of Fretilin] summoned various people, Francisco, Orlando, and Modesto, whom they suspected. My father, Francisco, was shot dead straight off by M231, because at the time my father was a member of Hansip. Fretilin considered them to be traitors, who had to be wiped out. After the killings and detentions, they [Fretilin] returned to the forest, and didn't come back to Com again.[844]

729. Soon after the Indonesian military ordered a group of civilians to search for Falintil guerrillas in the forests of Moro. A deponent explained to the Commission:

* According to one former Falintil commander, one reason Falintil carried out attacks on Indonesian public holidays was that ABRI reduced its vigilance on those days [see CAVR Interview with José da Conceição, Dili, 19 October, 2004].

On October 1982, ABRI/TNI Battalion 315 sent a local person form Daudere, named Paul, to fetch me (Manuel Marques), José Cabral, José Celestino, Adão Soares, and Nocomata to look for Fretilin in the forest. seek We went to Malauro, and the next day to Makaledo, near Moro, and then to Soruwaku, near Maina I. After four days, Fretilin caught one of us, José Celestino, who was ordered to cook for us… In the afternoon when the rest of us went to eat, Fretilin was waiting for us in the bushes. We were ordered to surrender our machetes and belongings. Then a member of Fretilin stabbed Paul to death on the spot. The rest of us ran away and reported the incident to TNI Battalion 315.[845]

730. Some time in 1982 Falintil also attacked the village of Carlilo (Aiteas, Manatuto, Manatuto), killing two or three people.[846]

731. As these cases illustrate, during 1982 Falintil carried out a series of attacks on Indonesian military forces, members of the civil defence and East Timorese civilians who were recruited to take part in military operations. At times Falintil forces also burned villages. In late 1982, however, Indonesian military officers sought to make contact with members of the Resistance and there was a decrease in fatal violations committed by both ABRI and Fretilin/Falintil. The March 1983 cease-fire meetings between ABRI and Fretilin led to a four-month period during which the number of killings by either ABRI or Falintil fell sharply. Following the August 1983 uprisings and the massive new Indonesian military operation that followed them, Fretilin/Falintil is reported to have committed very few fatal violations against civilians during the second half of 1983.[847]

732. In 1984, however, there was a marked increase in Falintil attacks, including the killing of civilians.[848] Most of the cases occurred in Lautém and Viqueque. The available data strongly suggests that, in response to the brutal military crackdown on civilians and new operations against the Resistance, Falintil retaliated. The Commission has received reports about eight attacks in which Falintil burned homes and killed at least one civilian (two cases in Lautém, three in Viqueque, two in Baucau, and one in Ainaro). The data suggests that the primary targets of these were individuals known to be collaborating with the Indonesian occupying forces (most frequently Hansip members), and that the burning of homes was intended as a warning to the rest of the community about the consequences of collaboration. For example, on 10 February 1984 Falintil forces attacked Uani Uma (Uato Carbau, Viqueque), killing a Hansip member and three civilians and burning houses. A deponent told the Commission:

On 10 February 1984, Falintil forces attacked the Hansip base in the aldeia of Uani Uma, Uato Carbau, causing the deaths of Hansip member Sico Ana and three other people, from bullet wounds. Meanwhile, the houses of Pedro, Luis, Martinho Pinto, Bernardo Loirei, Pedro, Gregório, Antonio and Alberto were burnt. Apart from that, they stole 20 Banpres (Presidential Aid) buffalos, that were intended to be shared out among the community. That night the villagers were afraid, and ran away to another village until the situation was safe.[*]

* HRVD Statement 06001. HRVD Statement 07521 and Statement 07515, which reports the attack taking place on 16 February 1984.

733. In another case, in Ainaro, a deponent explained that the victims of the attack were people known to be from families affiliated with the (pro-integration) Apodeti political party:

> In November 1984, the Falintil commander M232, along with his subordinates attacked Cassa, burned civilian houses and killed two members of Apodeti, Maukoli and Adolfo.[849]

734. Elsewhere, civilians were killed during Falintil attacks on Indonesian military personnel, as illustrated by this testimony from Same (Manufahi):

> In 1984 we went to the Same Church to organise some letters. I returned home with two Indonesian soldiers, Pak Dor and Pak Usi and a man called Manuel. At Bisakrem or the Grotto, we were attacked by Falintil, and Pak Usi and Manuel were killed. I was shot in the back. At the time, there was heavy rain and mist, and I couldn't tell which members of Falintil shot me. When I regained consciousness, I was taken by some people to the Same Hospital with the other victims.[850]

735. The Falintil offensive in 1984 appears to have been strategically targeted. Despite the large number of Falintil attacks in 1984 the Commission received only two reports of civilians who were ordered by the Indonesian military to search for Falintil and were subsequently killed.[851] A deponent told the Commission about a Falintil attack in Builale (Ossu, Viqueque), but justified it on political grounds:

> In 1984 in the aldeia of Builale at 10.00pm, an incident occurred, when a member of Falintil…attacked the Builale community, burning their houses and destroying their property…Not only that, but they killed a citizen from around there… called Olocai. They did this to prove to the international community that there was still war in Timor Lorosae.[852]

Table 46: Civilians and Hansip/TBO killed by Fretilin/Falintil, 1980–1984, as reported to the CAVR

	1980		1981		1982		1983		1984
	Civilian	Hansip	Civilian	Hansip	Civilian	Hansip	Civilian	Hansip	Civilian	Hansip
Lautém	-	-	-	-	3	2	1	1	8	-
Viqueque	1	-	-	-	2	-	1	-	10	7
Baucau	2	-	-	3	3	-	1	-	1	-
Manatuto	1	-	-	-	6	-	-	-	1	-
Manufahi	-	-	-	-	7	-	-	2	1	-
Ainaro	2	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	2	-
Aileu	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Ermera	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Covalima	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-

Bobonaro	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Liquiçá	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	1	-
Dili	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Total	6	-	-	4	21	2	3	3	24	7
Combined	6	-	4	-	23	-	6	-	31	-

Fatal violations committed by Fretilin/Falintil, 1985–1989

736. From 1985 to 1989 Falintil carried out a large number of attacks on ABRI and the civil defence forces. There are also many reports of Falintil attacks on villagers. One reason for this may be that the Indonesian crackdown in 1983–1984 disrupted, and in places destroyed, the clandestine networks supporting the Resistance, and hence Fretilin/Falintil was now forced to obtain food and supplies by force.

737. Whereas in 1984 there was a resurgence of attacks by Falintil against military and civilian targets, in 1985 and 1986 there was a significant shift to direct combat between ABRI and Falintil forces. An Indonesian military publication reports that ABRI lost 122 personnel in 1985 and 169 in 1986, after which the figures are much lower.[*] The most dramatic Falintil attack occurred in 1987 when Falintil killed 30 Indonesian combat engineers in Iliomar, Lautém.[853] The increase in direct combat between ABRI and Falintil was accompanied by a corresponding reduction in civilian fatalities committed by Falintil.

738. Nevertheless, during this period there were a number of notable developments. First, there was a sharp decrease in Falintil attacks in which civilian dwellings were burned: four cases in 1985, none in 1986, one in 1987, one in 1988 and none in 1989.[854] Second, in 1985–1986 half of all people killed by Falintil were Hansip: two in Iliomar, four in Viqueque, and seven in Manufahi. Most significantly, fatal violations committed by Falintil shifted from the traditional Falintil strongholds in Lautém, Viqueque, and Baucau to the districts of Manatuto and Manufahi. For example, a deponent told the Commission about a Falintil attack on the village of Manehat (Barique/Natarbora, Manatuto) in which houses were burned and several civilians were killed:

> On 5 May 1985, Falintil attacked the area of Manehat during the night. During the attack Falintil burned 15 people's home in Manehat, including my home (João de Carvalho). Apart from the arson, they shot two civilians dead and injured one person. Falintil also stole the people's belongings including their food, clothes and cattle.[855]

739. The increase in cases such as this in Manatuto in 1985 might be related to the ongoing political conflict within Fretilin – including the disappearance of Falintil commander Kilik Wae Gae and the subsequent surrender of Mauk Moruk – and the appointment of new Falintil commanders in the region.

* 35 Tahun Darma Bhakti Kostrad, [no bilbiographical information provided], pp. 86-88. This pattern roughly corresponds to data collected by the Commission from gravestones in Indonesian military cemeteries in Timor-Leste, although that data shows peaks of 62 in 1985 and 32 in 1986, after which the annual totals are in the low 20s.

740. In 1987, when Indonesia held another national election, there was an increase in the number of civilians killed by Falintil but there are no reports about Hansip being killed. At least one (and perhaps more) of the Falintil attacks in 1987 was directly related to the election. A deponent told the Commission about a Falintil attack on a group transporting election boxes in Natarbora, Manatuto.

> My husband, João Oscar, with three of his friends, Americo, Mário Belo and Sebastião Alves (Milsas), went to Betano [Same, Manufahi] on a tractor…intending to pick up election boxes. As they were on the way back, Falintil blocked the road and shot them dead. I was told this by friends of my husband, who collected his body from the site and brought it to my house.[856]

741. As was the case five years earlier, in 1987 Falintil also carried out attacks on 17 August, Indonesian Independence Day.

> On 17 August 1987, at 9.00pm, four Falintil attacked the village of Besusu, Uma Berloik (Alas, Manufahi). I (Joaquina Fernandes) did not know them but I knew they were Falintil… During the attack, the perpetrators burned down my neighour's house and fired shots to frighten the community. We fled to the rice fields nearby for safety… I yelled from the rice fields to my husband (Duarte Vassalo) to get out of the house quickly. fast. As he came out he was shot and died on the spot because the shot went straight through his ear. They burned three houses.[857]

742. In contrast to the tumultous years of the mid-1980s, the Commission received very few reports about fatal violations committed by Falintil in 1988 and 1989. Most of these killings appear to have been targeted at specific individuals who collaborated with the Indonesian military or, in one case, a former Falintil fighter who had surrendered and returned to his community.*

Table 47: Civilians and Hansip/TBO killed by Fretilin/Falintil, 1985–1989, as reported to the CAVR

	1985		1986		1987		1988		1989
	Civilian	Hansip	Civilian	Hansip	Civilian	Hansip	Civilian	Hansip	Civilian	Hansip
Lautém	1	2	2	-	1	-	-	-	-	-
Viqueque	-	4	2	1	-	-	-	-	-	-
Baucau	3	-	-	-	-	-	3	-	-	-
Manatuto	6	-	-	-	9	-	1	-	3	1

* For the latter, see HRVD Statement 00666. Note too that one attack and killing in 1989 took place on Indonesian Independence Day; see HRVD Statement 03037.

Manufahi	-	-	1	7	1	-	-	1	1	-
Ainaro	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Aileu	-	-	-	-	-	-	1	-	-	-
Ermera	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Covalima	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Bobonaro	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Liquiçá	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Dili	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Total	10	6	5	8	11	-	5	1	4	1
Combined	16		13		11		6		5

Fatal violations committed by Fretilin/Falintil, 1990–1998

743. Continuing the trend established in the late 1980s there were few reports to the Commission of fatal violations by Falintil during the first half of the 1990s. This trend is explained by several related developments. In 1987 the armed Resistance, Falintil, was formally separated from Fretilin, and a new policy was adopted shifting the focus of the struggle to urban protest. Although Falintil remained alive and militarily capable, this policy shift gave greater prominence to public protests in the towns than to Falintil's previously favoured tactic of demonstrating that it was a force still be reckoned with through shows of force in the countryside. This trend was accelerated by the Indonesian decision in late 1988 to "open" Timor-Leste to Indonesians, to allow greater freedom of movement and to allow foreign tourists to visit the territory. This policy shift by Indonesia reinforced the new focus on non-violent urban protest. At the same time the decision to pursue a "national unity" strategy and to build as broad as possible a base of support for the Resistance, including by winning over East Timorese who were collaborating with the Indonesians, probably also contributed to the decline in violence in these years.

744. Between 1996 and 1998, however, there was a sudden surge in fatal violations committed by Falintil. There are several notable features of these killings. First, unlike in the 1980s, when the majority of civilians killed by Fretilin/Falintil were in the eastern half of the territory, during the late 1990s these cases were evenly divided between the east (Lautém, Viqueque, and Baucau) and the west (Ermera, Covalima, Bobonaro, and Liquiçá). This shift reflected the change in leadership on the ground in Timor-Leste following the capture of Xanana Gusmão. Although Xanana Gusmão remained Falintil Commander-in-Chief while in prison, Konis Santana, in his capacity as CNRM chief of staff, acted as day-to-day commander of Falintil and established his base in Ermera (see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy).

745. Second, unlike in the 1980s when Falintil targeted members of the civil defence force, guard posts manned by civilians, individuals out hunting or those sent to search for Falintil, in the late 1990s most extra-judicial executions committed by Falintil were targeted against collaborators or civilians working as spies for the Indonesian military.*

746. However, Falintil continued to carry out occassional attacks on the Indonesian military and members of the civil defence groups, as well as civilians on guard duty. In March 1990, for example, Falintil attacked a guard post in Carlilo (Aiteas, Manatuto, Manatuto). A deponent told the Commission:

> On 23 March 1990, I (Mateus Soares Mauk), with my friends José Soares Laka, Domingos Ramos, Sebastião Ximenes, Antonio Coli, Domingos Larak, Hermenegildo Soares and my father, Antonio Soares, were on night duty at the Neighbourhood Security Post in Carlilo, Kampung Baru. Around 9.00pm Falintil attacked the Post and my father Antonio Celo Soares died during the attack, while I and my friends José Soares Laka and Domingos Larak were injured on the thigh, buttock, and leg from the shooting. The Falintil also stole corn, rice, clothes and a pig belonging to Mateus Go'o.[858]

747. The Falintil attack and execution at the home of a teacher named Castelo in Fuiloro (Lospalos, Lautém) is illustrative of the targeting of those seen as collaborators. On the evening of 28 May 1997 Castelo, his family and several Indonesian teachers were watching television when Falintil guerrillas arrived at the house and asked why they had signed documents supporting the integration of Timor-Leste with Indonesia. Castelo, two of his children and a friend were shot, and when the other teachers tried to flee they too were shot. The Commission received the following testimony from the wife of one of the victims:

> On 28 May 1997 at about 6.20pm in the village of Ira-Ara, Lospalos, my husband, EP, went to C's house, to watch them put up their satellite dish. Not long after, Falintil attacked C's house and asked Z, my younger sibling: "Where is C?" Z told them that C was in the house, and we began to hear shooting from the teacher's house and C's house. After that I, E, wanted to find out what was happening at C's house, but hearing the shooting going on I had to hide in the bushes. After the shooting stopped at 10.00pm, I went to C's house to find out what had happened. I found my husband, EP, laid out dead on the floor with his friends C, V and B.[859]

748. Another example of a Falintil attack against civilians working for the Indonesian military was described by a deponent in Dilor (Lacluta, Viqueque):

> Manuel de Araújo was forcibly recruited by Kopassus to spy on Falintil in the forest and report back to Kopassus. He continued to do that until 1 July 1996 when he went ot the forest with his friend Andre Sarmento to get tuak. That evening we heard shooting... and because they did not

* Although there were also cases in which Falintil killed the wrong person [see HRVD Statement 04156].

return that night we reported it to Kopassus and Koramil…. The following day, 2 July 1996, the Kopassus Commander Raul, his deputy Mamat, and the Milsas Commander Filipe Parada, a Koramil named Jacinto, Babinsa named Julio Riberu, Binpolda named Lorenco, village head called Jose Maria Soares, and some of the Dilor community went to Kulu Uhi to look for Manuel and Andre. Theyf found their corpses. They died not from shooting but because their hands were tied behind their backs, and they had been struck and stabbed with a knife, and their heads stoned. Their bodies were hanging in a tree. *

749. The third notable feature of Falintil attacks during this period was the string of election-related actions in May 1997. In early May, Falintil attacked a truck carrying Brimob members (Police Mobile Brigade) in the sub-district of Quelicai (Baucau), killing several of them.[860] Days before the election, due on 25 May, clandestine members, cooperating with Falintil, staged a bold attack on the Brimob compound in Bairro Pite, Dili. Several civilians were reported killed during the attack, although the statements received by the Commission indicate that they were hit by shots fired from the Brimob compound rather than by the attackers.[861]

750. There were also occasions when Falintil members committed what can only be described as criminal attacks on civilians. One deponent from Akaderu Laran (Kakae Uma, Natarbora, Manatuto) told the Commission:

On 13 February 1994, Falintil attacked around 9.00pm. At the time my mother, Faustina Soares, had just come out of the kitchen and was entering the house when she was shot twice by Falintil, one bullet hitting her in the head. She died immediately. As my mother died, my wife, Antoneta Lopes, came out of a room and caught a glimpse of a long-haired Falintil as he left. The Falintil also stole three sacks of fertiliser that they thought was rice and I (Elizio) shouted at them "you are not men, you don't seek the enemy and just kill poor, innocent people".[862]

Fatal violations by Falintil in 1999

751. As is the case for extra-judicial executions committed by the Indonesian military and militias, the killing (and disappearance) of civilians by Falintil in 1999 can be divided into three periods: (i) January until the end of May; (ii) the UNAMET period from the beginning of June until the Popular Consultation on 30 August; and (iii) September until the end of October.

752. The patterns of Falintil killings of civilians during these three periods more or less mirrored those of killings by the Indonesian military and the militias, though their scale was incomparably smaller throughout: relatively high numbers of cases were reported in the first and third of these periods, while there was an almost complete lull during the UNAMET period from June until the ballot on 30 August. Moreover, as with the killings by militia groups and the Indonesian military, Falintil's fatal violations were heavily concentrated in the western districts, particularly in Ermera and Bobonaro. For almost all of 1999 Falintil was under orders from its high command not to respond to militia violence in kind. In view of the fact that these orders were generally obeyed and the number of incidents reported was small, the degree of institutional responsibility for those violations that did occur may not be high.

* HRVD Statement 00474.

753. The Commission has received reports about 11 fatal violations (killings and disappearances) committed by Falintil between January and May: in February three civilians were killed in Covalima; in March two civilians were killed in Ermera; in April two civilians were "disappeared" in Baucau and one individual was killed in Bobonaro; and in May individuals were executed singly in Ermera, Covalima and Liquiçá. In terms of the number of violations, the identity of victims and the locations, these cases appear to be a continuation of the pattern observable during the previous three years. Of all these cases the one with the most far-reaching consequences during the first half of 1999 was the killing of Manuel S. Gama, the former sub-district head of Cailaco (Bobonaro) and a well-known pro-autonomy figure, and an Indonesian soldier near the village of Porogoa (Cailaco, Bobonaro) on 12 April 1999. These deaths led to a massive retaliatory crackdown in Cailaco and beyond by the TNI and their militia allies, and the mobilisation of new militia groups in Bobonaro District (see par. 779-781 below, for a full account).[863]

754. During the UNAMET period, from June to August, violations by Falintil virtually ceased. The Commission received only one report, about the disappearance of a man in the district of Baucau.[864] It is also worth noting that on 16 May, Falintil forces in the sub-district of Lolotoe (Bobonaro) attacked Indonesian military personnel and militia members, killing three combatants.[865]

755. When the results of the Popular Consultation were announced, the Indonesian military and militias launched a massive attack on the civilian population and destroyed both public buildings and private dwellings throughout the territory. Although Falintil continued to be cantoned, in the western districts of Ermera, Bobonaro and Liquiçá members of Falintil carried out what appear to have been revenge killings against individuals who were identified as pro-autonomy, even though complicity in the earlier violence was not always clear.[866] There were also instances where Falintil retaliated against militia groups and TNI units during this period. A deponent provided this description of one such incident in Lautém:

> On 8 October 1999, Falintil forces led by M233 ambushed some members of Tim Alpha [militia] at a place called Warusira, Tenu, in the sub-district of Moro (now Lautém)… During the incident Mário João Lopes and his companions were killed by Falintil forces… because they were suspected of killing some nuns…. I got this information about the killings from the Falintil commander M233.[867]

756. In all the Commission received information about 22 extra-judicial executions and seven disappearances committed by Falintil in 1999, 17 of these coming in the post-ballot period.

Table 48: Civilians and Hansip (in brackets) killed by Fretilin/Falintil, 1990–1999, as reported to the CAVR*

	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997	1998	1999
Lautém	2	-	1	-	-	-	1	7	-	1
Viqueque	-	-	-	-	-	-	10	1	2	-
Baucau	-	-	1	-	-	1	-	1	9	5
Manatuto	-(1)	-	-	-	1	-	-	-	-	-
Manufahi	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Ainaro	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Aileu	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Ermera	-	-	1	-	-	-	7	3	5	10
Covalima	-	-	1	-	-	-	-	-	1	3
Bobonaro	-	-	-	-	2	1	1	2	-	9
Liquiçá	-	-	-	-	-	-	3	1	-	1
Dili	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-
Total	2(1)	-	4	-	3	2	22	15	17	29

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances, 1999

757. The Commission estimates that in 1999 TNI and militia were responsible for the unlawful killings of between 1,400 and 1,500 civilians.†* The Commission received statements reporting the unlawful killing of 785 people by the TNI or the militia in Timor-Leste between 1 January and 25 October 1999. Another 27 persons were reported to the Commission to have been killed in refugee camps in West Timor.‡ Bobonaro, Covalima, and Oecussi were the three districts that reported the highest number of killings and disappearances.

758. All accounts agree that Bobonaro District suffered the highest number of unlawful killings and disappearances in 1999. The Commission received statements describing the deaths of 141 civilians from killings and disappearances in the district.§ At least nine militia groups existed in Bobonaro in 1999 and each of the six sub-districts had at

* The figures for 1999 include seven individuals who were allegedly disappeared by Falintil: in Baucau two individuals in April and one in June, and in Ermera four individuals in September.

† The estimate of 1,400 is quoted, among others, by the Secretary-General's progress report to the Security Council on the UNMISET, 18 February 2005, S/2005/99. The indictments filed by the Serious Crimes Unit in Timor-Leste cover 572 of the estimated 1,400 murders.

‡ A study commissioned by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) and submitted to the Commission estimates between 1,200 and 1,500 killings took place in 1999 [Geoffrey Robinson, East Timor 1999 – Crimes against Humanity, Report commissioned by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), July 2003, Submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 1. Subsequently referred to as OHCHR submission to CAVR].

§ The OHCHR study estimated there were 229 killings in Bobonaro (OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 142).

least one militia group. The oldest aggressive militia group in the district was Halilintar, led by the Integration Fighters' Force (Pasukan Pejuang Integrasi, PPI) supreme commander, João Tavares (see Militia Table in Vol. I, Part 4: Regime of Occupation). Halilintar, based in Maliana and Atabae, operated in the whole district and, at times, beyond it. Among the other major militia groups, Dadurus Merah Putih (Maliana), Firmi Merah Putih (Balibó), Saka Loromonu (Balibó) and Hametin Merah Putih (Bobonaro) were the most active. The TNI's relations with militia groups in the district were close. The Kodim commander, Lieutenant-Colonel Burhanuddin Siagian, was a strong supporter of militia groups. Lieutenant Sutrisno, the Maliana Kodim Chief of Intelligence, was another TNI officer heavily involved in organising the militia groups and coordinating their activities.

759. Covalima District was almost as badly affected as Bobonaro. The number of killings and disappearances reported to the Commission was 131.* The main militia group in the district, Laksaur, was active as early as January 1999 in the central and western areas while the eastern sub-district of Mape/Zumalai was mostly covered by the Mahidi militia group from the neighbouring district of Ainaro. The Laksaur militia group, led by Olivio Mendonça Moruk, received strong support from the local military and civilian authorities including the Kodim commanders, Lieutenant-Colonel Achmad Mas Agus (who was replaced by Lieutenant-Colonel Lilik Koeshardianto in late August 1999) and the district administrator, Colonel Herman Sediyono.

760. Oecussi District reported 125 killings and disappearances to the Commission.† The majority of the reported killings occurred in the post-ballot period. The early departure of UN staff and international observers, the absence of armed pro-independence groups and the late arrival of Interfet gave the TNI and militia groups free rein to create havoc for two months after the announcement of the ballot result. The geographical proximity to Indonesian territory also provided a safe haven for the preparation of operations. The militia group in Oecussi, Sakunar, was led by Simão Lopes, former sub-district administrator in Passabe and Oesilo in the 1980s, and who in 1999 worked in the Fishery Agency of Oecussi District. Sakunar received the full backing of the highest military and civilian authorities in the district, including District Administrator Filomeno Mesquita da Costa, the chief of police, Lieutenant-Colonel Wilmar Marpaung, and the Kodim commanders, Lieutenant-Colonel Kamiso Miran and Lieutenant-Colonel Bambang Sungesti, who replaced Lieutenant-Colonel Miran in early August 1999.

761. Based on testimonies received by the Commission, a significantly larger number of unlawful killings took place in the western districts than in the eastern districts – the western districts being closer to the Indonesian border and being where the more notorious militia were based. Other than the three districts mentioned above, Dili and Liquiçá also registered high levels of killings and disappearances in 1999. The remaining two districts which suffered relatively high numbers of fatalities were Ermera and

* The OHCHR study reports that at least 190 killings occurred in Covalima District (OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 149).

† The OHCHR study estimated there were at least 170 cases in Oecussi (OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 184).

Lautém. Viqueque and Aileu were the least affected districts. One of the main factors determining the scale of the killings was the strength of the local militia group in each district. Notorious militia groups such as Dadurus Merah Putih, Laksaur, Aitarak, Tim Pancasila, Mahidi, Besi Merah Putih, and Sakunar were based in the districts that suffered the highest levels of fatal violence. Meanwhile, Aku Hidup untuk Integrasi in Aileu and Tim Makikit in Viqueque were less aggressive than other militia groups.

762. The unlawful killings were usually enacted by multiple perpetrators using a variety of weapons ranging from machetes, to homemade guns, to automatic firearms. Victims were often individually targeted for their pro-independence affiliations. Particularly vulnerable were students, those participating openly in CNRT campaign activities, and East Timorese staff of UNAMET. Violence was targeted at not only its direct victims but also at intimidating others in the community. Apparently for this reason victims were often mutilated before or after they were killed.

763. There are clear signs that TNI co-ordinated with militia groups in the killings. Coordination existed at various levels including funding, training, directing, or even commanding militia at the scene of an attack. In some cases TNI members were directly involved in killing civilians. As a general pattern, TNI members were more directly involved in violence where the local militia group was still weak. This was particularly the case in the early months of 1999. If TNI members were not directly involved, they were often at the scene doing nothing to prevent militia members from carrying out atrocities, giving tacit approval to the violence. Some militia leaders, such as Joanico Belo, commander of the Saka militia group in Baucau, and Cesario Tilman, a member of the Mahidi militia group in Ainaro, were in fact TNI soldiers. Civilian authorities such as district administrators, sub-district administrators and village chiefs were also often involved in supporting or carrying out militia activities.* Some local civilian leaders were also members of local militia groups.

764. The victims of unlawful killings by TNI and militia were mostly real or suspected supporters of independence. Many of them were known independence supporters including CNRT members, clandestine members, Falintil supporters, student activists and their relatives. Sometimes a list of the persons to be killed had been made. Local leaders who were seen to be sympathetic to the independence cause and Catholic priests, nuns and brothers were sometimes targeted. Victims also included ordinary people who attempted to escape from TNI and militia out of fear, and villagers who fled to the mountains after the ballot, thus disobeying orders to go to West Timor (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment, section on displacement before and after the Popular Consultation, 1999). Because of these actions these people came under suspicion of having pro-independence sympathies. In a very arbitrary pattern, the TNI and militia also attacked suspected pro-independence villages by burning houses and killing civilians. Many random killings also occurred, particularly after the announcement of the result of the ballot, by soldiers of Battalion 745 in late September as they withdrew from Lospalos to Dili.

* Links between the Indonesian military, civilian authorities and the militia were embodied in individuals such as Vidal Doutel Sarmento who was a District Administrator (Bupati) in Manatuto, a member of TNI Special Forces (Kopassus) and a founder of and adviser to the Mahadomi militia group. Olivio Mendonça Moruk, a Bupati and military commander in Covalima was also leader of the Laksaur militia. The AHI (Aku Hidup untuk Integrasi, I Live for Integration) militia in Aileu were set up and supported by the civilian district administration.

765. The violence in 1999, including killings and disappearances, occurred in three distinct phases, each with its own patterns of abuse. The first covered the months January to May, the second covered the months from June to 29 August and the third covered from the day after the ballot on 30 August until late October when Interfet had established control over the whole territory.* The majority of unlawful killings took place in the periods before the arrival of UNAMET and after the ballot, suggesting that these killings may have been closely related to the presence or absence of the United Nations and international scrutiny of TNI behavior.

January to late May

766. The militia, often in collaboration with ABRI/TNI, committed many serious atrocities, including mass killings and disappearances, before UNAMET began its operations in Timor-Leste. This is the period during which militia groups began to take their characteristic form through recruitment, training, inaugurations and consolidation within an overarching structure. During this period militia targeted people regarded as having pro-independence sympathies. The Commission received testimonies showing that between January and the end of May 1999, more than 250 people were unlawfully killed or disappeared. Beginning in January, the violence accelerated to a peak in April before falling off in May. It included several attacks on places of refuge for internally displaced persons that occurred as negotiations leading to the 5 May Agreements, signed by the Portuguese and Indonesian governments under UN auspices, reached their final phase.

Early June to 30 August

767. The number of people killed in acts of political violence fell sharply as UNAMET, international observers and journalists established a presence throughout the territory from early June. Executions during this period also took a different form. Killings were committed primarily by East Timorese militia, sometimes with the aid of Indonesian TNI personnel in civilian clothes. The Indonesian military apparently tried to disguise their direct involvement in executions and other violations during this period. In late August, however, coinciding with the designated campaign period, there was a surge in violations of all kinds, including killings. The main targets of these killings were students and CNRT members participating in campaign activities. During this period more than 30 cases of killings and disappearences were reported to the Commission.

30 August to late October

768. This period of relative calm ended dramatically as soon as the voting concluded, when militia and TNI executed local UNAMET staff on 30 August and 2 September.

* Geoffrey Robinson discusses these three periods as the pre-UNAMET period, the UNAMET period and the post-ballot period (OHCHR submission to CAVR, pp. 44-47).

In much of the territory, however, the violence began in earnest on 4 September, the day the result of the ballot was formally announced. The announcement was made in the morning, and by early afternoon the militia, TNI soldiers and police had taken to the streets in towns and villages across the territory, firing their weapons, attacking supporters of independence, and burning houses and public buildings. Formally the TNI took over responsibility for law and order from the police on 4 September and on 6 September President Habibie declared martial law in Timor-Leste. Despite these actions, ostensibly taken to restore order, the number of killings and disappearances peaked during this period with more than 560 incidents. The number of killings reported to the Commission as having occurred in this relatively short period was 528, by far the highest number reported for any of the three periods described above.

Table 49: Killings and disappearances of civilians by militia and TNI in 1999, as reported to the CAVR

Location	Jan-May		Jun-Aug		Sept-Oct		Total reported fatal violations
	Killed	Dis.	Killed	Dis.	Killed	Dis.
Lautém	4	-	1	-	41	-	46
Viqueque	4	-	3	-	4	-	11
Baucau	3	3	-	-	13		19
Manatuto	5	1	-	-	19	-	25
Manufahi	8	1	-	-	13	-	22
Ainaro	5	-	-	-	29	-	34
Aileu	-	-	-	-	15	-	15
Ermera	30		2	1	12		45
Covalima	22	10	1	-	98	-	131
Bobonaro	52	-	9	-	81	-	142
Liquiçá	50	-	3	-	6	-	61
Dili	24		6	-	52		82
Oecussi	1	-	4	1	118	-	125
West Timor	-	-	-	-	27	-	27
Sub-totals (comprise killings and disappearances)	223		34		528		785

January–May: unlawful killings and disappearances before the arrival of UNAMET

769. Before June, it was common for unlawful killings to be carried out by both TNI and militia groups working together. The open collaboration of TNI and the militia contrasts with the period when UNAMET was present and the Indonesian military made some effort to disguise its role in the violence. The Commission received reports of killings and disappearances during the first five months of 1999 in 12 of Timor-Leste's 13 districts, the exception being Aileu.

770. The most killings and disappearances that occurred from January to May as reported to the Commission occurred in Bobonaro and Covalima Districts, with 52 and 50 respectively. The majority of the cases reported to the Commission from Bobonaro gave evidence of close cooperation between the TNI and militia groups. The following tables summarise these cases except for those that occurred in April 1999 which are discussed separately below.

Table 50: Killings and disappearances jointly by TNI and militia groups, January–March, May 1999, Bobonaro District

HRVD Statement	Summary
1122	On 4 January members of the Joint Intelligence Unit (SGI) and Halilintar militia, led by M295, killed a Fretilin supporter, Valentino Guilhermino, in Aipusra, Atabae (Atabae).
1828	On 27 January members of SGI and Halilintar militia attacked Abel Martins at his home in Faturasen, Rairobo (Atabae). He was shot dead.[868]
2485	On 16 March BMP militia together with TNI members from the Koramil Atabae, were checking travellers at Sukaer Laran in Atabae. They captured Armindo Bento, a passenger on a bus going to Dili, because his identity card had expired. Bento was reportedly severely tortured, then killed.
2418, 2585	On 19 March TNI and Halilintar members raided a meeting of clandestine members in Ritabou (Maliana). Witness testimonies cite the presence of Halilintar Commander M295, M56 and a member of the TNI, M57 [East Timorese]. Shot to death in the attack were Pedro dos Santos, Domingos dos Santos, José Barros and Fonseca Asu Mau. Other participants in the meeting escaped.
8630	A CNRT leader, Bonifacio Barreto, was abducted by members of Kodim Maliana, the SGI and the Saka Loromonu militia in May. He was taken to the beach in Batugade, where he was reportedly murdered and his body put in a bag and thrown into the sea.[869]
2551	On 7 May Halilintar militia, led by M295 killed Agusto Soares at Bea Horo, Ritabou Village. On 17 May Longuinos Batu Mali was reportedly stabbed to death at the Bulobu River in Ritabou by Dadurus Merah Putih members and members of the District Military Command in Maliana.

Table 51: Killings and disappearances by militia groups, January–March, May 1999, Bobonaro District

HRVD Statement	Summary
1135, 1786, 1159	Members of Halilintar militia, under M295, reportedly killed Luciano from Hauba (Maliana) on 17 May and Petrus Santos on 19 May and were implicated in the disappearance of Eugenio da Silva Gonçalves, a high school student from Maliana, on 29 May.
6683	Hametin Merah Putih militia reportedly killed Domingos Lole Mau in Edeoa, Kota Boot Village (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) on 9 May.

8227	On 11 May Dadurus Merah Putih militia, including M58, killed Pedro de Jesus in Holgaul, Leber Village (Bobonaro, Bobonaro).
8241-03	On 17 May Dadurus Merah Putih members arrested Fernando Correia at a church in Bobonaro, took him to the DMP post in Bobonaro, and then to the aldeia of Manu Aman, Tunu Bibi (Maliana) where he was reportedly killed.

771. During this same period two militia groups, Mahidi and Laksaur, were active in the sub-districts of Covalima District. The Commission received testimony describing an unlawful killing in the aldeia of Oebaba, Mape (Zumalai, Covalima) by a TNI soldier and three Mahidi members. According to João da Costa Fernandes Cardoso, on 24 January, Fernando Cardoso was beaten by the soldier and two Mahidi members before he was shot dead by a third Mahidi member who stole his motorcycle and Rp800,000.[870]

772. The table below summarises all the cases reported to the Commission of killings and disappearances which took place in Covalima District from January to May 1999, except for incidents in April 1999 which are reported separately below.

Table 52: Killings and disappearances by militia groups, January–March, May 1999, Covalima District*

HRVD Statement and/SCU Case	Summary
3684;and SCU Case no. 2003/06	On 24 or 25 January Mahidi militia, under the command of Cancio Lopes de Carvalho attacked the village of Galitas, Mape/Zumalai, because villagers were suspected of providing food to Falintil. Olandino Pereira, his pregnant daughter Angelica de Jesus and her brother Luis Pereira, were all killed. Another villager, Adelino Barreto, was seriously wounded during the attack.
8446-02	On 27 February Mahidi and Laksaur militia groups went on an operation in Suai Town and abducted three persons known as Pedro, Francisco and Vitorino who were beaten, then taken away in a car and not seen again.
5117	On 3 March Mahidi militia killed Luis dos Santos, his wife Fatima Mesquita and their daughter Sabina Mesquita, in Mape Village (Zumalai) because Luis had refused to be recruited into the militia.
5163	On 24 March Mahidi militia killed Fernando Caldas in Raifila, Mape (Zumalai).
5115	A Gadapaksi commander told a deponent that his men killed a man named Ernesto dos Santos. The victim was reportedly abducted in Salele (Tilomar) on 15 March on the way to Dili to see his sick wife.
SCU Case No. 2003/14	On or about 13 May José Afonso Amaral was killed by Laksaur militia in Fotoloro (Fatululik) when he and others were trying to prevent the militia group from taking away his brother to kill him.[871]

* Killings and disappearances which took place in April 1999 reported in the section below.

SCU Case No. 2003/14	On 28 May Laksaur militia under the command of Egidio Manek attacked a hut in Weisei forest near Oegues (Maucatar, Suai Town), where Domingos Martins and Gabriel Amaral were hiding. The two, both supporters of independence, were killed.[872]
SCU Case No. 2003/14	On or about 28 May a member of the clandestine movement, Vasco Amaral, was abducted in Fatumean by a group of Laksaur militia, under the command of Henrikus Mali. Henrikus Mali told the villagers not to look for Vasco Amaral as "Vasco Amaral was no more". His body was found on or around 30 May.[873]

The coordinated surge of violence in April 1999: killings in Liquiçá, Cailaco and Dili

773. The Commission has received evidence showing coordinated violence throughout Timor-Leste taking place in April 1999, in the month before the 5 May Agreements. In April 1999, three incidents involving major violations of human rights occurred in Liquiçá, Bobonaro, and Dili.

774. The first massacre in 1999 took place at the Liquiçá Church on 6 April. This incident, during which as many as 60 people seeking refuge at the church were killed,[874] is illustrative of the organised nature of TNI/militia violence. Before this incident, in early April, TNI and Besi Merah Putih (BMP) militia intensified their campaign of violence against pro-independence activists and the civilian population of Liquiçá. On 5 April, in three separate incidents, three supporters of independence – Herminio dos Santos, Ilidio dos Santos, and Laurindo da Costa Gonçalves – were abducted by members of BMP.[875]

775. In response to this deterioration of security, people from the sub-districts of Liquiçá and Maubara began to seek refuge at the Catholic church in Liquiçá town (Liquiçá, Liquiçá). Approximately 2,000 people, including women and children, had gathered at the church compound by 6 April. Early on the morning of 6 April, BMP militia along with TNI troops, including ones from the District Military Command in Liquiçá, the Sub-district Command in Maubara, also Mobile Police (Brimob) from Dili, members of the Special Forces Command (Kopassus) and Battalion 143, and local police, arrived at the church. Two police officers demanded that Father Rafael dos Santos hand over Jacinto da Costa Pereira, the village chief of Dato (Liquiçá, Liquiçá), along with another man, as both were identified as pro-independence leaders.

776. The Commission received a large number of statements about the massacre at the Liquiçá Church.[876] According to a witness, between noon and 1.00pm, Brimob members fired shots into the air and then militia members entered the compound.[877] Tear gas was thrown into the priest's residence forcing many people to flee. As they fled, they were brutally attacked by TNI and militia members waiting for them outside. According to Father Rafael's account the assailants killed the men but allowed the women and the children to leave the area.[878] Then they entered the priest's house and executed any persons they found inside. The BMP commander, M61, was seen inside the church compound with his men. When most of the refugees had left the church and the parish house, BMP members, police, and soldiers, including Sergeant M62

[East Timorese], came in looking for stragglers. Those they found were killed.[879] Some people fled to the house of the district administrator, Leoneto Martins, where pursuing militia and soldiers killed or severely injured them.

777. It is difficult to estimate the exact number of victims because the bodies of the dead were taken away.[880] While the official provincial police (polda) report said that only five people died in the attack and its aftermath, other estimates put the number between 30 and more than 100.[881] After the massacre at the Liquiçá Church many people fled to Dili and sought refuge at the house of Manuel Carrascalão where they were attacked again by BMP and Aitarak militia on 17 April.

778. Killings of real or perceived supporters of independence in Liquiçá continued after the Liquiçá Church massacre.[882] On 7 April, Fernando da Costa was allegedly stabbed to death at the Koramil in Liquiçá by militia members.[883] On 9 April on the orders of M65 [East Timorese], a BMP commander for Bazartete and Liquiçá, a man known as Carlos was allegedly arrested, taken to the beach in Pala near the Indonesian military cemetery and killed. He had documents concerning CNRT activities in his pocket. On 14 April, Henrique Borges, Carlos dos Santos da Costa, and Leo Lakon were killed at the beach in Pilila, Leohata (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) by an Indonesian TNI member, M302[884] On 21 April, Felix Barreto was killed by BMP militia members in Ulmera (Bazartete, Liquiçá).[885] On or about 27 April, Tobias Alves Coreia and Elias Ataidi were killed by militia in Tutuge, Loidahar (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) because they were identified as pro-independence supporters. It is alleged that their names were on a list drawn up by TNI officer Sergeant M62 [East Timorese] and others.[886] On 26 April in Maubara, a man named Abel was arrested and taken to the lake to be executed. Abel has not been seen since.[887]

A survivor of the Liquiçá Church Massacre[888]

On the morning of 5 April 1999, I was walking from the Social-Political Affairs office in Liquiçá to my house when I met my friend Lukas, from Flores, Indonesia. He encouraged me to go home quickly, saying, "I've heard that the Besi Merah militia are at the border of Liquiçá and Maubara." But I decided not to go home. I went instead to a meeting about the Easter youth commemoration in Manatuto. I met with my friends Jacinta, Suzi, and Ermelita. We weren't sure whether it would be a good idea to participate in the commemoration so we went to ask Father Rafael's opinion. While we were meeting with Father Rafael, the village head, Jacinto da Costa came and told us that a youth had been killed and others wounded in an attack by the militia and military.

We left Father Rafael's house early in the afternoon. When I got home I went to see Aquilina to get some more information. Aquilina lives close to the Welcome sign in Liquiçá. As soon as I got to her house I heard more shooting, coming from the direction of Pukalaran. I went straight home and found that my family had already fled to the church in Liquiçá. I joined them there. There were many people hiding in the church including people from the villages of Dotasi, Guilu, Leopa and Upper and Lower Caimeo. In the afternoon the militia and the military looted and burnt down the houses of the sub-district administrator, João Bosco, and Agustinho. For the two days that we were in the church we did not do anything else but pray. At night we couldn't sleep, and outside the church the militia were harrassing us with threats and foul language.

At 9.00am on 6 April Eurico Guterres and his men came to the church office in Liquiçá to talk with Father Rafael and Father José. We heard that during that meeting Eurico Guterres said he was going to make a request of the district administrator, Leoneto Martins. Eurico said that if Leoneto met the militia's demands the militia would let the people go home safely. But Eurico's meeting with Leoneto did not produce that guarantee.

Initially, Mobile Brigade police came to the church as if to rescue the people. In fact, Brimob were the ones who started the shooting. Around 1.00pm, the Besi Merah militia along with the police and the military attacked the church. They fired shots into the air to give the signal to the militia to enter the church, and then they started shooting the people. Wearing masks that covered their faces the militia and the military then attacked with axes, swords, knives, bombs and guns. The police shot my older brother, Felix, and the militia slashed up my cousins, Domingos, Emilio, and an eight-month old baby.

Because Brimob and the military were slaughtering people who had been hiding in the priest's office, everyone started running out of the church trying to find places to hide and to save themselves. I left with Emilio's wife and we went to the Convent. As we left I saw Miguel was still alive, but Loidahar and someone else from Maubara were lying dead near the church bell.

The militia, police and military had prepared a truck to carry people to the district administrator's house. When we arrived the militia continued their actions and continued beating and stabbing civilians. Several people died at the district administrator's house. Luckily there was a nurse there who attended to the wounded. After about three hours Agustinho, a civil servant in Maubara, made an announcement to the people, saying, "Go home and raise the Indonesian flag. And tie it to your right hand to show that we are all people who are prepared to die for this flag."

One week after the massacre a TNI soldier from the eastern sector, called Pedro, told me that the military from Kodim were also involved. I heard that the bodies of those who died were taken in a truck, but I don't know where they were taken.

779. The second major event in April 1999 took place in the sub-district of Cailaco (Bobonaro). On 12 April, TNI soldiers and Halilintar militia executed at least seven people.* This was in retaliation for the murder of at least one TNI soldier and a local pro-autonomy figure, Manuel Gama, in an ambush near Porogoa Village earlier the same day.† After the death of Manuel Gama, soldiers and militia searched for suspects. The Commission received at least one report of attempted murder during these initial sweeps.[889] A group of about 30 people were taken from the aldeia of Marco,[890] and some were severely beaten at the sub-district military command post.[891]

780. Residents and civil servants had been ordered to gather at the home of Manuel Gama, where the body was being prepared for burial. Several senior civilian and military officials arrived at the house, including the District Administrator, M70 [East Timorese], Head of the District People's Representative Assembly, Jorgé Tavares, the district military commander, Lieutenant-Colonel Burhanuddin Siagian and his intelligence chief, Lieutenant Sutrisno, and militia commander João da Silva Tavares. On the orders of Lieutenant Sutrisno, four pro-independence supporters - Paulino Soares, José Pou Lelo, Antonio Soares, and Manuel Mau Lelo Araújo - were taken from the house to the Joint Intelligence Unit compund next to the sub-district military headquarters. The district commander, Lieutenant-Colonel Burhanuddin Siagian, and the Halilintar militia leader, João Tavares, accompanied Lieutenant Sutrisno to the sub-district command post. There the detainees were shot dead by TNI soldiers and Halilintar militiamen. After the executions, the leaders returned to the home of Manuel Gama where they threatened to kill other pro-independence supporters.[892] One witness recounts:

> Not long afterwards, several soldiers came from the sub-district command headquarters and dragged [my] friends - Antonio Soares, José Pou-Lelo, Paulino [Soares] and Manuel Mau Lelo de Araujo – by their hands. Then several high-ranking civil and military leaders from Maliana arrived, namely: Bobonaro District Administrator M70 [East Timorese], Head of the District People's Representative Assembly, Jorgé Tavares, João da Silva Tavares (K11), Commander of Maliana District 1636, Burhanuddin Siagian and Chief of Intelligence, Sutrisno. The District Administrator and Head of the District People's Representative Assembly entered the house of mourning and the TNI District Commander, Chief of Intelligence and João Tavares headed directly to the sub-district command post. We were busy hanging awnings [for the funeral] when suddenly we heard

* The dead have been identified as: Paulino Soares (34), José Pou-Lelo (37), Antonio Soares (45), Manuel Mau Lelo Araújo, Carlito Mau Leto (32), Domingos Resi Mau (29) and João Evangelista Lima Vidal (40) [Robinson, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 197]. According to Adriano João there was an eighth victim, João Matos, a farmer from Meligo, the same village as Carlito Mau Leto ["Kasus Eksekusi 12-04-1999 di Cailaco", unpublished manuscript, June 2004].

† It is generally believed that Manuel Gama was killed during a Falintil attack [see, for example, HRVD Statements 1116-04; 5535; SCU Indictment 02/2003, paragraph 41], but according to one source, TNI was also a possible suspect in the murder: "Until now information about who the actual perpetrator of that murder was is still not consistent (with) accusations back and forth between TNI and Falintil in the forest." [CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004].

gunfire. Everyone was startled because those four people were shot in front of and beside the sub-district command post at a distance more or less 100 meters from the house of mourning. Then João Tavares and the TNI District Commander came to the house of mourning and screamed, "All you here, you are all part of the Security Disturbance Gang; we should kill you all."[893] [*]

781. On the same day, three other victims – Carlito Mau Leto, Domingos Resi Mau[†] and João Evangelista Lima Vidal – were taken into custody at the site of Manuel Gama's murder near the village of Porogoa by TNI soldiers.[894] Lieutenant Sutrisno was reportedly present when soldiers and militiamen beat the detainees. Carlito Mau Leto and Domingos Resi Mau were reportedly brought back to the sub-district command post in Marco, Cailaco and executed.[‡] The wife of João Evangelista witnessed her husband's murder:

At that time we heard the sound of gunfire, but we didn't know what the shooting was about. A little while later we heard the news that someone had killed Manuel Gama. We immediately went outside. TNI from the Cailaco military post came to get Manuel Gama's body They began inspecting every house in the vicinity of the killing. They apprehended my husband, João Evangelista Lima Vidal…They caught him, beat in the mouth with their weapons, kicked him, and tied him up. He was taken to the site of the killing at Porogoa, in the village of Meligo…They chased me away, yelling, "Get out of here!"… At that point they dragged my husband away and shot him. My relative Pedro took me by the hand and said, "Come on, let's leave for Marco, rather than stay here and be shot as well."[895]

782. These murders were the first in a series over the following two weeks targetting pro-independence supporters in the sub-district of Cailaco.[896] During this period soldiers and militia looted houses, detained and ill-treated hundreds, raped women and girls and killed about 20 people. Those killed included Aprigio Mali-Tae and Carlos Sama-Lelo, both killed on 17 April; Antonio Basilio and Armando Berlaku, both killed in the village of Manapa on 19 April by Dadurus Merah Putih militia; and José Barros, and Cornelio Rodrigues da Silva, both killed on 20 April.[897]

* According to Serious Crimes Unit (SCU) Indictment 02/2003, Bobonaro military officials visited the house of Manuel Gama where Lieutenant Sutrisno gave the order to arrest the four victims. The officials then went to the Sub-command post where Sutrisno ordered the detainees to be shot. Several CAVR interviews suggest that only civilian leaders went directly to the Gama house, while the militia and military leaders went straight to the military command post and shot the detainees who were already detained there.

† According to HRVD Statement 1116-04, this victim's name was Domingos Leki Mau.

‡ According to HRVD Statement 1865 and Adriano João ["Case of 12-04-99 execution in Cailaco", unpublished document], all victims were executed in front of the TNI Sub-district command office in Marco, Cailaco, but SCU indictment 02/2003 [paragraphs 76-83] states that these three victims were executed on a hill in the village of Porogoa not far from the site of Manuel Gama's death.

783. The killings on 17 April were allegedly committed by the Cailaco militia, Guntur Batu-Laka, Halilintar and the Joint Intelligence Unit. Dadurus Merah Putih, which was set up not long after the 12 April killings, allegedly killed Antonio Maia and Armando Berlaku on 19 April while members of militia groups Guntur Batu-Laka and Halilintar, BTT (Batalyon Tempur Teritorial, Local Territorial Battalion) and the Joint Intelligence Unit, allegedly committed the killings on 20 April.[898]

784. Calistro da Cunha was abducted on 24 April by the Kaer Metin Merah Putih militia and TNI members, including M66 and M67 (both East Timorese). He was taken to the village of Molop (Bobonaro) where he was handed over to a group of Halilintar militia and Koramil soldiers. He was killed by Halilintar militia from Maliana in Omelai, Molop. His body was buried the following day at the Guda cemetery by his family.[899]

785. Less than two weeks after the massacre at the Liquiçá Church, BMP and Aitarak militia members, together with TNI, killed at least 19 people* in Dili on 17 April 1999 during an attack on the home of Manuel Carrascalão.[900] Once again, the attack showed clear signs of military and militia cooperation.

786. The attack took place after a large gathering of some 5,000 members of the Integration Fighters' Force (Pasukan Pejuang Integrasi, PPI) in front of the Governor's Office in the centre of Dili. During the rally the Aitarak leader, M76, incited the crowd to capture and kill those who did not support integration with Indonesia. The rally was attended by senior government officials, including the provincial Governor, Abilio Soares, the District Administrator of Dili, Domingos Soares, the East Timor military commander, Colonel Tono Suratman, the assistant for operations to the army chief of staff, Major General Kiki Syahnakri, and four other senior military officers. When the rally was finished, M76 led a large group of militia on a parade through Dili. They attacked various targets along the way before reaching the home of Manuel Carrascalão. Approximately 150 refugees were sheltering there, having fled other attacks such as that in Liquiçá. In the attack on the house, Aitarak and BMP militia killed Manuel Carrascalão's teenage son, Manuelito. Others were killed or severely injured by militia who wielded machetes and knives. Among those killed were Eduardo de Jesus, Alberto dos Santos, Antonio da Silva Soares, Januario Pereira, Raul dos Santos Cancela, João dos Santos, Crisanto dos Santos, Rafael da Silva, Afonso Ribeiro and César dos Santos. Augustinho Benito X. Lay, who was severely wounded during the attack, survived.† Some of the refugees tried to climb over the fence to escape but could not because the house was surrounded by armed men. Multiple witnesses have confirmed that TNI officers in plain clothes from the Koramil in Maubara participated in the attack.

* According to the CAVR Gravestone Survey Research Team, "…[the] interview was followed by counting all the gravestones found in the Public Graveyard [by the beach] in Lebocoe-Maubara-Liquiçá, 19 new graves were those of victims from Maubara who were massacred at the home of Manuel Carrascalão on 17 April 1999." [CAVR Field Report, 21 October 2003].

† HRVD Statements 0354; 4629; 4661; 6940; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Eurico Guterres, et al., Case No. 02/2002, paragraphs 27-53. HRVD Statement 6940 alleges that a militia member M80 from the village of Leorema (Bazartete, Liquiçá) was actively involved in the killings at the house of Manuel Carrascalão. HRVD Statement 4661 alleges that militia member M80 took part in the killing of Raul dos Santos.

Furthermore, the commanding TNI officer for Timor-Leste, Colonel Tono Suratman, refused to intervene when Manuel Carrascalão requested that he stop the attack.[901]

787. The massacre at the house of Manuel Carrascalão was not the only fatal incident in Dili that day. Manuel Pinto, a clandestine member who had just arrived at the Becora bus terminal from Baucau, was killed in an attack by TNI and militia members, including M75. He was taken wounded to the Motael Clinic where he died.[902]

788. After the 17 April massacre, the village of Hera (Dili) became a focus of intensive violence. On 20 April Luis Dias, a Fretilin member, was killed in Hera by militia and TNI members.[903] On or about 1 May, Longuinhos da Silva de Jesus, a well-known independence supporter in Metinaro, was arrested and taken away by Aitarak commander M77. His body was found a few days later on the beach near Hera.[904] On or about 8 May, Tomas Ximenes and Sebastião Gusmão were killed by members of the Aitarak militia group in Hera.[905]

Killings in Covalima, Ermera, Manufahi Districts in April 1999

789. A dramatic increase in violence during the month of April was also documented in three other districts – Covalima, Ermera, and Manufahi.

790. In Covalima District violence escalated in mid-April after the Laksaur militia was established. While killings by the Mahidi militia group in the eastern area of the district decreased in this period, the Laksaur militia group stepped up its activities in the central and western areas such as Suai Town, Tilomar, and Maucatar. In Suai Town on 12 April a group of Laksaur militia members led by M78, killed clandestine member, Sabino Gusmão, at the local fuel station in Suai. M78 allegedly ordered his men to kill Sabino who was stabbed by a militia member named M79 and died of his injuries.[906]

791. On 13 April a group of Mahidi militia members led by M81 went to a house in the village of Dais (Maucatar, Covalima) where some students from the University of East Timor (Unitim) were staying as part of a work experience programme (Kuliah Kerja Nyata, KKN). They severely beat João da Silva Ximenes, one of the students, and he died shortly after. They also took Bernardinho Simão to the house of the Mahidi commander in Zumalai, M82, where several other people were already detained. Soon after Bernardinho Simão and Inacio Barreto, who was also detained at M82's house, were taken by Mahidi militia. Neither has been seen since.[907] In the village of Zulo, Mape/Zumalai, on 18 April the commander of Mahidi in Zulo, M82, ordered his men to kill Alvaro Tilman who tried to escape from detention at the house of M82.[908]

792. Disappearances also suddenly increased in April and many of them reportedly involved TNI members. The victims included Mateus Gusmão[909], Alvaro Barreto[910], Marçal Amaral[911], Felix Amaral, Abilio Mau Lear,[912] Justino Amaral, Amaro de Araújo[913] and Benedito do Nascimento.[914] Mateus Gusmão and Alvaro Barreto are reported to have disappeard at the Suai Kodim, and Benedito do Nascimento at the Koramil in Salele (Tilomar). Marçal Amaral and Felix Amaral were reportedly taken away by TNI members, and Amaro de Araújo was taken away by TNI and police members.

793. On 23 April a group of Laksaur militia members led by Olivio Moruk and TNI soldiers attacked the aldeia of Nikir, Raihun (Tilomar), killing Tomás Cardoso, Paulo Ximenes and Aleixo Ximenes.[915] They took Rodificus Rabo to the forest. He was not seen again and it is believed that he was killed.[916] Two days later the same group went in search of people who had fled to the hills and killed Yosef Leki, Tito Mali and Januario Maia.[917]

794. In Ermera District in April the arming of the local militia groups by the TNI led to an upsurge in violence. The Commission received information that a former Darah Merah commander, M83, received seven automatic rifles and four vehicles from the district military commander of Ermera in April. M83 had about 200 militia members under his command in Hatolia.[918] During April in Hatolia, Armando Gomes and Calistro were reportedly killed in the village of Leimea Kraik,[919] Marito Tavares and Antonio de Deus in Kukara, Manusea Village, and a man known as Venancio in the village of Ailelo (Hatolia).The Commission also received information that in April, M83's militia group attacked pro-independence supporters and burned houses in Kukara in retaliation for the killing of one of his men by the CNRT. The Commission was told that M83 shot dead two CNRT members known as Mau Laho and Domingos.[920] In early April in Lasaun (Atsabe), Adelino Magalhães and Velsior Pelo were reportedly killed by one or more TNI members of the Atsabe Koramil.[921] According to witness testimony, Adelino was blind-folded, thrown into a ravine and shot.[922]

795. On 11 April, Filipe dos Santos and one other student were reportedly shot to death by the TNI, and on 14 April Helder Martins was reportedly shot to death by the TNI and the police.[923] Towards the end of April Florindo de Deus was arrested, held in custody for two weeks in Atsabe, and on the way to Gleno was reportedly killed. A witness alleges that Team Pancasila was responsible for the death of Florindo de Deus.[924] On or around 20 April a group of TNI and militia members launched an operaiton in Lebu Rema, Samalete (Railaco, Ermera) and in the operation a young villager, Manuel Piedade, was reportedly killed by an East Timorese TNI auxiliary.[925]

796. In Manufahi District on 17 April, after the inauguration of the PPI and subsequent attack on pro-independence supporters in Dili, ABLAI militia began a campaign of violence.* In Same, on 17 April, ABLAI militia led by Bernadino da Costa attacked the community of Tirilolo, Hola Rua. In the attack they killed Luis Boco-Siri, whose house had been a hiding place for supporters of independence, and Agapito de Araújo.[926] On the same day, ABLAI militia members, including Bernadino da Costa, attacked Gratu Village in the sub-district of Same. As the men had fled to the mountains, the women were forced to call their husbands to return to the village. A few men came out of hiding into the village, including Carlito de Araújo. He was interrogated and was killed, allegedly by M85 and M86.[927] On 17 April Duarte Lopes (Duarte Bere Siri) was allegedly killed by M87 in Orema, Hola Rua Village.[928] On 24 April, Afonso da Costa, an 18-year old student at the University of Timor-Leste, was arrested at Anilumu, Holarua Village, taken to the top of the mountain above Orema and allegedly killed by M85 and M88.

* The Commission also has evidence of at least four rapes by ABLAI militia that took place during these attacks [see Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence].

Targeting of pro-independence activists, CNRT members and students

797. Another pattern which emerges from the data gathered by the Commission is that Indonesian military and militia groups specifically targeted pro-independence activists during this period. This is particularly the case for those who were open about their pro-independence activities and who actively engaged in campaigning – whether as members of the CNRT or in other organisations of civic education such as the Student Solidarity Council of Timor-Leste (ETSSC or Dewan Solidaritas Mahasiswa dan Pelajar Timor Timur, DSMPTT). The district of Dili was especially hard-hit in this regard. For instance, Benedito de Jesus was killed on 14 February, Joaquim de Jesus on 24 February, and João Teixeira on 11 March. In the case of João Teixeira, he was tortured and beheaded. In all three cases the killers included members of the TNI or the Indonesian police force.[929] Similar killings continued during April and May in Dili and Hera.[930]

798. For instance in April, students from the University of Timor-Leste (Untim) were participating in a social work programme in Suai, Covalima District. Their post was attacked by Mahidi militia led by M81 on 11 and 13 April. The second attack resulted in the deaths of two students, Bernardino and João, who were beaten and stabbed.* In Maucatar in April, Laksaur militia and TNI members captured and beat Mateus Gusmão when they failed to capture someone else they were seeking. The next day, Mateus Gusmão was taken by motorcycle to the district military command post and has never been seen again.[931]

799. The Polytechnic in Hera (Dili) was regarded as a centre of pro-independence student activity, and was occupied by the TNI and militia members on 10 May. At the beginning of May, two pro-independence students from the Polytechnic, Augustino de Carvalho and Estevão Xavier Pereira, were allegedly tortured and killed while in TNI/militia custody at the Polytechnic. The bodies of the two students were later recovered in Akanunu near Hera.[932]

800. During this period sporadic killings took place throughout Timor-Leste, targeting suspected pro-independence supporters. In March 1999 a series of abductions and killings by BMP took place in the district of Liquiçá. A man known as Mau Kuru was killed in Palistela, Guguleus (Maubara, Liquiçá), allegedly by members of the BMP militia group, including M88 and M89, because he was accused of burning an Indonesian flag.[933] In the same month Domingos Carion was shot to death by a group of TNI members in Mato, Lisadilia (Maubara, Liquiçá). Domingos Carion was a member of a pro-independence group which was travelling to Galai, Lisadilia Village, to help evacuate the villagers to the mountains.[934]

801. In March several men disappeared in Baucau while in the custody of TNI. In one incident, TNI members chased five men as they were travelling from Caicido to Buburaga in the sub-district of Baucau. Two of the men – Carlito and Abreu – escaped,

* HRVD Statement 0085. According to a report by the Timor-Leste human rights group, Yayasan HAK, these two students were kidnapped by Mahidi militia members and disappeared on 12 April when they were on their way from Suai to the village of Beco.

but Apeu, João, and Marçal were taken to the Baucau airport and were not seen alive again.* According to another testimony, three men – Marcal, Abrio, and Angelino† – were caught in Baucau by members of Battalion 745 because they were suspected of being members of Falintil. They were taken to army headquarters and disappeared.[935]

802. The Commission also received information suggesting that at least three people were killed or disappeared in April in Manatuto District.‡ On 16 April, Aquelino da Costa Guterres, who was planning to meet a Falintil Commander in Manatuto, was caught by TNI soldiers and was never seen again.[936] On 24 or 25 April, Marcelino Soares and a 16-year-old student at a junior high school in Dili named Mateus Soares were reportedly arrested by East Timorese militia in the village of Pualaka. They were taken to Mount Hatuharik in Manelima Village (Laclubar, Manatuto) where they were reportedly executed.[937]

803. As the CNRT opened headquarters in various districts, they came under threat by both militia and military. In at least one case, attacks on CNRT offices during this period resulted in a death. On 9 April 1999, the district commander of the Ermera Dandim, Lieutenant-Colonel Muhamad Nur, met leaders of Darah Integrasi, the FPDK and the BRTT in the district capital, Gleno. The following day, TNI from Kodim 1637 and militiamen burned down the CNRT headquarters in Gleno and killed a well-known CNRT supporter and local parliamentarian, Antonio Salsinha Lima.[938]

804. On 9 May a clandestine member, Eugenio Antonio Castro, was reportedly shot by members of the police and the Aitarak militia in Bemori (Dili), when he joined a crowd burning tyres on the street.[939] The following day a group of militia members reportedly came to Bemori and attacked another clandestine member, Flavio Urbano Saldanha Ribeiro, at his home. A relative alleged that the attackers were Besi Merah Putih militia who shot the victim, slashed his head, cut his throat, and cut off his genitals.[940]

805. On 16 May a group comprising members of the TNI, the SGI and Tim Pancasila launched a major attack on the village of Atara (Atsabe, Ermera) at about 5.00am. The group included the SGI commander in Atsabe, M91 [East Timorese], two Babinsa, M92 and M93 [both East Timorese] and an East Timorese TNI member, M94. In the attack the group killed six villagers. The victims were suspected of clandestine activities and included João Sarmento, Urbano Pereira, Justiliano Pereira, Rogério Talo Ati, Abel de Jesus, and Paulo Gonçalves.[941]

* HRVD Statement 7675-02. According to the Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, five unnamed young men were detained on 17 March 1999 in retaliation for the killing of a TNI soldier that month. Three were reportedly later discovered in a shallow grave at Triloka, near Baucau airport [p. 140].

† In the first incident, Abreu and Marcal are named; in the second Marcal and Abrio (also spelt Abriu) are named. Further investigation is required to determine if these statements are different versions of what happened to the same individuals.

‡ According to the Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, TNI troops mounted a major operation in Laclubar in apparant retaliation for the alleged murder by Falintil of the Team Morok militia commander and TNI soldier, Filomeno Lopes da Cruz [p. 178].

Deaths in custody

806. In addition to reports of large-scale arrests and torture in detention, the Commission received numerous reports of deaths in detention during this period. For example, Fernando da Costa, a CNRT supporter, was detained on 5 April in the town of Liquiçá by a group of TNI, BMP militiamen and police. After being badly beaten outside his house, he was taken to Liquiçá District police station (Polres), where he was detained for two days. On 7 April he was reportedly taken from his cell and transported to the Maubara Sub-district Military Command, accompanied by Sergeant M62 and a BMP commander, M65, where he reportedly died after being repeatedly stabbed.[942]

807. The Commission received reports that on 15 April Evaristo Lopes was tortured and murdered by TNI and Tim Alfa militia while in custody and under the supervision of a member of Kopassus, Sergeant M96 (Indonesian) in Lautém.[943] The Commission has also received reports of the deaths of at least three people as a result of torture during interrogation by militia and members of the Koramil in Lacluta, Viqueque on 30 April.[944]

808. On 8 May in Bobonaro District, TNI members, including East Timorese Sergeant M97 from the intelligence section of the Maliana Kodim and Dadurus Merah Putih members, arrested Manuel Pinto Tilman and Abilio Cardoso in Lalebol (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) accusing them of being Falintil members. After being detained in the town of Bobonaro, on 15 May the two were reportedly taken to the Nunura bridge in Maliana and executed. The indictment of the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes alleges that Mau Buti shot Manuel Pinto Tilman in the lower hip, while Inacio Conceição stabbed him. The indictment also alleges that Mau Buti shot Abilio Cardoso in the head.[945]

809. During this period the BMP militia in Liquiçá are also reported to have killed a number of people after taking them into custody. On 5 May two men named Antonio and Rosario were reportedly tortured to death by a group of BMP members at or near the BMP post in the aldeia of Ediri, Vatuvou Village (Maubara, Liquiçá).[946] On 10 May Albertino Martins was allegedly shot to death by a BMP member at the Gicu River in Maubara.[947] On 15 May a group of BMP and TNI members launched an operation in Asumanu Village, sub-district Liquiçá. On that day three villagers in Asumanu, known only as Moises, Martinho and Natalino, were seen tied and blindfolded, and some time later they were found dead at the village cemetery.[948]

Other killings, January–May 1999

810. The following table provides a summary of unlawful killings and disappearances reported to the Commission which took place in the districts where the level of fatal violence was relatively lower.

Table 53: Unlawful killings reported to the CAVR, January–May 1999

District	Summary
Ainaro	On 3 January in Manutasi (Ainaro) members of the Mahidi militia group erected a checkpoint at Fatuk Maria. When pro-independence supporters went to the checkpoint to demonstrate against it, members of the militia, including M99, M100 and M101, shot at them. Julio de Araújo and Reinaldo Martins were shot dead and another five were wounded in the attack.[949] On 26 February a group of Mahidi members, including M102, M103, and M104 killed a suspected supporter of independence, Joanico Bianco, in Cassa.[950]
Baucau	On 5 February, TNI members of the Rajawali unit captured Duarte Guterres in Loikiku, Uai Laha (Venilale). The TNI members shot him in the leg, put him into a cave and closed it with a big rock. Guterres later died.[951] On 26 March, TNI soldiers, including First Sergeant M105 [Indonesian] of the Kodim intelligence section, shot dead two men fleeing from them and a woman who happened to be working in a nearby field in Gariuai (Baucau). The victims were Ildefonso Pereira (Eldefonso Faria), Nazarito Xavier and Estefania Freitas. All of them were supporters of independence, although it is not clear whether the perpetrators knew it at the time of the killings.[952]
Dili	On or about 25 January, Lucio Ribeiro from Comoro, Dili, who had been missing for three days, was reportedly found dead in an old transmigration area in Loes (Maubara, Liquiçá).[953] On 24 February, Joaquim de Jesus and one other were reportedly shot dead in Becora by members of the Aitarak militia group accompanied by TNI members.[954]
Ermera	In May, Albino da Costa[955] was killed by the BTT (Territorial Combat Battalion) and TNI Partisans, and Constancio Carvalho was killed by members of Darah Merah Putih (DMP) militia [956] they were both reportedly killed in Mauabu Village (Hatolia). In Kaiturloa, Uruhau Village, Albino de Carvalho was killed by a BTT/TNI unit[957] and Abrão Salsinha Soares was killed by DMP militia[958] Bernabel Araújo[959] was killed in Asulau Village by DMP militia. In June Luis Alves was reportedly killed in Raitumura, Urahou Village by DMP militia[960] and Francisco Alves Caralhera in Lilimau, Manusea Village[961] also by DMP militia. On or around 30 May in Hatugau Village (Letefoho) the CNRT Nurep secretary, Luis Martins, was reportedly beaten to death by members of SGI[962]
Lautém	In January, a clandestine member, Rosa Maria, was reportedly killed by a Team Alfa member while hiding in the forest.[963] On or about 21 April a clandestine member, Evaristo Lopes, was tortured and stabbed to death by militia members and a TNI member at the headquarters of Team Alfa located in the Kopassus post in Lauara (Lospalos). The Team Alfa member, João da Costa, and a Kopassus Sergeant M96 [Indonesian], stabbed Evaristo Lopes.[964] In Somoco, Lospalos, Virgilio de Sousa was killed at his home by Team Alfa members.[965] On 23 April on a hill called Panili Cacaven, Lospalos, Lamberto da Silva, a former Falintil member, was killed by members of the Territorial Combat Battalion (BTT), an East Timorese TNI Corporal M165 and another Timorese M166[966]
Manatuto	Another supporter of independence, Humberto Casamiro Barros, was shot to death by Filomeno Brito in an attack by members of the Mahadomi militia on the house of a known pro-independence activist, Gregório Sebastião Gusmão, in the village of Haturalan (Laleia).[967] During this pre-ballot period the district administrator, M107, gathered five village chiefs and the sub-district administrator of Soibada and interrogated them about their clandestine activities. After the inquiry the village chiefs were allowed to return but the sub-district administrator, Zoalino, remained. He and a teacher named Vicente were later killed.[968]

District	Summary
Manufahi	Moises Soares was taken prisoner by Mahidi in Beikala Village (Hato Udo, Ainaro). On 28 April a group of ABLAI militia and Kopassus members under the command of Captain M108 [Indonesian] travelled from Same to Beikala to take custody of Moises Soares, who was suspected of killing a member of Kopassus in Alas. The ABLAI and Kopassus members took Moises Soares in a vehicle towards the sub-district of Same. The following day he was found dead in Betano (Same). [969] In the sub-district of Alas in May, José Antonio was arrested by a Koramil member M104 [East Timorese], at the Kelan River. He was taken to Dotik (Alas) and was never seen again.[970] In Feriksare, Taitudal (Alas), Domingos Sanches de Jesus was captured and taken to the Koramil. He was severely beaten and he reportedly died from the beating..[971] In the sub-district of Turiscai, a man named Angelito was killed in May when a group of militia members together with members of Battalion 743 launched an operation in the village of Liurai (Turiscai) under orders from Koramil commander M105 [Indonesian].[972]
Oecussi	In April 1999, after the Sakunar militia was formally established, a clandestine member named Bobo Noni in the sub-district of Passabe was killed by the Sakunar commanders M111 and M11. The circumstances of the killing are not clear but at the same time livestock of villagers were also reportedly stolen.[973]
Viqueque	On 30 April in the sub-district of Lacluta, leaders of the village of Ahic were beaten and kicked by Babinsa and Milsas. Pedro da Costa Araújo died from his wounds. Eyewitnesses testify that TNI members were present at the scene, including the Koramil commander M113.[974] The Commission received information that Vicente Alves and Caetano Duarte Gusmão were killed by an unknown individual or individuals on 28 May in an uninhabited location known as Weasin-Wehasan Mota Laran near the village of Ahic (Lacluta).[975]

June–30 August: unlawful killings from the arrival of UNAMET until the Popular Consultation

811. In the period after the arrival of UNAMET and international observers in June, but before the announcement of the results of the Popular Consultation on 4 September, there were significantly fewer reported cases of executions and disappearances. However, even during this period there were times, such as during the campaign period and in the days after the ballot itself, when violence increased. Overall, the Commission received reports of executions and disappearances in eight of the 13 districts during this period: Bobonaro, Dili, Oecussi, Liquiçá, Ermera, Viqueque, Lautém, and Covalima.

812. The districts reporting the highest number of unlawful killings and disappearances to the Commission were Bobonaro (nine deaths), Dili (five deaths and one disappearance), and Oecussi (ten killed and one disappearance).

Table 54: Unlawful killings and disappearances reported to the CAVR, June to 30 August 1999

Bobonaro	Halilintar militia reportedly killed two men in Atabae sub-district during this period. Agustinho Ximenes was reportedly captured on 6 July in the village of Aidabaleten (Atabae, Bobonaro), taken to the house of João Tavares where he was tortured, and then taken to the mountains where he was killed.[976] Feliz Tabesi Maria was reportedly captured in the village of Hataz on 28 August, when he was trying to flee to the mountains, and was killed.[977] In August members of the Dadurus Merah Putih militia group, possibly with TNI members, reportedly killed a group of four supporters of independence in Anapal, Molop Village, Bobonaro. The four victims were Cipriano Espirito Santo, José Efi, Armindo Barreto Moniz, and Natalino Moniz.[978] In Maliana Sub-district on 18 August, Dadurus Merah Putih militia, under the command of TNI Sergeant M114 (Timorese), took Augusto Martins, a university student and pro-independence campaigner, from a minibus at a checkpoint in the village of Lahomea. He was taken to the house of Sergeant M114 where he was beaten and stabbed. He died that evening. The UNAMET Civpol accompanied Indonesian police to the location where his body was recovered, but the police failed to conduct an investigation.[979] The next day members of Dadurus Merah Putih reportedly killed Agusto Marques, a university student, in the village of Lahomea.[980]
Dili	On 19 June, three young men from Lospalos, whose identities are not known, were reportedly killed in Becora.[981] On 25 July, José Soares was reportedly killed by shots fired from a passing vehicle near Fatu-Ahi.[982] On 1 August Angelino Amaral (Sabino) was shot dead outside the UNAMET district headquarters in Lahane.[983] On 27 August, Francisco Nascimento disappeared after he went to his office. His wife, who tesified to the Commission, believes that her husband was tortured at the Hotel Tropical, the headquarters of the Aitarak militia group, and that his body was buried behind the Dili heliport with the bodies of two other people.[984]
Oecussi	In June, a known pro-independence activist in the village of Lalisuk (Pante Makasar) was abducted and subsequently disappeared. José Talua'e, the local leader of the clandestine youth group Fitun, was reportedly visited by a Kodim intelligence member named Bertolomeu and was asked to go to Kefamenanu, West Timor, to buy a muffler for a motorbike. When his wife came back home, she found her husband had not returned. He has not been seen since.[985] Inácio Haumetan, a CNRT supporter in Oecussi, was killed on 20 August by Sakunar militia.[986] At least six pro-independence supporters were killed, numerous others were detained and beaten, and large-scale destruction of property was perpetrated by Sakunar militia and the Indonesian military between 28 and 30 August. At least two CNRT members were killed on 28 August when Sakunar militia, with TNI, mobile police, and Aitarak militia from Dili, and BMP militia from Liquiçá, attacked pro-independence campaigners.[987] On 29 August, two men known to be CNRT members disappeared after being detained in Malelat (Passabe) by Sakunar militia led by M115.[988]

813. Other killings reported to the Commission include the execution of suspected clandestine members in Hatolia (Ermera) by Darah Merah Putih militia on 8 June[989] and 16 June.[990] On 8 August Mariano da Costa, a UNAMET employee, was allegedly arrested by a group of BMP and TNI members in Dato (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) and on the orders of Sergeant M62 and a BMP commander, M65. He was allegedly executed by BMP militia members. His body has not been found.[991]

814. Although there were few reports of killings during the voter registration period, harassment and intimidation of the population continued. The Commission received information about a man named Filipe who was reportedly abducted by a group of about 10 BMP members after they registered at the UNAMET Kailema registration centre in Lebuhei, Dato Village (Liquiçá). In her testimony Filipe's wife stated:

> On 24 July, my husband and I went to register to vote in the Popular Consultation. After registering, we were just relaxing for a while when suddenly we were approached by 10 people…They detained my husband and took him off in the direction of Fatukesi [Liquiçá]. From that time until now my husband has never come home, and I don't know whether he is alive or dead.[992]

815. During the campaign period, which extended from 14–27 August, numerous instances of violence occurred, including targeted killings of pro-independence activists, students and others openly campaigning for independence. For instance, on 11 August, one day after opening their office in Viqueque, Student Solidarity Council (ETSSC) members were attacked by militia.* In three separate attacks, three students were killed: Rogério Soares (Rogério Amaral), Mariano Soares Pinto (Mariano Gusmão) and Carlos Sarmento.[993]

816. The final day of campaigning for pro-autonomy supporters was 26 August. They carried out large rallies across Dili. They attacked and burned buildings, injured two journalists, and killed eight people. A shooting incident that took place in the afternoon in Kulu Hun was preceded by a clash between pro-autonomy campaigners and pro-independence youths in the area. When a group of pro-autonomy campaigners passed by the Kulu Hun bridge, pro-independence youths began throwing stones at them. In a highly charged situation a man named Marcus wearing a pro-autonomy shirt was chased and stabbed from behind. He was immediately taken to the hospital in Bidau. At 3pm, the Indonesian police mobile brigade (Brimob) started shooting. The crowd began to flee in panic. In the shooting incident, four young men were killed. One was Bernardinho Joaquim Afonso Guterres, a student from Satya Wacana University in Salatiga, Indonesia, who had returned to Timor-Leste for the Popular Consultation. His killing was filmed and a photograph of his dead body appeared on the cover of Time Magazine in December 1999. An eyewitness told the Commission:

> Suddenly I saw Bernadinho running from the bridge and passing in front of us. Spontaneously I shouted: "Bedinho [Bernadinho], watch out!" Many policemen were running after him. Two policemen were already preparing to shoot. One policeman on the left side near the Virgo shop shot in the air, and the other on the right side near the Holy Caritas Convent shot

* The Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to the CAVR also describes the attack on the CNRT office in Viqueque on 11 August. Also in Viqueque District, Domingos Aparicio and another man named Idelfonso were reportedly killed by members of the Naga Merah militia in Beasu Village (Viqueque) in the pre-ballot period, although precise dates are unavailable [HRVD Statement 4127; Amnesty International ASA 21/49/99].

directly at Bernadinho. It was about eight metres from the spot where I was standing.

The policeman shot Bernadinho from behind. I don't know which part of his body he hit, but Bernadinho instantly fell on the ground. A lot of blood spilt on the street. His arms and legs were moving for about five minutes, and then the movements stopped. [994]

817. The other three victims were Adelino de Jesus da Silva (23), Virgilio da Costa Rodrigues (Azildo) (26), and Atanazio Moniz de Jesus (Ameta) (23). The families and friends of the victims told the Commission that the three were all young clandestine members in the area, and that they were hit by bullets in the face, the chest and the neck respectively.[995]

818. The situation was also deteriorating in other districts. In Covalima, on or about 27 August, Damianus da Costa Nunes and José Pereira, members of the Laksaur militia group in Fatumean, under the command of Henrikus Mali, allegedly killed Jaime da Costa Nunes, a known pro-independence activist. The following day José Pereira and another member of the Laksaur militia group went to the house of Jaime da Costa Nunes and showed his wife a pair of human ears and human genitals and told her that they belonged to her husband.[996]

819. In Lautém on the evening of 27 August, the last campaign day for pro-independence supporters, a group of TNI and Team Alfa members attacked the CNRT office in Lospalos. They fired at the house of Verissimo Dias Quintas and set the house and the CNRT office on fire. Some 30 CNRT supporters were inside the compound. In the attack Verissimo Dias Quintas was assaulted with machetes and died.[997]

820. In the district of Liquiçá on 26 August, a person named Henrique was reportedly killed by a group of four Kodim members at Filita, Lauhata Village (Bazartete). The same day two more young men were reportedly killed at Filita by BMP members but their identities are not known.[998]

821. The Commission also received reports that on 27 August, Dadurus Merah Putih and Halilintar militia, in the presence of Indonesian military and police officers, attacked campaigners in the village of Tapo Memo (Maliana, Bobonaro), killing four people: Raul dos Santos, Paulino, Felis Laku, and Jaime.[999] A witness to one of the murders recounted:

At that time we were approached by Dadurus Merah Putih militia members M118 and M119. They were conducting a military operation in Memo. My husband was hiding in the house, but M118 found him. They shot him dead immediately, because they thought my husband was Deker, one of the Falintil Commanders of the Southern Company. The first time they shot him he didn't die, but he ran until he collapsed in the Uluhati River, and they shot him again. I took him to the Maliana hospital, where he died on arrival…They burned down our house with everything in it.[1000]

30 August–October: unlawful killings and disappearances after the Popular Consultation

822. The day of the ballot, 30 August, was largely peaceful. There were several notable exceptions, however, such as the killing of UNAMET staff in Ermera (see par. 828), and continued violence in several districts, including Oecussi, Ermera, and Manufahi.

823. From Oecussi, the Commission received reports of attacks on 30 August, including the attempted killing of a man active in the clandestine movement in the sub-district of Pante Makassar.[1001] The Commission received multiple statements describing an attack by the Sakunar militia group, led by M120, M121 and M112, on the village of Bobometo on 31 August. They burned more than 100 houses. Horacio Tabes, a local leader, was said to have been killed in the attack. He was reported to have been decapitated.[1002]

824. The Commission also received reports of the killing by ABLAI militia of two men as they returned from a polling station near Same (Manufahi). Team Sasurut and ABLAI militia led by Bernadinho da Costa stopped a group of people returning from the vote in Holarua and took them to the militia post in Datina, Holarua (Same, Manufahi). They separated Armindo da Costa and Carlito da Costa, took them to a nearby coffee plantation, tortured them and cut off their heads.[1003]

825. From Ermera District, the Commission received evidence regarding the disappearance of a teacher called Carlos from Baboe Kraik (Atsabe). He was reportedly held at the village office of Malabe and taken away, never to be seen again.[1004] Manuel Oliveira was killed by Tim Pancasila militia and TNI members in Atara.[1005] FO from Lauala Village (Ermera) was another pro-independence activist. On 6 September she was arrested, taken to a Darah Integrasi post and then to a house where she was allegedly raped by a Naga Merah militia commander, M123, and three of his subordinates. She was again taken back to the militia post where she was threatened by M123 wielding an automatic rifle, tied up with a rope and then executed in Manten Nunutali, an uninhabited area of Lauala.[1006]

826. The pattern of targeting individuals suspected of having pro-independence sympathies, CNRT leaders, students and UNAMET staff by the TNI and militia continued on a much larger scale after the announcement of the result of the ballot on 4 September. With most of the international community evacuated and the remaining UN staff isolated in their compound in Dili, the TNI and militia began to operate together openly, as they had in the pre-UNAMET period. Further, during this period, executions became increasingly less discriminate. Violence was targeted not only at individual pro-independence activists, but extended to their families and friends. Religious leaders and church workers also became the targets of attacks. TNI and militia attacked and killed internally displaced people seeking shelter in church and government buildings. In some cases, the male youth of entire communities were targeted.

827. Testimonies received by the Commission indicate at least 501 people were reported killed or disappeared in the period across the 13 districts after the ballot, and 27 were killed or disappeared in West Timor (see Table 52 above). A number of cases highlighted below illustrate the various patterns of violence in this period, but they do not give a comprehensive account of the many victims of TNI and militia violence during this period. At the end of this section summaries of cases known to the Commission are provided.

The targeting of East Timorese UNAMET staff

828. On the day of the ballot and the days immediately afterwards, East Timorese UNAMET staff became particularly vulnerable to TNI and militia violence, as the UN quickly withdrew its international staff from the districts. During the week between the end of the campaign and the announcement of the ballot results, four UNAMET employees were executed by militia and TNI.

829. On 30 August, the day of the ballot, TNI soldiers and Tim Pancasila militia attacked the polling station in Baboe Leten (Atsabe, Ermera). The group, including a TNI member, M106, assaulted three UNAMET staff, Orlando Gomes, João Lopes, and Alvaro Lopes. The first two died while the third survived, though he was severely wounded. Orlando Gomes was the CNRT representative in the village. João Lopes was assaulted when he was carrying a ballot box to a waiting UNAMET vehicle. Present at the scene were a TNI member, Pedro dos Santos, the Malabe village chief, M125, and a militia member, M126. M106 is alleged to have been involved in both killings. Orlando Gomes was reportedly stabbed by M126, M125 and M106.[1007]

830. Three days later, on 2 September, TNI soldiers including Lieutenant M68 [Indonesian], Sergeant M128 and Darah Merah Putih members went to the house of a UNAMET staff member, Ruben Soares. The Darah Merah Putih members broke into the house, dragged him outside, and stabbed him. Ruben Soares was smashed on the head with a rock. Another UNAMET staff member, Domingos Pereira, came out of the next house and was reportedly shot by Sergeant M128 and also stabbed. Both died from the injuries they sustained.[1008]

831. The killing of EO from Gleno illustrates the type of violence inflicted on outspoken pro-independence women activists. EO was a school teacher and secretary of the CNRT-affiliated women's group, the OMT (Organização da Mulher Timor, Organisation of Timorese Women) in Ermera. Her family were well-known supporters of independence and her brother was a Falintil commander. She also worked as a UNAMET staff member in Ermera. A former member of the Darah Merah militia group told the Commission that on 13 September the Darah Merah commander, M129, ordered him and some other militia members to kill EO. The militia group took her to the border area of Tokoluli (Railaco, Ermera) and there a militia member stabbed her to death.[1009] Before being killed, EO was detained at the headquarters of Darah Merah and also at a house where she was treated as a slave. A TNI member, M130, was seen together with EO in a truck.[1010] EO reportedly told her close friend that she was raped by a member of the military.[1011] Two TNI members, M131 and M132, are also believed to have been involved in the ill-treatment and death of EO.[1012]

832. According to the OHCHR submission to the Commission, at least 14 local UNAMET staff members were killed in 1999: João Lopes, Ruben Barros Soares,

Domingos Pereira, José Ernesto Jesus Maia, Orlando Gomes, Leonel Silva de Oliveira, Manuel de Oliveira, Mariano da Costa, EO, Carlos Maia, Abrui da Costa, Hilario Boavida da Silva, Francisco Taek and Paulos Kelo. The submission concluded: "It is not clear that all of those killed were targeted because they were UNAMET employees, but most were."[1013]

Attack on the Bishop's residence and other places of refuge in Dili

833. In addition to targeting individuals associated with the Resistance, the TNI and militia targeted those in places of refuge. In the aftermath of the announcement of the results of the ballot, as violence increased throughout the territory, thousands of people sought refuge in churches, in church grounds, and sometimes in police and government buildings in the hope of finding some protection. But in reality, the TNI and the militia specifically targeted these places. The most notorious example was the massacre at the Suai Church on 6 September 1999.

834. In Dili, on 5-6 September, as many as 15 people were killed or disappeared during and after combined TNI and militia attacks on the Dili Diocese (Cámara de Ecclesiastica) compound, the house of Bishop Belo, the Canossian Convent, and the office of the International Committee of the Red Cross.* At about noon on 5 September, as many as 50 armed Aitarak militiamen, led by M298, assaulted the approximately 300 people who sought refuge in the Dili Diocese compound. They destroyed and set fire to the buildings. A large number of TNI and police personnel were present at the scene but took no action to prevent the attack, and some TNI and police joined in the attack. All of the refugees were forced from the compound and across the road to the Dili port area where those believed to be students, UNAMET staff or CNRT members were singled out for especially harsh treatment. They separated the men from the women and children, and drove the women and children to the Polda (provincial police) headquarters in Comoro, leaving the men behind. They allegedly assaulted eight men who were perceived to be pro-independence supporters, and tried to drive them away in a pick-up truck. But members of the police ordered the militia members to take them to the Wirahusada Military hospital. A number of men who had come out of the Dili Diocese compound were taken away and disappeared. Among the victims were Cassiano Morais, Hilario Boavida, Lourenço Boavida, Jorgé Mesquita da Costa Rego, Mário Belo, Thomas Belo, Tiago Kofi, Alexandre Mesquita da Costa Rego, Virgilio Fernandes, Augusto da Costa, Marito Mesquita, José Martins de Sousa, Francisco Boavida, Eugenio da Costa and Leonel da Silva de Oliveira. José Fernando (Nilton) da Costa was another who was driven away from outside the Dili Diocese in a Kijang pick-up. He escaped, but due to the stab wounds he had sustained he died at the Motael Clinic on 5 September.[1014]

* According to Serious Crimes Unit Indictment 13/2003, Eurico Guterres and Matteus de Carvalho are responsible for the killing of nine people and the forced disappearance of six others on or about 5 September 1999 during the attack on the Dili Diocese [Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Eurico Guterres et al., Case No. 13/2003, VII. The Charges, A., Counts 3-5].

835. On the following day, 6 September, further attacks took place on three other places of refuge in Dili – the Canossian Convent, the compound of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and the residence of Bishop Belo. Approximately 100 people and nine nuns were sheltering in the Canossian Convent. In the compound of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) an estimated 2,000 people had gathered in the days after the vote. Firing their weapons and shouting, the militiamen forced the refugees from the ICRC compound. Once again, suspected pro-independence activists were separated from the others before being marched away. The most widely reported and thoroughly documented of the three attacks targeted an estimated 5,000 people who had sought refuge in Bishop Belo's residence. At least 15 people were seriously wounded, and one person is known to have been killed in the attack. The Commission also received information that Vicente da Costa Carlos Tilman, who is believed to have sought refuge at the Bishop's residence, disappeared after the 6 September attack.[1015] Mário Correia Fernandes was taken away from Bidau Santana by four men wearing masks after he had escaped the attack at the Bishop's residence on 6 September. He also disappeared.[1016]

The Suai Church Massacre

836. One of the worst massacres of this period occurred at Our Lady of the Rosary Church (Nossa Senhora do Rosario) on 6 September in Suai. The massacre was a premeditated act of mass killing against an unarmed civilian population. It was also a coordinated operation of TNI and Laksaur militia members involving TNI premises such as the sub-district military command post in Salele (Tilomar, Covalima) and the district military command post in Suai.

837. Our Lady of the Rosary Church was a place where the civilian population from all sub-districts in Covalima sought refuge from January to September 1999, as members of the Laksaur and Mahidi militias and the TNI terrorised those perceived to be independence supporters.[1017] During the Popular Consultation the church became the focus of expressions of hostility by pro-autonomy supporters in the area. After the announcement of the result of the ballot, TNI and militia members intensified their threats by firing their guns into the air in the vicinity of the church. On 5 September, Father Dewanto asked the district police commander, Lieutenant-Colonel Gatot Subiaktoro, to provide security for the people sheltering in the church compound, as the militia began a campaign of violence in Suai Town. The Commission received reports suggesting that on 4 and 5 September, at least five people were killed and subsequently the flow of refugees to the church grounds swelled.[1018] The commander assured the priest he would arrange security for them. On the same day Father Hilario Madeira advised the people in the church compound to seek refuge elsewhere, on the grounds that the church was no longer safe for them. About 500 people left the church compound and went into hiding in the nearby forests.

838. On the morning of 6 September, the Laksaur militia group under the command of M78 and M59 gathered at the Koramil in Salele, which was also the militia headquarters. Following the arrival of a truck full of TNI soldiers, M78 told his men that they would attack the Our Lady of the Rosary church that day. The militia group under M78 and M59 went to the Kodim in Suai and then to the house of the district administrator, Colonel M133 [Indonesian]. In the afternoon, at about 2.30pm, the militia group left the house for the church. M133 followed them from behind, dressed in a TNI uniform and armed with a rifle.

839. On arrival, the militia and TNI members surrounded the church. The attack began with the throwing of two grenades into the church compound and was followed by shooting. They entered the church compound and attacked the people sheltering there. They killed many civilians including three priests, Father Hilario Madeira, Father Tarsisius Dewanto and Father Francisco Soares.[1019] Between 27 and 200 people were killed during the attack and another 30 in targeted killings that followed.* The Commission received numerous accounts of executions during the attack, including several accounts of rape and the execution of women and children.† A witness told the Commission that militia members decapitated two persons, Benyamin and Carlito from Zumalai.[1020] Another witness told the Commission that Jacinta Gusmão's neck was slashed with a sword.[1021] Father Francisco Soares was also reportedly slashed in the neck and the stomach.[1022]

840. Colonel M133, Lieutenant M134 [Indonesian], M78, M59, M135 and M136 [all East Timorese] were present and participated in the attack. A woman who had sought refuge at the church testified about the close coordination between the civilian authorities and militia in the attack:

> In March 1999 my whole family left our house. We hired a minibus to take us to the Suai Church because a district military command soldier, Private Second Class Alfonso Mau, often spied on our house.
>
> [W]e stayed at the church until August.
>
> After the ballot, we came back to the church. On 6 September, the church was attacked by militia. My husband had run away to the forest the day before that. I was in Father Hilario's dining room, with my mother-in-law and sister-in-law. There was shooting from 2.00 to 3.00pm. Then the district administrator, M133, and village head [of Foholulik, Tilomar], M78, came and said, "Just kill all the men, spare the women," in front of us all.[1023]

* The exact death toll in the attack is not known. The OHCHR Study puts it at at least 40. The Indonesian Commission on Human Rights Violations in East Timor (KPP-HAM) estimates that 50 were killed, while Yayasan HAK places the figure between 50 and 200. Approximately 27 bodies were recovered from mass graves in West Timor on or about 22 November 1999 under the direction of KPP-HAM [see Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Herman Sediyono, et al., paragraph 311].

† M167 and M168 shot dead ten civilians, including a woman named Matilde who was seven months pregnant, which resulted also in the loss of her baby [HRVD Statement 3624]. Others shot dead included Eufrazia Gusmão Amaral, the daughter of Mário Gusmão [HRVD Statement 7390], Paulus Seran (HRVD Statement 3638), and Patricio Mau and Carlos Yosep [HRVD Statement 8577]. Miguel da Cruz de Conceição gave testimony that Benyamin and Alito from Zumalai, two of eight friends killed during the attack, were beheaded [HRVD Statement 6351]. A woman who was raped at the church subsequently died as a result [HRVD Statement 8459]; another woman who was shot survived [HRVD Statement 3637].

Feliciana Cardoso, witness to the Suai Church Massacre[1024]

After my family participated in the referendum on 30 August 1999, we immediately sought refuge in the church. At that time, Suai was controlled by a joint group, namely the Laksaur and Mahidi militia [Live or Die for Integration with Indonesia], TNI and the Lorosae Police Contingent. Late on the afternoon of 6 September, the joint militia began shooting. Their attack on people gathered in the senior high school killed many people. They then headed for the church. All the windows were smashed and the door broken down. They invaded and ordered all the people inside to go out and surrender. Some of us, including myself and my three children, remained in the church. Others went outside, including my husband. The militia began to shoot those who went outside the church. I don't know how, but my husband managed to get away and run back into Father Hilario's room, which was located at the back of the church. Others were wiped out by the Laksaur/Mahidi team…

When the militia began to burn the church, we ran to the priests' house that was beside the church. That was when I could no longer see my husband. I saw Father Francisco holding up both hands and saying to the militia, "Enough. Don't shoot anymore. All of us are Timorese. Stop." The Father screamed when he saw how many victims had fallen. However the militia paid no attention to his screams. Then a militia, M137, who came from Raimea Village in Covalima, approached Father Francisco. He pretended to hug the priest, then escorted him down to the grotto of the Virgin Mary. When they came back, M137 shot the priest. But Father Francisco was not yet dead, so M137 took a sword and stabbed Father Francisco in the chest. That is when he died.

I saw my husband run from the priests' room when he heard the shooting. He was very emotional seeing that the priest had been shot. There was a group of militia outside the church, [including] M138 and M139 who were carrying weapons – AR-16, SKS and swords. They began to shoot in the direction of my husband, but their weapons didn't fire. One of the militia asked my husband, "Why don't you run?" My husband answered, "I am a man. Let me be shot on my own land! Viva Xanana Gusmão! Viva Timor-Leste!" Then M139 took his sword and stabbed my husband in the left hip, and the sword came out on the right. He also slashed his left shoulder, his left foot and his right hand twice each. At about 4.00pm, my husband drew his last breath.

[T]hose of us who survived were ordered out [of the church]. We were shoved, kicked with boots, trodden upon and beaten. They pointed guns and machetes at us all the way from the church to the Kodim 1635 building… There were many people at the Kodim, among them Domingas, the wife of the [CNRT] zone leader of the sub-district of Zumalai [Covalima], with her daughters, Zulmira, Fatima, Agustinha, Cinta and Monica… While at the Kodim we were verbally abused, ridiculed and given leftover food. The other women and I did not eat because we were afraid of being poisoned. On 13 September 1999… the Kasdim [Kodim chief of staff] ordered our move to Betun [West Timor] on four trucks… but at the Camenasa [Suai, Covalima] crossroads we were left by the side of the road.

On 14 September 1999, at approximately 7.00pm, an East Timorese Laksaur member, M169, took away a girl who was with me at the time. She was forced into a hardtop jeep and taken away. On the same evening at 7.30pm, a friend and I also continued with the help of a Mahidi member we knew... He took us by foot to Betun. We were escorted by two police officers on motorcycles. Walking from the Camenasa crossroads to Betun, West Timor, took eight hours. We arrived on 15 September 1999 at 10.00am. [Just as we arrived] the girl was brought back by Laksaur member M169 on a motorcycle. When she got off the motorcycle she could not walk because she had been raped. She arrived with injuries and blood on her genitals, I treated her…she drank [a concoction of] water and betel leaf [sirih], I washed her with sirih water and leaves that I had boiled.

We were ordered to report at the Betun Military Command. We lived for two months at the Betun police station. While there we never felt safe because of the terrorising by the militia all day long. Our desire to return home became stronger when we heard that some refugees had returned to Suai. Quietly we ran off and returned to Suai on 11 November 1999.

Seeking refuge with the police: executions at the Maliana police station

841. In some cases, individuals or entire communities sought assistance from the police who, under the terms of the 5 May Agreements, were responsible for security – a fact that had been a central part of the UNAMET public information campaign in the preparations for the ballot. Sometimes police officers did attempt to protect individual East Timorese. For instance, a sympathetic Brimob officer in Gleno (Ermera) made several attempts to hide UNAMET staff member EO from the militia, though she was ultimately detained, raped and murdered.[1025] In most cases the Indonesian police completely failed to intervene to prevent violence. There were instances when they became the targets of violence themselves when they did attempt to intervene. For example, on 6 September, a police officer, Bernabe de Jesus, in Hatupal (Maubisse, Ainaro) was shot dead by militia and TNI from the Maubisse Koramil after he intervened to prevent militia from looting and burning the village.[1026]

842. TNI and militia cooperation, and the complicity of the Indonesian police, are graphically illustrated by events at the district police station (polres) in Maliana, Bobonaro, where a large number of residents of Maliana sought refuge from the post-ballot violence.

843. On 8 September, the TNI and militia groups carried out systematic killings against perceived supporters of independence who had gathered at the Maliana police compound. They killed at least 13 people, including a 12-year-old boy. The following day TNI and militia groups hunted down those who had managed to escape from the Maliana police compound and killed at least another 13 people. The killings on 8-9 September can be seen as the culmination of the systematic and well-coordinated operations by the TNI and militia over the previous months to eliminate supporters of independence in Maliana. Without an international presence in the area, the military authorities could be openly involved in planning and carrying out the executions of those they had long perceived as their enemies. Following are excerpts from the indictment filed by the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes on 10 July 2003.[1027]

844. Lists of people sheltering in the police compound were prepared. At a meeting on 6 September in the compound, attended by, among others, the district police commander, Major Budi Susilo; the district military commander, Lieutenant-Colonel Burhanuddin Siagian; the district administrator, Guilherme dos Santos; the district command's head of intelligence, Lieutenant Sutrisno; the commander of Halilintar, João Tavares; the chairman of the district assembly (DPRD) and of the district branch of the United Forum for Democracy and Justice (FPDK), Jorgé Tavares; and Natalino Monteiro Gonçalves and Marcos Tato Mali, commander and deputy commander of DMP militia in Maliana. After this meeting the displaced, who up to that point had been camping in tents in areas thoughout the compound, were ordered to concentrate at the back of the compound.

845. In the afternoon of 8 September, TNI soldiers from units briefed the Dadurus Merah Putih militia units under their command at places in and around Maliana Town including the villages of Holsa, Lahomea, and Ritabou. At a meeting in Ritabou, a joint intelligence unit (SGI) member, M140 [Indonesian], provided the militia gathered there with a list of names and told them to go to the police station, locate the people on the list and kill them. All the militia who were to take part in the operation then met at the Maliana Koramil where several TNI members, including Lieutenant M68 [Indonesian], were also present. Sergeant M141 [East Timorese] ordered Dadurus Merah Putih members to divide into several groups and shortly after 5.00pm gave each group specific tasks such as locating and killing identified supporters of independence and forming a cordon around the compound to prevent escape.

846. The attack began and lasted for about three and a half hours. The 13 killed during the attack were Manuel Barros, Julio Barros, Domingos Gonçalves Pereira, José da Costa Guterres, José Abel, Francisco Paixão Fatima Martins, Martinho Marques, José Barros Soares, Lorenço dos Santos Gomes, Joaquim Monteiro Gonçalves, José Moniz da Cunha, Damião da Cruz and Daniel Barreto. Manuel Barros was a member of DPRD II and a CNRT leader. Julio Barros was a former Sub-district administrator of Maliana. Domingos Gonçalves Pereira was the village head of Ritabou. José Barros Soares was only 12-years-old and was probably killed because he was the son of CNRT leader Augustinho Soares. During the attack Lieutenant M68 [Indonesian] and East Timorese TNI sergeants M75, M142, M141, M143, M97 and M144 were commanding the militia.

847. The disposal of the bodies of those killed was carried out in coordination with the militia group in Batugade, Saka Loromonu, under the direction of M145, the Saka Loromonu commander, and his deputy, M148. The bodies were carried to the beach located near the Old Portuguese fort in Batugade.[1028] Then under the command of Sergeant M141 [East Timorese], the SGI member, M140 [Indonesian], and the two Saka Loromonu commanders, the bodies were tied to sand-filled sacks, loaded onto fishing boats and taken out to sea and dumped.

848. Further, according to the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, on 9 September, Sergeant M147 (East Timorese) who was at the house of Natalino Monteiro Gonçalves in Ritabou Village (Maliana, Bobonaro) received information from a villager that a group of people who had escaped from the police compound had been discovered on the river bank near a place called Mulau,* about 2 km from Ritabou. Sergeant M147 then ordered a group of Dadurus Merah Putih militia to accompany him to Mulau. In this operation, 13 pro-independence supporters were killed. The victims were: Lamberto de Sá Benevides, Abilio Marques Vicente, Augusto dos Santos Marques, José Barreto, Pedro Luis, Lucas dos Santos, Luis Soares (Luis dos Santos), Jeroni Lopes,† Domingos Titi Mau, Manuel Magalhães, Carlos Maia, Ernesto da Coli and Paul da Silva. The first nine of them, from Lamberto de Sa Benevides to Domingos Titi Mau, were ordered by Sergeant M147 to kneel down and raise their hands. Sergeant M147 shot them one by one with an automatic rifle. The other four were separately captured and killed. Manuel Magalhães and Ernesto da Coli were each shot and then stabbed. Carlos Maia was stabbed to death and Paul da Silva was shot several times while trying to surrender. Manuel Magalhães was a CNRT leader and Carlos Maia a prominent pro-independence activist. All the bodies, except that of Paul da Silva, were carried to the beach in Batugade. Under the orders of the two commanders of Saka Loromonu the bodies were dumped at sea. The body of Paul da Silva was discovered in the Mulau area in September 1999 and buried. The remains of Carlos Maia and Lamberto de Sá Benevides were discovered on the beach in Batugade and buried.[1029] The day after the killings in Mulau, on 10 September, two East Timorese policemen, Filomeno Guterres and Martinho Lopes Amaral, were killed 150 metres from the river bank in a similar fashion for their suspected CNRT sympathies.[1030]

* In the Deputy General Prosecutor's Indictment, Mulau is referred to as a village, but it is neither a hamlet (aldeia) nor a village (suco).

† According to HRVD Statement 2587, Jeroni's full name was Jeronimo Lopes.

Executions at Maliana police station

The following are excerpts from two eyewitness accounts of the killings at the Maliana police station, both of which illustrate the failure of the Indonesian police to intervene. The first comes from a woman who lost six family members in 24 hours, including three younger siblings and her husband, killed either at the police station or subsequently hunted down and killed at Mulau near the village of Ritabou:

We went to the police station on 3 September 1999. When we left our house we didn't take anything with us. Once we got there, the situation at the police station was like normal, except that several of the police who were under suspicion had been relieved of their weapons by their superiors. On 4 September 1999 we gathered to hear the results of the referendum announced by UNAMET. That evening several militia members came to where we were staying, because there were a lot of young people there. They asked us, "Why did you run to the police?" We remained silent. One of my younger brothers wanted to reply, but he stayed quiet too. Moments later, he asked us, "Are you afraid to die?" But we all remained silent….

On the evening of 8 September 1999, just after 5.00pm… the militia began their action at several locations in the police complex. [They said], "The police are doing nothing, so we have a right to take action." Then they began to attack from every direction. Many militia members came into the area where we were staying. Soon I heard the voice of a man crying out, "Ai, I am dying." After that I saw four militia carrying a corpse past me, just two or three metres away, very close. Even though there was a hedge of flowers between us, it was still very close, right by my side. In front of me were five bodies, until it got dark and I couldn't tell any more, but one was wearing shorts and a black jacket, and was rather fat. When they dragged that body, I leaned closer to the hedge to see more clearly. [When they neared] the walls of a house, he came to life and cried out. They stomped on him. Every time they dragged a corpse away, it took four militia, not just one. That's how they handled the bodies at the Maliana police station.

No action was taken by the Loro Sa'e Contingent at that time. After seeing the scenes of murder they went inside their office and just sat on their hands. They were right beside us, but they did nothing. They closed the doors to the office when they saw the people running there to ask for protection. They wouldn't let them in. That is why I saw so many people gathered in front of the doors of the Loro Sa'e Contingent. Their doors were closed.[1031]

Among those targeted was the prominent Maliana pro-independence figure Manuel Barros, former chairman of the PDI-P group in the district assembly (DPRD II), who on 2 September had taken refuge at the police station with his family including his brother Julio Barros, former administrator of Maliana Sub-district. At least four people witnessed his killing, including one man who was just a metre or two away when it happened. Shortly before Manuel Barros was killed, the two of them pleaded with the Indonesian police officers from the Loro Sa'e Contingent to intervene but they did nothing:

My friend and I were in a state of panic and a few moments later we met Manuel Barros. He [Barros] and I ran to the Loro Sa'e Contingent to ask for help. When we entered the office of the Loro Sa'e Contingent a group of people followed the two of us. I succeeded in getting into the office, but they threw me out and yelled, "Get out of here! Get out! This is not your hiding place. If you don't want to leave, we'll shoot." The people in the police station compound had placed their hope in the Loro Sa'e Contingent, because they were the ones who had been given the mandate from the United Nations to provide security in Timor-Leste at that time.

Anyone who was able to get into their office was immediately chased out again. Manuel Barros went outside first and I followed him. While we were still standing outside, leaning on the wall of the building, we saw militia dragging the corpse of Domingus Pereira, who had the rank of first corporal and was the village head of Ritabou, in Maliana Sub-district. Manuel Barros was shocked to see that, and ran immediately. We both ran to our tents. Manuel Barros, when he arrived at his tent, was immediately stabbed with a samurai sword by a Dadurus Merah Putih militia, and died on the spot. These were his last words: "Oh God, I am really going to die." In that situation, I couldn't do anything. My relative, Natalia Verdial, pulled me in and put me under her mattress, and they lay down on the mattress. I stayed there until late at night.[1032]

Institutions: Church and clergy targeted

849. While some members of the clergy had been the object of intimidation by the Indonesian military and militia before the Popular Consultation, in the aftermath of the ballot they became the victims of some of the most brutal killings. In addition to the murder of Father Hilario Madeira, Father Francisco Soares, and Father Tarsisius Dewanto at Suai church, clergy in other parts of the country also came under attack. In Dili on 11 September, German/Indonesian Father Carolus Albrecht, the director of the Jesuit Refugee Service in Timor-Leste, was shot in his home.[1033] In one of the most gruesome incidents of the post-ballot period, a group of five religious members and four lay people were ambushed and killed by a gang of Team Alfa militiamen near Lospalos.

850. The murder of nine people by a group of Team Alfa members led by Joni Marques on 25 September, on the road from Lautém to Baucau near the Verokoco River,* took the largest number of lives of any single incident that occurred in Lautém District after the ballot in 1999. The victims included five religious members, namely Sister Erminia Cazzagina, Sister Celeste de Carvalho, Brother Jacinto Xavier, Brother Fernando dos Santos, and Brother Valerio da Conceição. The victims also included an Indonesian journalist, Agus Mulyawan, and Cristovão Rudy Barreto and Titi Sandra Lopes who were riding in the same vehicle with the nuns and brothers. Izinho Freitas Amaral was caught separately at the same location by the militia group and killed with the other eight. Sister Erminia is said to have been killed as she knelt in prayer. The leader of the group, Joni Marques, said that he had been told that members of Catholic religious orders were also supporters of independence and therefore should be eliminated.†

Killings and disappearances during the withdrawal of Battalion 745

851. While Indonesian military forces stationed throughout the country were responsible for extra-judicial executions and disappearances in specific locations, in some cases an individual military unit or group of units committed killings in multiple locations. The Commission was informed that in addition to being responsible for several killings near Lospalos after the ballot,‡ members of Battalion 745, under the command of Major M148 [Indonesian], were also responsible for the murder of at least 18 people in Baucau, Manatuto, and Dili Districts, during the battalion's withdrawal to West Timor in late September.

852. On 20 September, approximately 120 members of Battalion 745, along with soldiers from the Lautém District military command, formed a convoy to escort military vehicles along the coast to West Timor. Witnesses have testified before the Special Panel for Serious Crimes in Dili that before the convoy left the town of Lautém, soldiers from Battalion 745, in the presence of Major M148 (Indonesian) and Platoon Commander Lieutenant M149 (East Timorese), detained, shot and burned the bodies of three men, Amilicar Barros, João Gomes and Agusto Venacio Soares, near a rice warehouse.[1034]

* The indictment by the General Prosecutor of the UNTAET reads: "At around 1600 hours, the mini bus passed Lautém junction and approached the vicinity of the village of Verokoco. The road passes along the River Malailana." [Case No. 09/2000, paragraph 36]. There is no village by the name of Verokoco, but there is a river by that name.

† HRVD Statement 2285. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Joni Marques, et al., Case No. 09/2000, paragraphs 33-40. Special Panel for Serious Crimes, Judgment, 11 December 2001. Seven militia members, including Joni Marques, were found guilty by the Special Panel for Serious Crimes.

‡ According to OHCHR Submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 240, Battalion 745 was responsible for killing 10 people between September 8 and 13 in Lautém District. The CAVR database contains only two HRVD statements which directly attribute responsibility to Battalion 745 during this period of time: HRVD Statement 8747 (on 10 September Jaime and Marito are detained and brought to 745 headquarters in the village of Fuiloro, and never seen again) and HRVD Statement 8742 (four people were executed by members of Battalion 745 on 12 September after they had first burned houses in the aldeia of Kanto in Fuiloro Village). Other HRVD statements reporting executions and disappearances in Lautém District between 4 and 20 September are: 3941; 7626; 2261; 7620; 8734; 8747; 7622; 8738; 8742; 8743; 8752 and 2255.

853. As the convoy passed through Laga in Baucau, several houses were destroyed. Two young men were killed on 21 September near Buile Village (Baucau, Baucau) on the road from Laga to Baucau* by soldiers in Battalion 745 and another four, including two women, were killed as the convoy moved through Buruma and Caibada in Baucau Town.[1035] In addition it is believed that soldiers from the same Battalion also killed four men in Laleia in Manatuto District and detained three more people nearby, who have not been seen since.[1036]

854. On 21 September, Battalion 745 arrived in Becora on the outskirts of Dili. A car which contained a British journalist and an American cameraman (whose names are not known), an East Timorese interpreter and an East Timorese driver, was forced to stop. Sancho Ramos de Ressurição, the driver, was hit in the head with a rifle butt with the blow forcing his right eye out of its socket. Anacleto da Silva, the interpreter, was taken away and was never seen again. As the convoy proceeded down Becora Road, members of the battalion shot at a group of three men as they walked down the street, wounding one of them and killing another, Manuel Andreas. A Dutch journalist who had arrived in Dili that afternoon to cover the arrival of the Interfet for the Financial Times, Sander Thoenes, was also killed by soldiers from Battalion 745. The East Timorese driver of the motorbike on which Sander Thones was riding tried to make a U-turn to escape but was told by the soldiers to stop. The driver managed to escape but Sander Thoenes was shot by one of two soldiers, one of whom was identified as Lt. Camilo dos Santos.[1037] His ears were cut off and part of his face was sliced off.[1038]

855. The convoy proceeded to the Sub-regional military headquarters (Korem) in the centre of Dili, then to the town of Balibó, arriving in Kupang on 22 September. Although Major M148 and two other officers were subsequently interviewed by military police, no TNI officers have been disciplined or prosecuted in connection with the killings, as of August 2005.[1039]

Targeted communities: killings at Mau-Nunu, Passabe and Maquelab

856. As already noted, TNI and militia executions became increasingly less selective and began to target whole communities or sections of communities. Violence was directed at clergy, the families of CNRT members and even members of the Indonesian police force who attempted to intercede on behalf of victims. During September and October, entire communities were also targeted because of their perceived pro-independence sympathies, because certain known clandestine figures had lived there, or because Falintil had been known to be active in the area.

857. For instance, after the announcement of the result of the ballot in Ainaro, TNI and Mahidi militia, led by M81 and his brother, M151, killed or disappeared more than 20 people,* which culminated in a brutal attack on civilians in the village of Mau-Nuno. The attack took place on 23 September, after Interfet had arrived in Dili. The militia involved in the attack had fled to Atambua, and then returned to attack Mau-Nuno, round up residents and forcibly deport them to West Timor.[1040] On the morning of 23 September approximately 60 East Timorese, mostly Mahidi militia members, and at least two Indonesian soldiers, attacked the village of Mau-Nuno. The militia group reportedly included M152, M153, and M154. After entering Mau-Nuno from several directions, the militia began to fire weapons into the air and to order the residents out of their houses to be deported to West Timor. Some militia carried cans of gasoline and began to set fire to houses and to kill livestock.

* The Indictment of the General Prosecutor of Timor-Leste (Case No. 10/2002) mentions a village of Buile in Laga Sub-district, Baucau District.

858. According to interviews with witnesses, statements submitted to the Commission and allegations in an indictment issued by the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes in Dili, Mahidi militia killed at least 13 people, including women and children, during the attack. One family fled the initial attack by hiding in a shallow riverbed leading up to a ridge behind Mau-Nuno. A young woman, Francisca Maria Almeida and her two-year-old son, Isadoro hid there with her parents, Ernestina and Francisco Bianco, and her sister-in-law, Isabel Maria Almeida. They hid in a hole in the ground next to a stream just below the ridge. When several Mahidi militias from Cassa (Ainaro, Ainaro) found them, they shot and killed Ernestina and Francisco Bianco and Isabel Maria Almeida. When Francisca Maria Almeida was shot, the bullet went through her body, seriously wounding her and into the body of her two-year-old son, Isadoro, who was also shot in the head and was killed. Another woman and her little daughter hiding nearby were also shot and wounded. The other victims killed in Mau-Nuno were Armando, Jacob Bianco, Lobotina, Jorgé Correia Barros Xavier, João Nunes, Lucinda da Silva Bianco, Afonso Ramos, Miguel Monis and Alcino Araújo. As many as 75 villagers were forcibly relocated first to Cassa, and then deported to Atambua, West Timor[1041]

859. In a case from a submission given to the Commission in July 2004, Regina Bianco narrated the killing of her mother, Belinha da Silva Bianco Lopes.

> Beginning 23 September 1999, my mother and I were at home when suddenly the following Mahidi militia entered our house in Mau-Nuno: M138, M155, M158, M159, M161 and M164, wearing t-shirts with Mahidi written on them and fully armed with SKS [automatic rifles], grenades and samurai [swords]. They entered the house and destroyed all our possessions, then took them outside and burnt everything.

* All bracketed numbers are to HRVD statements: Jonino Gomes killed in Ainaro by Mahidi [3321]; several days after Moises was captured by Mahidi militia members and taken to the Mahidi post in Beikala, on 4 September he was taken away by ABLAI militia and was not seen again [1312]; Felix de Araújo killed in Mulo 4/9 by TNI [7408]; Fernando Gomes killed in Cassa on 4/9 by Mahidi [7414]; Domingos Guro killed by TNI Kodim Ainaro and Mahidi in Beikala on 6/9 [1375; 1308; 1329; 1373; 1374]; Bernabe de Jesus killed in Maubisse by TNI on 6/9 [5965; 5955]; Avelino Magno killed by Mahidi in Ainaro on 9 September [3336]; Moises and Octavio killed by Mahidi on 12 September in Hato Udo [2002]; Carlito, Lucio da Costa, Henrique killed in Aituto on 9 September [7416]; Constancio Araújo killed in Leolima on 12 September [2017]; Paulino Maria Bianco by Mahidi in Cassa on 12 September [2676; 2731; 2008]; Americo Soares by TNI in Ainaro [3362]; Sancho by Mahidi and TNI in Ainaro on 16 September [9118]; Ramiro and José Guterres in Ainaro by Mahidi on 17 September [3359]; and three youths in Beikala by TNI Battalion 301 on 19 September [1399].

After that [they] forced the people in the village to go with them to Betung [sic], Atambua. The villagers were forced to go with them without taking anything because they were afraid they would be killed. We walked across the river with no time to rest or eat. Then four militias took grenades from their pockets and were going to throw them in the direction of the villagers, so that the villagers were startled and kneeled [begging] not to be killed. But the militia didn't care and said, "If necessary, just shoot [them]."

Most the militia members were related to each other because they all came from the same village as us, they also knew my mother and so they mentioned my father's name. My mother answered them, "Where are my husband's papers? Show them to me so I can read them." The militia answered, "We will never hand over those papers to you." After that the militia ordered the villagers to walk ahead of them to wait for a vehicle going to Atambua. [My] mother was walking at the back of the villagers and was shot dead by militiaman M138 near the Bui-Liku river. [M]y mother died on the spot and I was forced by M322 to get in the car alone that was headed to Betung [sic]. Militiaman M322 is related to my father's family.[1042]

Mass executions at Passabe and Maquelab, Oecussi

860. The executions which occurred at Passabe and Maquelab near the Indonesian border in the enclave of Oecussi also illustrate the extremes to which the TNI and militia went in order to punish entire communities for choosing to separate from Indonesia. In both cases TNI and militia chose the villages in which a number of pro-independence leaders lived and conducted a massive purge of young men.

861. Those killed in the Passabe massacre on 10 September were people who had fled from the three villages in the sub-district of Oesilo.[1043] On 9 September members of the Sakunar militia group were ordered to go to Imbate, West Timor (Miomafo Timur Sub-district, Timor Tengah Utara District, Indonesia) on the orders of M115. On the way to Imbate, at a place named Puput, West Timor, militia members reportedly hacked to death a civilian, Neti Lafu, from Usitakeno Village (Oesilo, Oecussi).[1044] Meanwhile the people from the three villages who had fled to the mountains in Imbate were told to come down to the Imbate village office to register their names. When they arrived, about 55 young men considered to be pro-independence supporters were separated from the rest. The young men included Francisco Sufa, Lambertu Punef, Paulinus Neno, José Ulan, Zacarias Mauno, Adriano Neno, Zacarias Tolo, Kolo Lopo, None Sufa, Kobus Henas, Dominikus Obe, Yohanes Suni, Baptista Elo, Poto Ulan,[1045] Poto Mauno, Martinho Bobo, Ili Afoan and Poto Sufa.* A witness told the Commission that Ernesto Bobi attempted to escape on the way but was hacked to death.[1046] They were forced to leave Imbate on foot. At around 3.00am on 10 September they reached the border between Timor-Leste

* HRVD Statement 6909. Martinho Bobo seems to have successfully escaped [see HRVD Statement 2828].

and West Timor at Teon Lasi. After the group crossed the Noel Passabe River, at a place called Nifu Panef, the militia started killing the young men. In total, more than 47 men were killed, while seven or eight managed to escape. Gabriel Kolo, André Ulan, Anton Sabraka, Florenço Tacaqui, Tomás Bubun Antonio Sila, Mateus Ceus, Agustinho Ero, and Bonifacio Bobo, all members of the Sakunar Militia, are alleged to have taken part in the killing of the young men. The same militia went to Passabe and ordered villagers to go to the site of the killings and bury the bodies. The villagers were also threatened that if they did not keep secret what they had done, they would be killed.[1047]

862. The Commission received numerous statements from survivors, witnesses and family members of the victims of the massacre.[1048] A Sakunar militia member who accompanied the prisoners, gave the following testimony to the Commission:

> In September 1999, I was called by M182 and his son M183 to join the Sakunar militia in Meocora, Usitasae Village [Oesilo, Oecuss]…. After I joined, I was given matches by M165 in order to burn the homes of the people of the sub-district of Passabe…. On the ninth, I saw M299, M187, M190, M191, M194, and M115 from Passabe and three TNI soldiers, also from Passabe, M165, M196, and M198, carrying their weapons along with more militias than I could count…. They were headed towards Imbate, West Timor, to capture CNRT members who were hiding there. They caught the CNRT members and brought them to the village office of Imbate. At that time I went with the militia to Imbate. After they brought the CNRT victims to the Imbate village office, their hands were tied in a chain. There were about 70 people tied up and they all came from Bobometo Village [Oesilo, Oecussi]. Then we took them at night to the area of Teon Lasi in Abani Village. At about 3.00am the victims were shot dead by the TNI soldiers; and some were hacked to death by M115, the Sakunar militia leader. I also hacked one person in the neck, but he didn't die. About 69 people were killed by the Sakunar militia at Teon Lasi, Abani Village, in the sub-district of Passabe.[1049]

863. A survivor of the killings also made a statement to the Commission:

> Those of us who were tied up at that time numbered about 70 people. After we were tied, we were ordered out of the village office to Nefopana [Passabe, Oecussi]. But the Sakunar militia members beat us from behind with clubs until we were black and blue. At 3.00am we arrived at Nefopana, where M201 and M204 began by cutting the throat of Marcos Kono. He died immediately. Then M206 told his friends to get rid of the body. Hearing him speak that way, Lafu Seco and I immediately threw ourselves to the ground. Then two victims fell on top of us, and their blood covered us, so it appeared that we too were dead. [1050]

864. At approximately 6.00am, about 100 men from Passabe Village were instructed by militiamen to gather tools suitable for road repair work. They were then taken to the site of the killings and ordered to bury the bodies where they had fallen.

865. A second mass execution took place in the vicinity of Maquelab (Pante Makassar, Oecussi) on 20 October. In the early afternoon of that day armed militiamen in eight trucks came to the area looking for people who had fled Maquelab for the safety of the mountains. They found a large group of about 300 people from the village and told them they had to return with the militia to Maquelab so that they could travel safely to West Timor. The militia then marched them five kilometres back to the village. On arrival at Maquelab the militia commander, Bonifacio Bobo, pulled from the group Atili da Costa and Paulus Cussi, two CNRT leaders, took them behind the Maquelab market and shot them dead.*

866. About 30 minutes later the deputy commander of Sakunar, M120, arrived at the scene, selected four men, ordered them to stand and shot them. The victims were the CNRT chief of security and UNAMET local staff member, Francisco Taek; another UNAMET local staff member, Paulos Kelo; a pro-independence student, Mateus Ton;† and a CNRT leader, João Talias.[1051] Immediately after these executions, and on command, the Sakunar militiamen set about burning all the houses and buildings in Maquelab, without exception. In the course of the afternoon they also killed another six, possibly seven, people in the village, before moving to West Timor, Indonesia.[1052]

867. A witness told the Commission:

> On 20 October 1999, about 20 people composed of members of TNI, the police, Sakunar and Aitarak militias staged a major attack on the people of Taiboco [Pante Makassar, Oecussi]. At that time my family and I had taken refuge at Neten Abas. Nonetheless, the Sakunar militia commander, M213, succeeded in finding us. After they caught us, they forced us to give them money. We were able to collect about Rp300,000 which we gave to them so they wouldn't kill us. After we had given them the money, we were closely guarded by the Sakunar militia. We were forced to walk about five kilometres from our hiding place in Neten Abas to the market at Maquelab. After we arrived at the market in Maquelab, there was a Sakunar militia named M212 who tried to kill me by swinging his machete in its sheath; it hit me directly on the mouth and teeth. As a result I lost three teeth and bled heavily, and I became dizzy. But I stayed quiet, I didn't yell out or cry. After that we sat down, and about 30 minutes later Sakunar commander M213 came and pulled out Atili da Costa and Paulus Cussi. The two of them were taken to the back of the market, near the toilet, and they were both shot dead and their bodies thrown in the rubbish hole.
>
> About 30 minutes later (3 pm WIT) a vice commander of Sakunar, M120, arrived on a motorcycle. There was no discussion. He immediately called

* HRVD Statements 377; 865; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Amended Indictment Against Laurentino Soares aka Moko and Bonifacio Bobo aka Bone, Case No. 13/2002 (OE-4-99-SC), paragraphs 14-29. There is slight variation in the spelling of the victims' names. According to HRVD Statement 377, the victims' names are Atili da Costa and Paulus Cussi. This compares with Atilio Costa and Paulo Cusi [HRVD Statement 865] and Justilio da Costa and Paulus Kusi [Deputy General Prosecutor Indictment, paragraph 22].

† The Deputy General Prosecutor's Indictment names this victim as Mateus Tone [Case No. 13/2002, paragraph 18].

four people, João Talias, Paulus Kelu, Mateus Ton and Francisco Taek. After the four had been called forward, M120 pointed with his finger and said, "You, get up!" to the first person, João Talias. He had just stood and walked about two paces forward when he was shot through the chest. After that, the same thing was done to the next two people, and then to the last one, Francisco Taek…Then all their families and the other people gathered there were ordered to bow their heads, and not to cry out or weep. The four victims were put into a Kijang car owned by Moko Soares and taken somewhere, I don't know where. Then we were all told to get on a truck to evacuate to Kefa [Kefamenanu, West Timor].[1053]

Other mass executions

868. The Commission also received testimonies about other mass executions which took place during the post-ballot violence. On 12 September, there was a mass killing of villagers in Covalima District, in the village of Lactos (Fohoren, Covalima) after the people refused to be taken to West Timor. After the announcement of the ballot result, the villagers of Lactos went into hiding in the hills. The Laksaur militia group in Lactos, led by its commander, M111, and his deputy, M220, received an order from the overall commander of Laksaur, M78 in Salele (Tilomar, Covalima) that the whole civilian population had to go to West Timor.

869. On or about 12 September, after talking privately with Lieutenant M222, the commander of the TNI unit in Lactos (Fohorem, Covalima), Cosmos Amaral, ordered his men to go and fix a broken water pipe. After fixing the pipe, one group comprised of Lieutenant M222, and some 20 TNI soldiers, M220 and a number of militia members and East Timorese military-trained auxiliaries (Milsas) led by M224, went to Rai Ulun. They found the villagers and ordered them to go to West Timor.*

870. The villagers, armed with machetes, answered that they would not go. When the villagers moved forward, suddenly the TNI members, the East Timorese auxiliaries (Milsas) and militia members started shooting, killing 14 villagers. Another man was stabbed to death. The victims of the killings were: Antonio Amaral Bau, Alberto Fereira, Ernesto Carvalho Letto, Anito Coli, Anito Mali, Anito Bau, Daniel Monis Aci, Domingos Amaral, Eurico Bau, Daniel Taek, Abel Soares Gomes, José do Rego, Geraldo Amaral and Boaventura de Araújo. The man stabbed to death was Boaventura.[1054]

871. Another mass killing took place in Becora (Dili), a pro-independence stronghold, on 4 September. Members of the Aitarak and Besi Merah Putih militia groups, together with members of TNI and police, reportedly killed eight men. The victims included André de Araújo, Cristovão da Silva, Domingos Martins da Silva, Joaquim da Costa, Filipe dos Santos and Carlos Martins Oliveira. The other two victims are known only as Marcelo and Aceng or Asam.[1055]

* Further investigation is needed to determine the location of this mass execution. HRVD Statement 6270 places it in Lactos Village whereas the Deputy General Prosecutor's Indictment [Case No. 9/2003] describes TNI and Milsas members going to Rai Ulun in Lactos. However, Rai Ulun is an aldeia in Leohitu Village (Balibó, Bobonaro).

Testimony of a child survivor

In the village of Lourba (Bobonaro, Bobonaro), Dadurus Merah Putih militia conducted a vicious attack days after the result of the ballot was announced. One family experienced an horrific attack at their house, resulting in the mother and father, and their 17-year-old daughter, being shot and hacked to death. Their daughter, aged nine, whose words are reproduced below, was hacked with a machete across her nose. The scar is still clearly visible today. Her cousin, who was seven years old at the time, was also hacked with a machete in the mouth, smashing her teeth. The daughter who survived told the Commission:

My name is A, I am the youngest of four children. I do not really know anything about politics. My parents often did clandestine work and liked to help Falintil, but I do not know if that is political work. At the time we actively discussed autonomy or Ukun Rasik-An but I only knew that Ukun Rasik-An meant our freedom. As a matter of fact all our family were pro-independence so I knew a little bit. As the Popular Consultation approached the situation in Bobonaro became very bad and my parents got anxious but we children felt things were much the same because we did not know about politics. On 30 August 1999 when the Popular Consultation was held all over Timor Loro Sa'e, we were told to stay home because there would be shooting by the militia and TNI, so we just stayed put. When the referendum results were announced my parents were really happy because we had won and the situation was not as bad as before the referendum. So we all just relaxed at home.

On 6 September 1999, the Dadurus Merah Putih (DMP) militia and TNI arrived in Lourba Village and started shooting brutally into the air and abusing the local people. Early in the morning on 7 September the village was surrounded by DMP and TNI, but my parents and I didn't know. My mother saw that TNI had surrounded our house and she yelled out to my auntie who lives close by to run outside because both houses were surrounded. My auntie ran out and was shot straight away by TNI. She was hit in the left hip but still managed to escape.

My mother and father and us four stayed inside the house because the TNI were ready for us. The other neighbours had run all over the place, some were hiding in their gardens, and others in the thick bush. But my mother still said we could not go outside, we should just stay put, why should we run? In the end we all tried to go out through the back door. My father tried to run, and the TNI and the militia chased him and shot him. Then they hacked him to death on the spot.

I was following my mother who had me by the hand, but they stabbed her right through the chest and out the other side. Then they cut her thigh and she lost hold of my hand. When she let go of my hand I started to cry and hug her because she was badly wounded. But then they cut me on the nose. Before she died, she said, "Stay child, we may all die, but we will have independence." Then she took her last breath as she squeezed my father's hand. There was a lot of blood from all the knife wounds so I passed out next to my mother. The militia thought I was dead so they left.

Suddenly mother's spirit lifted me up and placed me next to the house, and I came to consciousness. Then I looked over at my auntie's house and saw the militia and TNI throwing my cousin about three metres but her body was covered in blood from a stomach wound. My relative Lucia was dead and my aunt was hiding in a ditch. Because my family were all dead or badly wounded, the militia and the TNI left.

An hour later our neighbours came back to rescue those of us who were badly wounded and to recover the bodies of mother, father and Lucia. That night we were able to "hader mate" [stay awake with the deceased until the following morning], but towards morning the militia and TNI suddenly attacked again. We locked all the corpses in a room and ran outside.

Then we left for Mount Lour. When we got there, Falintil treated our wounds with traditional medicine. And thanks be to God all our wounds healed completely. After Interfet took control of Dili we came down from the mountain and found that the militia and TNI had destroyed the house and the three corpses had been dragged away and eaten by dogs and other animals. For four months we tried to collect what remained of their bones.

As a daughter I feel that I must help my older brothers to recover our parents' bones, which are not yet complete. I do not know about our future, as we are still young. Who will look after us? Even though my parents are dead, I believe that their spirits are still with us. One day the people who killed them will be punished. That is what I want, there must be punishment and justice.[1056]

Killing refugees in the camps in West Timor

872. Thousands of people were forced into trucks and boats by Indonesian security forces and militia groups to be evacuated to West Timor (see also Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). Some went voluntarily, seeking safety. However, security conditions in the refugee camps in West Timor were appalling. Most refugee camps were organised by the Indonesian authorities and military or militia leaders controlled the camps as "camp coordinators."[1057] More than 200 refugee camps were established in the four districts of Belu, Timor Tengah Utara (TTU), and Timor Tengah Selatan (TTS), and Kupang. According to the NTT Refugee Coordination Unit (Satkorlak PBP NTT), on 4 September there were 336,043 refugees (56,334 households) in West Timor. By mid-October the figure had dropped to 264,454 refugees.[1058] The UNHCR gave a figure of 250-280,000 people.[1059] Besides those transported to refugee camps, there were East Timorese who had fled there or been taken by force individually or in small groups. All the refugees were in danger, especially those identified as pro-independence.

873. Information about human rights violations committed by TNI and militia members in refugee camps in various parts of West Timor in September and October is not complete. Almost none of these human rights violations have been investigated properly by responsible authorities. For that reason, of those known to have been killed or disappeared in West Timor including the senior CNRT leader, Mau Hodu Ran Kadalak (José da Costa), the Commission cannot confirm the disappearance or death, or if dead, where the remains are buried. The general picture remains limited but accounts strongly suggest that many serious human rights violations were perpetrated against real or suspected supporters of independence there. The Commission received information on 27 killings and disappearances that occurred in two districts, Belu and Timor Tengah Utara.

Belu

874. Belu District, and its capital Atambua, were the location of the highest number of refugees during this period. In Belu at least 20 people were killed or disappeared. Agustinho Martins Trindade had been forcibly recruited to Aitarak. While in Atambua he was reportedly killed.[1060] Armando da Silva was reportedly arrested by three policemen. His wife went to the police station and asked about her husband, but she was threatened and asked if she also wanted to die like her husband. Armando da Silva was not seen again.[1061] Venancio do Régo, the village head of Fatumean, Covalima District and a clandestine member, was arrested by Laksaur militia members in Nenuk, and he was not seen again.[1062] Vong Neong Song and his family sought protection at the regional police station in Dili and on 9 September they boarded an Indonesian military boat. Vong Neong Song disappeared on his way to Atambua.[1063]

875. Celestino Correia was allegedly killed at a refugee camp in Kolam Susu (Atapupu, Belu) West Timor on 14 September. A son of M295, the Halilintar and Armui militia commander, attempted to force Celestino Correia to join the miltia, but he refused. M295's son was slightly injured during the incident and he was brought to the clinic. Apparently in retaliation, Anastacio Martins, and two others sought out Celestino Correia and beat him to death in the presence of other refugees.[1064]

876. Georgina Tilman was among the refugees from Ermera staying in Siskoe, Atambua. Domingos Maia, formerly a driver for the government in Ermera, was forced to become a driver for the Darah Merah militia. On 18 September he asked to meet refugees from Ermera who were staying in Siskoe. There Domingos saw Georgina Tilman washing her face while being guarded by an armed man.* Two days later Domingos Maia was told that Georgina had been taken away and released at the intersection at Mandoki (Atabae, Bobonaro). He went there and found the dead bodies of Georgina and her five children. The bodies were buried at the site.[1065]

877. On 19 September Manuel Soares and Mário de Araújo were playing volleyball at the Atambua sports ground (West Timor) when they were reportedly forced into a car and taken to Buas by a group of AHI militia members from Aileu under the command of M160. There they were tied up and taken into a bamboo forest where they were reportedly killed.[1066]

878. A former Falintil member, Pascoal da Costa Calau, was reportedly abducted from the Tanah Merah elementary school by a group of about 20 Aitarak militia members on 30 September. He was not seen again.[1067]

879. Apolinario Maujoni was among the refugees from Bobonaro staying in Lakmaras (Atambua, West Timor). On 12 October he was arrested with one other man and was reportedly killed. He was not seen again.[1068]

880. On 15 October, Edmundus Bere, who had worked with the Student Solidarity Council of East Timor (ETSSC or Dewan Solidaritas Mahasiswa dan Pelajar Timor Timur, DSMPTT), was arrested and taken to the Laksaur militia post in Lakmaras (Atambua, West Timor). There he was beaten and had salt placed in an open wound. On 17 October he was reportedly killed at a place called Bora (West Timor).[1069]

881. Those who tried to contact their families at Mota'ain (Belu, West Timor) near the border, were also targeted. Agusto Soares met with his sister on 20 October at Mota'ain. After the meeting, Agusto Soares was reportedly killed by Darah Merah Putih militia from Ermera.[1070] Clandestine member Celestino Soares, who was staying with his family stayed at Tenu Bo'ot (West Timor), was taken by members of the Aitarak miliita group. On 30 October his body was found in Saloreh (West Timor).[1071]

Timor Tengah Utara (TTU)

882. Timor Tengah Utara (North Central Timor) District shares a border with the enclave of Oecussi. Most of the killings in TTU reported to the Commission involved Sakunar militia targeting refugees from Oecussi who had known affiliations with CNRT. The Commission received testimonies about at least seven refugees who were killed or disappeared.

883. Firmino No'o was a pro-independence student. One day in September, when he was returning to Oecussi from Hali he was stopped at the militia post in Oel Faub, Kefamenanu because he was wearing a t-shirt with the letters CNRT on it. He was tied up and beaten by Sakunar militia including their commander, M120. He was reportedly taken to Oelfaub, Iri, and there he was killed. His body is believed to have been buried in West Timor and has not been recovered.[1072]

* Georgina Tilman was an alin sarani or younger "baptism" sibling of Domingos Maia. This means that Domingos Maia's biological parents were the godparents of Georgina and present as witnesses when Georgina was baptised.

884. In late September a CNRT member, Horacio Auni, was reportedly taken away by Sakunar militia commander, M120, at the refugee camp in Bu'uk and was not seen again.[1073]

885. Constancio Seni, an inhabitant of Oesilo Sub-district, Oecussi District, fled to Oeneno, Kefamenanu (West Timor), when his village was attacked by Sakunar on 8 September. He was reportedly taken away by a large group of about 70 militia members. He was not seen again.[1074]

886. Batista Bobo, an inhabitant of Tumin, Bobometo Village, fled to Bu'uk, Kefamenanu, to escape an attack of Sakunar on his village on 8 September, but was reportedly killed in Bu'uk on 9 September.[1075]

Other post-ballot killings and disappearences reported to the Commission

887. In the following table, the Commission has summarised other incidences of unlawful killings and forced disappearences from 1999 that have been reported.

Table 55: Summaries of unlawful killings and forced disappearances since the 1999 Popular Consultation, as reported to the CAVR

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
Aileu, Aileu	On 4 September, a group of AHI militia members reportedly killed Antonio Ribeiro in Malere, Seloi Village.[1076] On the same day another group of AHI members led by the Liurai M163 reportedly killed a man known as Marçal from Viqueque in a location called Mantane, Lausi Village.[1077] On 5 September, a group of AHI members shot two young brothers, Guilherme and Gabriel de Deus Lobato. Both died after reaching Rihui, Madabeno Village (Laulara). On 6 September, the Babinsa of Aissirimou, Sergeant Domingos Alberto Carlos, shot CNRT member Elias de Araújo dead. Sergeant Carlos also allegely ordered two AHI leaders with him, Carlos José and Almeida Martins, to kill Evaristo Lere Barreto. The two men hacked Evaristo Barreto to death with machetes.[1078] A man known as Maulere was found dead at the Manutane River. It is believed that he was killed by a pro-integration group.[1079] On 9 September, a TNI member, Gaspar Leite, allegedly shot Domingos Maukinta* to death in an attack on the village of Hohulu.[1080] On 11 September, an AHI member reportedly killed Tome Araújo in Malere, Seloi Village.[1081] On 13 September, Marcelino Timosila was reportedly killed at the base camp of the Aileu Kodim by a TNI member.[1082] On 16 September, a member of the Darah Integrasi militia group reportedly killed a man known as Domingos.[1083] On 17 September, João da Conceição Tilman was reportedly shot to death by members of TNI at Kodtalirei River on his way to Maurusa.[1084]

* According to HRVD Statement 4861, the victim's name is Domingos de Jesus Mesquita.

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
Laulara and Liquidoe, Aileu	On 6 September, a TNI member, Adolfo Amaral, shot Francisco Aleixo (aka Carvalho) at the Dili-Aileu road junction near Koto Lau Village (Laulara). He died on the spot and his body was found about a month later.[1085] On 17 September, a combined group of AHI and TNI members shot Marçal Alves dead in the aldeia of Urbada, Fucuculau Village (Laulara).[1086] In Liquidoe Sub-district, after the announcement of the result of the ballot, a group of Rajawali allegedly led by M175 [East Timorese], killed Miguel F Soares.[1087]
Ainaro, Ainaro	On 5 September, a group of Mahidi members, including Fernando Lopes and Anigio de Oliveira, attacked Fernando Gomes at his house in Cassa. Fernando Lopes allegedly shot him dead.[1088] On 13 September, Mahidi members reportedly killed Paulino Maria Bianco. Paulino Bianco had been detained the previous day and on 13 September he was handed over to the Mahidi leader, M81. His head was covered with a plastic bag, and on M81's orders he was taken to a place called Sildena Hare Kain and killed.[1089]
Hato Builico, Ainaro	On 4 September, Diogo de Araújo and Felix de Araújo, both suspected as CNRT sympathisers, were reportedly killed at the TNI and Mahidi post in Calihata, Mulo Village.[1090]
Hato Udo, Ainaro	On 4 September, a man known as Moises was caught by Mahidi members and held at the Mahidi militia post in the village of Beikala for about a week. He was then taken away by ABLAI militia to Same. He was not seen again.[1091] On 6 or 7 September, a man known as Domingos Guru was shot and hacked to death by a combined group of TNI and Mahidi members in the village of Beikala. Accounts suggest that a TNI soldier, Syamsudin, was involved in the killing of Domingos Guru.[1092] On 30 September, a group of 10 ABLAI members led by M186 reportedly killed Maria Imaculada near a cave in Lesso, Beikala Village.[1093]
Maubisse, Ainaro	Joana Soares and her son, Eusebio Nurega, were killed, reportedly when houses in Aihou, Aituto village, were burned. The exact date of the incident is not known.[*]
Quelicai, Baucau	On 10 September, TNI and Team Saka allegedly killed Sebastião dos Reis in Guruça Village. On 11 September, a group of Team Saka members led by commander Manuel Ariate, his deputies, Cosme Moreira and Virgilio Soares, and Rajawali commander Cristiano Ximenes, approached Pedro da Cruz Soares, a supporter of independence living in the aldeia of Abo Lir. Cosme Moreira shot him to death.[1094] Team Saka led by Manuel Ariate also reportedly shot to death a young man from Guruça called Celestino on 9 September.[1095]

* HRVD Statement 5957. The statement appears to report that the burning of the houses occurred in August but such an incident is more likely to have occurred in September.

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
Laga, Baucau	A group of TNI soldiers killed at least two persons in separate incidents. 1st Sergeant Faustino dos Santos, 1st Corporal Agustinho Soares and 2nd Sergeant Tomás Cardoso (aka Tomás Maurade), all from the Kodim's intelligence section, allegedly killed Armindo Belo Pires at Laga beach on 11 September. Armindo Belo Pires, a resident of Soba Village, was walking down to the beach to visit some relatives who had gathered there to wait for a ship to West Timor. The soldiers accused Pires of being a Fretilin member and reportedly killed him in open view of the many waiting for the ship.[1096] Faustino dos Santos and Agustinho Soares led a patrol team the next day to the village of Tekinomata. When they arrived near the village Agustinho Soares ordered his men to kill any man or woman they saw. Faustino dos Santos approached a house where Marcela Buti Fatima was holding a baby and standing behind the back door which was half open. Faustino reportedly fired his weapon at the back door and shot Fatima in the leg. She died of her injuries in the evening.[1097] On 21 September, six villagers were killed in Laga by members of Battalion 745 under the command of Major Jacob Djoko Sarosa when the troops passed along the main road from Laga to Baucau. Battalion 745 had committed killings in Lautém before it entered the district of Baucau. Two brothers, Egas da Silva and Abreu da Costa, went to Buruma Village near Baucau Town and warned the villagers not to come out onto the main road because TNI soldiers were killing people. On their way back to their village, Buile, travelling by motorbike, they encountered the Battalion 745 convoy. They jumped off the motorbike and attempted to run into a rice field but were shot by members of Battalion 745.
	In Buruma Village, Lucinda da Silva and Elisita da Silva were shot to death, and in Caibada Village, Victor Belo and Carlos da Costa Ribeiro were arbitrarily shot to death.[†]
Venilale, Baucau	On 11 September, a combined group of TNI soldiers and Team Sera militia members, including Agustinho, captured Faustino dos Santos, a pro-independence clandestine member. He is believed to have been taken to Baucau and killed there.[1098] The next day a combined group of TNI and Team Sera members reportedly shot Francisco Guterres to death in Uato Haco Village, while he was working in the fields with his wife. His wife heard the perpetrators accuse Guterres and herself of feeding Falintil soldiers.[1099]
Atabae, Bobonaro	A group of Halilintar militia under M203 reportedly killed Rui-Mau on 15 September.[1100] Halilintar militia also killed a clandestine member, Estévão, in Hataz Village (Atabae).[1101]

* Deputy General Prosecutor of Timor-Leste, Indictment against Maj. Jacob Djoko Sarosa and Lt. Camilo dos Santos, Case No. 10/2002, paragraphs 62-86. The dead bodies of Egas da Silva, Abreu da Costa, Elisita da Silva and Victor Belo, lying at their respective houses, were filmed by Indonesian journalist Agus Muliawan who was killed by Team Alfa militia members four days later in Lautém. The film footage of the victims was later recovered and used in a Japanese documentary program on the death of Agus Muliawan broadcast on 25 November 2000, NHK Special – East Timor: Records of the Dark September.

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
Balibó, Bobonaro	Some time in September, Halilintar reportedly killed a clandestine member, Francisco Nafan, at the Badut Mean River in Batugade Village.[1102] At midnight on 6 September, the Firmi militia group, led by commander M205, took out eight prisoners from the residence inside Balibó's old fortress, which was the militia's headquarters and detention centre. The eight were not seen again. The victims were Aleixo Paicheco, Francisco Maya, Patricio dos Santos, Cornelis Calouz, Gabriel dos Santos, Carlos de Carvalho, Benjamin Lucas and Francisco Paicheco.[1103] On 7 September, a TNI member, Francisco dos Santos Laku, reportedly ordered Armindo dos Santos, Mário de Carvalho and other TNI members to kill Celestino Fernando at a checkpoint on the road outside the aldeia of Berame, Balibó Village. Celestino Fernando was then reportedly taken to a nearby dry riverbed and stabbed to death by Armindo dos Santos and Mário de Carvalho.[1104] Firmi militia allegedly abducted three pro-independence activists, including Jorgé Mau Loe and Elias Pires, from their homes in Leo Lima Village on or about 10 September. The three were held at the house of the Firmi commander, João Oliveira, for one night and at the house of Marcos Leo Soro for four nights. On 15 September they were transferred to Batugade by Firmi members, including the Firmi deputy commander, Joaquim Maia. At a clearing beside the road to Atambua Jorgé Mau Loe and Elias Pires were allegedly stabbed to death by Firmi members including Francisco Pedro (Geger), while the third man escaped.[1105]
Bobonaro, Bobonaro	On 5 September, Halilintar reportedly killed João Morais in Oe-Leu Village.[1106] On 10 September, militia and TNI members abducted Lucinda Saldanha in Lourba Village and TNI member Paulino de Jesus allegedly stabbed her in the back, killing her.[1107] A group of TNI members including Paulino de Jesus, also allegedly killed two supporters of independence, Egas Cardoso and his wife Aliança de Jesus, in Lourba Leten, Lourba Village on 16 September.[1108] Halilintar and Dadurus Merah Putih also allegedly killed Samuel Guterres, Marcelina de Jesus and Antonio Barreto in Lourba Leten on 22 September for their connection with Falintil.[1109]
	In the village of Ai-Assa, Afonso Pereira and Armindo Guterres were reportedly killed on 14 September by a group of militia under the command of a man known as M217.[1110] On 14 September, a group of Hametin Merah Putih members, including M219, M221 and M223, reportedly killed Martina Maia.[1111] On 20 September, a group of Hametin Merah Putih members, including M225 and M221, reportedly abducted Luis Maia in Tebabui Village, took him to Carabau and killed him there.[1112] In the village of Maliubu a group of TNI members and Halilintar militia reportedly killed Henrique de Araújo in front of his home in Raimatete on 16 September.[1113] In the village of Cota Bo'ot, Florindo Cardoso Gomes from Dili was reportedly shot dead on 16 September in a location known as Hauba in Cota Bo'ot, by TNI or members believed to be attached to the SGI.[1114] Manuel Xavier was reportedly killed by a militia group referred to as Koboi 55, possibly another name for Harimau 55, on 22 September.[1115] José Godinho was detained by members of the Bobonaro Sub-district military command and Hametin Merah Putih and was reportedly shot to death by a member of the Bobonaro Sub-district military command on 22 September.[1116]

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
Cailaco, Bobonaro	In September, two brothers, Armando and Quintilião, went to Meligo Village to look for food and were reportedly detained by the village head. They were not seen alive again.[1117] On 21 September, Halilintar members reportedly killed Daniel Leal in Airae, Meligo Village, because his son gave support to Falintil.[1118]
Lolotoe, Bobonaro	On 8 September, members of Kaer Metin Merah Putih led by their commander, José Cardoso Ferreira (Mouzinho), killed Mariana da Costa and Carlito Freitas in Sibi, Opa Village.[1119] On 16 September, members of Kaer Metin Merah Putih led by José Cardoso Ferreira killed Augusto Noronha and Antonio Franca in Raimea, Opa Village.[1120]
Maliana, Bobonaro	On 2 September, TNI soldiers and Dadurus Merah Putih members surrounded the office of youth group Juventude Lorico Assuwain (JLA). Dadurus Merah Putih members started throwing stones at the building. When JLA members threw stones back onto the road, the TNI soldiers opened fire into the group of JLA members. Mateus de Conceição was shot by Sergeant M227 [East Timorese] twice, and Silvano Mali Talo was also shot. Mateus was taken to the house of a friend and Silvano was taken into the office. Darah Merah Putih members then set fire to the office in which Silvano was located. Mateus died later the same day and the burnt remains of Silvano were found in October in the destroyed JLA office.[1121] On 7 September, a group of Halilintar members, including M228, M229 and M230, reportedly killed Ermino Xavier Viana, Venancio César Mouzinho, Leoneto Gusmão Pereira and Martino de Fatima at the Mesak River in Odamau Village.[1122] On or about the same day, Halilintar members including João Maia* and Augusto Asameta Tavares went to Tapo Memo and there João Maia, assisted by Augusto, found Paulino hiding in the ceiling and stabbed him to death with a spear.[1123] Halilintar was also reportedly responsible for the murder of Mário dos Santos in Nunura some time in September.[1124] On 7 September, Dadurus Merah Putih killed at least two, possibly three, people in Mugis, Odamau Village. In one incident Dadurus Merah Putih reportedly killed Abilio Soares and one other man who refused to go to West Timor.[1125] In another case Dadurus Merah Putih reportedly killed Faustino Martins Mota.[1126] On or about 9 September, a group of about 20 men including Sergeant Frederico Pires, Corporal Romeu da Silva of Kodim 1636 and Dadurus Merah Putih member Batista de Sousa went to Genuhaan, Odamau Village. There they injured a CNRT member Avelino Tilman, and an independence supporter, Vitor dos Santos. Avelino Tilman died of his injuries around 10 September. Around 14 September, Baptista de Sousa of Dadurus Merah Putih came to a house where Vitor dos Santos was located and after ordering the people out of the house, he allegedly entered it and cut the throat of Vitor dos Santos with a machete.[1127] On or about 8 September, Dadurus Merah Putih also reportedly killed Tito Franca Barros from Lesu, Memo village, at Tunubibi.[1128]

* Perhaps João Maia. Halilintar militia João Maia is also implicated in the murder case of Santara Tavares [see HRVD Statement 1164].

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
	On 13 September, Dadurus Merah Putih militia killed two people who had escaped from the police station compound. They had returned with their families to Rokon, the aldeia in Holsa where they lived. At a meeting on 13 September in Holsa attended by TNI Sergeant Frederico Pires, the Dadurus Merah Putih militia members, João Coli, Baptista de Sousa and others agreed to kill Francisco Terezão and Lemos Guterres. The militia members stabbed them to death.[1129] On 21 or 22 September, a group of Halilintar members under the command of M295 reportedly killed two Falintil supporters, Manuel Moniz and Casimiro Viana, in Beremau.[1130] On an undetermined date at the end of September Manuel Gonsales Bere (sic), a member of Dadurus Merah Putih, stabbed to death João Gonçalves from Lahomea Village at the Nunura bridge in Maliana Sub-district. The victim was accused of being pro-independence and a Falintil supporter and had been caught in Haikesak, West Timor.[1131]
Fatumean, Covalima	On 30 August, the Laksaur militia group in Fatumean began looking for three known supporters of independence, Raimundo de Oliveira, Martinho do Rego and Abel Pereira. The three – two of them with their wives – fled to Fohoren Sub-district, but were all captured and taken back to the militia headquarters at the Koramil in Beluluik Leten (Fatumean). On 4 September, the three were allegedly killed by Henrikus Mali and two other Laksaur members at the militia headquarters.[1132] After the announcement of the result of the ballot, the Fatumean Laksaur militia group under the command of Henrikus Mali started registering villagers to be taken to West Timor. About 5 September, an independence supporter from the aldeia of Manekiik in Beluluik Leten Village, Agapito Amaral, went to see a Laksaur platoon commander in Fatumean, Yakobus Bere, with a machete in his hand because he did not want his family to be taken to West Timor. He was allegedly shot in the stomach by Yakobus Bere and later his throat was allegedly cut by a militia member on Yakobus Bere's orders. Agapito Amaral's mother, Rosalina Cardoso Belak, was also allegedly killed because she went to the militia post and shouted insults at the militia for killing her son.[1133] On 8 September, a TNI soldier, Simão Nahak, allegedly ordered other TNI soldiers and militia to kill clandestine member Suri Atok and his adopted son José Ramos in Dato Rua Village (Fohoren).[1134]
Zumalai, Covalima	Mahidi militia reportedly attacked a group of some 10 people seeking contact with Falintil and killed Daniel Cardoso, Albru Amaral and Francisco Ribeiro.[1135] On 10 September Luis da Conceição was reportedly killed in Zulo Village by a member of the paramilitary group, Gadapaksi.* In Fatuletu two Mahidi militia members took away a clandestine member, Mateus Mota, from his home. He was not seen again.[1136]
Suai, Covalima	About 6 September, Albino Nahak was allegedly taken away by two members of the Laksaur militia group, Baltazar Moruk and Damião da Costa Nunes. His body was later found in a place called Legore.†

* HRVD Statement 5207. Gadapaksi here perhaps means any militia member.

† Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Damião da Costa Nunes, Case No. 1/2003, paragraphs 21-25. The indictment identifies Legore as a village.

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
	About 7 September, Domingos Bau Koli (Domingos Andrade) from Kamenasa Village was allegedly killed by Laksaur militia members led by Olivio Tatoo Bau.[1137] On 8 September, Olivio Tatoo Bau allegedly killed Simplicio Doutel Sarmento who was heading to West Timor by stabbing him at a checkpoint in Salele.[1138] On 9 September, TNI member Lieutenant Sugito, commander of the Suai Sub-district military command post, and some Laksaur militia members arrested a group of five supporters of independence in Suai. Lieutenant Sugito and Laksaur militia operations commander, Alipio Gusmão, allegedly decided that the five were to be killed. Three of the five were allegedly shot by Laksaur militia member Americo Mali, and their throats were allegedly cut by militia member Saulus. Paulus Ximenes and Johanes Talu died as a result of this attack, but the third man survived. The remaining two were let go because they were related to Eurico Guterres, the Aitarak commander.[1139] On or about 7 September, Alfredo Nahak, a clandestine member, was arrested at a militia checkpoint in Suai under the control of Olivio Tatoo Bau and taken to the Kodim. His family found his remains in Fatukuan in November.[1140] On 8 September, Olivio Tatoo Bau and Americo Mali, while overseeing a checkpoint, discovered Manuel Noronha and dragged him out of the truck in which he was travelling. Some time after his killing Manuel Noronha's family recovered his remains.[1141] Elizario Martins and Mateus Amaral from Kiar Village (Maucatar) went to the Suai district military command post after being ordered to assemble there before being taken to West Timor. Because they did not want to be taken to West Timor, they escaped from the district command post. They were soon captured. Allegedly on the orders of Lieutenant Sugito and Olivio Moruk, the Lakusar commander, they were taken into the forest and killed.[1142] On 26 September, members of the Laksaur militia under the command of Egidio Manek, including Silvestre Atai, allegedly attacked a place in the Wesei Forest where villagers were hiding and killed Domingos Barros. Silvestre Atai allegedly beheaded Domingos Barros.[1143] Two youths, known as Mário and Domingos, were reportedly killed at the Mahidi headquarters in Beco, Suai Town on 5 September.[1144] Two persons known as José and Quintinho were killed at the Telkom, Suai Town, on 5 September.[1145] Felix Mali, a leader of the clandestine group Korenti Mate Fatin, in Debos (Suai Town) was killed by Joanico Gusmão on 5 September.[1146] A woman known as Veronica was killed in Matai on 9 September.[1147] A man known as Paul was killed at the Suai Koromil (1635-01) on 9 September[1148] Manuel Mali was killed in Kamanasa on 10 September.[1149] Manuel Amaral Tilman was killed in Debos on 11 September.[1150] Luis Amaral was killed in Debos on 13 September.[1151] Terezinha Bete was killed in Kamanasa on 24 September.[1152] A man known as Lorenço was killed in Debos on 4 October[1153] A man known as Alcino was killed in Feras on an undetermined date.[1154] The Commission also received information on the disappearances of Ilizardo Martins of Debos,[1155] Carlito Barros of Lakorak,[1156] Moises Barros of Kamanasa,[1157] Paulus Berbesin,[1158] Felix Amaral and Marçal Amaral Corte Real of Debos,11[59] and José Soares of Wedare.[1160] Most of them disappeared in September.

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
Tilomar, Covalima	On 15 September at the Sub-district military command post in Salele, Egidio Manek allegedly ordered about 150 Laksaur militia members, who had returned from West Timor, to attack the neighborhoods of Kulit and Aidere in Suai Town. They were to arrest all the villagers and to kill those who tried to escape. In the attack on Aidere, Carlos Yosep and Patricio de Jesus Ximenes were killed.[1161] On 25 September, members of the Laksaur militia group including Simão Nahak (TNI), Illidio Gusmão, Marcel Mendonça and Yosep Leki attacked the Wea Forest where villagers from Nikir were hiding, and in the attack Titus Mali, Damião Ximenes and Januario Maia were killed.[1162] In a quite similar pattern, on or about 26 September, members of the Laksaur militia group including Illidio Gusmão, Noberto Ximenes and Yosep Leki, attacked a group of villagers from Wetabe who were hiding in Mudasikun Forest, and in the attack Paulino Cardoso was killed.[1163]
Maucatar, Covalima	On or about 7 September, José dos Reis, who refused to be taken to West Timor, was allegedly killed by Damião da Costa Nunes and the TNI member, Simão Nahak, on the road not far from Matai Village in Maucatar.* On or about 9 September, in two separate incidents, Paulus Amaral and Mário Martins, both villagers from Loho Rai, Matai, were taken away by TNI and Laksaur militia members, including Americo Sefan, Olivio Tatoo Bau, Henrikus Nahak and Paulus Berbosi. The bodies of the two were later found floating in the river in Loho Rai.[1164] The same militia group continued to be active in October. Three persons from Lookeu village, Frederico Barros, Lorenzo Gusmão and Nazario Guterres were allegedly killed by members of the group.[1165]
Fatululik, Covalima	About 19 September, the TNI member, Simão Nahak, took away an independence supporter, José Pereira Coli, from the Alastehen militia post. Some time in January 2000 the villagers found his remains and buried them.[1166] During October, two persons known only as Joni and Anis were taken away from Wemer, Fatuloro Village, Fatululik Sub-district. They were reportedly taken to Atambua, West Timor by members of the Army Stategic Command (Kostrad) and then were killed.[1167]
West Dili, Dili	On 1 September, Guido Alves Correia, a CNRT member from Mascarenhas, Dili, was allegedly killed by members of the Aitarak militia group led by Aitarak's Company C commander Beny Ludji.[1168] On 7 September, Rui Abel was killed in Dare.[1169] On 13 September, about 20 members of the Naga Merah militia group and TNI arrested Afonso Gonçalves and shot and killed him in Bairro Pite because they could not find his brother whom they were looking for. Around 14 September, Francisco Besi Cano was beheaded at the Aitarak post in Kampung Alor, Dili. The Fatuhada village head, Mário Aitade, was allegedly present at the scene.[1170] Armando Barros, an estafeta with Falintil, fled from Aileu to Colmera in Dili where he is said to have been killed.[1171]

* Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Damião da Costa Nunes, Case No. 1/2003, paragraphs 26-31; HRVD Statement 7385. The indictment says that José dos Reis was taken from a house in Mota Air [sic] village and killed enroute to Maucatar Village. Matai is a village in Maucatar Sub-district.

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
	Thomás Americo from Vila Verde, well known as a boxer who had competed internationally for Indonesia, was taken in a Kijang jeep owned by the former village chief of Hera to the ACAIT building on 7 September and was driven away by members of the Aitarak militia group led by a man named M259. Américo has not been seen again.[1172] Carlos Manuel da Silva was taken away from the Polda headquarters around 10 September and was not seen again.[1173] On 12 September, Abilio Paicheco was arrested, taken first to the Aitarak headquarters at Hotel Tropical, and then to the Aitarak post in Surik Mas. From there he was taken toward West Timor. On the way to West Timor, near the Loes River at the village of Guico, Maubara sub-district, he was reportedly taken out of the vehicle and handed over to the Besih Merah Putih militia. He is believed to have been killed after that.[1174]
East Dili, Dili	On 31 August in Hera, a CNRT member, Mantus de Araújo and Martinho Vidal, a member of the human rights group, Kontras, were arrested and taken to the house of Mateus de Carvalho, the commander of Company D of the Aitarak militia. Mateus de Carvalho allegedly told his men to "go and do your job". The two were then taken to the militia post across the road and there they were allegedly stabbed and died of their injuries.[1175] On 1 September, Marcelino Fausto de Oliveira was reportedly assaulted and burned with petrol by members of the Aitarak militia group in the presence of Brimob and TNI members. His family found his body at the hospital in Toko Baru and buried him in Matadouro.[1176] On the same day João Xavier Fernandes, was reportedly shot to death by TNI members and his body was buried at the front of his house.[1177] José Barbosa died after he was hit by a bullet fired from a Kijang jeep driven by the Aitarak militia members near the Chinese cemetery in Taibessi.[1178] José Pinheiro was reportedly killed by a member of the Aitarak militia group and a policeman near the Gedung Negara which had been the Governor's residence in Portuguese times.[1179] On 4 September, Marcelo Agosto was shot to death by members of the Besi Merah Putih and the Aitarak militia groups in Masaur Debu, Becora.[1180] Around 4 September, Luciano Sequira was shot to death by members of the Aitarak militia group in Camea.[1181] On 6 September, in Hera, Domingos Nunu Alves, accused of assisting Falintil, was allegedly shot dead by a TNI soldier, Antonio Pinto.[1182]
Metinaro, Dili	Antonio Fernandes was arrested around 5 September in Metinaro, taken to the police station, and was later reportedly killed.[1183] On 7 September, Antonio Saldanha Fernandes, the principal of the primary school in Metinaro and also an active CNRT member, was shot dead by a TNI soldier, José Soares, at the Koramil. The Koramil commander, Lieutenant Untung, was present at the Koramil at the time.[1184]
Atsabe, Ermera	On 31 August, in Lasaun Village, members of Team Pancasila acting on the orders of TNI soldiers arrested Manuel de Oliveira, a UNAMET staff member at the Lasaun polling station. The group of militia members, including Agustino da Costa, severely beat Manuel de Oliveira. Agustino da Costa is reported to have shot him dead.[1185] Also in Lasaun in mid-September, a supporter of independence, Domingos Remkulit, was reportedly shot dead by a militia member.[1186]

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
Hatolia, Ermera	In Hatolia, violence erupted immediately after the ballot. On 31 August in Manusea Village, the commander of the Naga Merah militia group, M265, allegedly stabbed Marcelo Soares to death.[1187] M265 also allegedly arrested José Martins in September. José Martins was taken to Santa Cruz, Hatolia, where he was reportedly killed.[1188]
Railaco, Ermera	The Darah Merah commander, M266, and the Naga Merah commander, M265, were also responsible for the death of a civil servant of the Ermera District government, Agustinho Soares dos Reis, on 9 September in Bugasa Atas, Gleno.[1189] Members of the Darah Merah militia group, including Jakel and Abrão Martins, killed a youth, Moises Soares, at Riamori, (Letefoho) in September.[1190] The Darah Merah commander, M266, and militia member, M269, are alleged to have been responsible for the death of a man named Ameu in September in Railaco Kraik Village.[1191]
Lospalos, Lautém	In the village of Cacaven, in the west of Lautém, Mateus Nunes was reportedly killed at the TNI post about 9 September. His throat was reportedly cut and his body was thrown into a well.[1192] In village of Raça to the north, Joaquim Ovimarais,[1193] Antonio Oliveira,[1194] Marito Bernandino, Paul and Serafim[1195] were reportedly killed between 10 and 13 September. Statements allege that TNI members stationed at Mauloho, Raça village, were involved in these killings. In the village of Fuiloro, where Battalion 745 was stationed, Martinho Branco, Marcelio Jeronimo, Julião de Azis and Helder de Azis were captured while in hiding and were taken to Poihoro, Fuiloro and allegedly killed about 13 September.[1196] Aleixo Oliveira was allegedly killed by a soldier of Battalion 745 behind the 745 Battalion's base on 11 September.* In addition to this list, from 8–10 September, soldiers of Battalion 745 allegedly killed Antonio da Costa, Ambrosio Bernadino Alves, Julio de Jesus, Florencio Monteiro and Florentino Monteiro.[1197] A number of supporters of independence from Fuiloro were taken to the Kodim headquarters where they were executed or disappeared. The victims included Afonso dos Santos,[1198] Noberto da Luz Nato, João, Sikito, Olantino,[1199] Serpa Pinto, Jaime, Marito[1200] and Francisco dos Santos[1201]. It is alleged that some were thrown into a well in Sawarika, Fuiloro.[1202]
Moro, Lautém	In Moro Sub-district, killings were reported in the villages of Parlamento, Lautém and Com along the north coast. On 20 September, TNI soldiers, allegedly of Battalion 745, arrested Agusto Soares and João Gomes and tortured them to death at the beach in Parlamento. The victims had come down to the beach to see if they could go to West Timor.[1203] The bodies of the two men and a third victim, Amilcar Barros, were allegedly burned behind the Dolog, a rice warehouse, in the town of Lautém.[1204]

* General Prosecutor of Timor-Leste, Indictment against Major. Jacob Djoko Sarosa and Lieutenant Camilo dos Santos, Case No. 2002/10, paragraphs 35-40; General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Joni Marques, et. al., Case No. 2000/9, paragraphs 26-28. The decision of the Special Panel for Serious Crimes, however, states that the cause of the death of Aleixo Oliveira cannot be determined with existing evidence and that therefore the accused for the killing of the victim was not guilty [see Special Panel for Serious Crimes, Judgement, 11 December 2001].

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
	On 21 September, a group of men were looking for food in a coconut grove in the aldeia of Ira-Ara, Parlamento Village, encountered Tim Alfa militia members, including Joni Marques, Team Alfa* Commander and a member of TNI special forces command (Kopassus), and Paulo da Costa. Members of the militia group fired at them, and then Joni Marques allegedly shot Afredo Araújo dead. Paulo da Costa allegedly shot Calisto Rodrigues to death.[1205] In Com, João Viela left a cave at Luaira, where he and his family were hiding, to look for water but did not return. He was later found dead. His wife heard that he was shot, although it is not known who shot him.[1206] Benedito Marques Cabral from Moro was allegedly killed by a group of Team Alfa members, including José Valente, when he came down from the mountains to look for food.[1207]
Bazartete, Liquiçá	In the village of Metagou on 3 September, a group of TNI soldiers and BMP members arrested a number of residents including Jacinto dos Santos, Pedro Alves and Francisco da Silva because they were suspected of being CNRT supporters. The following day the three were taken behind the school where other villagers had been ordered to dig a grave. The three were executed one by one by militia members, including Anastacio Martins and Domingos Gonçalves (Domingos Liman Sanak). The villagers were ordered to bury them immediately after the executions.[1208] On 5 September, a group of BMP militia members, again including Anastacio Martins and Domingos Gonçalves, went to a location known as Muka Bera and burned houses there. They returned to the village on 7 September and allegedly killed three supporters of independence: Paulo Gonçalves, Guilhermo Gonçalves and Clementino Gonçalves.†
Maubara, Liquiçá	Bruno Cardoso was reportedly taken to the BMP post at Aliatu, Lubulogor, Guguleur Village on 6 September and killed.[1209]
Manatuto, Manatuto	Armando da Cunha from Maabat Village was reportedly abducted on 5 September and after some days he was reportedly shot to death by a TNI soldier.[1210] On 8 September, Filipe Soares was taken away from the old police station (Polres lama) where he had taken refuge with many others, and he was reportedly shot dead by Mahadomi militia leader M274.[1211] On 11 September, Francisco Gusmão was shot to death by a TNI soldier in Manatuto when he was looking for food with some 20 others.[1212] On an undetermined date, Atai da Costa was reportedly taken to the beach in Sau Village and was killed there by Mahadomi militia leaders, M275 and M276[1213] On 11 September, TNI and Mahadomi members attacked more than 100 civilians from Maabat Village who were hiding in the mountains around Kakurut Liden. In the attack Antonio Pinto was shot to death. On 13 September, the CNRT coordinator in Sau Village, Nazario Lino Pereira Belo, was captured at the Manatuto bridge by Mahadomi militia members and taken to the militia post in Manatuto where he was allegedly stabbed to death by them. On 16 September, clandestine activist Sebastião da Costa was killed at the beach in Manatuto after being detained at the TNI compound.[1214]

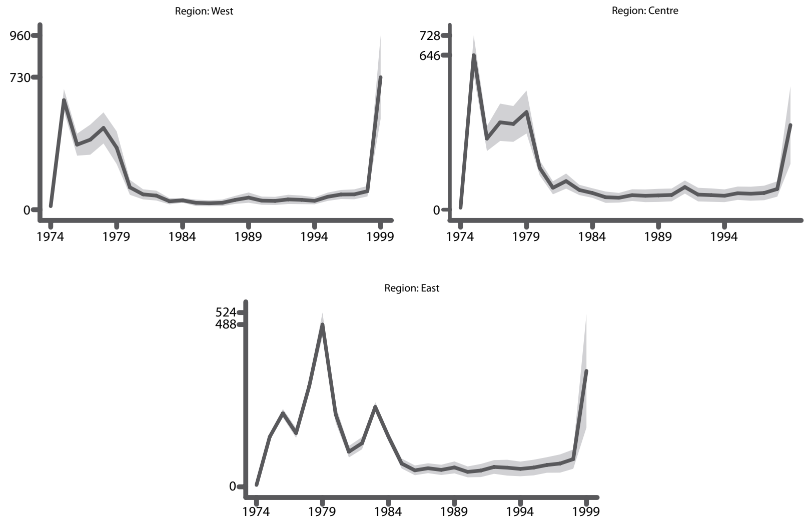
* Team Alfa militia was also sometimes referred to as Jati Merah Putih militia.

† HRVD Statements 0919; 0957 refer to a location called Buku Merah, while General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Anastacio Martins and Domingos Gonçalves, Case No. 11/2001, refers to a location called Muka Bera in paragraphs 34-45.

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
Laclo, Manatuto	On 7 September, Mahadomi members, while apparently with TNI soldiers patrolling in Laclo, reportedly killed Jacinto Correia, Gilberto Madai, Domingos Carceres and André Carceres.[1215] In Wehau, Aniceto Santos was reportedly arrested and shot to death by a police officer[1216] and Aleixo da Cunha was stabbed to death.[1217]
Soibada, Manatuto	Mauleki was reportedly shot in the leg and then was stabbed to death with a knife by TNI soldiers when he was working in the fields.[1218]
Same, Manufahi	About 3 September, on the orders of ABLAI militia leader Guilhermino Marçal, militia members arrested Bendito Moniz at his home in Letefoho Village,* took him to the ABLAI headquarters in Same and killed him.[1219] On 9 September, Lorenço Tilman was killed allegedly by João Sarmento and Benjamin Sarmento because he refused to board a truck to be transported to West Timor.[1220] On 9 September, João da Silva, together with some other villagers from Fahiluhan, Hola Rua, came down from the mountains to gather food and encountered a truck carrying by Kopassus members and ABLAI members at Fatu Maromak, Hola Rua. They were shot at and João da Silva was hit but did not immediately die. On the orders of one of Kopassus members in the truck, a militia member, Clementino Alves, stabbed João da Silva to death.[1221] On 12 September, when members of the ABLAI militia group burned down houses in Ailule, Letefoho, a bedridden villager, Lorenço da Costa, was not able to leave his house and died in the fire.[1222] Lorenço da Costa reportedly shouted to take him out but to no avail.[1223] On 16 September, a group of ABLAI militia members allegedly killed a supporter of independence, Marcelino Verdial, in front of his eight-year-old daughter.[1224] On 24 September four persons were killed by a group of TNI and ABLAI members, led by TNI Lieutenant Sumino, in Betano Village.[1225] The group was returning to Betano from Atambua to deport more people to West Timor and all these killings occured on their way back to Betano. The four were apparently targeted by the group but were not necessarily known pro-independence activists. Florindo Pereira Soares, a mentally ill man, was spotted, arrested and stabbed to death.[1226] Marten Gaspar Soares was spotted, chased and shot in the chest by Lieutenant Sumino himself. Remezio da Costa was stopped and shot from behind while he was still being questioned.[1227] Finally Egas Monis Tilman was spotted, chased, stabbed and shot.
Betano, Manufahi	Some time in September a group of ABLAI members led by the Babinsa of Betano, Mohammad Ruri, and Kopassus member, Gualter Vidigal, burned down houses in Betano Village. Guilhermino Tilman was able to crawl outside although he suffered from paralysis in both legs. He was badly burned, however, and three days later he died.[1228]

* According to Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Nazario Vital dos Santos Corte Real, et al.: "Bendito Moniz went to his house in Letefo [sic] aldeia, Hola Rua village to take his personal belongings" [Case No. 13/2004, paragraph 52]. Letefoho and Hola Rua are two different villages in Same Sub-district.

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
Oesilo, Oecussi	After the annoucement of the result of the ballot, TNI and the militia group in Passabe planned a large-scale attack on perceived pro-independence strongholds in Oesilo Sub-district.[1229] On 7 September, at a meeting held at the district military command headquarters, orders were given to the militia group to attack the villages around Passabe and Oesilo. Simão Lopes, the overall commander of the Sakunar militia group, was to lead one group to attack the villages around Passabe. Laurentino Soares (Moko) was to lead another attack on the villages around Oesilo. The group led by Simão Lopes walked to Nibin in the village of Usitakeno, and there they allegedly killed the pro-independence village chief, Armando Sani.[1230] A sub-group of militia members, led by Quelo Mauno, allegedly killed Domingos Kolo in the aldeia of Nitas, Usitakeno Village.* The militia group also set fire to houses and killed livestock belonging to the villagers. The group then attacked Quibiselo, Bobo Manat, and in the attack Victor Punef, Yacobus Siki, Yosep Noni Maknaun, Augustino Ulan, Zacharias Ena, Mikhael Sasi, Yacobus Oki and José Siki were killed. According to one statement, Quibiselo was attacked from four directions, Pure, Noel Ekat, Imbate (West Timor) and Passabe.[1231] After destroying the aldeia of Quibiselo, the group led by Simão Lopes proceeded to Tumin, Bobo Manat. Meanwhile the group led by Laurentino Soares also attacked Tumin, burning houses and killing livestock. According to a statement, Tumin was attacked from three directions.[1232] In the attack on Tumin, Marcos Sufa Afoan, Filippus Tualaka, Laurentino Ulan Cono, Augustino Neno, Naub Lape, Alberto Afoan, Nenu Catu, Ciprianus Anin and Francisco Elu were killed. In these attacks on the three villages around 18 villagers were killed. A massacre of about 47 young men from these villages occurred on 10 September at a place in the sub-district of Passabe. Many other killings in Oesilo were reported. The victims included four brothers – Bonat Afoan, Paul Ase, Kusi One and Punef Bonat[1233] – Francisco Kefi,[1234] Firmino Nahak,[1235] Sufa Tabun[1236], Neno Katu[1237], Fancisco Sani, Francisco Sanan and Cipriano Kono.[1238] Paulo Sequeira, the aldeia head of Pune, Usi Tasai Village, and a CNRT member and another CNRT supporter in the village, Stanislau Bala, were allegedly killed by a group of TNI soldiers including Jorgé Ulan, João Gomes and Blasus Manek on 11 September.[1239]
Passabe, Oecussi	The Sakunar militia group in Naetuna, Abani Village, including Umbertus Ena (aka Mala Cloe), burned houses in Nakome on or about 9 September. One or two days later the same militia group came back to Nakome and ordered the villagers to gather in front of a house that was not burnt. The militia members surrounded the villagers so that no one could escape and then began stoning them. The militia members targeted three suspected supporters of independence: Ernesto Lafu, Serafim Tolo and Vicente Quelo (Mala Quelo). They repeatedly struck the three with machetes. Ernesto Lafu and Vicente Quelo died from their injuries.[1240]



* Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Quelo Mauno, Case No. 3/2003, paragraphs 10-22. According to paragraph 14: "Domingos Kolo and his family lived in the aldeia of Nitas, village of Nibin."

Sub-district, District	Summary of cases
Nitibe, Oecussi	On or about 16 September, a group of Sakunar militia members led by Laurentino Soares (Moko) attacked Usi Taco Village, burned many houses and reportedly killed Lazaro Bano, Celestino Cab and Seni Tui Anin.[1241] The same day in the village of Lela Ufe, Leonardo Anin and Antonio Beto were reportedly killed. Anin was a Hansip and was a CNRT activist with responsibility for intelligence. Beto was also a CNRT member.[1242] César Guterres was reportedly killed by members of the Kefamenanu Kodim (West Timor) in Bene Ufe Village in September.[1243] Sylvester Saco was reportedly killed in September in the village of Suni Ufe. Much later, on 20 October in Suni Ufe, Umberto Taek and Berta Bala were reportedly killed as they were suspected of being CNRT members.[1244]
Pante Makassar, Oecussi	Between 22–28 September, the following persons were reported killed in attacks by militia members or TNI soldiers: Maria Au,[1245] En Labi,[1246] Antonio Hunu,[1247] Oscar Francisco da Costa,[1248] João Eko, Fagundo Bano, Leovigildo Bano,[1249] Ambrosio Bobo,[1250] Angelo Caet,[1251] Tuin Cab,[1252] Ernesto Cab[1253] and Tolo Cusi.[1254] Luis Cofitalan and Domingos Vaz were reported killed in Lifau Village in October, [1255] and Neon Colo, Puin Tanessi and Neon Sufa in the rice fields of Letefoho, Lifau Village.[1256] Besides the mass executions in and around the aldeia of Maquelab, Taiboco Village, on 20 October, as referred to above, another incident occurred on 22 October, the same day that Interfet troops reached Oecussi. A small group of about 12 Sakunar militia members led by M292 came to the aldeia of Nus Lao, Bobocasae Village and captured Francisco Anton, Frimino Anton and Marcelino Cono. The militia group reportedly took the three to Naimeco Village and killed them there.[1257]
Lacluta, Viqueque	On 10 or 11 September, Jeronimo de Carvalho was reportedly killed by a man called Antonio or Amtuno in Dilor Village (Lacluta). The perpetrator, disguised as a madman, approached the victim and hit his head with a wooden stick. He then ran into the forest.[1258] He reportedly confessed in a later investigation by the pro-independence group that he had received money from militia and TNI members to carry out the killing.[1259] On 26 September, Sirilio Bosco, a CNRT member, was reportedly beaten to death. He and other four persons were going to meet a Falintil commander in Kadoras and were ambushed by a group of five men.[1260] The Commission heard of killings of independence supporters in Dilor Village (Lacluta) on 10 or 11 September and again on 26 September.[1261]
Ossu, Viqueque	On 11 September, independence supporter Manuel Carvalho was reportedly shot to death by members of the Naga Merah militia group in Builale Village.[1262]

Findings

888. Based on the quantitative analysis of data gathered through its statement-taking process and its graveyard census, the Commission has found that approximately 18,600 East Timorese non-combatants (with a margin of error of +/- 1,000) were killed or disappeared during the period of the conflict.

Total documented killings in Timor-Leste

Source: Calculations from HRVD, RMS, and approximate GCD murder (by the Commission) calculation date: 21 April 2005

889. The Commission finds that the highest number of killings and disappearances of non-combatants occurred between 1975 and 1983, and in 1999. The overwhelming majority of all unlawful killings and enforced disappearances documented through the Commission's statement-taking process were committed by the Indonesian security forces, including its East Timorese auxiliaries: 57% were committed by the Indonesian military and police; nearly one third, 32%, were committed by East Timorese auxiliaries under the control of the Indonesian security forces.*

890. The Commission finds that the Resistance also committed unlawful killings and disappearances during the period of the conflict. Out of all killings and disappearances reported to the Commission through its statement-taking process, 29.6% were attributed to the members of the Resistance.

891. Large-scale disappearances took place in 1979–1980 in the Eastern and Central Regions, and 1983–1984 in the Eastern Region. Of the disappearances reported to the Commission, 70% were attributed to the Indonesian security forces and 27% to the East Timorese auxiliaries of the Indonesian military.

892. Although the Indonesian security forces were responsible for the overwhelming majority of fatal violations under its control, the Commission notes that East Timorese,

* Auxiliaries comprise "civil defence" groups (including Hansip, Ratih, Wanra, and Kamra), members of the local administration, paramilitary groups (such as Tonsus and the various "Teams" that were forerunners of the militia groups formed in 1998-99), and the militia groups themselves.

either acting alone or as members of the Indonesian security forces, were involved in committing more than one quarter of these crimes.

Internal conflict, 1974–1976

893. The Commission finds that a multitude of unfavourable factors conspired to generate uncontrolled violence during the period of internal conflict. They included:

- Portugal's tardiness in producing a broadly acceptable timetable for decolonisation.
- Indonesia's increasingly overt interference in the territory's affairs.
- The failure of all the international actors who might have restrained Indonesia to affirm unequivocally that a forcible Indonesian takeover of Portuguese Timor would be an unacceptable violation of the principle of the right to self-determination.
- The lack of political experience of the newly formed political parties, including their tolerance of violence.
- The formation and arming of militia affiliated with political parties.
- The abandonment by East Timorese and Portuguese members of the colonial army and police of political neutrality.
- The failure of the organs of law enforcement of the Portuguese Government to redress outbreaks of violence during the build-up of tension before 11 August 1975 and after this date.

894. The Commission notes that the few institutions in the territory that might have played a mediating role and promoted dialogue, including the Catholic Church, failed to do so. Instead they took sides and fanned the flames of conflict.

895. The Commission finds that deep-seated communal differences, often based on personalities and economic interests, heavily influenced the shape of politics in the months leading up to the internal armed conflict. As political parties fought each other for local dominance, through intimidation, violent rhetoric and actual violence, the climate was created for the killings and revenge killings that were a feature of the armed internal conflict of August–September 1975. While political life throughout the territory was disfigured in this way, the districts of Liquiçá, Ermera, Manatuto, Aileu and Manufahi were the most affected.

896. The Commission finds that Indonesia's actions from 1974 were a major contributor to the deterioration of an already volatile situation. These actions culminated in the incursions of September–November 1975 and the full-scale invasion of 7 December 1975 during which Indonesia exploited and exacerbated East Timorese divisions by mobilising anti-Fretilin forces to join its aggression against the territory. Executions of detainees, which had already become a feature of the conflict between August and October 1975, occurred on an unprecedented scale in December 1975-January 1976, as Fretilin executed detainees in response to the advance of Indonesian forces.

UDT

897. The Commission finds that:

1. UDT members and supporters carried out unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of civilians in Dili, Ainaro, Liquiçá, Ermera and other districts after it launched its armed movement on 11 August 1975. Most of the victims were Fretilin members and supporters. Some victims were innocent bystanders killed in place of a Fretilin member who managed to escape and people who had the misfortune to encounter a group of armed UDT supporters.
2. UDT members and supporters committed unlawful killings between August and October 1975, targeting suspected members of Fretilin in Liquiçá, Dili, Ermera, Manatuto, Manufahi, Bobonaro, Oecussi and other districts. This sharp increase in the number of fatal violations by UDT took place under the pressure of advances made by Fretilin.
3. UDT leaders, members and supporters killed persons identified as being affiliated with Fretilin in a variety of circumstances. In the immediate aftermath of the launching of the armed movement, Fretilin supporters were captured, killed, and often beheaded in Manufahi, Liquiçá and Ermera, sometimes by UDT mobs acting on the orders of their leaders. Prison guards killed individual detainees in UDT detention centres, sometimes, as in Palapaço (Dili), on their own initiative, and sometimes as in Aifu, Ermera, on the orders of party leaders. In late August and early September 1975, persons who had been detained in the days after UDT launched its armed movement were executed in Manufahi and Ermera as Fretilin forces advanced on these areas.
4. The victims of these unlawful killings by UDT were predominantly military-aged men with real or suspected association with Fretilin. However, the Commission also received reports of children among groups of executed detainees.
5. Methods of unlawful killing included:
    - Armed groups of UDT members shooting unarmed civilians in groups.
    - The execution of civilians using traditional weapons, such as machetes, spears, and knives.
    - The holding of ritual ceremonies before and after killing.
    - Beheadings, and display of the decapitated heads as trophies.
    - The severing of body parts, such as hands, and disembowelment.
    - The display of corpses in front of homes of Fretilin members.
    - The disposal of dead or fatally wounded bodies in gorges and rivers.
    - The execution of detainees in detention centres, and in isolated places in the countryside, including coffee plantations. Some detainees had their hands tied with wire at the time of execution. Others were brought out of detention centres in small groups and then executed.
    - Beating before execution.
    - Disappearance.

6. The Commission does not believe that the UDT Central Committee ordered the killing of civilians, including the execution of detainees. However, it contributed to a climate in which such killings were likely to occur by inciting its followers over the radio to arrest political opponents as part of a purge of "communists". However, the Commission learned that individual members of the UDT Central Committee played a direct role in inciting violence at district level. Other members of the UDT Central Committee would have been aware that UDT commanders, members and UDT forces were conducting unlawful killings, as is evident by the sporadic efforts of some of them to stop them occurring.

Fretilin

898. The Commission finds that:

7. Before UDT's armed action of 11 August, both Fretilin and UDT members and supporters conducted sporadic attacks on rival villages, in which civilians were killed. These attacks occurred with greatest regularity in the area of Laclubar (Manatuto), Turiscai (Manufahi), and Maubisse (Ainaro). The most serious of these attacks was a Fretilin assault on the village of Maulau (Maubisse, Ainaro) in which around 40 people, mainly UDT supporters, were killed.
8. Fretilin's response to UDT's armed action of 11 August was an armed "general insurrection", in which its members unlawfully killed leaders, members and supporters of UDT and other opposition parties. Between August and October 1975, Fretilin members and supporters carried out reprisal unlawful killings in numbers which surpassed the victims of the killings by UDT.
9. The victims of these unlawful killings by Fretilin were predominantly military-aged men with real or suspected association with UDT. To a lesser extent, in some parts of the country, leaders, members and supporters of Apodeti were also targeted.
10. Fretilin members and supporters conducted sporadic execution of detainees, both individuals and in groups, in Aileu and Liquiçá Districts, within a week of the armed action by UDT. Among those executed were surrendered combatants and civilians. There were instances, including in the districts of Liquiçá and Manufahi, where local Fretilin leaders halted the execution of detainees.
11. Fretilin leaders ordered the evacuation of detainees from Dili and other areas to Aileu in September, October, and December 1975. As Indonesian troops advanced, the security situation deteriorated further, leading to an atmosphere of uncontrolled fear and vicious resentment towards those regarded as actual or potential collaborators with the invaders. Hundreds of detainees were executed by Fretilin forces in Aileu, Maubisse (Ainaro) and Same (Manufahi) in December 1975-January 1976. The Commission believes that these executions, several of which were mass executions, resulted in a number of fatalities that was far higher than in the earlier period of the internal conflict.

12. Method of unlawful killings included:
    - Deadly assault as part of attacks against a community perceived to support the opposing party.
    - Beating prior to execution.
    - Shooting using Mauser, G-3, and other firearms.
    - Discarding of bodies by throwing them into burning house.
    - Lack of treatment for wounded detainees.
    - Beheading.
    - Tying to a flag-pole, lining-up, or being tied-up for execution.
    - Deadly assault using traditional weapons, such as machetes, spears, and knives.
    - Throwing grenades into enclosed spaces where detainees were being held.
13. Although the unlawful killings committed by Fretilin members and supporters were in retaliation for acts of violence perpetrated earlier by UDT, Fretilin leaders failed to control its forces in order to prevent excess fatal violations throughout the country.

ABRI/TNI

899. The Commission finds that:

14. Covert Indonesian intelligence operations, high-level contacts with leaders of the East Timorese political parties, and the military training of East Timorese in West Timor exacerbated the rising tensions between the political parties, and were probably decisive in UDT's decision to launch its armed action.
15. Indonesian covert military operations were directly responsible for unlawful killings of dozens of civilians in the districts of Bobonaro, Covalima, and Ermera in August–November 1975. The training given by Indonesian military personnel in West Timor to Apodeti and UDT members and the deployment of these "Partisans" with Indonesian troops in the incursions of August–November 1975 and during and after the full-scale invasion of 7 December 1975 aggravated the hostility between Fretilin and those parties, and thereby played a part in Fretilin killings of persons associated with UDT and Apodeti before and after the invasion.

ABRI, UDT and Apodeti

900. The Commission finds that:

16. ABRI used members of UDT, Apodeti, and other parties in a variety of roles during and after the invasion, including as auxiliaries, translators, informants and administrators. Members and supporters of UDT and Apodeti recruited and trained by the Indonesian military aided and abetted ABRI in the commission of unlawful killings and enforced disappearances during and after the invasion.

Indonesian Occupation 1975–1999

The Resistance

901. The Commission finds that:

17. The Resistance also committed unlawful killings and disappearances over the whole period between the Indonesian invasion and during the whole period of the conflict. During this period less than one-third, 29%, of all unlawful killings and disappearances reported to the Commission through its statement-taking process were committed by forces affiliated with the Resistance movement. Moreover, these violations were heavily concentrated in the early years of the conflict. While 49% (561/1,145) of documented killings and disappearances in 1975 were attributed to Fretilin/Falintil, its share of the total fell to 16.6% (563/3,398) in the period 1976-84 and kept on falling during the remaining years of the conflict, to 3.7% (18/488) of killings and disappearances in 1985-98 and to 0.6% (5/898) in 1999.

902. The Commission heard extensive testimony about the killing of non-combatants[1999] perpetrated by Fretilin and Falintil during the period February 1976-79. During this period leaders and members of both organisations were implicated in fatal violations in most districts across the territory. Senior Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders ordered many of the killings reported to the Commission, and in some instances themselves perpetrated them. Although some of those killed were civilians previously associated with UDT and Apodeti, who were collaborating with the Indonesians, most of those who were killed, disappeared or died of deprivation or other kinds of ill-treatment during this period were themselves members of Fretilin or Falintil or members of the civilian population living in Fretilin bases.

903. Between 1980 and 1999 not only was the scale of reported killings by Falintil far lower than in 1976-79; the pattern was also very different from in the earlier period. The victims tended not to be persons who were associated with the Resistance, but individuals who were working with the Indonesians (sometimes against their will) and the random casualties of Falintil attacks.

904. The Commission heard of a number of killings committed by Fretilin after February 1976 through to 1979 against persons who were associated with other parties, most of the victims known to the Commission being associated with UDT. The killings tended to occur in areas such as the districts of Ermera, Baucau, and Manatuto, where support for both UDT and Fretilin had been strong and the level of violence during the "civil war" had been particularly intense.

905. In some instances UDT members were killed by ordinary Fretilin members motivated by feelings of revenge. In other cases, such as the killing of at least nine people in Venilale (Baucau) between 1 and 12 February 1976, there is evidence of higher-level involvement. The Commission also received reports of the killing of former UDT members who were suspected of spying for the Indonesians and of persons who were executed because they had allegedly been in contact with UDT-affiliated relatives in the Indonesian-controlled areas.

906. The Commission finds that:

18. In 1976-77 around 60 people were executed or died in detention, as a result of conflicts within the Resistance. They included:
    - Aquiles Freitas, commander of the Bero-Quero Command in Quelicai (Baucau), and several of his chief associates, including Ponciano dos Santos, Antonio Freitas and João Teodoso de Lima, were executed at Lobito (Vemasse, Baucau) and in Baguia (Baguia, Baucau) in December 1976-January 1977.
    - Francisco Ruas Hornay and at least 14 of his followers, who were executed in Iliomar (Lautém) in November 1976.
    - The former Falintil Deputy Chief of Staff, José da Silva, and possibly 40 of his followers, who were executed or died in detention between October 1976 and August 1977 after being arrested in Ermera District in October 1976.
19. In the Fretilin internal conflict that erupted in 1977 several hundred followers and suspected followers of the Fretilin President, Francisco Xavier do Amaral, were executed or died as a result of torture and ill-treatment in detention. The purge was concentrated in Aileu and Manufahi in the North Central and South Central Sectors, and to a lesser extent in Quelicai in Baucau District and Uato Carbau and Uatolari in Viqueque District in the Central Eastern Sector and Covalima and Ermera in the South Frontier and North Frontier Sectors. Those targeted included members of the Fretilin Central Committee, senior military commanders and middle-level cadres of Fretilin and its affiliate organisations as well ordinary Fretilin members, Falintil troops and members of the civilian population living in the Fretilin bases.
20. Many of the victims of these purges died in horrific circumstances, including:
    - In public mass executions conducted with the utmost brutality.
    - As a result of severe deprivation in extremely primitive detention centres, including Renals (National Rehabilitation Centres), where the food, shelter, sanitation and medical treatment provided to prisoners were grossly inadequate.
    - As a result of severe torture in detention, involving such methods as burning with hot irons, repeated heavy beatings, hanging the victim from a tree and the cutting of the victim's body.

907. The Commission finds that:

21. Senior Fretilin leaders not only knew of and approved these practices, which generally occurred at or near places where the Fretilin Central Committee and the Sectoral and Zone administrations had their bases, but in many instances were themselves direct perpetrators.
22. In addition to the killings and deaths related to political conflict within Fretilin there were other circumstances in which Fretilin/Falintil committed these violations. Among the categories of victims reported to the Commission to have been executed or to have died of deprivation or other kinds of ill-treatment while in detention, were the following:

- Civilians who were suspected of planning to surrender, were in the process of surrendering, or who had actually surrendered.
- Local Fretilin or Falintil leaders or members who had encouraged the civilian population to surrender.
- People who broke away from the main population concentrations and were captured.
- Detainees killed as Indonesian forces closed in on the areas where they were detained.
- Villagers suspected of or actually belonging to "pro-integration" parties killed as Indonesian forces advanced on an area.
- Persons holding dissenting ideological views.
- People who after surrender were ordered by ABRI, Hansip or members of the civil administration to return to the mountains or forest to try to persuade people still holding out to surrender.
- Persons who rejoined the Resistance after previously surrendering or being captured by the Indonesians.
- The relatives of collaborators, as well as collaborators themselves.
- Persons blamed for failed Falintil attacks on Indonesian bases and successful Indonesian attacks on Fretilin and Falintil bases.
- People living in Fretilin bases who had been in contact with relatives or others in Indonesian-controlled areas.
- People living in the Resistance bases, under Indonesian control or in areas not fully under the control of either side who were found looking for food or going about their daily activities.

908. While acknowledging the intense pressure created by indiscriminate Indonesian offensives against their bases, particularly in the later years of the 1976-79 period, the Commission holds the Fretilin/Falintil leadership of the time responsible for creating an atmosphere of violence and ideologically-based intolerance which provided the preconditions in which this wide range of killings could occur. In addition the Commission finds that Fretilin/Falintil leaders and commanders were responsible for ordering or directly perpetrating many of these killings.

1980–1999

909. Between 1980 and 1999 there was a sharp drop in the number of killings attributed to Fretilin/Falintil. Because East Timorese society became so heavily militarised during this period, the status of many of the civilians who were killed by Fretilin/Falintil was often ambiguous. They included people who were forcibly put in harm's way, whether as Hansip, as persons forcibly recruited as TBOs (Tenaga Bantuan Operasi, operations assistants) or to take part in the various Operasi Kikis, persons required to perform night-guard duties or as unwilling recruits to the militia groups. The Commission believes that responsibility for deaths in these circumstances should rest primarily with those who put the victim in harm's way, namely the Indonesian security forces. In addition many of the victims of Falintil killings were Hansip, village chiefs and other members of the civil administration, holding positions that, unlike in most of Indonesia, had become highly militarised in occupied Timor-Leste.

910. Because the dividing line between combatants and non-combatants was often blurred and because it is not always clear from the available information that a particular victim was a specific target, it has not always been possible for the Commission on the basis of the information available to it to judge whether a violation has in fact occurred, and if it has, where responsibility for it lies.

911. The downward trend in unlawful killings by the Resistance, which was particularly marked during the final decade of the Indonesian occupation, is explained by several related developments. A new policy was adopted shifting the focus of the struggle to urban protest. Although Falintil remained alive and militarily capable, this policy shift gave greater prominence to public protests in the towns than to Falintil's previously favoured tactic of demonstrating that it was a force still be reckoned with through shows of force in the countryside. This trend was accelerated by the Indonesian decision in late 1988 to "open" the territory partially to outsiders. At the same time the decision to pursue the National Unity strategy and to build as broad as possible a base of support for the Resistance, including by winning over East Timorese who were collaborating with the Indonesians, probably also contributed to the decline in violence in these years. As a part of this strategy, in 1987 the armed Resistance, Falintil, was formally separated from Fretilin.

912. During the period 1980-98, Falintil killed civilians in the following circumstances:

- During attacks on military-controlled settlements in early 1980s, which were apparently intended to demonstrate to the population now under Indonesian control that Falintil had survived.
- During Indonesian military operations for which East Timorese had been recruited, usually forcibly.
- During attacks on villages in the mid-1980s, which were apparently in response to major Indonesian operations and intended to show that Falintil still retained a military capacity to launch such attacks; village guards and Hansip were particularly vulnerable to be killed during such incidents.
- During attacks launched at particular times, including anniversaries (such as Indonesian Independence Day and the anniversary of the founding of Falintil) and during national elections (in 1987 and 1997), when they could be expected to attract attention internationally and in Indonesia and Timor-Leste.

913. These killings occurred in the context of military operations and as noted above, the Commission often found it difficult to establish whether civilians killed in these circumstances were specifically targeted.

914. There were instances of targeted killings reported during this period, where, for example, Falintil killed civilians who had been ordered by ABRI/TNI to search for relatives in the forest on their own, when it assassinated members of Hansip and other collaborators and before and after the Popular Consultation in 1999. In several of these cases the Commission received credible information that the Falintil High Command did not institutionally condone these violations.

Indonesian security forces and its auxiliaries

915. The Commission finds that:

23. Members of the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries committed and condoned widespread and systematic extra-judicial executions and enforced disappearances during the period of the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste.
24. Of all unlawful killings and disappearances reported to the Commission through its statement-taking process, just over 70% (4,174/5,944) were attributed to the Indonesian military and police and East Timorese auxiliaries, acting alone or jointly.

Table 56: Estimated number of unlawful killings by Indonesian security forces and auxiliaries

Violations by:	Indonesian military, police & Timorese auxiliaries acting alone or jointly	Timorese auxiliaries acting alone	Indonesian military & police acting alone	Indonesian military and police acting together with Timorese auxiliaries
All violations	71,917	14,704	43,323	13,550
	84.40%	17.30%	50.90%	15.90%
Illegal killings	3,455	835	1,972	630
	67.60%	16.30%	38.60%	12.30%
Disappearances	719	105	494	120
	86.30%	12.60%	59.30%	14.40%

25. Indonesian security forces, acting without their East Timorese auxiliaries, were responsible for the majority of civilian killings during the period of the occupation, during the years of 1975, 1979 and 1983. These peaks coincide with periods of large-scale military operations, where thousands of people experienced detention, displacement and food shortages.
26. East Timorese auxiliaries acting without members of the Indonesian security forces were responsible for lesser number of civilian killings during the period of occupation, during the years of 1975, 1979, 1983. However, East Timorese auxiliaries acting without members of the Indonesian security forces were responsible a majority of civilian killings in 1999, during the time of the Popular Consultation. This shows a shift in the strategy of the Indonesian security forces who armed, trained and directed local militias to carry out unlawful killings and enforced disappearances on their behalf.
27. Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances by Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries took place in all 13 districts, with the highest number being recorded in the eastern districts.
28. Victims of unlawful killings and enforced disappearances were predominantly men of military age with a real or suspected association to groups resisting the occupation, including Fretilin/Falintil, clandestine networks, or other pro-independence groups. Women and children who were thought to be family members of those mentioned above were also victims of these fatal violations to a lesser degree. Typically, women and children were killed during massacres, when indiscriminate shooting and attacks led to large number of fatal casualties.

29. Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries used enforced disappearances as a strategy to control counter-insurgency activities, particularly in the eastern and central regions. The strategy was particularly effective in instilling fear in the general community, disrupting the lives of the families of the victim.

1975–1984

30. Indonesian forces were responsible for unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of civilians during the invasion of Timor-Leste. In Dili hundreds of civilians were executed, apparently in revenge for deaths of Indonesian soldiers. Most of these killings took place on 7-9 December 1975 in areas such as Colmera, Vila Verde, Matadouro, and along the Maloa River to Ailok Laran, where Fretilin forces actively resisted the invading forces. Dozens of ethnic Chinese, who lived around Colmera, were executed near the harbour, as were captured leaders and members of Fretilin and their relatives, including Isabel Barreto, the wife of Nicolau Lobato, the Fretilin Vice-President and RDTL Prime Minister.
31. The Commission received many reports of Indonesian forces killing civilians as they advanced into other parts of the territory. Sometimes those killed had been denounced as members of Fretilin, but many of the victims of these killings were randomly targeted members of the civilian population. Ordinary civilians were targeted in a variety of other circumstances: while looking for food or going about their daily activities, after encountering Indonesian security forces on operations, in retaliation for Falintil attacks, and on suspicion of working with or having knowledge about Fretilin/Falintil.
32. Throughout the early years of the occupation, but in particular between 1978 and 1979, ABRI/TNI commanders, troops and auxiliaries committed systematic and widespread unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of surrendered civilians and combatants.

916. In addition to the executions of individuals and small groups, the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries carried out a widespread and systematic campaign of killings and disappearances directed at surrendered and captured members of Fretilin and Falintil. The Commission finds that these killings and disappearances were carried out as part of a systematic plan, devised at the highest levels of the military command structure and coordinated by newly-created Korem under the command of then Colonel Adolf Sahala Radjagukguk, whose purpose was to eliminate surviving leaders of the Resistance movement. It reaches this conclusion on the basis of the following considerations:

- The campaign occurred in a number of different places at around the same time, and resulted in the execution or disappearance of at least 600 people between March and September 1979.

- Its targets were mainly people who before their surrender or capture had been Fretilin activists, often though not exclusively ones holding senior positions in the organisation, or members of Falintil, again often though not exclusively commanders.
- The particular time during which these killings and disappearances occurred was a period of transition when Operasi Seroja Joint Task Command was being dismantled and replaced by the East Timor Sub-Regional Command (Korem), a change that was intended to mark the normalisation of the situation in Timor-Leste.
- Many of those who fell victim to the campaign had been captured or had surrendered well before they were executed or disappeared, and had in some cases been integrated into Indonesian auxiliary units, such as Tonsus and Hansip, or the civil administration.
- In several of the districts where the executions and disappearances took place the Commission learned that lists of targeted individuals had been drawn up.
- The treatment of the victims was uniform: most of the victims were held in specific detention centres from which they were taken to specific places of execution where they were killed by specific military or auxiliary units.
- The Commission also found that a detainee who was eventually executed might be transferred from one place of detention to another, often in a different district, before being executed, one indication of overall coordination.
- Another indication of coordination was the wide range of institutions which were involved in the execution and disappearance of detainees, including the units of the territorial structure from the Korem down to the Koramil, combat battalions and the regional combat regiments (Resimen Tim Pertempuran) which commanded them, Hansip, paramilitary teams such as Team Nuklir and Tonsus, and the civil administration.
- The killings were widely known about at the time both by detainees and by the wider population and were perceived by both to constitute a coordinated campaign.
- The language used by perpetrators in different districts to account for the disappearance of the victims was frequently uniform, with detainees who had been taken away for execution being described as "having gone for a bath" or "gone to school".
- Throughout the occupation ABRI commanders, troops and members of the civil administration forcibly recruited tens of thousands of civilians to participate in military operations, known as Operasi Kikis, to search for and destroy remaining armed Resistance in the mountains. The largest of these operations took place in June–September 1981, when as many as 60,000 East Timorese were recruited to converge on Falintil positions.

917. The Commission has found that in September 1981, at the conclusion of the Operasi Kikis of June–September 1981, Battalions 321, 744 and/or 745, Marine Units, and Hansip Falintil forces, gathered in the area of Mount Aitana on the Manatuto-

Viqueque border and subsequently executed more than one hundred and, possibly several hundred, Falintil troops and civilians, including women and children, who were accompanying them. At the time that they were killed these victims were either at the mercy of Indonesian forces or in their custody after surrender or capture.

918. Throughout the occupation, but in particular in the early 1980s, ABRI/TNI commanders, troops and auxiliaries committed systematic and widespread unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of civilians to punish communities collectively that were suspected of supporting Falintil forces. The indiscriminate punishment of persons known to have previously been involved with the Resistance movement and the collective punishment of communities were particularly severe in the aftermath of Falintil attacks on military targets. For example:

- After the Resistance mounted attacks on military targets in Marabia and Becora in Dili on 10 June 1980, hundreds were detained. The Commission compiled the names of 121 people who disappeared, were executed (sometimes in public) or died in detention as a result of severe torture and deprivation of food and medical treatment in the weeks after the attack. This figure does not include people who were selected for transportation to the island of Ataúro between July 1980 and August 1981 for their alleged involvement in the attacks. For these people, who constituted the first groups of people to be sent to Ataúro since the invasion, conditions were particularly harsh and it is known that many of them died on the island.
- After Falintil attacks on Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) and Rotuto (Same, Manufahi), in the area of Mount Kablaki on 20 August 1982, troops and commanders from the Ainaro Kodim, the Dare Koramil and the 5th Combat Engineering Battalion (Zipur 5), and Hansip, detained hundreds of men and women from Mau Chiga and the surrounding communities. A special project undertaken by the Commission recorded that more than 50 people from the village of Mau Chiga alone were executed or disappeared in the following months. Many of them were killed in the most brutal fashion, both publicly and at an execution site, called Jakarta 2, at Builo, near the town of Ainaro, where victims were hurled into a deep ravine. Others were raped, and some 600 people from the area were forcibly displaced to Ataúro Island and other locations where many of them died of deprivation.
- After the joint attack by Falintil and East Timorese Ratih (civil defence) in Kraras (Viqueque) on 8 August 1983, troops and commanders of Kopassandha, Kodim Viqueque, Battalions 328, 501, 745 and Hansip, carried out a series of executions, in which more than 200 civilians, mostly men, who had fled from the village were hiding in various locations around Kraras, in the months of September–October 1983.
- After the defection of more than 30 armed members of Hansip, with their families and members of a clandestine youth group, in Mehara (Lautém) on 9 August 1983, smaller-scale defections in Lore in Lospalos Sub-district (Lautém) and Serelau in Moro Sub-district (Lautém), and the discovery of a plan for a similar action in Iliomar, Indonesian military forces detained hundreds of men and women throughout the district. Between August 1983 and March 1984 around 100 civilians, mostly men, were executed in various locations throughout the district.

- The "uprisings" in Viqueque and Lautém marked the end of a ceasefire that had been agreed between Indonesian forces and the Resistance in March 1983 and the start of an operation, Operasi Persatuan (Operation Unity), which the recently-appointed commander-in-chief of the Indonesian armed forces, General Benny Moerdani, said was aimed at the total eradication of the Resistance. One of the chief targets of this operation were civilians involved in clandestine activity. The Commission received testimonies about the execution and disappearance of more than 250 civilians in the districts of Lautém, Viqueque, Baucau, Dili, Aileu, Manufahi, Ainaro, Bobonaro, and Covalima between August 1983 and mid-1984 (excluding those killed in Viqueque in the immediate of the attack on Kraras), as well as the arrest, detention and torture and ill-treatment of many others, including their long-term detention either without trial on Ataúro and elsewhere or after blatantly unfair trials. The systematic nature of these executions is evident to the Commission from the remarks of the commander-in-chief of the Indonesian armed forces, from their scale and also from documentary evidence received by the Commission that village chiefs and members of the civil defence forces were ordered to draw up lists of people who had been active in the Resistance in the past, which formed the basis for the violations that followed. In addition, as with the executions and disappearances of 1978-79, the operation of 1983-84 involved the mobilisation of a wide range of institutions within the security apparatus and the civil administration, including the Special Forces (Kopassus), all levels of the territorial structure, combat battalions, the civil defence forces, paramilitary teams, the civilian and military police, and local government officials.

1985–1998

33. In the period 1985–1998, the number of killings and disappearances committed by ABRI and its auxiliaries declined relative to the earlier years of the occupation. However, the Indonesian security forces continued to kill and cause the disappearance of civilians with real and suspected association to groups resisting the occupation, including members of Fretilin/Falintil, the clandestine networks and other pro-independence groups.

919. Although the number of fatal violations decreased, those that occurred could not be regarded as the exceptional acts of "rogue elements". Impunity created a climate in which the following institutional practices were tolerated and condoned:

- The execution of civilians who were forcibly recruited to partake in military operations or exercises during military action.
- The execution of civilians in place of escaped combatants.
- Opening fire on a group of unsuspecting people or individuals carrying out daily activities, for no apparent reason.
- Opening fire into a crowd of unarmed demonstrators.

920. These practices are illustrated by the following cases:

- On 12 November 1991, Indonesian security forces opened fire on a group of demonstrators who were carrying pro-independence banners and flags at the Santa Cruz Cemetery in Dili. The demonstrators had proceeded to the cemetery to commemorate the death of Sebastião Gomes Rangel, a clandestine activist killed during a raid of the Motael Church on 28 October 1991. At least 75 civilians, and almost certainly many more, were killed at the cemetery and afterwards.
- On 12 January 1995, in Gariana (Maubara, Liquiçá), in response to a failed attempt to capture a suspected Falintil combatant, Indonesian security forces dragged six civilians into a ditch and executed them.
- In retaliation for the execution of suspected informants and an attack on military targets by Falintil in Alas (Manufahi), in October and November 1998, Indonesian security forces and auxiliaries detained hundreds of civilians, and 20 people were executed or disappeared in the following weeks.

34. Responding to international and domestic pressure, the Indonesian military conducted internal investigations and brought judicial proceedings against relatively junior personnel in at least two instances, following the Santa Cruz Massacre in Dili in 1991 and the killing of six civilians in Gariana (Maubara, Liquiçá) in 1995. In both cases court martial proceedings resulted in the low-ranking soldiers receiving light sentences, of between eight months and four years. The proceedings were not conducted in such a way as to establish the truth of what happened during these incidents or command responsibility for the atrocities.

35. The institutional practice of the Indonesian security forces shifted in the 1990s, resulting in a further decline in the number of unlawful killings and enforced disappearances, particularly after the Santa Cruz Massacre of November 1991. The shift was influenced by a number of factors, including an increasingly bold and sophisticated clandestine movement which made use of international media and human rights mechanisms and diplomacy, heightened international scrutiny after the Santa Cruz Massacre, the establishment of the Indonesian Human Rights Commission, the emergence of a human-rights focused Indonesian and East Timorese civil society, and finally, Reformasi (Reformation) in Indonesia. At the end of the 1990s, in response to the growing outspokenness of the pro-independence movement, the number of unlawful killings and enforced disappearances rose again. However the majority of these acts were no longer directly committed by members of the Indonesian security forces, but by their auxiliaries.

1999

36. In 1999, Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries conducted a coordinated and sustained campaign of violence, designed to intimidate the pro-independence movement and then to ensure a pro-Indonesian result in the Popular Consultation organised by the United Nations. Thousands of civilians were detained, hundreds of thousands were forcibly displaced, and between 1,400 and 1,500 were killed or disappeared during the course of the year. The majority of fatal violations took place in April, before the signing of the May 5 Agreement, and in September–October, after the announcement of the result of the ballot.

921. Impunity created a context where the unlawful killing or enforced disappearance of civilians was tolerated, supported, and condoned. As in earlier years when ABRI/TNI launched operations against the civilian population, it mobilised all branches of the security apparatus, including auxiliaries, and much of the civil administration, in pursuit of its goals. Throughout this period ABRI/TNI, the police and militia groups acted in a coordinated manner. Military bases were openly used as militia headquarters, and military equipment, including firearms, was distributed to militia groups. Some ABRI/TNI personnel were also militia commanders or members. ABRI/TNI intelligence officers provided lists of the names of people to be targeted and coordinated attacks. Civilian authorities openly provided state funding for militia groups and participated in militia rallies and other activities.

922. The extent of this collusion is illustrated by the following cases:

- On 6 April 1999, approximately 2,000 civilians who had sought refuge in the Liquiçá Church were attacked by Besi Merah Putih militia, together with soldiers from the Liquiçá Kodim, Brimob (police mobile brigade). At least 30-60 civilians were killed, their bodies transported in military trucks and discarded in secret locations.
- On 12 April 1999, in retaliation for an alleged Falintil killing of an ABRI/TNI soldier and a pro-autonomy leader, hundreds of civilians in the villages in Cailaco Sub-district (Bobonaro) were rounded up and required to attend the funeral of the pro-autonomy leader. At least seven suspected pro-independence supporters were executed by TNI soldiers and Halilintar militia at the Koramil, 100 metres away from the mourners. Another 13 were executed in the following weeks.
- On 17 April 1999, at the end of a pro-autonomy rally in front of the Governor's Office in Dili attended by Governor of Timor-Leste, the District Administrator of Dili, the Mayor of Dili, the provincial military commander, Colonel Tono Suratman, the Assistant for Operations to the Army Chief of Staff, Major General Kiki Syahnakri, the Regional Military Commander (Udayana), Adam Damiri, and two other senior military officers, Aitarak militia conducted a violent rampage, culminating in an attack on the house of Manuel Carrascalão where hundreds of displaced persons had sought refuge.
- On 6 September 1999, Laksaur militia, together with members of the Indonesian security forces, attacked thousands of refugees who had sought safety in the Suai Church (Covalima). At least 27 people were killed, including three priests, possibly more. The bodies were burned, and some were transported across the border to be buried in a secret location in West Timor (Indonesia).
- On 5-6 September 1999, Aitarak militia, together with members of Indonesian security forces, attacked hundreds of refugees who had sought safety in church-related places, such as the diocesan office complex, the Bishop of Dili's house, convents, and the ICRC office. At least 19 civilians were killed or disappeared. The previous day, on 4 September, the militia attacked the pro-independence stronghold of Becora in Dili, killing at least seven men.

- On 8 September 1999, Dadurus Merah Putih and other militias, under the command of Indonesian security forces, attacked thousands of refugees who had sought safety in the Maliana police station, hunting down and killing those who escaped the following day. Before the attack CNRT leaders urged members of the Indonesian police to give them protection, but their pleas were ignored. At least 26 civilians were killed or disappeared, mostly local CNRT leaders and suspected pro-independence supporters, including one 12-year-old boy. The bodies were disposed of at a secret location.
- On 12 September 1999, Laksaur militia and Indonesian security forces, during an attempt to forcibly deport villagers from the village of Laktos, Fohorem (Covalima), killed 14 men who resisted being moved to West Timor.
- On 21 September 1999, ABRI/TNI soldiers from Battalion 745 randomly shot civilians during their retreat from Lospalos (Lautém) to Dili, and eventually to Kupang (West Timor, Indonesia). At least eight people, including a foreign journalist, were killed or disappeared during their journey from Lospalos to Dili.
- On 20 October 1999, Sakunar and Aitarak militia and Indonesian security forces, while rounding up villagers from Maquelab (Pante Makassar, Oecussi) for deportation to West Timor, executed six men in the Maquelab market. Another six were killed later during an attack on the village.

37. In 1999, victims of unlawful killings and enforced disappearances were predominantly men of military age with a real or suspected association to pro-independence groups, including CNRT, the clandestine movement and student and youth organisations. However, since the objective of the military and its allies was to intimidate the general population into voting for integration with Indonesia, their target was broad and their methods indiscriminate. Thus, women and children seeking refuge with their families were also killed during massacres. Other groups perceived to support pro-independence groups, such as the clergy, students, and local UNAMET staff, were also targeted, particularly after the announcement of the ballot results.
38. Throughout the period of occupation (1975–1999), methods and circumstances in which unlawful killings were carried out included:
    - Indiscriminate shooting of unarmed groups of civilians
    - Dividing groups of unarmed civilians by gender, then indiscriminate shooting of the men
    - Ordering victims to dig their own grave before execution
    - Ordering victims to line up in formation before line by line execution
    - Execution of unarmed individuals by close-range shooting
    - Discarding of bodies by burning, by speedy secret burials without any attempt to identify the victim and next of kin, by dumping into a well, lake, or ocean

- Throwing of grenades at an unarmed group of civilians
- Death in custody by beating and torture
- Immediate execution after capture during military operations
- Public beheading
- Public, staged or real acts of cannibalism
- Public cutting of body parts
- Public display of decapitated head, or severed limbs or body parts
- Forcing of civilian to kill another civilian under duress
- Tying to a moving vehicle to be dragged to death
- Immolation
- Tying up on a cross before execution
- Throwing down a cliff, sometimes after being wounded
- Burying of wounded victim alive
- Public execution where a married couple was stripped naked and struck on the back of the neck until they fell into a grave
- Public fatal beating
- Parading of corpse
- Deadly assault using traditional weapons, such as machetes, spears and knives
- Death by acts of torture
- Abduction followed by disappearance, in some cases blind-folded and tied-up
- Targeted killing by militia from lists drawn up by military personnel
- Execution of detainees in detention centres, and in isolated places in the countryside, including in lakes and from rural bridges
- Displaying of human ears and genitals to family members of the disappeared
- Rape before the killing of female victims.

39. Among this litany of atrocities, there were a small number of brave individuals who baulked at the command to execute unarmed civilians and sought to prevent these crimes.
    - A member of Battalion 745 from Bobonaro refused to execute a group of civilians, which included women and children, preventing a massacre in Rotuto (Manufahi), in 1982.
    - An Indonesian member of Brimob smuggled a female CNRT leader to safety the day after the ballot in Gleno, Ermera, in 1999. Although she was initially safe, she was eventually raped and killed by militia when she attempted to return home a week later.
    - An East Timorese police officer was shot and killed by militia and ABRI/TNI when he attempted to prevent militia members from looting and burning a village in Maubisse (Ainaro).

923. Throughout the occupation, Indonesian military commanders ordered, supported, and condoned systematic and widespread unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of thousands of civilians in Timor-Leste. The sheer number of these fatalities, the evidence that many of them occurred during coordinated operations conducted across the territory, and the efforts of domestic and international non-government organisations to inform the military and civilian authorities in Jakarta that these atrocities were happening, rules out the possibility that the highest reaches of the Indonesian military, police and civil administration were ignorant of what was going on. The systematic failure of the Indonesian military and civilian leadership to prevent and stop these acts which they must have known about, and to punish the direct perpetrators of these crimes, is itself evidence of complicity.

40. Without full disclosure, the Indonesian military continue to perpetuate and support acts of enforced disappearances. Acts constituting enforced disappearances should be considered as a continuing offence as long as the perpetrators continue to conceal the fate and whereabouts of persons who have disappeared.

Endnotes

1. Xanana Gusmão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
2. Domingos Oliveira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
3. João Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
4. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
5. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
6. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
7. Domingos Oliveira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict, December 15–18 2003.
8. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Conflict, December 15–18 2003.
9. Mario Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003,
10. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, December 15–18 2003.
11. Rogério Lobato, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
12. CAVR Community Profile in Mulo, Hato Builico Sub-district, Ainaro District, 2 February 2004; CAVR Community Profile of Kasabauk [then Maudemo], Tilomar Sub-district, Covalima District; CAVR Community Profile of Uaitame, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 12 December 2003; CAVR Community Profile of Orlalan/ Batara, Laclubar Sub-district, Manatuto District, 24 January 2003; CAVR Community Profile of Bibileo, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 5 June 2003; CAVR Community Profile of Saburai, Maliana Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 13 January 2003.
13. HRVD Statements 1003; 1670; 3576; 8427; 8130; 4990 and 4993.
14. CAVR, Community Profile of Maulau, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 26 May 2003; see also HRVD Statements 4993; 4990 and 8130.
15. HRVD Statement 6443.
16. HRVD Statement 2507.
17. CAVR, Community Profile, Vila Verde, Mascarenhas and Rumbia, Dili District, 10 June 2003.
18. CAVR, Community Profile, Asucai Lorosae, Dili District (undated).
19. CAVR, Community Profile of Bemori, Dili District, (undated).

20. CAVR Interviews with Carlos Vicente de Sousa, Guilherme Martins and Manuel Henrique Ena, Darulete, Liquiçá, March 8 2004; see also CAVR Community Profile of Darulete, Liquiçá, 13 February 2003.
21. CAVR Interview with Guilherme Martins, Darulete, Liquiçá, 8 March 2004; see also HRVD Statement 3570.
22. CAVR Interviews with Adelina Freitas, Vicente de Sousa, Guilherme Martins and Henrique Ena, Darulete, Liquiçá, 8 March 2004.
23. HRVD Statement 3003
24. HRVD Statement 5428.
25. HRVD Statement 3570
26. HRVD Statement 2054.
27. CAVR Interview with Brigida Martins, Liquiçá, 10 March 2004. Corroborated by HRVD Statement 3003.
28. CAVR, Community Profile, Manelobas Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 23 May 2003.
29. CAVR, Community Profile, Manetu Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 8 July 2003.
30. CAVR, Community Profile, Edi Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 9 June 2003.
31. CAVR, Community Profile of Maulau, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 26 May 2003; see also HRVD Statement 4993.
32. CAVR, Community Profile, Asumano, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 6 February 2003.
33. CAVR Interview with Manuel Luis, Lisbon, Portugal, 10 March 2004; see also HRVD Statement 0280.
34. CAVR, Community Profile, Asumano, Liquiçá Sub-district, LiquiçáDistrict, 6 February 2003.
35. HRVD Statement 4882.
36. HRVD Statement 5467.
37. HRVD Statement 1071.
38. HRVD Statement 6199.
39. CAVR Interview with Francisco Barbosa, Turiscai, Manufahi, 8 September 2003.
40. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004.
41. Mateus Soares, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.
42. CAVR, Community Profile Orlalan/ Batara, Laclubar Sub-district, Manatuto District, 24 August 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Francisco Barbosa, Turiscai, Manufahi, 8 September 2003.
43. HRVD Statement 01413.
44. HRVD Statement 1468.
45. CAVR Community Profile, Asumano, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District 6 February 2003.
46. CAVR Interviews with Manuel Henrique Ena and Carlos Vicente, Darulete, Liquiçá, 8 March 2004.
47. CAVR Interview with Carlos Vicente, Darulete, Liquiçá, 8 March 2004
48. CAVR Community Profile, Darulete, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 13 February 2003.
49. HRVD Statement 1088.
50. CAVR Interview with Mário (Marito) Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 17 January 2002 and 27 July 2003; CAVR Interview with Maria José Fatima Ximenes, Dili, [undated]; CAVR Interview with Manuel Agustino Freitas, Bobonaro, 12 June 2003; see also HRVD Statements 3742; 5698 and 03715.
51. CAVR Interview with Mário (Marito) Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 17 January 2002 and 27 July 2003; corroborated by HRVD Statement 5698.
52. CAVR Interview with Mário (Marito) Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 17 November 2002 and 27 July 2004.
53. See generally Mário Lemos Pires, Descolonizaçao de Timor, Chapter on the UDT Coup.
54. CAVR Interview with João da Costa, former UDT detainee, Same, 24 June 2003; see also HRVD statement 06465 01; CAVR Interview with Francisco Gonçalves, then Fretilin detainee, Dili, 14 June 2003.
55. CAVR Community Profile, Laclo, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District, 16, June 2003.
56. HRVD Statement 2223.
57. HRVD Statement 8345; see also HRVD Statement 8384.
58. CAVR Interview with Elidio Maria de Jesus, Dili, 24 June 2003.
59. Monis da Maia, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974–1976, 15–18 December 2003.
60. Monis da Maia, ibid.
61. Monis da Maia, ibid.
62. CAVR Interview with Rosa Pina Meneses [victim's wife] Dili, 22 August 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Laura Pina Meneses Belo, Dili, 22 August 2003.

63. CAVR Interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
64. CAVR Interview with Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004.
65. HRVD Statement 9182.
66. Manuel Duarte, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974–1976, 15–18 December 2003.
67. Manuel Duarte, ibid.
68. CAVR Interview with Florentino de Jesus Martins, Talimoro, Ermera, 25 August 2003.
69. CAVR Interview with Lorenço dos Santos, Poetete, Ermera, 25 August 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Manuel Duarte, Urahou, Hatolia, Ermera, 23 September 2003; see also CAVR Interview with Florentino de Jesus Martins, Poetete, Ermera, 25 August 2003.
70. CAVR Interview with Eufrazia de Jesus Soares, Gleno, Ermera, 25 September 2003.
71. HRVD Statement 9016.
72. HRVD Statement 7946.
73. CAVR Interview with Adelino Maia, [undated]; see also HRVD Statement 1688; see also CAVR Interview with Carolino Madeira, Lauana, Letefoho, 24 September 2003.
74. HRVD Statement 1082.
75. HRVD Statement 1082.
76. HRVD Statement 2610.
77. HRVD Statement 6990.
78. Submission to CAVR, Operasi Militer ABRI Wilayah Timor Timur, 1974–1999, Lembaga Studi dan Advokasi Masyarakat (ABRI military operations in East Timor 1974–1999, The Institute for Community Advocacy and Study) Elsam, Jakarta, March 2004.
79. HRVD Statements 1107: 1164: 1123: 179: 2004: 2574: 2589: 2468: 4221: 4280: 4285 and 4348
80. CAVR Interview with Claudio Vieira, Bairro Pite, Dili, 10 June, 2004.
81. HRVD Statement 1136.
82. HRVD Statement 4607
83. Ibid.
84. CAVR Interviews with Florentino de Jesus Martins, Talimoro, Ermera, 25 Agustus 2003
85. CAVR Interviews with Tomás Gonçalves, 8 June 2004 and 13 September 2004.
86. Sydney Morning Herald, 29 May 1999. AAP, 20 October 1999.
87. Ball and McDonald, op. cit., p. 101.
88. It appeared in The Canberra Times on 29 October 1975.
89. Tom Sherman, 1996 Report, p. 89.
90. CAVR video-recorded Interview with Guido dos Santos, Balibó, Bobonaro, 21 July 2004.
91. See CAVR researcher's affidavit on conversation with Guido dos Santos.
92. CAVR Interview with Olandino Luis Maia Guterres, Dili 7 June 2004.
93. See the Sherman Report 1996, pp. 62-63.
94. On this issue, see Tom Sherman Report, 1996, p.110; Ball and McDonald, p. 115; and "The Balibó killings 1975 and intelligence handling - a report of an inquiry by the Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security" ("The Blick Report"), June 2002.
95. See, for example, Conboy, Kopassus.
96. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [W2], 24 August 2004, Dili. See also James Dunn, Timor: a People Betrayed, Jacaranda Press, The Jacaranda Press, Milton, Queensland, 1983, p. 284; see also Amnesty International, East Timor Violations, p. 26.
97. CAVR Interview with Lay Kuon Nhen, Dili, 23 February 2004; CAVR Interview with W2, Dili, 24 August. 2004; see also submission to CAVR, interview with Chong Kui Yan, Anthony Goldstone, Australia, 1984.
98. CAVR Interview with Afonso Luis Silveira, Dili, 14 December 2003.
99. CAVR Interview with Erminio da Silva da Costa, Jakarta, Indonesia, 9 August 2004.
100. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [W2], 24 August 2004, Dili; see also submission to CAVR, "East Timorese killed as a direct result of the Indonesian Invasion of East Timor in 1975 and the subsequent occupation of East Timor by Indonesian Military Forces," Anthony Goldstone.
101. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [W2], 24 August 2004, Dili; see also submission to CAVR, "East Timorese killed as a direct result of the Indonesian Invasion of East Timor in 1975 and the subsequent occupation of East Timor by Indonesian Military Forces," Anthony Goldstone.
102. Testimony of Chong Kui Yan, quoted in Amnesty International, East Timor Violations, p. 26.
103. CAVR Interview with Alberto de Oliveira Camra, Dili, 17 August 2004. This account is supported by CAVR Interview with Francisco da Cunha, Dili, 3 February 2004.
104. CAVR Interview with Francisco da Cunha, Dili, 3 February 2004; see also CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [A3], Dili, 16 August 2004.

105. CAVR Interview with Felismina dos Santos da Conceição, Dili, 19 November 2003.
106. CAVR Interview with Francisco Soriano, Dili, 4 July 2004
107. CAVR Interview with Francisco da Cunha, Dili, 3 February 2004; see HRVD Statement 2566.
108. HRVD Statement 2566.
109. CAVR Interview with Felismina dos Santos da Conceição, Dili, [undated] November 2003.
110. CAVR Interview with Domingos Freitas, Dili, 29 June 2004.
111. CAVR Interview with Filomeno Gomes, Dili, 25 June 2004
112. CAVR Interview with Alexandrino do Rego, Dili, 22 August 2004
113. CAVR Interview with Sebastiana Henrique Guterres Soares Belo, Dili, 14 August 2004.
114. CAVR Interview with Alberto de Oliviera Camra, Dili,15 August 2004.
115. HRVD Statement 3708.
116. CAVR Interview with Maria Filomena Godinho Isaac, Dili, 13 August 2004.
117. HRVD Statement 3708.
118. CAVR Interview with Acacio da Costa Carvalho, Dili, 16 August 2004; see also HRVD Statement 5072.
119. HRVD Statement 5073.
120. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [A3], Dili, 16 August 2004, Dili; see also HRVD Statements 5072, 5069, and 5070.
121. CAVR Interview with Felismina dos Santos da Conceição, Dili, [undated] November 2004.
122. CAVR Interview with Iria de Araújo, Dili, 4 August 2004.
123. CAVR Interview with Daniel João Batista, Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 21 July 2004.
124. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [A3], Dili, 13 August 2004.
125. Testimony of Chong Kui Yan, in Amnesty International, East Timor Violations, p. 26.
126. Interview with Laurinda Guterres Ximenes in Vox Populi, No. 14, Minggu IV, June, 2004, p. 14.
127. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [W2], Dili, 24 August 2004. See also CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [A3], Dili, 13 August 2004; CAVR Interview with Erminio da Silva da Costa, Jakarta, Indonesia, 9 August 2004; CAVR Interview with Daniel João Batista, Kupang, West Timor Indonesia, 21 July 2004 and "Isobel dos Santos Barreto Lobato: Putri Bangsa yang Dilupakan," (Isobel dos Santos Barreto Lobato: A nation's forgotten daughter) Vox Populi, No. 14, June, 2004, p. 14.
128. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [W2], Dili, 24 August 2004.
129. CAVR Interview with Erminio da Silva da Costa, Jakarta, Indonesia, 9 August 2004.
130. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [A3], 13 August 2004. This is supported by the testimony of Chong Kui Yan; see Amnesty International, East Timor Violations, p. 26.
131. CAVR Interview with Daniel João Batista, Kupang, West Timor Indonesia, 21 July 2004 and CAVR Interview with Erminio da Silva da Costa, Jakarta, Indonesia, 9 August 2004.
132. See Julius Pour, Benny Moerdani, Portrait of a Soldier Statesman, Yayasan Kejuangan Panglima Besar Sudirman, Jakarta, 1993, p. 400; see also Saleh Kamah, Seroja, p. 154; see also Hendro Subroto, Eyewitness to Integration of East Timor, Pustaka Sinar Harapan, Jakarta, 1997, p. 182; See also CAVR Interview with Erminio da Costa da Silva, Jakarta, Indonesia, 9 August 2004.
133. CAVR Interview with Erminio da Costa da Silva, Jakarta, Indonesia, 9 August 2004.
134. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [A3], Dili, 16 August 2004.
135. CAVR Interview with Alexandrino do Rego, Dili, 4 February 2004
136. Ibid.
137. CAVR Interview with Alberto de Oliveira Camra, Dili, 17 August 2004.
138. CAVR Interview with Alexandrino do Rego, Dili, 4 February 2004.
139. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [W2], Dili, 24 August 2004.
140. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant, Melbourne, Australia, [undated].
141. CAVR Interview with Iria de Araújo, Dili, 4 August 2004.
142. Ibid.
143. Ibid.
144. CAVR Interview with Francisco Soriano, Dili, 4 July 2004.
145. CAVR Interview with Iria de Araújo, Dili, 4 August 2004.
146. CAVR Interview with anonymous informant [W2], Dili, 24 August 2004; see also HRVD Statement 05064.
147. HRVD Statement 09068.
148. Alexandre da Costa Araújo, testimony to the CAVR Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.
149. CAVR Interview with Humberto Martins da Cruz, Dili, [undated].

150. Alexandre da Costa Araújo, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.
151. CAVR Interviews with João da Costa, Letefoho, Same, 24 June 2003; Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003; and Aleixo Ximenes, Dili, 2 February 2004; and HRVD Statements 09016, 09068 and 04742.
152. CAVR Interviews with João da Costa, Letefoho, Same, 24 June 2003; and Assis dos Santos, Maliana [undated].
153. CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2004; see also Monis da Maia, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
154. CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2004; see also Monis da Maia, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
155. CAVR Interview with Assis dos Santos, Maliana, [undated].
156. HRVD Statement 09026.
157. CAVR Interview with João da Costa, Same, 24 June 2004. On the central role of César Mau Laka, see also CAVR Iinterviews with Luis Filipe Aquino Caldas, Dili, [undated], and with Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003.
158. See also HRVD Statements 09016 and 09026.
159. CAVR Interviews with Manuel Gaspar (Torado), Uaitame, Uatolari, Viqueque, 19 September 2003; Agostinho Boavida Ximenes (Sera Malik), Soe, West Timor, 28 August 2004.
160. CAVR Interview with Agostinho Boavida Ximenes (Sera Malik), Soe, West Timor, 28 August 2004. See also Gusmão, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win: The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, p.39.
161. CAVR Interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 11 May 2004.
162. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
163. CAVR Interview with Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003.
164. CAVR Interview with Humberto Martins da Cruz, Dili, [undated].
165. CAVR Interview with Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003.
166. CAVR Interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
167. CAVR Interviews with José Catarino Gregório Magno Trindade de Melo (Labut Melo), Kupang, 23 July 2004; and with Herminio da Silva da Costa, Jakarta, 9 August 2004.
168. CAVR Interview with José Catarino Gregório Magno Trindade de Melo (Labut Melo), Kupang, 23 July 2004.
169. CAVR Interview with Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003.
170. CAVR Interviews with Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003; Luis Antonio de Aquino Caldas, Dili, [undated]; and Agostinho Boavida Ximenes (Sera Malik), 28 August 2004, Soe, West Timor, Indonesia.
171. Xanana Gusmão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
172. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
173. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
174. Rogério Lobato, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
175. HRVD Statement 00166.
176. HRVD Statement 05040.
177. HRVD Statements 02208 and 03564.
178. HRVD Statement 03554.
179. HRVD Statements 05027 and 05018.
180. HRVD Statement 04191
181. HRVD Statement 04068.
182. HRVD Statement 02079.
183. HRVD Statement 00464.
184. HRVD Statement 04517.
185. See, for example, HRVD Statements 05058 and 03254.
186. Father José Tavares, Tuba Rai Metin, Bases of Resistance, 27 March 2002.
187. HRVD Statement 03829.

188. HRVD Statement 00537.
189. HRVD Statement 05363.
190. HRVD Statement 03897.
191. HRVD Statement 03067.
192. HRVD Statement 05235.
193. HRVD Statement 03551.
194. HRVD Statement 01669.
195. HRVD Statement 00447.
196. HRVD Statement 00487.
197. HRVD Statement 04495.
198. HRVD Statements 01347 and 03152.
199. HRVD Statement 05052.
200. HRVD Statement 08909.
201. HRVD Statement 06409.
202. HRVD Statements 01311, 03372, 01043, 01687, 01311, 03372 and 03252; see also Lucio Meneses Lopes, testimony to the CAVR, National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–23 November 2003.
203. HRVD Statement 04531.
204. HRVD Statement 05493.
205. See, for example, HRVD Statements 02238, 00503, 07411, 04984, and 04995.
206. HRVD Statement 03372.
207. HRVD Statement 08536.
208. HRVD Statement 03091.
209. HRVD Statement 07210.
210. HRVD Statement 04474.
211. HRVD Statement 04200.
212. HRVD Statements 05264, 05279.
213. HRVD Statement 06547. For other killings by Tonsus in this area, see HRVD Statements 05296, 08014, 06480, 01938 and 06553.
214. See, for example, HRVD Statements 08538, 08538, 00543, 06179, 06179, 07696, 07676, 07076, 03165, 03252, 05336, 05263, 08345, 06179, 07988, 00446, 02510, 07803, 03091, 08950 and 04185-05.
215. HRVD Statement 00543.
216. HRVD Statement 07431.
217. HRVD Statement 04216.
218. See HRVD Statements 02323, 05288, 05365, 03429, 05408, 00079, 03401, 03224, 04073, 02257, 02264, 05324, 06961, 05408, 04073, 03429 and 04085; and CAVR, Community Profile Debu-Waen, Mahaquidan Alas Sub-district, Manufahi District, CAVR, Community Profile, Hera, Cristo Rei Sub-district, Dili District, and CAVR, Community Profile, Liurai, Aileu Town Sub-district, Aileu District.
219. HRVD Statement 08911.
220. For 1980, see HRVD Statement 06961; CAVR, Community Profile, Liurai, Aileu Town, Aileu Sub-district, Aileu District; and CAVR, Community Profile, Hera, Cristo Rei Dili District; for 1983-84, see HRVD Statements 04772 (Manufahi), 01447 (Aileu), 02323 (Baucau), 02359 (Baucau) and 03834 (Baucau).
221. HRVD Statements 04073, 04085 and 03219; and CAVR Interview with Florindo Sarmento, Aileu, [undated].
222. HRVD Statements 03224, 03218, 03219, 92979 and 02082.
223. HRVD Statements 02257, 02252, 02264 and 02259; CAVR, Community Profile, Iparira/Laiara, Parlamento Village, Moro Sub-district, Lautém District.
224. Amnesty International Annual Report 1985.
225. See, for example, HRVD Statements 05395, 06802, 07781, 09188, 07076, 07930 and 07117.
226. HRVD Statement 01810.
227. HRVD Statement 01659.
228. HRVD Statement 08529.
229. HRVD Statement 02224.
230. HRVD Statement 03828.
231. HRVD Statement 03019.
232. HRVD Statement 08089.
233. HRVD Statement 07699.
234. HRVD Statement 07696.

235. HRVD Statement 07497.
236. See CAVR, Community Profiles for Liurai Village and Manumera Village, Turiscai Sub-district, Manufahi District.
237. CAVR Case Summary: Massacre in Foholau, Turiscai, Manufahi; and HRVD Statements 06640 and 07532.
238. See, for example, HRVD Statements 01810, 03551, 01669, 01659, 08529, 05434, 02214, 07532 and 07485.
239. HRVD Statement 01379.
240. HRVD Statement 02214.
241. HRVD Statement 05985.
242. See, for example, HRVD statements 01484 and 04765.
243. CAVR Interview with Luis Pereira, Laclubar, 12 April 2003.
244. HRVD Statement 01757.
245. HRVD Statement 02294.
246. HRVD Statement 08897.
247. HRVD Statement 04765.
248. HRVD Statement 07906.
249. HRVD Statement 04146.
250. CAVR Interview with José Francisco Pires I Silva, Dili, 12 January 2004.
251. HRVD Statement 02127.
252. HRVD Statement 04448.
253. HRVD Statement 05324.
254. CAVR Interviews with Pedro Pinto, Uato Carbau, Viqueque, 14 December 2003 and Tomás da Cruz; and HRVD Statement 07367, which also names Carlos, Manuel Kaimuadee, Delin and Francisco Borulau as victims.
255. On Pasmar 9, see HRVD Statement 07699; on Pasmar 10, see HRVD Statement 02385; on Battalion 315, see HRVD Statements 02798and 06059; on Battalion 328, see HRVD Statements 03898 and 07329; on Battalion 721, see HRVD Statements 00490, 00494, 00481 and 03829; on Battalion 312, see HRVD Statement 02294; on Battalion 202, see HRVD Statements 04200, 07431. 04456, 00487, 06032, 07455.
256. HRVD Statement 03083. Other disappearances from Battalion 202 headquarters in Uaida are reported in HRVD Statements 03085, 03154, 03122 and 03138.
257. Testimony of Onu Bu, CRRN Communiqué, 1983, p. 34.
258. CAVR Interview with Carmen da Cruz, Dili, undated.
259. CAVR Interview with Meria Montalvão, Dili, undated.
260. Father José Tavares, Tuba Rai Metin, Base de Apoio session, 27 March 2002.
261. CAVR Interview with Izidora da Costa Boavida, Joana M. Dulce Viktor, Dili, 25 May 2004; Aleixo Ximenes, Dili, 2 February 2004.
262. CAVR Interview with Aleixo Ximenes, Dili, 2 February 2004.
263. See HRVD statements 08041, 05671, 03759, 08037, 03742, 08115, 05775, 03529.
264. Interview with Justino Mota, Lisbon, 4 July 1984 (Document submitted to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone).
265. CAVR Interview with Maria de Fatima Vaz de Jesus, Bebora, Dili, 23 September 2004.
266. CAVR Interview with Merita Alves, ex-detainee and member of the Fretilin Central Committee, Dili, 19 September 2003.
267. HRVD Statements 05671 and 03759; and Interview with Justino Mota, Lisbon, 4 July 1984 (Document submitted to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone).
268. CAVR Interviews with Constantino dos Santos, Quelicai (Baucau), 28 November 2002 and Zeferino Armando Ximenes, Baucau, 13 June 2003; CRRN Communiqué, Testimony of Onu Bu, July 1963; Gatimor No 6; and Interview with Justino Mota, Lisbon, 4 July 1984.
269. CAVR Interview with Maria de Fatima Vaz de Jesus, Bebora, Dili, 23 September 2004.
270. Ibid.
271. CAVR Interview with Constantino dos Santos, former Hansip member, Quelicai, 23 March 2004.
272. Amnesty International, East Timor: Violations of Human Rights, London, 1985.
273. CAVR Interviews with João da Costa, Baucau, 10 December 2003 and Merita Alves, Dili, 19 September 2003.
274. CAVR Interviews with Rui Lopes, Camenassa, Covalima, 31 October, 2003; and with Merita Alves, Dili, 19 September 2003.
275. Interview with Virginia da Cruz Dias Quintas, Lisbon, 6 April 1985 (Document submitted to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone).

276. CAVR Ringkasan Kasus: Penghilangan Maria Gorete Joaquim.
277. CAVR Interview with Merita Alves, Dili, 19 September 2003.
278. CAVR Interviews with Constantino dos Santos, Letemumu, Quelicai, Baucau, 28 November 2002; Cipriano Ximenes, Quelicai, Baucau, 28 November 2002; and Leonel Guterres, Quelicai, Baucau, 28 November 2002.
279. Xanana Gusmão, Timor-Leste – Um Povo, Uma Pátria, p. 42; Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win: The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, p. 59.
280. CAVR Interviews with Fernando José Freitas Soares and Venancio dos Santos Alves, Quelicai, 2 May 2004, and Zeferino Armando Ximenes, Baucau, 13 June 2003; Gatimor No 6 (Document submitted to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone) and CRRN Communique, July 1983.
281. CAVR Interviews with Constantino dos Santos, Letemumu (Quelicai, Baucau), 13 June 2003; and José Correia (Calala), Tirilolo (Baucau, Baucau), 24 March 2004.
282. HRVD Statements 00595 and 00597; and Gatimor No 6.
283. HRVD Statements 00572 and 07800.
284. HRVD Statements 07092 and 07800.
285. CAVR Interview with Zeferino Armando Ximenes, Baucau, 13 June 2003; and CRRN Communiqué, Testimony of Onu Bu, July 1963.
286. CAVR Interview with Constantino dos Santos, Letemumu, Quelicai, Baucau, 28 November 2002
287. CAVR Interview with Zeferino Armando Ximenes, Baucau, 13 June 2003.
288. Ibid.
289. CAVR Interviews with Constantino dos Santos, Letemumu, Quelicai, Baucau, 13 June 2003; and José Correia (Calala), Tirilolo, Baucau, Baucau, 24 March 2004.
290. See, for example, HRVD Statements 00597 [Celestino Peloy and Agapito Gama]
291. HRVD Statement 00528.
292. HRVD Statement 06113.
293. HRVD Statement 05324.
294. HRVD Statements 07715 and 02363.
295. HRVD Statement 00538.
296. HRVD Statement 00556.
297. HRVD Statement 04448.
298. HRVD Statement 02364.
299. CAVR, Community Profile, Uaitame Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 12 December 2003
300. HRVD Statement 02361.
301. HRVD Statement 06099.
302. HRVD Statement 06104.
303. HRVD Statement 07787.
304. CAVR Interview with Maria Teresa Corvelo Avila Marçal Sarmento, Dili, 4 October 2005
305. Ibid.
306. CAVR, Community Profile, Bauro Village, Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém District, and CRRN Communique, 23 July 1983.
307. HRVD Statements 05332, 05660 and 04422; and CAVR, Community Profile, Fuiloro Village, Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém District.
308. CRRN Communique, 23 July 1983.
309. Xanana Gusmão, Timor-Leste – Um Povo, Uma Pátria, p. 45; Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win: The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, pp. 62-63.
310. HRVD Statements 00737, 00740, 00741, 00713, 00702, 00706, 07586 and 00788; Xanana Gusmão, Timor-Leste – Um Povo, Uma Pátria, p. 45 and Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win: The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, p. 63; and CRRN Communiqué, 25 July 1983.
311. HRVD Statements 02257, 02252, 02264 and 02259; and CAVR, Community Profile, Aldeias of Iparira and Laiara, Parlamento, Moro Sub-district, Lautém District, 6 March 2003
312. HRVD Statement 01623 and CAVR, Community Profile, Loro Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 22 November 2002
313. HRVD Statement 01623; see also CAVR, Community Profile, Loro, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 22 November 2002
314. HRVD Statements 01618, 00615, 01622, 01636, 00740, 01649 and 02286.
315. HRVD Statement 02254.
316. CAVR, Community Profile, Aldeias of Pitileti, Etepiti and Ira-Onu, Com Town, Moro Sub-district, Lautém District, 6 March 2003
317. HRVD Statements 01604 and 01638.

318. HRVD Statement 02300.
319. HRVD Statements 02115 and 03979.
320. HRVD Statement 03968.
321. HRVD Statement 01650.
322. HRVD Statement 02130.
323. HRVD Statement 07586.
324. HRVD Statements 05364, 05365, 05369 and 05376.
325. Ibid.
326. HRVD Statement 00703; CAVR, Community Profile, Raça Village, Lospalos sub-district, Lautém District, and CRRN Report, 23 July 1983.
327. CAVR, Community Profile, Lore I Village Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém District; and HRVD Statement 05345.
328. CAVR Interviews with Saturnino Tilman and Mateus Conceição.
329. HRVD Statements 01506, 01576 and 01587; and CAVR, Community Profile, Manus, Taitudak Village, Alas Sub-district, Manufahi District, 4 October 2002.
330. HRVD Statements 04750 and 05410; CAVR, Community Profile, Letefoho, Same Sub-district, Manufahi District; and CRRN Communiqué, 25 July 1983.
331. HRVD Statements 05153, 03429, 04071 and 03427; and CAVR, Community Profile, Debu-Waen, Mahaquidan Village, Alas Sub-district, Manufahi District. [3 December 2003]
332. HRVD Statements 03401, 03403, 03429, 04071 and 04088; CAVR, Community Profile, Uma Metan, Mahaquidan Village, Alas Sub-district, Manufahi District; and Ringkasan Kasus: Pembantaian di Uma Metan. (Case Summary: Slaughter at Uma Metan)
333. HRVD Statements 04073, 04081 and 04085; and CAVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman. Dili.
334. HRVD Statements 04088, 04071, 04069 and 04100; and Ringkasan Kasus: Pembantaian di Uma Metan. (Case Summary: Slaughter at Uma Metan)
335. HRVD Statements 06621, 06525, 06610; and CAVR, Community Profile, Manumera Village Turiscai Sub-district, Manufahi District, 12 August 2003.
336. HRVD Statements 03491 and 03790; and CAVR, Community Profile, Manumera Village, Turiscai Sub-district, Manufahi District, 12 August 2003.
337. HRVD Statement 03464; and CAVR, Community Profile, Caicasa Village, Fatuberliu Sub-district, Manufahi District.
338. CAVR, Community Profile, Fatucahi Village, Fatuberliu Sub-district, Manufahi District.
339. HRVD Statement 03424.
340. HRVD 03482 and 03278; CAVR, Community Profile, Clacuc Village, Fatuberliu Sub-district, Manufahi District.
341. HRVD Statements 03474 and 03492.
342. HRVD Statement 03471.
343. HRVD Statement 05759; and CAVR Interviews with Bernardo da Costa and Elizio Teofilo; and Maria José da Costa, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Famine and Forced Displacement, 28–29 July 2003.
344. See, for example, HRVD Statements 04185, 04200, 07450 and 07458.
345. HRVD Statements 04815
346. HRVD Statement 06093; see also CAVR Interview with Brigadier General Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 9 June 2004.
347. See: Informação Sobre A Situação De Algunas Zonas de Timor Leste, Dili, 13 May 1982 (document submitted to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone); and Informações, Submission of Napoleão de Almeida to CAVR, 25 May 2004.
348. Informações, op.cit.
349. CAVR, Community Profile, Macadique Village, Uatolari Sub-district, Viqueque District, (undated).
350. Lucio Meneses Lopes, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003.
351. HRVD Statements 03894, 00552, 03888, 03514 and 05112.
352. HRVD Statement 03514.
353. See HRVD Statements 02166 and 03759.
354. HRVD Statement 06490.
355. HRVD Statements 06068, 03894 and 03888; and CAVR Interview with Aleixo Ximenes, Dili, 2 February 2004.
356. CAVR Interview with Aleixo Ximenes, Dili, 2 February 2004; and HRVD Statement 03733.
357. HRVD Statement 03033.
358. HRVD Statement 09004.

359. See Shepard Forman, Statement to US Congress Sub-committee on International Organisations, Hearings on Human Rights in East Timor, 28 June 1977, p. 1719.
360. Laporan Kegiatan di Uaibitae (Report on Activities in Uaibitae), Anonymous Submission to CAVR.
361. Laporan Kegiatan di Uaibitae (Report on Activities in Uaibitae); and CAVR Interviews with Abilio Quintão Pinto, Dili, 7 October 2003 and Augusto Pires, Dili [undated].
362. CAVR Interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 23 September 2003.
363. CAVR Interviews with Jacinto A. Junior, Baucau, 28 May 2004; Helena Freitas da Silva and J. Francisco, Dili, 2004; Luis da Costa, Lisbon [undated].and Augusto Pires, Dili [undated].
364. CAVR Interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 23 September 2003.
365. CAVR Interview with Luis da Costa, Lisbon [undated].
366. CAVR Interviews with Marito Reis, Baucau, 23 September 2003; Aleixo Ximenes, 28 May 2004; Luis da Costa, Lisbon [undated].
367. CAVR Interview with Luis da Costa, Lisbon; John G. Taylor, East Timor: The Price of Freedom, Zed Books, London, 1991, p.96
368. HRVD Statement 00570; and CAVR Interview with Agostinho Boavida Ximenes (Sera Malik), Soe West Timor, Indonesia, 28 August 2004.
369. HRVD Statement 04444.
370. CAVR, Community Profile, Iliomar II, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District; and HRVD Statements 03962 and 03969.
371. CAVR, Community Profile, Iliomar II, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District; and HRVD Statement 03982.
372. HRVD Statements 06386 and 09471.
373. HRVD Statements 09471, 06354, 06395 and 06407.
374. CAVR Interviews with Eduardo de Jesus Barreto, Ermera, 12 August 2003, and Celestino Alves, Fatubessi, Ermera, 6 October 2003.
375. CAVR Interview with Jeronimo Albino, Ermera, 10 September 2003; see also HRVD Statement 08385.
376. HRVD Statement 06395.
377. CAVR Interviews with Celestino de Carvalho Alves, Fatubessi, Ermera [undated], and Fatubessi, Ermera, 27 June, 2004.
378. A Nossa Vitoria É Apenas Questão de Tempo, Comunicado do Comité Central da Fretilin de 14/9/77, Edições Comité de 28 de Novembro, Lisbon, March 1978, pp. 8-9 and 15. [Original: "o mais vil traidor que a nossa Historia conhece."]
379. "A Nossa Vitoria", p. 14, and Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan), testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003
380. "A Nossa Vitoria", p. 15.
381. CAVR Interviews with Jeronimo Albino, Ermera, 10 September 2003; and Eduardo de Jesus.
382. CAVR Interview with João Soares, Atara, Atsabe, Ermera, 24 September 2003.
383. CAVR Interview with Maria Fatima Vaz de Jesus, Bebora, Dili, 23 September 2004.
384. CAVR Interviews with Maria Fatima Vaz de Jesus, Bebora, Dili, 23 September 2004; and Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
385. CAVR Interviews with Bernardo da Costa, 5 September 2003; and Maria Fatima Vaz de Jesus, Bebora, Dili, 23 September 2004.
386. HRVD Statement 05758.
387. Thomás Araújo, Case Summary 908, Kotomori, (Remexio Aileu) [undate].
388. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier Amaral, Dili 18 June 2004.
389. HRVD Statements 08100 and 05812.
390. HRVD Statement 07902.
391. HRVD Statements 00166, 09120, 04882, 04875, 04878 and 05745.
392. HRVD Statement 04878.
393. Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan), testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003; CAVR Interview with Antonio de Amado Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 11 December 2003; Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003; and HRVD Statements 05758, 09120 and 05063.
394. Antonio Amado JR Guterres, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003.
395. Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan), testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003.
396. HRVD Statement 08100.

397. HRVD Statement 05807.
398. CAVR Interview with Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 6 November, 2003; Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003.
399. HRVD Statement 08100.
400. HRVD Statement 05812.
401. HRVD Statement 05810; and CAVR Community Profile, Faturasa Village, Remexio Sub-district, Aileu District,.20 June 2003.
402. HRVD Statement 05760.
403. CAVR Interview with Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 6 November 2003.
404. See 7.4.4.2 and CAVR Community Profiles, Hoholau, Aileu Town Sub-district, Aileu District; and Lausi/Bandudato, Aileu Town Sub-district, Aileu District 16 February 2004.
405. HRVD Statements 06995, 04830 and 05063.
406. HRVD Statements 06504, 07902, 08002 and 08010.
407. HRVD Statement 05712.
408. HRVD Statement 03203.
409. On Laclubar and Natarbora, see HRVD Statements 05771, 05056 and 05279; on Metinaro see HRVD Statement 05056 and CAVR Interview with Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 6 November 2003.
410. Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan), testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing, Dili, 19–21 November 2003; and HRVD Statement 00802.
411. HRVD Statement 04815.
412. Among the survivors were Tobias Mendonça, Jorgé and Thomás Araújo [HRVD Statements 04882 and 0481]5; and CAVR Interview with Thomás Araújo CAVR Interview 14 October 2003.
413. Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan), testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing, Dili, 19–21 November 2003; and Thomás Araújo, CAVR Interview 2003.
414. HRVD Statement 08002.
415. HRVD Statement 04815; CAVR, Community Profile, Ahic Village, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 22 November 2002.
416. HRVD Statements 05807, 05810, 05811.
417. CAVR Interview with Jacinto A Junior, Baucau, 28 May 2004; Quelicai Uaibitae Document, submitted to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone; and HRVD Statements 07442, 07443 and 07588.
418. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
419. CAVR Interview with Jacinto A. Junior, Baucau, 28 May 2004.
420. HRVD Statement 07512.
421. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
422. HRVD Statements 04158, 07442 and 07443; CAVR Interviews with Jacinto A Junior, Baucau, 28 May 2004; and Quelicai Uaibitae Document, submitted to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone.
423. HRVD Statements 07442 and 07443.
424. Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!: The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, pp. 49-50.
425. HRVD Statement 00095.
426. CAVR, Community Profile, Uaitame, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District; CAVR Interview with Agostinho Boavida Ximenes (Sera Malik), Soe (West Timor), 28 August 2004.
427. HRVD Statements 03804 and 03818.
428. HRVD Statement 06033. See also HRVD Statement 07443.
429. Quelicai Uaibitae Document, Submitted to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone.
430. HRVD Statement 07588.
431. See, for example, HRVD Statements 02992, 08225, 05771, 07837, 07990 and 08022.
432. For some of these cases, see HRVD Statements 04899, 06995, 02231, 08022, 05712, 06938, 00128 and 03900.
433. See, for example, CAVR Interviews with Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 11 December 2003; José Manuel do Santos, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004; and José Manuel Monteiro, Remexio, 6 October 2004; and HRVD Statements 06033, 00114, 05056, 07902, 01502, 06995, 02086, 03818, 02056, 07902 and 04878, 02195, 03160, 03179, 02056, 06498, and 00200.
434. Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003.
435. CAVR Interview with Egas da Costa, Dili, 19 May 2004.
436. HRVD Statement 06641.
437. HRVD Statements 03157 and 03160.

438. HRVD Statements 07704, 06033, 05056, 02195 and 05056.
439. HRVD Statements 00114, 02086, 03818 and 00200.
440. HRVD Statement 00200 and CAVR Interview with Maria Fatima Pinto, Dili, 31 May 2004.
441. HRVD Statement 06938 (Metinaro).
442. See also CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
443. CAVR Interview with Antonio Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 11 December 2003; and HRVD Statements 03804, 03818, 05842 and 08024.
444. HRVD Statements 03804 and 03818.
445. HRVD Statements 05842, 08024, 03804 and 03818.
446. HRVD Statement 08024.
447. HRVD Statement 00128.
448. HRVD Statements 03179, 09093, 03562 and 03597.
449. HRVD Statement 03179.
450. HRVD Statements 02123 and 03858.
451. HRVD Statement 02203.
452. HRVD Statement 04675.
453. HRVD Statement 02043.
454. HRVD Statement 03159.
455. HRVD Statement 03045.
456. CAVR, Community Profile, Raça Village, Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém District.
457. HRVD Statement 02137.
458. HRVD Statement 03824.
459. HRVD Statement 00418.
460. HRVD Statement 04384.
461. HRVD 04479 and CAVR, Community Profile, Laclo, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District, 26 June 2003.
462. Angelo Araújo Fernandes, testimony to the CAVR, National Public Hearing on Massacres, CAVR, Dili, 19–21 November 2003.
463. HRVD Statements 00633 and 03033.
464. HRVD Statement 03906.
465. HRVD Statement 05028.
466. HRVD Statement 08013.
467. HRVD Statement 03808.
468. HRVD Statement 08607.
469. HRVD Statement 04384.
470. HRVD Statement 04610
471. HRVD Statements 00403, 02719, 04187, 04992, 03974, 05771, 02056, 01902, 04095, 01711, 03027, 06950, 04604, 05567, 02148, 06950, 06490, 04384, 07612, 09093 and 03114.
472. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
473. See, for example, HRVD Statements 06950, 04604, 09093 and 04148.
474. A Nossa Vitoria, op. cit., p.20.
475. HRVD Statement 04148.
476. CAVR, Community Profile, Puno, Pairara Village Moro Sub-district, Lautém District, undated.
477. HRVD Statement 02056.
478. HRVD Statement 04095. For other examples, see HRVD Statements 02179, 04498, 03114 and 01902.
479. HRVD Statement 02778.
480. HRVD Statement 07149.
481. HRVD Statement 02148.
482. HRVD Statement 07612.
483. HRVD Statement 02098.
484. HRVD Statements 05783 and 04188.
485. HRVD Statement 04188.
486. HRVD Statement 00615 and 00616.
487. Community Profile, Suhu-Rama, Inur Fuik, Sub-District Nain Feto, Dili District.
488. HRVD Statement 04087.
489. Xanana Gusmao, To Resist is to Win!, Aurora Books, Melbourne, 2000, p. 68.
490. Moerdani, article in Sinar Harapan Newpaper, 17 August 1983, cited in Taylor, Indonesia's Forgotten War, p. 143.
491. CAVR Interview with Bernadino Villanova, Ataúro, Dili, 7 March 2002.

492. CAVR Community Profile, Dare, Vera Cruz, West Dili.
493. CAVR Community Profile, Benamauk Village, Camea and Fatuahi, Cristo Rei Sub-district, Dili District.
494. CAVR Community Profile, Becora/Culuhun, Cristo Rei Sub-district, East Dili.
495. HRVD Statement 00177; see also Interview with Justino Mota, Lisbon, 3 July 1984 (Submission to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone).
496. HRVD Statements 09471, 08311, 08063, 08275; Neil Barrett Interview with David Ximenes; and "En Nome de Presos de 10/6/80", CRRN Communiqué, 13 July 1983; Interview with Antonio Barbosa, Lisbon, 5 April 1985 (Submission to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone).
497. HRVD Statements 00072; and interview with Antonio Barbosa, Lisbon, 5 April 1985 (Submission to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone).
498. CAVR Interview with Maria de Fatima Martins, Seloi Malere, Aileu, undated; and HRVD Statement 03217.
499. CAVR Community Profiles, Hera, Cristo Rei Sub-district, East Dili; and Becora/Culuhun, Cristo Rei Sub-district, East Dili.
500. HRVD Statement 01626; and "En Nome de Presos de 10/6/80", CRRN Communiqué, 13 July 1983.
501. Neil Barrett Interview with Maria Imaculada Araújo; Amnesty International Report, 1985; and "En Nome de Presos de 10/6/80", CRRN Communiqué, 13 July 1983.
502. Neil Barrett interview with David Ximenes, Dili 2003.
503. HRVD Statement 05655; Neil Barrett Interviews with Maria Fatima Pinto and Maria Imaculada Araújo.
504. HRVD Statement 00072.
505. HRVD 00076.
506. Neil Barrett Interview with David Ximenes, Dili 2003.
507. Neil Barrett Interviews with David Ximenes and Maria Fatima Pinto, Dili 2003; HRVD Statements 00076, 04864 and 08063.
508. HRVD Statements 03490 and 06983; and "En Nome de Presos de 10/6/80", CRRN Communique, 13 July 1983.
509. HRVD Statement 03490; and Neil Barrett Interview with David Ximenes.
510. HRVD Statement 08735.
511. Neil Barrett Interview with Maria Imaculada Araújo, Dili 2003.
512. HRVD Statement 08275.
513. HRVD 08031; and CAVR, Community Profile, Suhu-Rama, Inur Fuik, Nain Feto Sub-district, East Dili District.
514. CAVR Interview with José Simões, Dili, 9 March 2004.
515. Letter from Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes to Leo Soekoto, Archbishop of Jakarta, 12 July 1980 (Submission to CAVR by Anthony Goldstone).
516. HRVD Statements 09011 and 05010.
517. "En Nome de Presos de 10/6/80", CRRN Communique, 13 July 1983.
518. HRVD Statements 03121 and 00072; and "En Nome de Presos de 10/6/80", CRRN Communiqué, 13 July 1983.
519. HRVD Statement 06961.
520. HRVD Statement 06941.
521. HRVD Statements 05735, 06959 and 06995.
522. CAVR Community Profile, Suhu-Rama, Inur Fuik, Nain Feto Sub-district, Dili District; HRVD Statements 05078 and 08031.
523. HRVD Statement 06956.
524. CAVR Interview with Anselmo Fernandes Xavier, Com, Lautém, 10 October 2003.
525. CAVR Interview with Abilio Quintão Pinto, Iliomar, Lautém, 7 October 2003.
526. Written statement provided to CAVR by Fernando Ximenes, Ossu, Viqueque, 2 October 2003.
527. HRVD Statement 01459.
528. HRVD Statement 04877.
529. CAVR Interviews with João Bosco and Valdemar Sarmento, 14 July 2003; Raimundo Hornay Ximenes, Fatuberliu, Manufahi, 20 October 2003; HRVD Statement 00427.
530. Written statement provided to CAVR by Fernando Ximenes, Ossu, Viqueque, 2 October 2003.
531. Xanana Gusmao, Sarah Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win!, pp. 67-68.
532. CAVR Interviews with José de Jesus dos Santos, Dili, 28 June, 2004; and Cancio da Costa Viegas, September 25, 1981.
533. CAVR Interview s with Anacleto Ximenes, Cairui, Manatuto, 12 March 2004; and Sebastião da Cunha, Manatuto, 12 May 2004.

534. CAVR Interviews with Sebastião da Cunha, Manatuto, 12 May 2004; and José de Jesus dos Santos, Dili, 28 June 2004.
535. CAVR Interview with Sebastião da Cunha, Manatuto, 12 May 2004.
536. CAVR Interview with Anacleto Ximenes, Cairui, Manatuto, 12 March 2004.
537. HRVD Statement 07101.
538. HRVD Statements 04424, 01628, 00801, 05346 and 05331.
539. HRVD Statement 07599.
540. HRVD Statement 05340.
541. HRVD Statement 05358.
542. HRVD Statement 06780
543. CAVR Interview with Dinis Amaral, Dare, Ainaro, 1 June 2003.
544. CAVR Interview with Adelino de Araujo, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 29 May 2003.
545. CAVR Interview with Ana Britos, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 31 May 2003.
546. Statement 6 from CAVR, Research Team, Ainaro Field Report, Dili, 16 January 2003; see also CAVR, Community Profile of Mulo Village, Dare Sub-district, Ainaro District, 2 February 2004.
547. CAVR, Community Profile of Mulo Village, Dare Sub-district, Ainaro District, 2 February 2004.
548. CRRN Communíque, July 1983.
549. HRVD Statement 07181.
550. HRVD Statement 07241.
551. HRVD Statement 07242.
552. HRVD Statement 07253.
553. HRVD Statement 07256.
554. HRVD Statements 07177; 07186 and CAVR list compiled from gravestones in Ainaro.
555. Statement 6 from CAVR, Research Team, Ainaro Field Report, Dili, 16 January 2003.
556. Statement 6 from CAVR, Research Team, Ainaro Field Report, Dili, 16 January 2003.
557. CAVR, Community Profile of Mau Chiga Village, Hato Builico Sub-district, Ainaro District, 17 September 2004.
558. CAVR Interview with XH, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 17 March 2003.
559. CAVR, Community Profile of Nunumogue Village, Hato Builico Sub-district, Ainaro District, 4 February 2004.
560. "List of victims at Mau Chiga", 1982, Submission to CAVR from Abilio dos Santos Belo, 3 June 2003.
561. See CAVR Research Team, Ainaro Field Report, Dili, 16 January 2003.
562. HRVD Statements 02803; 03343; 09152.
563. CAVR Interview with Duarte Gaspar Corte Real, Ainaro, 22 October 2003.
564. CAVR, Community Profile, Bibileo Village, Viqueque Sub-district, Viqueque District.
565. Ibid.
566. CAVR Interviews with Silvino das Dores Soares, Viqueque, 10 March 2004; Geronimo da Costa Amaral, Viqueque, 10 March 2004; and "Interview with Mario Carrascalão", Indonesia 76, October 2003.
567. HRVD Statements 03072; 06062.
568. HRVD Statements 09035; 06039; 07340; CAVR Interview with Honorio Soares de Gonzaga, Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque, 10 March 2004.
569. CAVR Interview with Silvino das Dores Soares, Viqueque, 10 March 2004.
570. Ibid.
571. CAVR Interview with Geronimo da Costa Amaral, Viqueque, 10 March 2004.
572. Serious Crimes Unit interview with José da Costa Carvalho, CAVR Interview with José da Costa Carvalho.
573. CAVR Interview with Olinda Pinto Martins, Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque, 8 November 2003; see also Serious Crimes Unit interviews with Jacinto Gomes (Leki Rubi), Viqueque 11 April 2001, and Antonio Soares (Toni Rubik), Viqueque, 11 April 2001.
574. See CAVR Interview with José Gomes, Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque, 8 December 2003.
575. CAVR Interview with Domingos Amaral, Luca, Viqueque, 18 July 2003. See also HRVD Statement 06025.
576. HRVD Statement 04203.
577. HRVD Statement 04205.
578. HRVD Statements 06050, 06001, 06809, 06798, 07332, 07522, 07523, and 07373.
579. HRVD Statement 07333.
580. HRVD Statement 04142.
581. HRVD Statement 03134.

582. HRVD Statement 04140.
583. HRVD Statement 03051.
584. CAVR Interview with Aleixo Rogério José, Lugasa, Viqueque, 14 December 2003.
585. CAVR Interview with Isabel da Silva, Beaço, Viqueque, 14 December 2003.
586. HRVD Statements 06036, 07432, 07436, 07459, 07482, 07517 and 07518; see also CAVR Interview with Mateus da Silva, Uatolari, Viqueque, 4 October 2003.
587. HRVD Statement 07465.
588. HRVD Statement 07354.
589. HRVD Statement 04143.
590. HRVD Statements 04123; 04144
591. CAVR Interview with Julio dos Santos, Dili, 15 October 2004.
592. CAVR Interview with Antonio dos Santos, Mehara, Tutuala, Lautém, 10 October 2003; HRVD Statement 00791.
593. See CAVR Interviews with Gaspar Seixas and Fernando Amaral; and Document No. 4/Ag/84, Submission to CAVR of Anthony Goldstone, CAVR Archive.
594. CAVR, Field Report of the Displacement and Famine Research Team on the sub-district of Iliomar, 27 May–4 June 2003.
595. CAVR, Community Profile, Iliomar II, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District.
596. CAVR, Community Profiles, Iliomar I, Ailebere and Fuat, all Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District.
597. CAVR, Community Profiles, Tirilolo and Ailebere, both Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District.
598. Trial Documents of Zé Roberto Seixas Miranda Jeronimo (No: 57/PID/B/1984/PN.DIL).
599. HRVD Statement 04371; see also Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar, 2003, p. 25.
600. CAVR, Community Profile, Iliomar I Sub-district, Lautém District; HRVD Statements 03918, 04446, 03973, 04371, and 03985; and Trial Documents of Zé Roberto Seixas Miranda Jeronimo (No: 57/PID/B/1984/PN.DIL).
601. HRVD Statement 03925; see also HRVD Statements 02113; 03924; 03912; 03949; 03986; 03997; 04371; see also Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar, p. 25.
602. HRVD Statement 03928; see also HRVD Statement 09198.
603. HRVD Statements 03911; 04406; see also Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar, 2003, p. 25.
604. HRVD Statement 03960; see also HRVD Statements 03946; 04008; 03920; see also Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar, 2003, p. 25.
605. CAVR, Community Profile, Cainliu Village, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District.
606. HRVD Statements 03946; 04401; 04008; 04406.
607. HRVD Statements 03997; 03973; 09171; 04440.
608. HRVD Statement 00791.
609. CAVR, Community Profile, Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District.
610. HRVD Statements 00737; 00761.
611. HRVD Statement 09151.
612. HRVD Statements 00761; 00726; 00727.
613. HRVD Statement 00707. The killings on 25 November are described in HRVD Statements 00746; 00761; 07092; 00763 and 00755.
614. See Document No. 4/Ag/84, Submission to CAVR, Anthony Goldstone, CAVR Archive.
615. See HRVD Statement 07582.
616. HRVD Statement 01646.
617. Gracilda Guimarães, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003; see also HRVD Statements 00777; 00784; 00787; 09151.
618. See Doc No. 4/Ag/84, Submission to CAVR of Anthony Goldstone, CAVR Archive.
619. Ibid; see also HRVD Statement 05330.
620. HRVD Statement 02794; CAVR Interview with Raul da Costa Pite, Lore, Lospalos, Lautém, 9 October 2003.
621. HRVD Statements 05320, 05330 and 02794; CAVR Interview with Raul da Costa Pite, Lore, Lospalos, Lautém, 9 October 2003; and Document No. 4/Ag/84, Submission to CAVR of Anthony Goldstone, CAVR Archive.
622. HRVD Statement 05399.
623. HRVD Statement 05400.
624. HRVD Statement 07592.
625. HRVD Statements 01674; 05350; 07591 although the names differ slightly.
626. HRVD Statement 07595.
627. HRVD Statement 00768.

628. HRVD Statement 02295.
629. HRVD Statements 07606; 07613; HRVD Statement 07604 reports that Antonio and Pedro were killed in 1984.
630. HRVD Statement 07613.
631. HRVD Statement 07801.
632. HRVD Statement 08748.
633. HRVD Statement 08726.
634. HRVD Statement 07618; see Document No. 4/Ag/84, Submission to CAVR, Anthony Goldstone, CAVR Archive; see also CAVR Interview with Julio dos Santos, Dili, 15 October 2004.
635. See CAVR Interview with Gonzalo da Silva, 8 October 2003.
636. Mariana Marques, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.
637. HRVD Statement 02789.
638. HRVD Statement 05355.
639. HRVD Statements 02344, 02310, 02369, 00567 and 06098.
640. HRVD Statements 02310; 0609.
641. HRVD Statement 06114.
642. HRVD Statement 00584.
643. HRVD Statement 08117.
644. HRVD Statement 00553.
645. HRVD Statement 07050.
646. HRVD Statement 08601.
647. HRVD Statements 02401; 03808.
648. "Letter from a priest in East-Timor of July 14th, 1984", Submission to CAVR, by Anthony Goldstone; and HRVD Statements 07679; 08610.
649. HRVD Statement 03834.
650. HRVD Statement 07060.
651. HRVD Statements 02374, 02373 and 02388.
652. HRVD Statement 05234.
653. HRVD Statement 08762.
654. HRVD Statement 08039.
655. HRVD Statement 00182.
656. HRVD Statement 06767.
657. HRVD Statement 05776.
658. HRVD Statement 05024.
659. HRVD Statements 03602 and 07064; CAVR Interview with Henrique Belmiro, 25 May 2004, Comoro, Dili; Assepol Submission to the CAVR: Political Prisoners in East Timor, 25 April 1974-September 1999; Interview with Antonio Tomás Amaral da Costa (Antonio Aitahan Matak), Dili, 16 October 1984
660. HRVD Statement 01437.
661. HRVD Statements 01410; 04154; 01407; 01408; 01454; 01471.
662. HRVD Statement 04772.
663. HRVD Statement 03430.
664. HRVD Statements 04807; 04783.
665. HRVD Statement 04787.
666. HRVD Statement 04772.
667. HRVD Statement 09044.
668. HRVD Statements 03437; 03452; 03476; 03430; 04024.
669. HRVD Statement 03782.
670. "Report of events in Ainaro District, especially May 1984," photocopy held by CAVR, dated June 1984.
671. HRVD Statements 02803; 02051.
672. HRVD Statements 03341; 03343; 09152.
673. CAVR Interview with Duarte Gaspar Corte Real, Ainaro, 22 October 2003.
674. CAVR Interview with Olandino Guterres, Dili, 7 June 2004.
675. HRVD Statements 05156; 05157; 05169; 06681; 07168; 07172; 08143; 08182; 08187 report cases of individuals detained in Bobonaro and Zumalai during 1984 and taken to the Koramil in Bobonaro.
676. CAVR Interview with Lucio Dinis Marques, Raifun, Maliana, Bobonaro, 13 June 2003.
677. CAVR Interview with Armando dos Santos, Maliana, 13 June 2003.

678. HRVD Statement 05156.
679. HRVD Statement 05203.
680. HRVD Statement 08553.
681. HRVD Statement 03695.
682. HRVD Statements 07172; 08143.
683. HRVD Statement 07172; CAVR Interview with Olandino Guterres, Dili, 7 June 2004.
684. "Relação de acusados e mortos pelas forcas da Indonesia em Koramil de Bobonaro no Ano de 1984," ("Report of accused killings by the Indonesian military at the Bobonaro Koramil in the year 1984), Submission to CAVR by Armando dos Santos, Maliana, Bobonaro, 13 June 2003.
685. HRVD Statement 00924.
686. HRVD Statement 02108.
687. HRVD Statement 00965.
688. HRVD Statement 00970.
689. HRVD Statement 00992.
690. HRVD Statement 00946.
691. HRVD Statement 01000.
692. HRVD Statements 00205; 03547.
693. HRVD Statement 05323.
694. HRVD Statement 07661.
695. HRVD Statement 03902.
696. HRVD Statement 07444.
697. HRVD Statement 07602.
698. Amnesty International, 21 December 1987.
699. HRVD Statement 04161.
700. HRVD Statement 06022; CAVR Interview with Roque Soares Pinto, Beaço, Viqueque, Viqueque, 3 October 2003.
701. HRVD Statement 03916.
702. HRVD Statement 01612; CAVR Interview with Julio dos Santos, Dili, 15 October 2004. According to Julio dos Santos, Josefina was killed in 1985.
703. HRVD Statement 06029.
704. HRVD Statement 00427.
705. HRVD Statement 06052.
706. HRVD Statement 01605.
707. HRVD Statement 01640; CAVR Interview with Julio dos Santos, Dili, 15 October 2004.
708. HRVD Statement 04437; CAVR, Community Profile, Ailebere Village, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District, 24 July 2003; and Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar: Resistance in Rural East Timor, pp. 27–28.
709. HRVD Statement 05320.
710. HRVD Statement 06073.
711. HRVD Statement 02136.
712. HRVD Statement 05349.
713. HRVD Statement 03138.
714. HRVD Statement 09163.
715. HRVD Statement 00436.
716. HRVD Statements 03899 and 02337.
717. HRVD Statement 06122.
718. HRVD Statement 00585.
719. HRVD Statement 03873.
720. HRVD Statement 04102.
721. HRVD Statement 04716.
722. HRVD Statement 03388.
723. HRVD Statement 01357.
724. HRVD Statement 02164.
725. HRVD Statement 01674.
726. HRVD Statement 09189.
727. HRVD Statement 03771.
728. UNPOL [United Nations Police] Historical Crime Unit interview with Jacinto Alves, 11 June 2001.
729. See the matrix of interviews attached to Special Report on the Result of the Investigation of Riot-Control Officers at the 12 November 1991 Demonstration, No. Lapsus/03/XII/1991, January 1992

730. CAVR Interview with Marcio da Graça Ximenes Cipriano Gonçalves, 28 November 2004. See also United Nations Transitional Authority in East Timor [UNTAET] National Investigations Unit [NIU, Civilian Police], interview with José João Lemos Aniceto, 21 March 2001.
731. For instance, see Russell Anderson, Statement on the Massacre in East Timor on 12 November 1991, first submitted to the Joint Parliamentary Committee for Trade and Defence (Australia), 2 December 1991.
732. Simplicio Celestino de Deus, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.
733. State Court in Dili, Case Dossier (Bundle A), No. 13/Pid/B/1992/PN DIL.
734. CAVR Interview with Aviano Antonio Faria, 16 October 2003.
735. CAVR Interview with Antonio Dias.
736. CAVR Interview with Inocêncio da Costa Maria Freitas, Dili, 27 November 2004.
737. CAVR Interview with Aviano Antonio Faria, Portugal, 16 October 2003.
738. State Court in Dili, op. cit. Case Dossier (Bundle A), No. 13/Pid/B/1992/PN DIL. p. 93.
739. CAVR Interview with Fernando Tilman, Dili, 28 November 2004.
740. Asia Watch, East Timor: The November 12 Massacre and its Aftermath, Asia Watch Report, Vol. 3, No. 26, 12 December 1991.
741. Advance Report of the National Commission of Inquiry into 12 November 1991 Incident in Dili, 26 December 1991. In Heike Krieger (ed.), East Timor and the International Community: Basic Documents, 1997, pp. 256-259.
742. Komisi Penyelidikan Nasional, Indonesian National Commission of Enquiry.
743. Asociação Oikoumenis and A Paz e Possivel em Timor Leste [Peace is Possible in East Timor] (Editor), East Timor after Santa Cruz: Indonesia and the International Order. Editor, Lisbon, Portugal, January 1993. Commission on Human Rights, Report of the Secretary-General on the Situation in East Timor, 31 January 1995, Annexe I: Information provided by the Government of Indonesia. E/CN.4/1995/72. The estimate of those killed varies from 50 to 100 to 200 to 271. See CDPM and Peace is Possible in East Timor after Santa Cruz, 1993.
744. See suspect No. 9 in Result of the Investigation of Riot-Control Officers at the 12 November 1991 Demonstration, No. Lapsus/03/XII/1991, January 1992
745. See, for example, CAVR Community Profile Iliomar II, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District, which says that 12 people from Iliomar, who attended the Santa Cruz demonstration, were killed or "disappeared".
746. HRVD Statement 02049.
747. HRVD Statements 02049 and 04964.
748. For graves at Tibar, see United Nations Transitional Authority in East Timor [UNTAET] National Investigations Unit [NIU, Civilian Police], interviews with Paul da Silva de Jesus, 7 April 2001; Matias Guterres, 30 March 2001; and Manuel Soares alias Amanu, 11 August 2001.
749. United Nations, "Report by the Special Rapporteur Bacre Waly Ndiaye, on his mission to Indonesia and East Timor from 3 to 13 July 1994", E/CN.4/1995/61/Add.1, 1 November 1994, Paragraph 69.
750. UN Document E/CN4/1995/61/Add.1. Referred to as the Ndiaye Report.
751. Ibid.
752. Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions, recommended by Economic and Social Council Resolution 1989/65 of 24 May 1989. Annexe, 1989 UN ESCOR Supp. (No. 1) at 52, UN Doc. E/1989/89 (1989).
753. Surat Perintah Penyidikan Order of Investigation No.POL: SPRIN/1090/XI/1991/SERSE.
754. Police Report No.POL:LP/611/XI/1991/PAMAPTA.
755. Daftar Barang Bukti (List of Evidence), prepared by M. Tutuhatunewa.
756. Second Military Police Report, infra.
757. Ndiaye Report, para. 52.
758. Ibid. para.56.
759. Ibid. para.57.
760. Statement of Joana Dias, 4 August 2001, provided to UNTAET Civpol; Statement of Simão Pedro Ribeiro, 12 August 2001, provided to UNTAET Civpol.
761. First Military Police Report: Special Report: Brief Summary of the Results of the Investigation of the managing Officials of the Anti-integration Group and its Supporters' Demonstration on 12 November 1991, dated 26 November 1991, by the Military Police for Military Region IX, Udayana. (Laporan Khusus Nomor Lapsus/487/XI/1991, Resume Singkat Hasil Pemeriksaan Para Petugas Pengendali Unjuk Rasa Kelompok Anti Integrasi dan Pendukungnya pada tanggal 12 Nopember 1991, dated 26 November 1991, by Polisi Militer Daerah Militer IX, Udayana, Detasemen IX/4).

Second Military Police Report: Report of the Investigation into the events of 12 November 1991, by the Military Police dated December 1991, dated December 1991 (no day entered). [Laporan Pengusutan Ke Dalam Peristiwa 12 Nopember 1991 Nomor: R/488/XII/1991, Polisi Militer Daerah Militer IX, Udayana Detasemen-IX/4]; and

Third Military Police Report*: Special Report about the Results of the Investigation into the PHH officials at the Demonstration of 12 November 1991,* dated January 1992, by the Military Police for Udayana region. [Laporan Khusus Tentang Hasil Penyelidikan Terhadap Petugas PHH pada Demonstrasi tanggal 12 Nopember 1991, January 1992, Polisi Militer Daerah Militer IX, Udayana, Detasemen IX/4]. This report contained a five-page signed and sealed report from deputy commander Major Hawas Mu'in.

762. Police Report no: LP-28/A-22/Military Police Detachment Unit IX/4/1991, 12 November 1991.
763. Third Military Police Report: Special Report about the Results of the Investigation into the PHH officials at the Demonstration of 12 November 1991, dated January 1992, by the Military Police for Udayana region.
764. Ibid, p. 4.
765. Ibid, p. 4-5.
766. Record at Site of Incident, 14 November 1991, Case Dossier in the case against Aloysius Rani.
767. Ndiaye Report, par. 47.
768. Berita Acara Persidangan (Transcript of the hearing) No. 15/Pid/B/1992/PN.DIL, 7 May 1992, p.100.
769. First record of interview of Second Lieutenant Mursanib
770. Third Record of Interview of Second Lieutenant Mursanib, 21 March 1992, answer to question q.6 b5.
771. According to Asia Watch in East Timor: The Massacre Courts-Martial, p. 4, Mursanib was the head of the social and political section of the Kodim (Kasi Sospol).
772. Ndiaye Report, para.29.
773. Ndiaye Report, para.57(d).
774. Presidential Decree No. 53/1991 dated 18 November 1991 on The Establishment of National Commission of Inquiry on 12 November 1991 Event/Incident in East Timor.
775. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor – Santa Cruz: The Government Response, AI Index: ASA 21/03/92, February 1992, Chapter 2.2.
776. Preliminary Report of the National Commission of Inquiry, 26 November 1991, Jakarta, reproduced as an Annexe to the Ndiaye Report.
777. Ndiaye Report.
778. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor – Santa Cruz: The Government Response, AI Index: ASA 21/03/92, February 1992, Chapter 2.2.
779. Preliminary Report of the National Commission of Inquiry, 26 November 1991, Jakarta, reproduced as an Annexe to the Ndiaye Report.
780. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor – Santa Cruz: The Government Response, AI Index: ASA 21/03/92, February 1992.
781. Ndiaye Report, para.79.
782. Asia Watch, The Massacre Courts-Martial, 23 June 1992, Vol. 4, Number 16, p.2.
783. Letter dated 27 February 1992 from the Permanent Representative of Indonesia to the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights, see UN Doc. E/CN.4/1992/79.
784. Ndiaye Report, para.35.
785. Appendix 3: Officers Disciplined After the Santa Cruz Massacre, in Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor: the Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a follow-up to the Dili Massacre, Vol. 5, No. 8, April 1993.
786. Asia Watch, The Massacre Courts-Martial, p.6.
787. Ibid.
788. Ndiaye Report, para.70(g).
789. Asia Watch, The Massacre Courts-Martial, p.1.
790. Asia Watch, The Massacre Courts-Martial, 23 June 1992, Vol. 4, Number 16; Remembering History in East Timor: the Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a follow-up to the Dili Massacre, Vol. 5, No. 8, April 1993.
791. Second Military Police Report, p.6.
792. Records of Interview on Aloysius Rani, p. 2-4, in an Annexe to the Second Military Police Report.
793. Ibid. para. 60.
794. Ndiaye Report, para.70.
795. Amnesty International, Indonesia and East Timor: Twenty years of violations: statement before the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization, 1995, p. 7.

796. HRVD Statement 02994.
797. CAVR Interview with Jacinta Alves Correia, Gariana, Maubara, Liquiçá, 19 June 2004; and HRVD Statements 02994 and 03004.
798. HRVD Statement 02994.
799. CAVR Interview with Clementino Amaral, Dili,11 June 2004.
800. CAVR Interview with Father Rui Gomes, Baucau, 28 May 2004.
801. ETISC (East Timor International Support Centre), From the road to Dili to the shootings in Baucau, 1 July 1998.
802. CAVR Interview with Father Rui Gomes, Baucau, 28 May 2004.
803. See "Indonesian army apologizes for Timorese death; East Timorese protest against death of youth, Dili, East Timor", Reuters, 17 June 1998; see also "A Legacy of Bitterness", Asiaweek, 8 August 1998.
804. Statement by Constancio Pinto before the United Nations Committee on Decolonization on behalf of National Resistance of East Timorese Students (RENETIL), New York, July 1998; United Nations A/AC.109/2111/Add.1 General Assembly, 30 June 1998, Special Committee on the Situation with Regard to the Implementation of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, East Timor Working Paper prepared by the Secretariat.
805. Amnesty International release, ASA 21/108/98; ETHRC (East Timor Human Rights Centre) Report, 28 February 1999, p. 166.
806. HRVD Statement 03461.
807. HRVD Statements 01507, 01521 01545 and 09019.
808. HRVD Statements 01558; 01603; 03402; 01583; CAVR Interview with Anibal Franca da Costa, Manufahi, [undated].
809. HRVD Statement 03402.
810. HRVD Statements 01558, 01603, 03402, and 01583.
811. HRVD Statement 01531.
812. HRVD Statements 01522.
813. HRVD Statement 04042
814. HRVD Statement 04061.
815. HRVD Statements 01572; 03467; 04042.
816. Geoffrey Robinson, East Timor 1999: Crimes against Humanity – A Report Commissioned by the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, 2003, [Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR], p. 181
817. Ibid, p 202.
818. HRVD Statements 01197; 01115; 01156; 01140; 04317; 01116.
819. HRVD Statement 08161.
820. HRVD Statements 07820; 07051.
821. HRVD Statement 08167.
822. HRVD Statement 06177.
823. HRVD Statement 08161.
824. HRVD Statements 02912
825. HRVD Statement 02641.
826. HRVD Statement 03476.
827. See CAVR Interview with Agostinho Boavida Ximenes (Sera Malik), 28 August 2004, Soe (West Timor Indonesia).
828. HRVD Statement 07758.
829. HRVD Statement 05043.
830. HRVD Statement 08916.
831. HRVD Statement 07280.
832. HRVD Statement 04033.
833. HRVD Statement 05278.
834. HRVD Statements 09020 and 04883.
835. HRVD Statement 06622, CAVR Interview with Martinho de Jesus, Matorek, Manufahi, 6 June 2003.
836. HRVD Statement 07078.
837. HRVD Statement 05335.
838. HRVD Statement 00638.
839. CAVR Interview with Aleixo Rogerio José, Lugasa (Viqueque, Viqueque), 14 December 2003.
840. Interview with Jacobs, dated 4 August 1982, Anthony Goldstone, submission to CAVR. CAVR Archive.
841. HRVD Statements 08028 and 08030.
842. HRVD Statement 00522.

843. HRVD Statement 01570.
844. HRVD Statement 02299; see also HRVD Statement 02296 and Statement 01620 (which incorrectly reports the attack in 1983); see also CAVR Interview with Anselmo Fernandes Xavier and Edmundo da Cruz, Com, Lautém, 10 October 2003.
845. HRVD Statement 05371.
846. HRVD Statement 07840, 08719, 06515.
847. See HRVD Statement 07340 (killing of a man named Cosme in Bahatata (Uato Carbau, Viqueque), HRVD Statement 07776 (killing of a village head named Eugenio in Maluro (Quelicai, Baucau), and HRVD Statement 07615 (killing of a Hansip member Sico Hornay and a woman named Joanna in Home (Lospalos, Lautém).
848. Fretilin/Conselho Revolucionario de Resistencia Nacional (National Council of Maubere Resistance, CNRM), Mensagem de Saudação, Lisbon 1985.
849. HRVD Statement 02719.
850. HRVD Statement 04767.
851. HRVD Statement 01931 (in Manatuto) and Statement 04439 (in Lautém).
852. HRVD Statement 00425.
853. HRVD Statement 04008.
854. HRVD Statement 09198 (Iliomar, Lautém), HRVD Statement 04154 (Bibileo, Viqueque), HRVD Statement 03822 (Vemasse, Baucau) and HRVD Statements 09002, 09015, 09019 and 06022 (Tautudak, Manatuto), and HRVD Statement 05810 (Faturasa, Aileu).
855. HRVD Statement 01931.
856. HRVD Statement 03197.
857. HRVD Statement 03420.
858. HRVD Statement 06483.
859. HRVD Statement 02301. See also "Soal Tewasnya Dua Guru di Timtim, Dunia Pendidikan Sesalkan Tindakan Brutal," (The deaths of two teachers in East Timor, the education world regrets brutal act) Republika, 7 June 1997, and Human Rights Watch.
860. HRVD Statement 07783.
861. See HRVD Statements 05766, 05078, and 05074 for information on arrests following the attack.
862. HRVD Statement 03179.
863. HRVD Statements 04231, 01116 and 05532; and CAVR Interviews with Rosana Barros, Bendito Gomes Aldeia and Iria Paula (all Cailaco, Bobonaro, 14 June 2004) and Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004.
864. HRVD Statement 03813.
865. HRVD Statement 05626.
866. Examples include HRVD Statements 08259, 08244 and 03530 (all Ermera).
867. HRVD Statement 00710.
868. Also reported in Amnesty International, "East Timor: Seize the Moment", AI Index: ASA 21/49/99, 21 June 1999.
869. Ibid.
870. HRVD Statement 6740.
871. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Col. Herman Sedyoso, et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraphs 215-225.
872. Ibid, paragraphs 226-230.
873. Ibid, paragraphs 231-236.
874. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p. 192.
875. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Leoneto Martins, et al., Case No. 21/2001, paragraphs 85-95.
876. HRVD Statements 0082; 1823; 1963; 4644; 4669; 5876; 9191; 0276; 2326; 4614; 5860; 5944; 0196.
877. Herminia Mendes, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19–21 November 2003.
878. Deposition of Father Rafael dos Santos, recorded and compiled in Sydney, Australia on 27–28 October, 1999, p. 8, quoted in Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p. 194.
879. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, pp. 192-196
880. HRVD Statement 0082.
881. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p. 195.
882. On the following three killings, General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Leoneto Martins, et al., Case No. 2001/21, paragraphs 80-84, 126, 129-132.
883. HRVD Statement 0196.
884. HRVD Statement 2983.

885. HRVD Statement 1001.
886. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Leoneto Martins, et al., Case No. 2001/21, paragraphs 133-136.
887. HRVD Statement 4701.
888. Herminia Mendes, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, Dili, 19–21 November 2003.
889. HRVD Statement 4231.
890. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p. 198.
891. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Burhanuddin Siagian et al., Case No. 02/2003, paragraph 51.
892. Ibid, paragraphs 84-101; CAVR Interview with Bendito Gomes Aldeia, Marco, Cailaco, Bobonaro, 14 June 2004.
893. CAVR Interview with Rosano Barros, Marco, Cailaco, Bobonaro, 14 June 2004.
894. HRVD Statement 5535; CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004.
895. CAVR Interview with Iria Paula, Purogoa, Meligo, Cailaco, Bobonaro, 14 June 2004.
896. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, pp. 197-200.
897. Regarding the apprehension of Aprigio Mali Tae and Carlos [Sama-Lelo], and the executions of Cornelio Rosa [sic] da Silva, Antonio Basilio and Armando [Berlaku], see CAVR Interview with Bendito Gomes Aldeia, Marco, Cailaco (Bobonaro), 14 June 2004; regarding the execution of Aprigio Mali Tae and Carlos Sama-Lelo see Adriano João, "Kasus eksekusi 12-04-99 di Cailaco" ["Case of 12-04-99 execution in Cailaco"], unpublished manuscript, 10 June 2004 (CAVR Archive), and Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Burhanuddin Siagian, et al., Case No. 02/2003, paragraphs 121-126; regarding execution of Armando Berlaku see HRVD Statement 2544; regarding executions of José Barros and Cornelio Rodrigues da Silva, see eyewitness account given by Cornelio's wife in HRVD Statement 5507.
898. CAVR Interview with Bendito Gomes, Marco, Cailaco, Bobonaro, 14 June 2004; Adriano João, "Kasus eksekusi 12-04-99 di Cailaco" ["Case of 12-04-99 execution in Cailaco"], unpublished manuscript, 10 June 2004, CAVR Archive.
899. HRVD Statements 5639-02; 6749; 6680; 6687.
900. CAVR, Field Report, Gravestone Survey Research Team, Lebocoe (Maubara, Liquiçá), 21 October 2003; HRVD Statements 4661; 6940.
901. Confirmed by Irish Foreign Minister David Andrews and Basilio Araújo who were present when this conversation took place.
902. HRVD Statement 05732; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Eurico Guterres, et al., Case No. 02/2002, paragraph 26.
903. HRVD Statements 0116; 0159; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Marcelino Soares, Case No. 11/2003, paragraphs 14-20.
904. HRVD Statement 0135; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Mateus de Carvalho, et al., Case No. 24/2003, paragraphs 34-39.
905. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Mateus de Carvalho et al., Case No. 24/2003, paragraphs 40-49.
906. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Col. Herman Sedyoso et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraph 180.
907. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Cancio Lopes de Carvalho et al., Case No. 06/2003, paragraphs 29-60.
908. Ibid, paragraphs 61-73.
909. HRVD Statement 3655.
910. HRVD Statement 5206.
911. HRVD Statement 8423; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Col. Herman Sedyoso et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraph 167.
912. HRVD Statement 6258.
913. HRVD Statement 8544; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Col. Herman Sedyoso et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraph 195.
914. Ibid, paragraph 201.
915. Ibid, paragraph 204.
916. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Egidio Manek et al., Case No. 9/2003, paragraph 131.
917. HRVD Statements 8578; 8414; 8595.
918. HRVD Statement 9031.
919. HRVD Statement 4585.

920. HRVD Statement 9031.
921. HRVD Statement 2530.
922. HRVD Statement 4597.
923. HRVD Statement 9471.
924. HRVD Statement 4598.
925. HRVD Statements 3557; 3573.
926. HRVD Statement 5485. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Bernadino da Costa, Case No. 03/2002, paragraphs 30-36.
927. HRVD Statement 5488. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Bernadino da Costa, Case No. 03/2002, paragraphs 24-29.
928. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Nazario Vital dos Santos Corte Real, et al., Case No. 13/2004, paragraphs 28-31.
929. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p. 155.
930. HRVD Statements 8104; 0135 [killing by Aitarak in Metinaro in April]; 0159 [João Bosco, Luis Diaz disappeared in Hera]; 3757 [Luis Diaz in Hera]; 0116 [Luis Diaz in Hera]; 3886; 8068 and 8104.
931. HRVD Statement 3655.
932. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, pp. 206-207; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Mateus de Carvalho, et al., Case No. 2003/24, paragraphs 50-56.
933. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Armando dos Santos, Case No. 2001/16, paragraphs 13-16.
934. HRVD Statement 4678.
935. HRVD Statement 7825.
936. HRVD Statement 3883-03.
937. HRVD Statements 6493; 6496.
938. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 162; HRVD Statements 8385; 8296; 8295; 3510; 1705.
939. HRVD Statements 3886; 8068. The name of the victim is alternatively referred to as Eugenio Fatima.
940. HRVD Statement 8104.
941. HRVD Statements 2163; 2502; 2503; 2522; 2558; 3551.
942. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 172.
943. Ibid, p. 166, citing Dili District court judgment, Joni Marques, et al., at 53-57; 08739.
944. HRVD Statements 0404; 0467; 0469; 0470; 0471; 0475; 0477.
945. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Maliana Indictiment, Case No. 2003/18; HRVD Statements 6756; 6760; 8241-03.
946. HRVD Statement 4645.
947. HRVD Statement 1831.
948. HRVD Statement 0290.
949. HRVD Statement 2700; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Cancio Lopes de Carvalho and others, Case No. 2003/06; OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 136.
950. HRVD Statement 2007.
951. HRVD Statement 6132.
952. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Richard Hutadjulu and others, Case No. 33/2003.
953. East Timor Human Rights Centre, SR1/99.
954. HRVD Statements 3779; East Timor Human Rights Centre, SR 1/99.
955. HRVD Statement 6418.
956. HRVD Statements 6429; 6436. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Sergio da Costa, Case No. 2001/12.
957. HRVD Statement 6421.
958. HRVD Statement 6360.
959. HRVD Statement 4520.
960. HRVD Statement 6211.
961. HRVD Statement 6209.
962. HRVD Statement 1021.
963. HRVD Statement 5323.
964. General Prosecutor for the UNTAET, Indictment against Joni Marques et al., Case No. 9/2000, paragraphs 18-20; HRVD Statement 8739.
965. East Timor Human Rights Centre, SR 1/99.
966. HRVD Statement 2661.
967. General Prosecutor, Indictment against Vidal Doutel Sarmento et al., Case No. 11/2002, paragraphs 22-25.

968. HRVD Statement 0643.
969. HRVD Statement 1312; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Nazario Vital dos Santos Corte Real et al., Case No. 13/2004, paragraphs 35-42.
970. HRVD Statement 1603.
971. HRVD Statement 1512.
972. HRVD Statement 9045.
973. HRVD Statement 6899.
974. HRVD Statements 0404; 0467; 0469; 0470; 0475.
975. HRVD Statement 0479.
976. HRVD Statement 1872.
977. HRVD Statement 1169.
978. HRVD Statement 8219.
979. Deputy Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Maliana Indictment, Case No. 18/2003; HRVD Statement 0241.
980. HRVD Statement 8204.
981. HRVD Statement 5743.
982. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 156.
983. Ibid, p. 156.
984. HRVD Statement 5096.
985. HRVD Statements 8943; 8946; 8951; 2947; 8943.
986. HRVD Statements 0374; 0876.
987. HRVD Statement 00876 (Inácio Haumetan killed, one other attempted murder); 2632 (Hendrikus Oki killed by BMP, Aitarak, TNI and police); 2857 (Henrik Oki by BMP).
988. HRVD Statements 6896; 6901; 8940 – Saturlino and Tomás Nino.
989. HRVD Statements 6211; 6377.
990. HRVD Statement 6209.
991. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Leoneto Martins et al., Case No. 21/2001, paragraphs 141-147; HRVD Statement 2985.
992. HRVD Statement 1997.
993. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, pp. 189-190; HRVD Statement 4127.
994. CAVR Interview with Helena de Araújo, Dili, 17 September 2003.
995. CAVR Research Team, A CAVR research report on the Kuluhun shooting incident, 19 March 2005. CAVR Archive.
996. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Col. Herman Sedyoso et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraphs 237-253.
997. General Prosecutor of the Democratic Republic of East Timor, Indictment against Edmundo da Conceição da Silva et al., Case No. 12a/2002, paragraphs 21-45.
998. HRVD Statement 0923.
999. HRVD Statements 2434; 2451 (Raoul dos Santos, Paulino); 2462 (Jaime, Felis Laku).
1000. HRVD Statement 2451.
1001. HRVD Statements 2917; see also 2919; 2943.
1002. HRVD Statements 2615; 2616; 2617; 2619; 2625; 2634; 2635.
1003. HRVD Statements 5463; 5464. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Bernadino da Costa, Case No. 3/2002, paragraphs 40-44.
1004. HRVD Statements 4578; 6448.
1005. HRVD Statements (Manuel Oliveira) 2160; 2163; 2509; 4553.
1006. HRVD Statement 6200.
1007. HRVD Statements 4545; 4562; 6201.
1008. Deputy Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Maliana Indictment, Case No. 18/2003.
1009. HRVD Statement 2221.
1010. HRVD Statement 8335.
1011. Amnesty International, "Timor-Leste: Victims of crimes against humanity still wait for justice", 29 August 2003 with update 8 January 2004, http://web.amnesty.org/pages/tmp-290803-background-eng at 18 July 2005.
1012. HRVD Statement 9471.
1013. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p. 217, n. 68.
1014. Ibid, pp. 221-224; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Eurico Guterres, et al., Case No. 13/2003, paragraphs 27-77. HRVD Statements 5664 (Vicente da Costa Carlos Tilman's disappearance from the Bishop's residence); 5678 (disappearance from Bidau Santana after being moved from the Bishop's residence after attack).

1015. HRVD Statement 05664.
1016. HRVD Statements 05734; 05678.
1017. HRVD Statement 6351 (attack on Aidila forces refugees to seek shelter in church on 6 September).
1018. HRVD Statements 6333; 7219; 7276; 8435.
1019. HRVD Statements 07390; 08345; 09009.
1020. HRVD Statement 6351.
1021. HRVD Statement 1266.
1022. HRVD Statement 7219.
1023. Fokupers, Gender-based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004; HRVD Statement F9323.
1024. Feliciana Cardoso, Statement prepared by CAVR from the Interview with Feliciana Cardoso, 12 April 2003, for the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, 28–29 April 2003.
1025. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, pp. 237-239.
1026. HRVD Statement 5965; OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 135.
1027. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Maliana Indictment, Case No. 18/2003, paragraphs 128-190.
1028. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p. 233; CAVR Interview with Domingas Verdial, Mugis, Maliana, 15 June 2004.
1029. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Maliana Indictment, Case No. 18/2003, paragraphs 191-220.
1030. HRVD Statement 2587; CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004.
1031. CAVR Interview with Domingas Verdial, Mugis, Maliana, 15 June 2004.
1032. CAVR Interview with Adelino G. Brito, 15 June 2004.
1033. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p.158.
1034. General Prosecutor of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste, Indictment against Maj. Jacob Djoko Saros and Lt. Camilo dos Santos, Case No. 10/2002, paragraphs 54-57.
1035. Ibid, paragraphs 62-86.
1036. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p. 242.
1037. General Prosecutor of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste, Indictment against Maj. Jacob Djoko Saros and Lt. Camilo dos Santos, Case No. 10/2002, paragraphs 95-107.
1038. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p. 243.
1039. Ibid, p. 244.
1040. HRVD Statements 2675; 2718; 5005; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Cancio Lopes de Carvalho et al., Case No. 6/2003, paragraphs 36-58; F. Rawski, "Truth-Seeking and Local Histories in East Timor", Asia Pacific Journal on Human Rights and the Law 1:77-96, 2002.
1041. HRVD Statements 2675, 2718; 5005.
1042. Fokupers, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, Statement 99AIN007.
1043. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Simão Lopes, et al., Case No. 20/2001, paragraphs 56-63.
1044. HRVD Statements 2832; 2836.
1045. HRVD Statement 2804.
1046. HRVD Statement 2828.
1047. General Prosecutor of UNTAET, Indictment against Simão Lopes, et al., Case No. 2001/20.
1048. HRVD Statements 2804; 2806; 2832; 2814; 2819 ; 2837; 6895; 6893; 6901; 6910.
1049. HRVD Statement 6893.
1050. HRVD Statement 2837.
1051. HRVD Statements 0372; 0375; 0377; 0811; 0831; 0832; 0833; 0834; 0838; 0839; 0840; 0865; 0869; 2972; 0384; General Prosecutor of the Democratic Republic of East Timor, Amended Indictment against Laurentino Soares (aka Moko) and Bonifacio Bobo (aka Bone), Case No. 13/2002 (OE-4-99-SC), paragraphs 17-22.
1052. For other killings on 20 October, see also HRVD Statements 0368; 0371; 0377; 0384; 0389; 0841; 0865; 0870; 8952.
1053. HRVD Statement 0377 (statement from Matias Slaen).
1054. HRVD Statement 6270; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Egidio Manek, et al., Case No. 9/2003, paragraphs 302-316.
1055. HRVD Statements 6940; 8981; 8993.
1056. Fokupers, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, HRVD F9367.
1057. Sugeng Prayudi, Winston Rondo and Matheus Krivo, "'Not Eno': Documentation of information dissemination program on CAVR by West Timor NGO Coalition", submission of West Timor NGO Coalition to CAVR, June 2003, p. 29.

1058. "Upaya Penuntasan Penyelesainya Penanganan Pengungsi Eks Timor Timur (sejak tahun 1999 s/d 2003)", ["Effort at Total Solution to Handling Former East Timor Refugees (from 1999–2003)"]; document Satkorlak PBP NTT, Kupang, 2003.
1059. Dolan, C., Large, J. and Obi, N., Evaluation of UNHCR's Repatriation and Reintegration Programme in East Timor, 1999–2003, Geneva: UNHCR, Evaluation and Policy Analysis Unit, February 2004, p. 12
1060. HRVD Statement 3513.
1061. HRVD Statement 5675.
1062. HRVD Statement 5188.
1063. HRVD Statement 8095.
1064. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Anastacio Martins and Domingos Gonçalves, Case No. 11/2001, paragraphs 46-52.
1065. HRVD Statement 8335.
1066. HRVD Statement 4836.
1067. HRVD Statement 5718.
1068. HRVD Statement 7153.
1069. HRVD Statement 7155.
1070. HRVD Statement 2588.
1071. HRVD Statement 3706.
1072. HRVD Statement 2645.
1073. HRVD Statements 2820; 2880.
1074. HRVD Statement 2825.
1075. HRVD Statement 2887.
1076. HRVD Statement 4835.
1077. HRVD Statement 4907.
1078. HRVD Statements 3266; 3269; 4839. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Domingos Alberto Carlos, Carlos Jose and Almeida Martins (aka Almeida Soares), Case No. 20/2003, paragraphs 17-41.
1079. HRVD Statement 3269.
1080. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Gaspar Leite, Case No. 05/2001.
1081. HRVD Statement 3230.
1082. HRVD Statement 3227.
1083. HRVD Statement 3580.
1084. HRVD Statement 3229.
1085. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Adolf Amaral, Case No. 35/2003.
1086. HRVD Statement 2089.
1087. HRVD Statement 5789.
1088. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Anigio de Oliveira, Case No. 07/2001.
1089. HRVD Statements 2008; 2676.
1090. HRVD Statement 7408.
1091. HRVD Statement 1312.
1092. HRVD Statements 1308; 1329; 1373; 1375.
1093. HRVD Statement 1353.
1094. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Richard Hutadjulu and others, Case No. 2003/33.
1095. HRVD Statement 7089.
1096. HRVD Statement 2362; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Richard Hutadjulu and others, Case No. 33/2003.
1097. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Richard Hutadjulu and others, Case No. 2003/33. See also HRVD Statements 2362; 0563.
1098. HRVD Statement 2329.
1099. HRVD Statement 2335.
1100. HRVD Statement 4248.
1101. HRVD Statement 4254.
1102. HRVD Statement 8947.
1103. HRVD Statements 8633; 8806.
1104. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Francisco dos Santos Laku, Armindo dos Santos and Mário de Carvalho, Case No. 2001/08.

1105. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Francisco Pedro alias Geger, Case No. 2001/01. See also Statement 06873.
1106. HRVD Statement 8145.
1107. Deputy General Prosecutor for UNMISET, Indictment against Paulino de Jesus, Case No. 2002/06.
1108. HRVD Statement 8230.
1109. HRVD Statement 8230.
1110. HRVD Statements 6759; 8224.
1111. HRVD Statement 6727.
1112. HRVD Statement 6745.
1113. HRVD Statement 6747.
1114. HRVD Statement 4491.
1115. HRVD Statement 6743.
1116. HRVD Statement 5541.
1117. HRVD Statement 2545.
1118. HRVD Statement 4297.
1119. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Lolotoe Indictment, Case No. 04/2001; HRVD Statement 5541.
1120. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Lolotoe Indictment, Case No. 04/2001; HRVD Statements 5538; 5545.
1121. Deputy Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Maliana Indictment, Case No. 18/2003.
1122. HRVD Statements 2405; 2584; 2590.
1123. Deputy Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Augusto Asameta Tavares, Case No. 02/2001.
1124. HRVD Statement 8810.
1125. HRVD Statement 1153.
1126. HRVD Statement 2582.
1127. Deputy Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Maliana Indictment, Case No. 18/2003; HRVD Statement 2595.
1128. HRVD Statement 2430.
1129. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Maliana Indictment, Case No. 18/2003, paragraphs 234-246.
1130. HRVD Statement 5519.
1131. General Prosecutor for UNTAET, Indictment against Manuel Gonsales Bere, Case No. 10/2000.
1132. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Egidio Manek et al., Case No. 9/2003, paragraphs 199-206.
1133. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Egidio Manek et al., Case No. 9/2003, paragraphs 242-254.
1134. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Col. Herman Sediyono et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraphs 364-367.
1135. HRVD Statement 5113.
1136. HRVD Statement 3673.
1137. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Egidio Manek, et al., Case No. 9/2003, paragraphs 265-279.
1138. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Herman Sediyono, et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraphs 361-363.
1139. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Egidio Manek, et al., Case No. 9/2003, paragraphs 295-301.
1140. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Herman Sediyono, et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraphs 354-360.
1141. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Herman Sediyono, et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraphs 368-371; HRVD Statement 8440.
1142. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Herman Sediyono, et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraphs 372-377.
1143. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Egidio Manek, Case No. 9/2003, paragraphs 340-343.
1144. HRVD Statement 8435.
1145. HRVD Statement 7219.
1146. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Joanico Gusmão, Case No. 7/2003, paragraphs 15-22.
1147. HRVD Statement 2049.
1148. HRVD Statement 8958.
1149. HRVD Statement 8439.

1150. HRVD Statement 7386.
1151. HRVD Statement 6345.
1152. HRVD Statement 8424.
1153. HRVD Statement 7247.
1154. HRVD Statement 7396.
1155. HRVD Statement 3653.
1156. HRVD Statement 6261.
1157. HRVD Statement 8593.
1158. HRVD Statement 3672.
1159. HRVD Statement 3628.
1160. HRVD Statement 8525.
1161. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Egidio Manek et al., Case No. 9/2003, paragraphs 317-324.
1162. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Herman Sediyono, et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraphs 424-428.
1163. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Egidio Manek, et al., Case No. 9/2003, paragraphs 337-339.
1164. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Herman Sediyono, et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraphs 378-386.
1165. Ibid, paragraph 344.
1166. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Herman Sediyono, et al., Case No. 14/2003, paragraphs 417-421.
1167. HRVD Statement 2040.
1168. HRVD Statement 5046; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Beny Ludji and José Pereira, Case No. 2003/16.
1169. HRVD Statement 5084.
1170. HRVD Statement 7024.
1171. HRVD Statement 5755.
1172. HRVD Statement 5060.
1173. HRVD Statement 0197.
1174. HRVD Statements 2433; 3711.
1175. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Mateus de Carvalho, et al., Case No. 2003/24, paragraphs 57-61.
1176. HRVD Statement 5054.
1177. HRVD Statement 5053.
1178. HRVD Statement 5775.
1179. HRVD Statement 8048.
1180. HRVD Statement 6933.
1181. HRVD Statement 6932.
1182. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Mateus de Carvalho, et al., Case No. 24/2003, paragraphs 66-70.
1183. HRVD Statement 0103.
1184. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Mateus de Carvalho, et al., Case No. 24/2003, paragraphs 71-75.
1185. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Agustino da Costa, Case No. 7/2000.
1186. HRVD Statement 4467.
1187. HRVD Statement 6159.
1188. HRVD Statement 6363.
1189. HRVD Statement 8335.
1190. HRVD Statement 1057.
1191. HRVD Statement 3536.
1192. HRVD Statement 7626.
1193. HRVD Statement 7620.
1194. HRVD Statement 7622.
1195. HRVD Statement 8752.
1196. HRVD Statement 8742. General Prosecutor of Timor-Leste, Indictment against Maj. Jacob Djoko Sarosa and Lt. Camilo dos Santos, Case No. 10/2002, paragraphs 44-49.
1197. General Prosecutor of Timor-Leste, Indictment against Major Jacob Djoko Sarosa and Lieutenant Camilo dos Santos, Case No. 10/2002, paragraphs 15-34.

1198. HRVD Statement 8734.
1199. HRVD Statements 8734; 8743.
1200. HRVD Statement 8747.
1201. HRVD Statement 8738.
1202. HRVD Statement 8743.
1203. HRVD Statement 2255.
1204. HRVD Statement 2147. General Prosecutor of Timor-Leste, Indictment against Maj. Jacob Djoko Sarosa and Lt. Camilo dos Santos, Case No. 2002/10, paragraphs 57-64.
1205. HRVD Statement 2285. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Joni Marques, et al., Case No. 9/2000, paragraphs 29-32. Special Panel for Serious Crimes, Judgement, 11 December 2001.
1206. HRVD Statement 2298.
1207. HRVD Statement 2127. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against José Valente, Case No. 3/2001.
1208. HRVD Statements 0249; 0250; 0227; 0228. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Anastacio Martins and Domingos Gonçalves, Case No. 11/2001, paragraphs 25-33.
1209. HRVD Statement 6476.
1210. HRVD Statement 6565.
1211. HRVD Statements 06497; 8282.
1212. HRVD Statement 7897.
1213. HRVD Statement 6486.
1214. HRVD Statement 6486. General Prosecutor, Indictment against Vidal Doutel Sarmento, et al., Case No. 11/2002, paragraphs 80-103.
1215. HRVD Statements 7949; 7533.
1216. HRVD Statement 7902.
1217. HRVD Statement 7903.
1218. HRVD Statement 1912.
1219. HRVD Statement 1371; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Nazario Vital dos Santos Corte Real, et al., Case No. 13/2004, paragraphs 50-55.
1220. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Nazario Vital dos Santos Corte Real, et al., Case No. 13/2004, paragraphs 56-59.
1221. Idem, paragraphs 60-69.
1222. Idem, paragraphs 70-71.
1223. HRVD Statement 5414.
1224. HRVD Statement 5428; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Nazario Vital dos Santos Corte Real, et al., Case No. 13/2004, paragraphs 72-73.
1225. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Nazario Vital dos Santos Corte Real, et al., Case No. 13/2004, paragraphs 74-85.
1226. HRVD Statement 4059.
1227. HRVD Statements 4740; 5440.
1228. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Nazario Vital dos Santos Corte Real, et al., Case No. 2004/13, paragraphs 86-87.
1229. On the attacks on the three villages, see General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment agains Simão Lopes, et al., Case No. 20/2001, paragraphs 42-55.
1230. HRVD Statement 2838.
1231. HRVD Statement 2828.
1232. HRVD Statement 2901.
1233. HRVD Sattement 2901.
1234. HRVD Statement 2854.
1235. HRVD Statement 2895.
1236. HRVD Statement 6904.
1237. HRVD Statement 2901.
1238. HRVD Statement 2645.
1239. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment againt Jorgé Ulan et al., Case No. 32/2003.
1240. HRVD Statement 2840; General Prosecutor of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste, Indictment against Umbertus Ena and Carlos Ena, Case No. 5/2002.
1241. HRVD Statements 0857; 0860; 0330.
1242. HRVD Statements 0311; 0383; 0392.

1243. HRVD Statement 0307.
1244. HRVD Statements 0843; 0850.
1245. HRVD Statements 0828; 0818,
1246. HRVD Statement 0829.
1247. HRVD Statements 0357; 0814; 0881.
1248. HRVD Statements 2894; 0871; 2943.
1249. HRVD Statement 2919.
1250. HRVD Statement 2939.
1251. HRVD Statement 0877.
1252. HRVD Statement 2944.
1253. HRVD Statement 0867.
1254. HRVD Statement 0376.
1255. HRVD Statement 8949.
1256. HRVD Statement 2648.
1257. HRVD Statements 0355; 0817.
1258. HRVD Statement 00453.
1259. HRVD Statement 00452.
1260. HRVD Statement 00461.
1261. HRVD Statements 00452; 00453; 00461.
1262. HRVD Statement 00425; Tim Relawan Flores untuk Kemanusiaan, Pasukan Sipil Integrasi - Kekerasan dan Pengungsian Warga Timor Leste [Flores Volunteer Team for Humanity, Integration Civilian Forces – Violence and Displacement of East Timorese], Submission to CAVR, July 2003, p. 52.

Chega!

Part 7.3.

Forced Displacement and Famine

Part 7.3 Forced Displacement and Famine

Tables:

Graphics:

7.3 Forced Displacement and Famine

Introduction

1. As part of its mandate to establish the truth regarding past human rights violations, the Commission conducted an inquiry into displacement and famine in Timor-Leste during 1974–1999. This inquiry was critical to understanding the story of human suffering and human rights violations associated with the conflict because displacement was a defining feature of the years of conflict in Timor-Leste. Almost every East Timorese person who lived through these years suffered some form of displacement, and many were displaced more than once.

2. Displacement and its consequences occurred repeatedly during the period of the Commission's mandate.

- As early as 1974 the Commission learned there were cases of villagers fleeing the violent consequences of growing inter-party tensions.
- The civil war of August–September 1975 caused tens of thousands of people to be displaced, most for short periods within Timor-Leste, but some forcibly to Indonesian West Timor.
- The Indonesian invasion of 7 December 1975 triggered the evacuation of a majority of the population into mountain and forest areas under Fretilin control, in numbers that were so large that they put an unbearable strain on Fretilin's resources and organisational capabilities. Even after Indonesian forces stepped up their attacks and ended the relatively settled lives of those living in these areas, the Fretilin leadership went to great lengths to prevent people from coming out of the forest and mountains, including by the use of harshly punitive measures against those suspected of wanting to do so.
- The massive campaigns waged by Indonesian forces between mid-1977 and late 1978 made the already difficult conditions in which hundreds of thousands of East Timorese people in the forest and mountains were living intolerable, finally forcing the leadership to permit them to surrender to Indonesian forces.

- Once in Indonesians hands they faced an even worse fate in "resettlement camps": there the Indonesian military made utterly inadequate provision for their everyday needs and placed restrictions on their freedom of movement which made it impossible for camp inmates to provide for themselves. The result was a famine which took thousands of lives, largely because the Indonesian military permitted international relief agencies to operate in Timor-Leste only once it decided that it had achieved its military objectives.
- In the 1980s some of those living in the camps were allowed to return to their home villages but they continued to live under restriction. Others were moved to "new villages" and other locations explicitly selected for their strategic value to the Indonesian military.
- In the same period displacement continued to be used as an integral part of the Indonesian counter-insurgency strategy. As the Resistance began to recover from its near destruction in the late 1970s, the military responded by displacing people suspected of having links with it, whether as members of a clandestine network or simply because they had family members in the bush. Beginning in 1980 thousands of people, the majority of whom were women and children, were transported to the barren island of Ataúro. They faced the consequences of inadequate provision of food and other essentials, at least until the ICRC was permitted to operate there in 1982. Fretilin attacks brought dire retribution from the Indonesian forces. Typically, as after the attacks on Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) in 1982 and Kraras (Viqueque, Viqueque) in 1983, this involved the displacement of entire villages, including to previously unsettled areas where again provision of essentials was minimal and the opportunities to achieve self-sufficiency slight.
- The whole period surrounding the Popular Consultation of 30 August 1999 was marked by displacements of different kinds.These ranged from flight from militia and TNI violence before and after the ballot to the organised evacuation of the population to West Timor, Indonesia that occurred after the result was announced. The violence of the militia groups, often working openly with their TNI sponsors, resulted in human rights violations on a scale not seen since the late 1970s. Detentions, torture and ill-treatment, killings, sexual violence and forced recruitment all reached new peaks in 1999, as did displacement. During 1999, displacement occurred both as spontaneous flight from militia violence and intimidation, and as the organised movement of people from their homes and other places where they had sought refuge. As in earlier years, displacement in all the variety of circumstances in which it occurred in 1999 had a severe impact on people's ability to feed themselves, especially as the Indonesian authorities made a concerted effort to deny them humanitarian assistance.

3. As is evident from this short summary, the consequences of displacement in Timor-Leste were far-reaching. One of the most frequent ways in which armed conflicts around the world have disrupted the everyday lives of civilians is by causing them to be displaced. Even where it is voluntary, by uprooting civilians from the settings in which they have supported themselves, displacement commonly results in deprivation of various kinds, including hunger, disease and the loss of adequate shelter. Often displacement is in effect a form of arbitrary collective punishment, and as such is associated with violations of a range of human rights, civil and political as well as economic, social and cultural. All of these features of displacement were present in Timor-Leste, in a very pronounced way.

4. Thus the reason why mortality was far higher between 1975 and 1999 than would have been expected in normal peacetime conditions was the large number of deaths from hunger and illness that were directly related to displacement. The Commission has concluded that a minimum of 84,200 people died from displacement-related hunger and illness during the whole period (see Vol. I, Part 6: The Profile of Human Rights Violations).

5. In Timor-Leste displacement was also closely correlated with the whole range of human rights vioIations. It is noteworthy that during the years when deaths from hunger and illness were at their highest, namely 1975-79, displacement, killings and disappearances, and many non-fatal violations, including detention, torture and ill-treatment, also reached peaks. Indeed, over the whole period 1975-99 fluctuations in all of these phenomena tend to be closely correlated, strongly suggesting that they had a common underlying cause, most plausibly the intensity of Indonesian military operations. The events of 1999 provide a partial exception to this finding: although displacements and both fatal and non-fatal violations rose to very high levels in that year and deaths by deprivation did increase, the number of deaths from hunger and illness did not increase as sharply as the level of displacements and violations of all kinds did, perhaps due to the relatively brief timeframe of displacements in that year (see Vol. I, Part 6: The Profile of Human Rights Violations).

Definitions and methodology

6. Both "displacement" and "famine" are neutral terms in the sense that they may occur without human rights being violated. The Commission has concluded, however, that in the context of the conflicts in Timor-Leste, the nature of displacement and famine was almost always such that both were human rights violations in themselves and at the same time entailed a whole cluster of other violations.

Displacement

7. The Commission defines displacement as a situation where people leave the place where they live either under some form of compulsion or because they themselves have decided that circumstances are such that it would be dangerous not to move. Displacement can occur within a particular country ("internal displacement") or to the territory of another country ("external displacement"). In Timor-Leste both "'internal" and "external" displacement took place at different periods of the conflict. In this report, the Commission uses the term "internally displaced" for displaced people who remained within the borders of Timor-Leste,* and "refugees" for those who crossed the border to West Timor.†

8. By definition displacement always takes place unwillingly. It may occur because of the direct use of force or the threat of force against the people being displaced. It may also be spontaneous, or non-forcible, such as in a situation in which civilians flee from an approaching invading army.

9. Legally, displacement is forced when it occurs in a manner that is unlawful. Without reasonable evidence that a party to an armed conflict has acted unlawfully when displacing people, displacement cannot be described as forced. In accordance with international law, the Commission defines a "forced displacement" as displacement that is effected through the use of physical force or by the "threat of force or coercion, such as that caused by fear of violence, duress, detention, psychological oppression or abuse of power against…person or persons or another person or by taking advantage of a coercive environment".[1] Forced displacement within a country is referred to as "forcible transfer"; forced displacement to the territory of another country is "deportation".[2]

10. Forced displacement does not necessarily involve the actual use of force against the person or persons who are being displaced. Forced displacement would be considered to have occurred in a situation where, for example, civilians are ostensibly given a choice as to whether to board a truck that is going to move them from their homes, but in fact had reasonable grounds to fear death or violence if they refused.‡ It does not encompass all situations where civilians flee to escape combat between an invading force and a defending army.

11. The use of force or the threat of force does not necessarily make displacement illegal. Force may be used to displace a population if those using force can justify their actions in terms of the safety of the people being displaced or military necessity. However, in the absence of these justifying conditions forced displacement may, if committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population, be a crime against humanity or may, if directed against people, such as civilians, who are protected under the Geneva Conventions, be a war crime.[3]

* According to UN Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement, E/CN.4/1998/53/Add.2, 11 February 1998: "internally displaced persons are persons or groups of persons who have been forced or obliged to flee or to leave their homes or places of habitual residence, in particular as a result of or in order to avoid the effects of armed conflict, situations of generalised violence, violations of human rights or natural or human-made disasters, and who have not crossed an internationally recognised State border."

† Article 1 of the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees 1951, defines a refugee as a person who based on "well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable, or owing to such fear, unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country." In this section the term "refugee" is used to apply to those who were displaced to West Timor during the Indonesian occupation, whether or not they met that definition.

‡ Thus forced displacement has been held to have occurred in circumstances where civilians "were not exercising a genuine choice to go, but reacted reflexively to a certainty that their survival depended on their flight". [Prosecutor v Radislav Krstic, ICTY Case No IT-98-33-T, Trial Chamber Judgment, 2 August 2001, Paragraph 530].

12. According to universal human rights standards, everyone has the right to liberty of movement and freedom to choose his or her residence.[4] Restrictions on these rights are permitted only when it is necessary to protect national security, public order, public health or morals, or the rights of others. Any restrictions must be provided by law, proportionate to the protective function served, and must not be inconsistent with other human rights.[5]

13. The UN Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement provide that every person has the right to be protected against arbitrary displacement from his or her home, including in situations of armed conflict, except where the security of civilians or imperative military reasons so demand.[6] Where people do suffer displacement, authorities must ensure their well-being, including access to food, water, shelter and medical services.[7]

14. Under international humanitarian law forced transfers of the civilian population are permitted by an occupying power only in cases where the evacuation of an area is necessary for the security of the population or for imperative military reasons. Even then civilians must not be moved outside the occupied territory except when it is impossible to avoid that happening. Where transfers are necessary the occupying power must ensure that proper accommodation is provided, that transfers occur in healthy and safe conditions, that members of the same family are not separated, and that evacuees are returned to their homes as soon as hostilities in their area have ceased.[8]

15. As already noted, in all other cases – that is where transfers are not strictly necessary – forced displacement of civilians within an occupied territory or to a place outside the occupied territory is prohibited by humanitarian law during an occupation.[9] Violation of this rule constitutes a grave breach of Geneva Convention IV.[10] In addition, where a forced displacement is carried out as part of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population it will constitute a crime against humanity.*

16. In addition, other actions which may indirectly cause mass displacement of populations are also prohibited. Attacks on civilian homes,[11] attacks that do not distinguish between civilians and combatants,[12] and attacks that are designed to terrorise the civilian population[13] are all prohibited. Violations of these rules by individuals may constitute war crimes.

Famine

17. Famine has been defined as widespread lack of access to sufficient food for survival, leading to excess death due to starvation and associated diseases.[14] Like displacement, famine in itself does not constitute a violation of human rights. Famine may result from natural causes, such as drought, or from sheer poverty. By disrupting everyday life, armed conflict routinely causes food shortages. During an armed conflict civilians cannot get on with the everyday activities that allow them to make a living, such as producing food, earning an income or going to the market to provide for their own subsistence. In extreme cases, during wartime food shortages turn into famine.

* Article 5(d) Statute of the ICTY (referring to "deportation" but which has been interpreted so as to include both internal and external displacement: Prosecutor v Milomir Stakić, ICTY Case No IT-97-24-T, Trial Chamber Judgement, 31 July 2003, at para 679); Article 7(1)(d) Rome Statute for the ICC.

18. However, it has been increasingly acknowledged that famines are in fact rarely simply the result of natural disasters and that human actors play a large part in creating them. Climatic extremes, an inhospitable environment and poverty have made hunger a persistent feature, and extreme hunger a frequent feature, of life in Timor-Leste. Famine, however, has been quite rare in Timor-Leste, and almost always associated with armed conflict.*

19. The noted economist Amartya Sen has sought to distinguish the "phenomenon of 'regular' starvation" (known to many East Timorese people) from the "violent outbursts" that are famines. He suggests that "starvation is the characteristic of some people not having enough food to eat. It is not the characteristic of there not being enough food to eat." He defines famine as a "particularly virulent manifestation of starvation causing widespread death".[15]

20. In Timor-Leste, famine occurred between 1978 and 1980 during and after the intensive Indonesian military operation to finally gain control over the territory. Serious food shortages that caused deaths also occurred during the 1980s and in 1999. At all these times, and the Commission believes this is demonstrated in this part, it was not the case that food could not have been made available to the people who needed it. Instead those people were positively denied access to food and to its sources.

21. It is in such contexts that famine is associated with violations of international human rights and humanitarian law. These violations go well beyond the denial of people's rights to food and other essentials, although states have obligations to guarantee those rights. Under human rights law everyone has the right to adequate food[16] and freedom from hunger.[17] Food of sufficient quality and quantity to satisfy people's needs should be available.[18] In respecting these rights states must, for example, take measures to reduce malnutrition.[19] A State must always ensure that everyone under its control has access to the minimum essential food.[20] All persons also have a right to water[21] and adequate housing.[22]

22. These obligations can also be violated indirectly by, for example, pursuing policies that entail other kinds of violations that are manifestly incompatible with the right of people to food.[23] They include the denial of freedom of movement, the violation of the right of individuals to live where they want, the denial of access to relief, the destruction of food sources, and ultimately the violation of the right to life.[24]

23. Such violations may amount to crimes in international law. Thus in an international armed conflict mass starvation is a war crime if it is used as a weapon of war. Among the methods seen as examples of using mass starvation as a weapon of war are the deliberate obstruction of relief supplies and the destruction of food sources.[25] Starvation may also constitute a crime against humanity if the deprivation of food is being used in a widespread and systematic fashion to exterminate a civilian population.[26] During an occupation the occupying power has additional responsibilities to meet the needs of the local population. It must ensure that the population receives adequate food, water and medical treatment. This means importing resources or accepting aid when local supplies are inadequate.[27]

* Famine was the main reason for the estimated 40,000 deaths that occurred during the Japanese occupation of Timor-Leste [see VolII, I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict].

Gathering information

24. The conflicts in Timor-Leste caused thousands of people to be displaced from their homes, in many cases more than once. Displacement, by its very nature, decreases victims' ability to protect themselves or to meet basic needs. In Timor-Leste periods of displacement coincided with increased numbers of deaths by deprivation. This presented a challenge to the Commission. Many people who saw or experienced what happened during the years of displacement and famine have died. This meant that the Commission had to develop special initiatives to look into displacement, famine and death by deprivation.

1. The Commission collected 7,669 narrative statements from all 13 districts of Timor-Leste and in refugee camps in West Timor. 43.6 % (3,344 out of 7,669) of deponents reported incidents where famine-related deaths or displacement occurred. Deponents in the Commission's statement-taking process reported a total of 4,869 unique deaths by deprivation and 16,977 unique displacement events.
2. Thousands of people spoke about displacements and famine during Community Profile workshops. These workshops were facilitated by Commission staff to allow people collectively to document human rights violations and their impact on the community.
3. Eleven victims and expert witnesses gave testimony at the Commission's National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine held in Dili on 28–29 July 2003.
4. Commission staff conducted close to one hundred individual interviews with witnesses and survivors of displacement and famine in every district except Oecussi.
5. The Commission conducted a special investigation (the Death Toll Project) which included two major data-gathering exercises. Staff and volunteers conducted a census of marked and unmarked gravestones found in 1057 public cemeteries across the country.* Staff also conducted a survey of 1,396 randomly selected households, asking them questions about displacements and deaths in their family during the conflict. Data gathered by the Commission were used to make statistical estimations on the death toll and patterns of displacement during the period of the conflict. The Human Rights Data Analysis Group (HRDAG) helped the Commission to collect and analyse these data (see Vol. I, Part 6: The Profile of Human Rights Violations).†

* In total, 1057 of 1631 public cemeteries were surveyed

† The HRDAG (Human Rights Data Analysis Group) assists human rights projects around the world in the use of information management systems and scientific and statistical tools to gather and report large-scale human rights abuses. HRDAG is a project of the Benetech Initiative, a non-profit venture that provides technical and management assistance allowing HRDAG to fulfill its mission.

6. People and organisations inside and outside Timor-Leste with knowledge or direct experience of the phenomenon submitted documentation, materials and submissions on displacement and famine to the Commission.
7. Commission researchers and staff consulted published and unpublished materials, books, radio programmes, film footage and photographs produced since 1974.

Displacement and hunger caused by internal conflict (1974–1975)

Displacement due to political rivalries (1974–1975)

25. The Commission has received some reports of internal and external displacement between 1974 and 1975. These incidents are distinct from events immediately before and during the August 1975 internal armed conflict. While the exact timing of the events are often unclear, they do suggest that rivalry between the political groups was serious enough to cause people to flee their homes well before the outbreak of the internal armed conflict.

26. Before the outbreak of the internal armed conflict tensions had been rising throughout the territory. There were several elements to these growing tensions: competition between the parties for followers, often focused on the distribution of party cards and the setting up of branch offices; conflicts between traditional leaders and the leaders of the new parties; and more broadly the transformation of historically-rooted conflicts into inter-party conflicts. The civil war was then not just a sudden explosion of violence, but simply raised to new heights a spiral of violence that was already underway, one side-effect of which was flight and displacement.

Table 1: Example of testimony about refugee movement resulting from political rivalries 1974–1975, collected by the CAVR

Source	Name and Location	Summary
HRVD 00922	Samalete, Taraso (Railaco Ermera)	In 1974, fearing intimidation from members of UDT, more than 70 persons ran into the forest. At the same time, Fretilin supporters killed seven members of UDT suspected of involvement in the previous killing of Fretilin supporters. Consequently, another revenge killing of one person took place by UDT supporters.
CAVR Community Profile	Edi (Maubisse, Ainaro)	In 1974 and 1975, most people joined Fretilin, leaving UDT ashamed and angry. The two UDT leaders in Edi summoned forces from Ermera, Atsabe and Maubisse. They burned 1,872 houses, coffee holdings and food in storage, and killed animals, taking those still alive to Maubisse. After a four-day operation they set up a branch in Mauosahi Uslakatei and a small one in Kamlai. Then they killed two Fretilin supporters. Fretilin supporters fled to Turiscai again. After four days Fretilin forces brought their supporters back from Turiscai. The two sides fought in Manelobas and the UDT forces fled to Maubisse.

Source	Name and Location	Summary
CAVR Community Profile	Aldeia Beco, Beidasi Village, (Fatululik, Covalima)	In October 1974, Fretilin leaders distributed party cards, as did Apodeti in November 1974. The two parties began to struggle to attract members. About 500 people from the aldeia of Beco ran off to Lakmanen in West Timor.

27. The Commission heard evidence that an atmosphere of fear arose in other districts during this early period of political party formation, causing displacement.[28]

Displacement caused by the internal conflict

28. The displacements that occurred as a result of the armed conflict between the two main political parties, UDT and Fretilin, in August to September 1975, was more widespread and lasted longer. Other parties, especially Apodeti, were embroiled in this armed conflict. Opposing party supporters, their families and ordinary people sought safety from the violence which erupted throughout the country. Party supporters, sometimes entire villages, fled in fear for their lives. In Dili the political violence led to some displacement and food shortages as the population fled the fighting, as recorded in one CAVR Community Profile:

> In 1975 the situation became heated. People began to throw stones at each other, to fight each other using spears and machetes. Some people dug cellars as a place to hide…Everyone left their homes and hid in neighbouring areas. Some fled to hide in caves for three months. The food situation was difficult, and many grew hungry, but nobody died of starvation.[29]

29. The following table shows some examples of testimony collected by the Commission about civil war-related displacement.

Table 2: Example of testimony about civil war-related displacement, collected by the CAVR

Source	Name and Location	Summary
CAVR Community Profile	Maulau (Maubisse, Ainaro)	On 7 and 14 August 1975, Fretilin forces from Lequidoe, Turiscai and Manumera launched a three-pronged attack through Maleria, Lumluli and Usululi, killing many people and burning 675 houses in the three aldeias. They also killed many animals and took others to Lequidoe. The UDT people fled to Maubisse leaving the old and the children in Maulau. In another attack one week later, on 14 August, Fretilin forces from Turiscai burned eight houses in Lakamalikau.

Source	Name and Location	Summary
HRVD 09078	Daniel Pereira Pires, Leubuti, Foholau (Turiscai, Manufahi)	In September 1975, because of an attack by Fretilin supporters, villagers from the aldeia of Leobuti, Foholau (Turiscai), mostly Apodeti supporters, fled to safety in the surrounding forest area. At least three people were captured and killed by Fretilin supporters. Some survivors were forced to relocate to Turiscai where they worked in the fields.
HRVD 00163	Celestina da Costa Oliveira Wedauberek, Same, Manufahi	Soon after the conflict between UDT and Fretilin broke out on 11 August 1975, most of the people of Letefoho (Same, Manufahi) fled into the mountains, fearing further violence. They were afraid of being captured by UDT supporters, after the killing of a group of Fretilin activists by UDT in Wedauberek.
CAVR Community Profile	Asumanu, Liquiçá	On 13 August 1975, UDT raised its flag in Bilamar, in the aldeia of Caicasico and then burned houses and killed six people in the aldeia of Siskoolema and of Hatumatilu. Some of the population ran off to Base 1 in Leorema and others fled to Base 2 in the Loes area (Maubara, Liquiçá), while a small number fled to the forest.

30. According to ICRC estimates, as many as 50% of the population may have been displaced as a result of the internal armed conflict.[30] With the cessation of hostilities across most of the territory by mid-September 1975, most internally displaced people were able to begin returning to their homes. However a large number of the defeated UDT leaders and fighters fled to the border area, eventually crossing over into West Timor (Indonesia). Some members of the parties allied with UDT and Apodeti supporters also sought refuge in West Timor. Particularly in the border districts of Covalima and Bobonaro, UDT and Apodeti leaders forced the uncommitted and Fretilin supporters to join the flight.

The flight to West Timor

31. Of the UDT and Apodeti supporters who fled into West Timor after the Fretilin armed insurrection in August 1975, some were civilians who went to West Timor out of genuine fear for their safety. They believed that they were likely to be targets of Fretilin violence.

32. Some UDT supporters crossed the border for military training and to join forces with the Indonesian military to continue to fight against Fretilin. The Commission does not consider these cases to be displacement, as they involve willing combatants and not civilians. Often, however, the two groups were intermingled and difficult to distinguish.

33. In collective testimonies of communities in the district of Covalima, through the Commission's Community Profile discussions in Holpilat, Lela (Maukatar, Covalima), Belulik Kraik (Fatumean, Covalima), and Aitoun, Beidasi (Fatululik, Covalima), a clear picture emerged of supporters of Apodeti and UDT fleeing across the border in late 1975 out of fear for their lives.*

34. Paulo de Fatima Martins, in an interview by UN police, stated that he and a group of 900 people - including women and children - fled first from Hatolia (Ermera) to Tatae Uhu (Lisapat, Hatolia) and then on to Cailaco, Purugua in Maliana (Bobonaro) in mid-September, before reaching Haekesak near Atambua in West Timor on 16 September.[31]

35. The Commission heard testimony from a former UDT leader in Covalima, Emiliano Teixeira (Rui) Lopes, and others who recounted that they fled to West Timor with some 400 civilians. They stayed at make-shift refugee camps in Alas (Betun, West Timor, Indonesia) for a few days, and were moved to Atambua to join other refugees from Timor-Leste. Emiliano (Rui) Lopes told the Commission:

> In Suai we didn't force people to go to Indonesia. We knew it was also hard in Indonesia. Only those of us who were involved went. But a number of people who fled also followed us. Not many. But in Dili and Ermera, they took everybody. Those who supported UDT all fled.[32]

36. The following table lists some of the communities living near the border who, fearing the inter-party violence, fled to West Timor.

Table 3: Some communities who fled to West Timor during the inter-party conflict

CAVR Community Profiles	Summary
Odomau (Maliana, Bobonaro) [33]	On 2 September 1975, the people of the village ran in all directions, up into the mountains and into Builalo (West Timor). The people of Odomau were refugees in West Timor for about nine months.
Aldeia Aitoun, Beidasi Village (Fatululik, Covalima)[34]	Fretilin arrived in the aldeia of Aitoun, with supporters from Fatululik. About ten families fled to Lamaknan in West Timor because of intimidation and threats from Fretilin supporters.
Lela Village (Maukatar, Covalima)[35]	On 20 November 1975, about 650 people crossed the border with UDT leader Emiliano Teixeira Rui Lopes.
Hopilat Village (Maukatar, Covalima)	After Fretilin launched the armed insurrection on 20 August 20 1975, four families who supported Apodeti ran to Lamaknan in West Timor.

* CAVR Community Profile Holpilat, Lela (Maucatar, Covalima) recounts that Apodeti supporters sought refuge in Lambemanas (Belu, West Timor), 18 February 2003; CAVR Community Profile Belulik Kraik (Fatumean, Covalima) describes how the placement of Falintil troops on the border after the armed insurrection led opposition party leaders and their supporters to flee to West Timor, 28 July 2003; CAVR Community Profile Aitoun, Beidasi, Fatululik Sub-district, Covalima District records that ten families moved to Lamaknen (Belu, West Timor) as early as 1974. Later, in October 1975, UDT and Apodeti supporters evacuated to West Timor, 17 October 2002.

CAVR Community Profiles	Summary
Ritabou Village (Maliana, Bobonaro)[36]	Fretilin supporters were detained by UDT members on 11 August 1975. On 2 September 1975, villagers heard the sound of gunfire and ran to Haekesak, Wedomo and Atambua in West Timor. After nine days some moved back to Batugade then, fearing attacks from the sea, moved to Mota Ain and Atambua, West Timor. Conditions were difficult in the camps, with disease and little access to clean water. The ICRC eventually began providing emergency assistance to the camps.
Holsa Village (Maliana, Bobonaro)[37]	The men were recruited to attack Fretilin in Dili, but then UDT lost. When the men returned to Maliana, people ran in all directions, many without taking provisions. Some ran to the mountains, others to Builalo in West Timor. Some Fretilin supporters who joined the exodus to West Timor were threatened and then killed.
Memo Village (Maliana, Bobonaro)[38]	On 5 September 1975, hearing the sound of gunfire, the people of Halimesak fled across the river to Bauilalu in West Timor. They made make-shift houses and lived on food gathered from the forest. Initially some families remained in Memo, but by the end of the month all had joined the 5,000 to 10,000 refugees already gathered in Bauilalu. Many died from diarrhoea and malaria and there were serious food shortages during this time.
Raifun Village (Maliana, Bobonaro)[39]	About 500 people ran to the mountains and others to Haekesak in West Timor. In Haekesak, they lived in tents and received food, clothes and money, but disease was rife and many died. They stayed in Haekesak for one year.
Vaviquinia Village (Maubara, Liquiçá)[40]	When Fretilin retaliated, UDT leaders like João Carrascalão and Raja Gaspar Nunes fled to Batugade in fishing boats.
Leimea Sorin Balu Village (Hatolia, Ermera) [41]	Some people surrendered, others ran with UDT leaders to Atambua. About 120 people became refugees in Haekesak in West Timor for one year.

Forcible transfer to West Timor

37. Not everyone in refugee camps in West Timor or being trained by ABRI for operations in Timor-Leste had fled willingly. Some people reported being forced across the border by UDT leaders.

38. The Commission heard statements from persons who were forcibly brought across the border and, in some instances, recruited as TBOs, Hansips or Partisan forces. For example, Francisco da Silva Araújo from Ermera gave evidence to the Commission about the forced deportation to Atambua through Hakesak by members of UDT of approximately 1,000 people. The group crossed the border on 2 September, and did not return to Ermera until June 1976.[42]

39. Benvinda dos Santos from Memo (Maliana, Bobonaro) was one of several people who told the Commission of being forced by F36, the East Timorese liurai of Memo and a local UDT leader, to flee to Atambua in 1975, because he said there was going to be a huge upheaval between the UDT and Fretilin parties. When they arrived in Atambua her husband, Malibere, was captured by a Hansip member F39 who took him to Sumur where he, with Clementino and Americo, were subsequently stabbed to death.[43]

40. Francisca Argentina, also from Memo, claimed that she was a member of Fretilin but was nevertheless forced to flee to West Timor by UDT party leaders, including F36. She told the Commission she and her family were refugees in West Timor for about one year, during which her brother died from lack of adequate food.[44]

41. The people of the village of Saburai (Maliana, Bobonaro) told the Commission that it was not just Fretilin supporters who were forced over the border:

> On 30 August 1975, fighting between UDT and Fretilin supporters began. Soldiers from the 5th Cavalry Squadron in Bobonaro came to Maliana. Supporters of UDT and Apodeti, were forced by F40, an East Timorese member of Apodeti and the liurai*, F36, to run to West Timor. About 500 people from the* aldeia of Mesage were refugees in Tahon (West Timor) for one year.[*]

Refugee numbers in West Timor

42. The Commission was unable to determine the exact number of refugees in West Timor in 1975. However, a variety of East Timorese sources who had been in the camps in West Timor agree that the figure of 40,000 given by the Indonesian authorities was a gross overestimate. João Carrascalão told the Commission:

> [There were] never more than 10,000 (refugees). At the time I complained very strongly to the Indonesians because they were using the figure of 40,000 people and they were receiving aid for 40,000 people. (But) the Timorese did not get anything. They [the Indonesian authorities] took advantage of the situation.[45]

43. Two priests, Father Francisco Fernandes[†] and Father Apolinario Guterres, both of whom had joined the exodus to West Timor in August to September 1975 and were involved in the work of the East Timor Refugee Committee in Atambua during this period, put the number of refugees at "roughly 20,000".[46]

44. One of the leaders of the KOTA party, José Martins, "defected" from the pro-integration cause while in Rome in 1976. From Rome he wrote a letter to the UN Secretary-General, Kurt Waldheim, dated 29 April 1976, in which he also said that

* CAVR Community Profile Saburai Village (Maliana, Bobonaro). Other statements received by the Commission in which F36 was alleged to have forced people to cross into West Timor at this time include HRVD Statements 02487, 02449, 02491, 02462 and 02446. F36 became district administrator of Bobonaro (bupati) from 1992 to 1999. In 1999 he played a pivotal role in the creation and support of the militia groups, of which there were at least nine in his district [see OHCHR Submission, pp.114 and 142-3].

† Father Francisco Fernandes passed away in Maucau, China on 30 August 2005. He was buried in Laclo, Manatuto District on 11 September 2005.

the refugees numbered no more than 20,000. Like João Carrascalão, he claimed that the figure of 40,000 cited by the Indonesians was being used "as a political weapon against Fretilin" and "a trick to get funds and aid from the International Red Cross and foreign governments". Tomás Gonçalves of Apodeti, who was also in West Timor at the time, told the Commission that the refugees numbered no more than 25,000-30,000.[47] Even Francisco Lopes da Cruz, then the vice chairman of the Indonesian-installed Provisional Government of Timor-Leste, said in March 1976 that no more than 30,000 refugees had fled Timor-Leste as a result of the civil war.[48]

45. The international agencies operating in West Timor, however, accepted the official Indonesian figures. On 16 September 1975, an ICRC report estimated the number of refugees at between 25,000 and 50,000.[49] The ICRC delegate, Michel Testuz, reported visiting 10,000 refugees in the camp in Haekesak and 6,000 in Bauilalu on 29 September 1975. He further reported that Indonesian border immigration claimed to have counted 33,000 crossing the border by 16 September 1975 and 2,000 to 3,000 coming across during fighting in Batugade on 24 September 1975. Using these data Testuz concluded that the "total number is now 40,000 and could increase to 50,000".[50] A figure of 40,000 refugees was also used in a US Catholic Relief Services (CRS) report describing humanitarian assistance to West Timor in November 1975.[51]

Conditions and humanitarian assistance in West Timor

46. Once international relief programmes were established for the refugees, reports suggest that their basic needs were for a time adequately met. However, several sources suggest that conditions in the camps later deteriorated.

47. Describing the situation in October 1975, the ICRC delegate, Michel Testuz, said that the camps were temporary but well-provisioned. Most refugees were sheltered in schools that had been closed by the Indonesian authorities to accommodate them. Although local pressure to re-open the schools and relocate the refugees was mounting, he noted that the "government makes no move or plan for relocation and gives the impression that it could all be over tomorrow and refugees safely home the next day". The ICRC delegate further commented that the Indonesian Red Cross was caring adequately for the refugees there, providing rice rations and 25 US cents per day for other necessities.[52] The refugees looked "well fed and healthy".[53] This assessment was confirmed by former refugees in the camp who were interviewed by the Commission.[54] They said that the services provided by the local provincial government and the Indonesian Red Cross included the provision of semi-permanent housing with adequate sanitation. Other than meeting basic daily needs, the Indonesian government also conducted social activities such as Indonesian language lessons.

48. However, former inmates of the camps said that after an initial period in which they were well-treated, the Indonesian attitude to them changed.[55] Emiliano (Rui) Lopes told the Commission:

> Many people fled abroad, because they didn't like the military ethos. For example a Hansip could also order us around, hit us. Everyone saw this and many left…There were people who died from illness, but no one died of starvation. I'm speaking honestly. But the mental pressure was very intense…We felt completely oppressed. There was not much we could do. If someone started hitting we'd just watch and stay silent. Where was our pride? Things like this made the Carrascalão family and other families flee the country.[56]

49. In his letter to UN Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim, José Martins complained that the refugees had "found only maltreatment and misery":

> The refugees were either forced to take military training and fight against Fretilin or to work without pay for the Indonesians. Their belongings were confiscated, such as money, jewellery and so on.[57]

50. In their testimony to the Decolonisation Committee in October 1979, Fr Francisco Fernandes and Fr Apolinario Guterres gave a detailed account of the change in the Indonesian attitude to the refugees. They said that it happened in March 1976 when the Indonesian authorities asked the two priests to ensure that all the refugees attend a rally at which the Foreign Minister, Adam Malik, would be present. The refugees were to carry Indonesian flags and call for integration. After only 2,000 of the 20,000 refugees attended the rally their food supplies were reduced and then completely cut off. Their only options were to sell their belongings at very low prices, to "do hard labour for criminally low wages" or to join the military.[58]

51. Some former refugees confirmed that it was the lack of adequate food that forced them to join the military in West Timor. In his statement to the Commission, Emiliano (Rui) Lopes said that initially the refugees in the camps in West Timor did not experience any shortages. However, the amount of aid received by the refugees began to diminish once all international aid was distributed by Indonesian government officials. According to him, some young men joined the Partisans in order to receive rations:

> One of the reasons I took up arms on the border was that there was no more food to eat, and I had to do this to receive food supplies. Because every donation from the international NGOs was given through the Indonesian government. In the beginning they [Indonesia] provided enough aid, but as time passed it began to decrease. I had to take up arms to get more food to eat, otherwise we would have faced a difficult situation.[59]

52. Odete dos Santos from Memo (Maliana, Bobonaro) told the Commission about the recruitment as TBOs (tenaga bantuan operasi, military porter) of two forcibly displaced members of her family, and its consequences. In 1975 her family was forcibly displaced to Atambua by F36. In Atambua two of her family members, Lesu Bere and Alfredo Lopes, were forced to become TBOs. They were made to go on military operations in Timor-Leste. According to Odete, Lesu Bere was killed by Indonesian soldiers in Atsabe, and Alfredo Lopes in Maliana.[60]

Food shortages and humanitarian assistance in Timor-Leste

53. The conditions of those who fled the violence but stayed within the borders of Timor-Leste are difficult to assess. Many people fled to remote locations and were isolated from any outsiders who could have delivered aid or acted as impartial observers.

54. ICRC correspondence confirms that, in addition to the loss of access to their own crops, isolation was a major reason why those who were displaced internally faced food insecurity. The ICRC delegate noted that the much of the population had already been living a marginal existence.[61] As previously noted, he estimated that 50% of the population was displaced due to the conflict.[62] He insisted, however, that there was no "starvation" following the civil war, but rather "food stress". The ICRC was given free access by Fretilin, which was aware that the food situation was likely to become critical if shipments were not allowed to land and replenish supplies.

55. The ICRC confined its food distribution activities to Dili and the Ermera-Maubara-Dili triangle. The ICRC delegate admitted that this meant that its distribution was not determined as much by need - although the areas where it did distribute food were ones that had suffered violence and displacement - as by its desire to avoid the appearance of political partiality. The ICRC declined to deliver food to the Fretilin-controlled areas on the grounds that such aid would be "political".[63] Fretilin handled distribution to the central part of the island, using supplies from the Australian Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA).[64] However, the ICRC food deliveries did not start until late November and had thus barely begun when it was forced to pull out of Timor-Leste in early December, just before the full-scale Indonesian invasion.

Hunger and deaths

56. Despite this humanitarian assistance, the Commission did receive reports of hunger and deaths due to lack of food and medicine. Displaced people in the interior highlands, in particular, had poor access to outside assistance. Below are some examples of testimonies received by the Commission.

57. Veronica dos Santos of Laclo (Manatuto) told the Commission how in 1975 her family fled from Apodeti supporters, and hid in the Zona Modok Forest. She listed six members of her family who died from lack of food and medical care:

> In our hiding place I lost several members of my family - João da Costa, José Luis dos Santos, Domingas dos Santos, Carlos do Rosario Cabral, Maria de Fatima Canossa and Filomeno Cabral - due to lack of food and medicine.[65]

58. The Commission heard of a case in Soibada (Manatuto) when conflict between political parties drove people to the forest. Under orders from Fretilin, people moved to a place called Wetirak Modod (Natarbora, Manatuto).[66]

59. José Nunes de Andrade recalled that he was attacked by UDT members in his village of Mahakidan (Alas, Manufahi) in 1975, while he and four of his friends were attempting to raise the Fretilin flag. The five fled to Wederok, and he was later joined by other members of his family. Two members of his family died from lack of food and illness while they were in Wederok.[67]

60. Some killings took place when people went searching for food. The Commission heard of cases where inter-party conflict resulted in people being internally displaced, and in some cases killed by Fretilin forces[68]

61. The reports of starvation during this period are few. The ICRC's overall assessment was that starvation and famine-related deaths were not a widespread phenomenon before the Indonesian invasion. As the violence quickly subsided (Fretilin gained control of the entire country in a matter of weeks), most of those who were internally displaced were in hiding for a month at most. By mid-September 1975, most of them had returned home and were planting food crops again.[69]

Displacement and famine during the Indonesian occupation (1975–1979)

Invasion, displacement and evacuation 1975–1977

62. The full-scale Indonesian invasion of Timor-Leste on 7 December 1975 marked the beginning of the displacement of the population of Timor-Leste on a massive scale. The invasion of Dili itself on that day caused many to flee to the countryside, following those who had left earlier in anticipation of an attack. Such movements were repeated outside Dili, both in response to the actual presence of Indonesian forces and in the expectation that their arrival was imminent.

63. Some evacuations were spontaneous, others were organised by the Fretilin-led resistance. In a complex mixture of circumstances, many East Timorese who left their homes then found themselves caught between a fear of life under harsh Indonesian military rule and a resistance determined to keep them out of Indonesian control. The motivation of the Resistance here appears to have been a combination of a commitment to support and protect the people, to meet the Resistance's own security needs in a time of war, a desire to retain control of the bulk of the population in order to launch its revolutionary social programme, and as evidence of the extent of its political support.

64. The numbers of displaced people are impossible to calculate for any point in the first two years of the occupation, but they certainly increased over that time. The eventual movement of something like 300,000 people into Indonesian-controlled centres between 1978 and 1979 is the best indicator of the massive scale of the displacement which began in late 1975.

Evacuation and flight after the full-scale invasion

65. The Indonesian invasion of Dili on 7 December 1975 found many people unprepared, even though it was expected. The situation was chaotic as people fled in all directions. Many became separated from their immediate family members. Belinda Lopes told the Commission:

> On 7 December 1975 I was in Quintal Boot. When the Indonesian troops invaded they came straight to our house and shot my brothers Raul and Kaimauk in front of me…The residents of Quintal Boot had all fled to the hills. My cousin and I chose to stay in the house. But as the situation became more chaotic both of us fled to Tereiro, and then [we] moved again to the Lahane Hospital. We stayed in Lahane for two days. We were very hungry because we did not have anything to eat. Finally the two of us returned to our house to get some rice and other food. The rest of my family was scattered…I don't know where they ran to.[70]

66. As news of the invasion reached other parts of the territory and Indonesian forces began to advance beyond Dili, many more people fled in fear. In Baucau the arrival of Indonesian soldiers came only days after the invasion of Dili. Members of the community of Uailili (Baucau, Baucau) recounted to the Commission:

> On 9 December 1975 Indonesia troops entered Baucau. [T]hey distributed posters written in Tetum which said among others: "Ami sei ba passa Natal iha Baucau to'o Tutuala" (We will celebrate Christmas from Baucau to Tutuala"). A day later, the people of Uailili [about 10 km from the centre of Baucau] scattered. Some ran into the forest, while others hid [in] the coconut grove near our house until the Indonesian troops came.[71]

67. For some communities, the news of the Indonesian invasion in Dili was enough for them to evacuate their homes to seek safety in the mountains. Manuel Carceres da Costa told the Commission of the community response in Laclo (Manatuto):

> After the Indonesian military invaded Dili on 7 December 1975, but before Christmas, there were people from Dili who fled returning to Laclo. They told us: "The Indonesian military have entered Dili and killed many people. They have shot people dead and used tanks to take everything the people owned." We heard this and thought: "Rather than…stay here and let the enemy destroy us, it is better … to flee to the forests." We also hoped that assistance from the outside world would come quickly.[72]

68. In other places Fretilin had made preparations for the evacuation of the population in the months leading up to the invasion and had evacuated villages well before the arrival of Indonesian forces in the area. This level of organisation seems to have been most common in the eastern districts of Baucau and Lautém, for example in the areas of Tutuala, Iliomar, Uaitame, Alawa Kraik and Ossuhuna.

69. Some people from the town of Ermera ran to the mountains in early 1976, when they heard that Indonesian troops had entered Letefoho from Bobonaro. Francisco Bernadino Soares told the Commission:

> We heard the sound of planes bombing the Letefoho area for one whole day. The situation in Ermera was no longer under control. The Resistance army tried to stop Indonesian soldiers in Dauhati, to prevent them from entering Ermera. We evacuated to Mau-Ubu, which is our traditional land where we have our gardens and uma lulik [ancestral home]. We fled because we heard that the Indonesians had entered Letefoho and were killing people randomly. We never imagined that we would face the disaster of people starving to death. For two years we lived quite well. When we left Ermera, there were 11 of us, plus another 20 family members who lived in Mau-Ubu. In total we were more than 30 people. When we returned to Ermera there were only three of us left. My wife and my family all died in the forest from sickness and hunger.[73]

70. In other areas people spoke of being able to remain in their villages in the interior until the Indonesian military approached in late 1976 or 1977.[74]

Capture or surrender

71. Some communities were captured before they had a chance to flee. Others chose to stay behind and take their chances with the invading Indonesian soldiers.

72. In Suai (Covalima) some people did not evacuate to the hills when the Indonesian army attacked. They hid in their gardens and then surrendered.[75]

73. Similarly, some people in Same (Manufahi) who did not follow the Fretilin leadership surrendered immediately to the Indonesian armed forces when they entered the town in June 1976.[76]

74. When the Indonesian forces attacked the village of Coliate Leotelo (Hatolia, Ermera) in May 1976, about 200 people were unable to escape because the army blockaded the area. At first these people were detained in Coliate Leotelo Village itself, then they were forced to move to Letefoho (Ermera).[77]

Fretilin internal divisions on policy towards civilians

75. Not long after the invasion the Fretilin leadership faced serious disagreement over the implications of its policy towards civilians that was confirmed at the Central Committee's meeting at Soibada in May 1976. For a variety of reasons, including political, military, humanitarian and religious reasons, the dissidents challenged the strategy of creating zonas libertadas where the civilian population could simultaneously support the armed struggle and undergo the political transformation needed to achieve Fretilin's revolutionary goals. They preferred to pursue a more purely military strategy, which would not rely on a civilian support base and thus would allow civilians to come down from the mountains and surrender. This challenge came from a number of sources, including professional soldiers, who had served in the Portuguese colonial army, traditional leaders and some within the Fretilin leadership itself. The most notable early advocate of these dissenting views was Aquiles Freitas, a former sergeant in the Portuguese army and a traditional leader from Quelicai (Baucau), who had been appointed deputy commander of the Centro Leste Sector. Aquiles Freitas was ultimately arrested on the orders of the Fretilin leadership with several of his followers and executed (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances), However, support for such views was widespread and persistent.

76. Community leaders told the commission about the impact of this violent conflict on the villages of the sub-district of Iliomar in Lautém in 1976. They remembered that when the political commissar for the Ponta Leste Sector, Juvenal Inácio (Sera Key) and Adjunto Fernando Txay had advocated the party line that civilians should evacuate to the mountains with Fretilin, Francisco Hornay had resisted them. Like his friend, Aquiles Freitas, Francisco Hornay was a former sergeant in the Portuguese colonial army who had joined Falintil. The conflict unleashed violence on both sides which resulted in the execution of Francisco Hornay and 14 of his followers, and the imprisonment and torture of many others.

Responsibilities of parties to the conflict

77. The Geneva Conventions clearly state that parties to a conflict must guarantee basic needs for the survival of civilians caught up in the conflict.*

78. The Commission received overwhelming evidence that the Indonesian armed forces gave absolute priority to security considerations, while paying scant attention to the protection and well-being of civilians. In so doing, Indonesia failed to fulfill its obligations to protect civilian life.

79. Iliomar is one example. In 1975 Fernando Amaral was the head of the village of Faut, on the edge of the town of Iliomar (Iliomar, Lautém). He told the Commission:

> The Indonesian invaders first entered Lospalos in [February] 1976. In Iliomar we did not experience anything [of the war] until 9 February 1977, when we started to hear mortar fire and the sound of cannons from ships. We became frightened and worried and…we evacuated to the forest around Fuat and to other places near our houses. We hid for several months in Fuat then moved to Luro. We moved into the forest because we were afraid of the Indonesian military. No one forced us.[78]

80. Often the local Fretilin leadership organised the evacuation in order to take people away from danger. These evacuations were part of Fretilin's policy to prepare the population for an organised national resistance. In Baucau, for example, Fretilin moved many people to the slopes of Mount Matebian early in February 1976. This was nearly two months after the Indonesian armed forces had entered Baucau. Mário (Marito) Nicolau dos Reis was a Fretilin leader in Baucau at the time of the invasion. He recounted to the Commission the internal Fretilin debate on whether to evacuate civilians:

* See Geneva Convention (IV) relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in a time of war, Geneva, 12 August 1949, for a full outline of the parties' obligations.

> [In 1975] there was a discussion among members of the Fretilin Central Committee (CCF). Some said, "if possible, we should follow the example of other countries: children and the elderly shouldn't have to go to the forest, we must pay attention to [their] economic and health needs. We don't have the means to support everyone". But others said: "If we don't prepare the people politically, morally and mentally, then we will not be able to maintain our legitimacy and fulfil our duty as the main party in Timor." Fretilin decided that everyone [must] evacuate. After everything was prepared, then they could come down [to surrender]. That was why Fretilin had to force, excuse me for using the word "force", everyone to flee to the mountains.[79]

81. When the people of Defawasi (Baguia, Baucau) began to evacuate in the direction of Mount Matebian in September 1976, it was on the orders of Fretilin. In October 2003 they recalled to the Commission:

> It was not too repressive. It was still required for our safety and also to demonstrate our loyalty to the armed front and the Fretilin Central Committee.[80]

82. The Commission was also told of instances where the evacuation was repressive. The people of Caisido (Baucau, Baucau) recalled their experience:

> Between February and March 1976, Fretilin started to force the people to evacuate, first to Uai-Ae and Bundura, then to Hae-Osso, Vemasse. While the evacuees were in Hae-Osso, Fretilin forces killed two people, Francisco Belo and Eduardo Belo, because they suspected them or out of revenge. Then they killed five Apodeti sympathisers. Then Fretilin forced the people to evacuate to Lobito.[81]

83. Often people did not have an opportunity to flee, or they chose not to. This was most common in towns.

84. The communities of Bidau Santana and Meti-Aut in Cristo Rei, Dili, recalled to the Commission:

> On 7 December the Indonesian paratroops landed in Bidau Santana and Meti-Aut, and all over Dili. We scattered in fear. Some stayed in their houses, some fled to the mountains and never returned. Chiquito Mau-Lohi [of Apodeti] persuaded people not to go to the forest, saying that if they all died there "Who will take responsibility in the future?"[82]

85. In Buruma, on the eastern edge of the town of Baucau, some people, and especially those who had been active in Fretilin, tried to flee after Indonesian tanks entered Baucau on 10 December. Several of them were captured. One of those who was captured, a Fretilin activist called Manuel Fernandes, was killed on 18 December. For those who stayed in Buruma life was difficult. In January 1976, Battalion 330 was posted in the village and two people suspected of having contact with Fretilin were killed by the Indonesian military. The people of Buruma were concentrated in the centre of the village and restrictions were placed on their movement outside that area.[83]

86. Indonesian troops attacked the village of Samara (Hatolia, Ermera) on 24 April 1976. Fretilin troops attempted to defend the village but the Indonesians overpowered them and took 500 civilian villagers to the district capital Ermera. In Ermera, the Samara villagers were not allowed to move outside the town and suffered from severe hunger.[84]

87. The community of the sub-district of Hato Udo (Ainaro) told the Commission of their difficult experience upon surrender in early 1976. In 1975 Hato Udo had about 3,000 inhabitants, but the people had only about 40 guns to defend themselves. The leaders of Hato Udo held a meeting on 28 February 1976, and decided to surrender without resistance to the Indonesian armed forces that day. But the decision to surrender also resulted in hardship. At first, they had sufficient food, but after some time the people began to suffer from hunger. The Indonesian battalion that took the town, Battalion 312, together with Hansip and Apodeti party members had killed the local livestock and burned some of the crops. People were not permitted to leave the village to farm. The Indonesian armed forces also brought many more people to Hato Udo who had surrendered from other places. These people also needed food, placing further strain on the already overstretched supplies.[85]

Displacement, hunger and death in Bobonaro

88. In an interview with Commission staff, Sister Consuela Martinez of the Carmelite Order told of her experience of early surrender in Bobonaro to Indonesian forces.[86] Restricted in their movements, food shortages became a constant problem for all the population there over the following three years. Sister Consuela's account is especially striking as it recalls the terrible conditions that the surrendering civilian population were held in by the Indonesian authorities. These conditions led to hunger and illness and a significant number of deaths, especially among children. Such testimony demonstrates the pattern of neglect toward surrendering civilians, which cost an immense number of lives in the later 1970s, and which was already established in the early period after the invasion.

Bobonaro surrenders early[87]

Sister Consuela Martinez of the Carmelite Order gave a detailed interview to the Commission about the Indonesian military attacks of 1975 in the border district of Bobonaro, which led to mass displacement.

She spoke of the difficulties of living in the mountains and of the terrible conditions upon surrender to the Indonesian military which led to large-scale loss of life among the civilian population. This brief study is based on the interview with Sr Consuela.

Sister Consuela was living in the town of Bobonaro with three other nuns in August 1975 when she witnessed Indonesian military airplanes bomb the town. This was around the time of the UDT "attempted coup" in Dili. She heard that planes were also bombing the towns of Maliana and Suai. Every day the planes dropped bombs. Many people died. She said that when the people heard the planes coming to drop the bombs, they ran to hide.

Sister Consuela said that a child of a catechist she knew was killed by a bomb, which exploded near to her. She remembers that in the Bobonaro market people were hit by flying debris as a result of one attack. She recalled thinking at the time that the bombs were not being directed at houses in the town but rather at the fields. Houses close to these areas were completely destroyed. The nuns and all the people were terrified. She tried to make a safe place in the kitchen with mattresses.

In December 1975, when the Indonesian soldiers landed in Dili, the people fled to the hills at Ai Metan. The four nuns went with them together with the local East Timorese priest, Fr António Maia. People were able to bring some food and, with what they could find, all survived. "We ate only bananas or peanuts every day. If there was some corn then they ate that. God blessed us, so no one was sick," she said.

Sister Consuela said that there was no community decision to flee, it was just spontaneous. There were about 8,000 people in Ai Metan – not just from the immediate vicinity of the town of Bobonaro, but from places such as Hauba (Maliana, Bobonaro) and Cailaco (Atabae, Bobonaro) in other sub-districts of Bobonaro District and from Marobo in Railaco (Ermera.) In the hills they lived out in the open, exposed to the cold. They built simple shelters out of grass and other materials they could find. There was no organisation or community decision-making process. People were generally grouped in families. About 300 people attached themselves to the four nuns and the priest, thinking perhaps they would be safer in their company.

About 15 members of Falintil were hiding with the people, including Manuel Barros, the son of the liurai of Hauba (who was later killed in Maliana). His father, the liurai, forbade them from carrying weapons.

On the morning of 2 February 1976, an unarmed Indonesian soldier, with an East Timorese Partisan from Atabae, came to meet them in the hills. He told them that if they surrendered they would not be bombed and they would be treated well. A group of people, including three of the nuns and the priest, were invited to walk to the foothills to discuss surrender. However all the people who were with the nuns went with them to the meeting. The priest spoke with the soldiers, as he was the only one who could speak some English. The meeting concluded at 5.00pm but they were not permitted to return that evening. They spent that night sheltering under the trees without food and returned the following morning. The next day, 3 February 1976, all 8,000 people collected their belongings and walked to Bobonaro, a journey of about three hours.

At the time they surrendered, one East Timorese Partisan recognised that there were members of Falintil among them. Another Partisan assaulted the son of the liurai. However, the Indonesian commander took action against this Partisan because he thought that people would be too afraid to surrender to the Indonesian military if they thought this could happen to them.

Life in Indonesian-occupied Bobonaro

When the group surrendered the soldiers did not given them any food. Most people were able to carry some food with them from the mountains. Later groups that surrendered were given a bowl of white rice with salt by the Indonesian soldiers at the time of surrender.

The people had to live in the town of Bobonaro and could not go beyond a distance of one kilometre from its centre. Some people lived in houses in the town, which were often not their own. They also stayed at the school, the church, the large house of the former Portuguese administrator, where the nuns had their clinic, and in other buildings where they could find shelter. Within the town perimeter itself there was an Indonesian police post, a military command post (Koramil) and a house where the commanders and Kopassandha (Special Forces) troops lived. On the roads out of town there were six or seven military posts. In the open field in front of the church the Indonesian soldiers set up seven portable mortar launchers, and in another area there was a large mounted artillery piece which could launch 36 missiles at one time.

Sister Consuela said the firing of the mortars from the churchyard was so loud that it would break the windows and lamps in the church. The Indonesian soldiers fired their artillery shells in all directions, and Falintil fired back.

If they wanted to go to find food, civilians had to be escorted by a soldier. However many people were killed, it was unclear whether they were killed by ABRI who thought they were Falintil, or by Falintil themselves. According to Sister Consuela, Falintil was angry that the people had surrendered to the Indonesians and they shot some people. In Aiasa seven people were killed by landmines and bombs when they went there to find food. Despite the risks of being killed by either side, the people tried to sneak out of the town in search of food.

The soldiers gave the nuns and the people who lived with them in the clinic some rice, flour, milk and sugar, but it was insufficent for the 27 people who lived in their house. For months Sister Consuela ate only watery porridge made from rice, once a day. She felt very depressed and was too weak to walk up and down the stairs. She felt powerless to help the dying children who came begging for food. The soldiers often asked the nuns what they needed, what was missing from their house. All she asked for was food. Eventually the soldiers gave the nuns rice, sugar, milk and cooking oil regularly, which they shared with the people staying with them, especially the children.

There was an Indonesian doctor and nurse from the Indonesian Red Cross in Bobonaro when the people surrendered in February 1976. They helped the nuns care for the most vulnerable children, but they left in April or May and the Carmelite nuns took over the care of the children. They fed between 120 and 180 destitute children at the clinic. They decided to give priority to the youngest children, feeding them themselves. Sr Consuela was afraid that if the food were given to their parents, it could be sold and the children would receive nothing.

The Sub-district administrator kept a record of the number of people who died. Every month, from February 1976 until the end of that year, 200 to 300 people died. The numbers decreased slightly from the beginning of 1977, and decreased again towards the end of 1979. The majority of those who died were children. Sister Consuela recalled:

In the morning there would be dead people here, dead people there, 6 to 8 dead people, just where they were sleeping. Every day many died because they were so frail, their legs swollen, their bodies also swollen with fluid. Their hair was falling out, their stomachs were swollen. We used small needles to help remove the fluid from their bodies. The people would arrive in the evening. The following morning this one would be dead, another one would be dead. I was there and I saw it. I saw many pregnant women who gave birth and were so weak from loss of blood.

Towards the end of 1976 the Indonesian military began to issue surat jalan (travel passes) that allowed people to move outside town into the surrounding fields. The most difficult years were 1976–1978, after which the people were given more freedom to go to their fields. However it was not until 1983 that the situation really returned to normal, and the people were allowed to go back to their own villages.

After the first group left the forest to live in Bobonaro on 3 February 1976, groups of people continued to surrender almost every week until 1979. Among the last to surrender were the Bunak people, who held out in the forest for three years. Often people surrendered in groups of up to 700. Those who surrendered were always frail. Many were so weak they could not walk back into town.

Life and death in the mountains (1976–1978)

89. In the first phase of the invasion the Indonesian forces concentrated on taking control of strategic towns and villages and the roads connecting them. Many people lived in their villages away from Indonesian control. At this stage of the invasion, civilians who fled the advancing Indonesian forces were dispersed throughout the interior. As the military offensives were generally not directed at these areas, the people living there were able to farm and live in reasonable safety. Gilman dos Santos described to the Commission the conditions during the early years of the conflict:

> Between 1975 and 1977 the food situation in the forest wasn't so bad. People could move around and plant according to the season. The Indonesian military controlled only district and sub-district towns, even though there was some fighting in the hills.[88]

90. From mid-1977, however, the Indonesian military began to move into the areas it had not conquered. For those who fled their homes for safety in the interior, the advance of the Indonesian forces into these areas forced them to be constantly on the move.

Fretilin's bases de apoio strategy

91. At its conference in Soibada (Manatuto) in May 1976, the Central Committee of Fretilin established structures for organising the civilian population under its control and for increasing the effectiveness of its armed wing, Falintil (see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structures and Strategies). The thinking underlying these changes was that the people of Timor-Leste were engaged simultaneously in waging a war and making a revolution. To further these two objectives military and civilian support bases, or bases de apoio, were established in each administrative zone. The Fretilin leadership concentrated displaced people at these bases de apoio, which became the logistical support centres for civilians and the Resistance for nearly three years. The last base was destroyed in November 1978. Xanana Gusmão described the rationale for the bases:

> The concept of base de apoio came about when the population ran to the hills after the Indonesians invaded on 7 December…Suddenly we were at war, but with the people among us. The concept was to build a foundation to provide political and logistical support, but mostly political support, which we could say was revolutionary.[89]

Vemasse (Vemasse, Baucau)

92. The people of Vemasse (Vemasse, Baucau) moved three times before they finally joined other displaced communities in an area controlled and organised by Fretilin in Uaimori (Viqueque). Cosme Freitas told the Commission that the people of Vemasse first left their town because they heard that the Indonesian military had killed ten civilians in the nearby aldeia of Cairabela on 11 December 1975. A teacher named Francisco Feliciano Ximenes led the people out of the town to Mount Lame, on the southern edge of town. They were joined by people from Cairabela and Bucoli (Baucau, Baucau). They built temporary barracks on Mount Lame. Because Indonesian forces had not yet established a permanent presence in Vemasse, the people from Vemasse were able to return home to harvest their gardens, giving them enough to eat. In mid-March 1976, the Indonesian army attacked their temporary settlement with bazookas and mortars, destroying their barracks and food stores.[90]

93. The people moved about 8 km further south, along the Vemasse River to Uai-Gae. They were able to plant gardens to meet their basic needs. But the fighting kept getting closer, and they had to move again. Each time the people of Vemasse moved, it was to a place where conditions were increasingly difficult. From Uai-Gae they walked 8 km east to Mount Uai Knassa. Finally they walked to Uaimori (now in Bibileo, Viqueque) in the mountains 20 km south of Vemasse. Fretilin had established Uaimori as a base de apoio. People from Viqueque, Dili and other parts of Timor-Leste were also there. They lived there for two years. Life became more difficult as time passed. As more and more people came, and there was not enough food.[91] In 1978, Uaimori came under attack, and the population fled again. Eventually, some were captured and brought to an Indonesian-controlled camp in Bucoli.[92]

Covalima

94. Indonesian troops entered Covalima District in force in early February 1976. They attacked by land and air, and shelled the district from the sea. Their aim was to take control of the towns of Covalima rather than the countryside. Falintil suffered during these attacks, but so did ordinary townspeople and villagers. Fretilin leaders urged the people to move to the safety of the hills outside the towns. Most people from the sub-districts of Fohorem, Fatululik, Fatumean and Tilomar fled about 10 km northeast to

Mount Taroman. They also went to the villages of Dato Tolu (Fohorem), Fato Loro (Fatululik), Taroman (Fatululik) and Lactos (Fohorem). Many people from the town of Suai fled north and northwest about 10 km to the sub-district of Maucatar. Not all residents of the town of Suai fled. Some hid in their gardens or near the beach for a few days, then surrendered to the Indonesian troops.[93]

95. The people of the sub-district of Zumalai also fled. They went in different directions. Some went west towards Lolotoe. They scattered throughout the area that stretches from the aldeia of Gala (Beco Village, Suai) to the aldeia of Zoilpo (Guda Village, Lolotoe, Bobonaro), and down to Zova Mount (Opa Village, Lolotoe, Bobonaro) and Labarai (Suai, Covalima). Others from Zumalai fled northwest towards Zulo (Mape/Zumalai). These were all hilly or lowland areas, 10 km or less from Zumalai. A few people who lived close to the border fled to the Betun District of West Timor, Indonesia. Many people who already lived in the mountains did not leave their homes at this time, as the Indonesian military was still a long way off.[94]

96. Initially, according to witness testimonies, the displaced people in Covalima District had only had the food they took with them from their homes.[95] They thought the war might last only two or three months. When these supplies had been eaten, they became hungry and starvation and illness struck. However, after about two months, Fretilin's youth and women's organisations, Organização Popular de Juventude Timorense (OPJT) and Organização Popular da Mulher Timor (OPMT), began to organise food supplies. This improved conditions and allowed people to survive in the hills for about one and a half years.[96] When the Indonesian army launched a large-scale attack on the Resistance based in the hills near Lolotoe in late 1977, the base de apoio was destroyed. The people were scattered, and most were captured at this time.

Table 4: Some key Resistance bases

Location	District	People from
Zumalai	Ainaro/Covalima	Zumalai, Ainaro, Hato Udo
Remexio	Aileu	Remexio, Laclo, Aileu, Dili
Mount Matebian	Baucau	Quelicai, Laivai (Ililai), Laga, Baucau, Baguia, Venilale, Lospalos, Manatuto, Viqueque, Same, Dili
Baguia	Baucau	Lospalos, Baguia, Ilomar, Uato Carbau
Cailaco	Bobonaro	Cailaco, Hatolia, Letefoho, Maubara, Atabae
Mount Taroman	Covalima	Covalima District
Zoilpo and Maucatar	Covalima	Covalima District, Lolotoe, Ermera, Ainaro
Halik, Labarai, Zova, Beco	Covalima	Covalima District, Lolotoe, Ermera, Ainaro
Catrailete (Mount Ramelau)	Ermera	Letefoho, Ermera, Ainaro, Aileu, Cailaco
Fatubessi	Ermera	Ermera, Cailaco, Maubara, Dili, Aileu, Ainaro, Suai
Iliomar	Lautém	Iliomar, Uato Carbau, Lospalos

Location	District	People from
Mehara	Lautém	Lautém District
Malehui (Maubara)	Liquiçá	Maubara, Leimea Kraik, Railaco, Atsabe, Ainaro, Zumalai
Manufahi South and North Sectors	Manufahi	Manufahi, Dili, Aileu, Maubisse, Manatuto, Soibada and other places
Alas	Manufahi	Manatuto, Same, Dili, Liquiçá, Ermera, Aileu, Ainaro
Fatuberliu	Manufahi	Turiscai, Maubisse, Aileu, Liquiçá, Dili
Mount Kablaki	Manufahi	Mau Chiga, Same, Letefoho, Aileu, Atsabe
Laclo	Manatuto	Manatuto District, Dili, Aileu
Natarbora	Manatuto	Manatuto, Same, Dili, Liquiçá, Ermera
Laclubar	Manatuto	Laclubar, Soibada, Manatuto
Barique	Manatuto	Natarbora, Lacluta, Barique, Same
Laleia	Manatuto	Baucau, Manatuto, Viqueque
Ossu	Viqueque	Ossu, Viqueque
Uaimori	Viqueque	Vemasse, Baucau, Venilale, Ossu, Lacluta
Uatolari	Viqueque	Ossu, Viqueque, Uatolari, Uato Carbau
Mount Bibileo	Viqueque	Lacluta, Aitana, Ossu, Laleia, Natarbora, Barique, Maubisse, Same. Later moved to Mount Matebian.
Lacluta	Viqueque	Lacluta, Ossu, Baucau, Viqueque
Lobito	Viqueque	Vemasse, Baucau, Venilale, Ossu, Lacluta
Mount Builo	Viqueque	Viqueque Town, Uato Carbau, Ossu, Baucau, Lospalos

Source: CAVR Research Notes

97. As the Indonesian attacks grew more intense, more rigorous security was put in place in the bases de apoio. The camps were organised in concentric rings of Falintil troops (Companhias de Intervenção) on the outer perimeter, with civilian defence forces called Forças de Auto-Defesa (Fade, also known as Armas Brancas) forming the next ring, and civilians concentrated at the centre. People were forbidden to move outside the perimeter.[97]

Life in the bases de apoio

98. Life in the bases de apoio was highly organised. Everyone was required to work in communal gardens as well as in their own personal gardens. The youth and women's organisations, OPJT and OPMT, had the task of organising people to plant rice, corn, tubers and other crops which were distributed to those in need and to feed the Falintil soldiers. The women also were required to weave cloth and produce traditional medicines. Rudimentary schools were set up to teach literacy and political ideology. At night they sang songs to encourage the people to believe they could be free. Some remember this time fondly, as a time of sharing and common purpose.

A young woman's perspective on life in a base de apoio[98]

Maria José da Costa was born in 1962. She was 13 years old when the Indonesian military invaded Dili in 1975. When Indonesian forces advanced to Soibada (Manatuto) in 1977, she ran with everyone from her village of Manlala to hide in the nearby forest of Lehutala. They built small huts near their gardens, so that they could collect food. As the Indonesian soldiers advanced, the community moved again to Fatuberliu in Manufahi. They built huts and a school. Maria and two girls began teaching the children, using charcoal and their fingers in the sand to practice writing. They taught their pupils to face hardships using methods that had been developed in Mozambique. They started communal gardens with the children, to help their families survive. But some people still died of hunger and disease during this time.

The school had been operating for only two months before they were, again, under attack from the Indonesian military. The community moved for the third time to Lakudadur, still in Fatuberliu. Again they rebuilt their huts, but the situation did not allow them to go back to harvest their fields in Manlala.

By early 1978 a large number of people had concentrated around Fatuberliu, driven there by Indonesian military assaults. The local population helped the new arrivals, but there were families who experienced serious shortages. About 10 km from where Maria lived, she counted 400 to 500 displaced persons. About 200 of them were malnourished. Maria and her friends joined an organisation called the Comissão de Apoio e Solidaridade (Solidarity and Support Committee, CAS) which provided food for those in need.

Other Fretilin organisations, including the women's and youth organisations, OPMT and OPJT, collected food. Eleven young women took turns carrying the food on horseback to places in need, including Sarin and Fukiran (both in Alas, Manufahi), and Fatuberliu. Working in two groups, the young women would spend one week in each location. Every morning they would make a mix of pounded cassava and corn, and when it was available, deer meat. They distributed the food to those in need twice a day. The CAS also educated the villagers about the importance of boiling drinking water, how to make toilets and other aspects of hygiene. With the help of a nurse named Felisberto Gouveia Leite, they learned to make traditional medicine from roots and vegetation. They also organised the burial of the dead. During a two-month period, about four people died every day. Maria still remembers how she took care of a very sick child, who eventually died. They asked community leaders to give moral support to the people through talks and presentations about the objectives of Fretilin. At night they would have free time to play, sing, dance and tell stories. Many songs of struggle were created during this period. Times were hard but at night they would come together in this way so they did not just passively accept their situation.

Two months later Maria and her friends had to cease all their activities because they were, again, under attack. They moved again, for the fourth time. The attack began in August 1978 and continued for three months. Eleven young women, all under 18 years old, were members of the CAS under the coordination of Soi Mali (Maria José Brites Boavida) and Aurora Assunção Sarmento. Most members of the CAS were relatives of Nicolau Lobato. Only five survived the war. Many died in 1978 or 1979. Some were shot, others were kidnapped and disappeared.* Maria survived because she surrendered in an area where she was not known. The few who knew about her activities did not say anything. She told the Commission "I am sure if the soldiers knew I was active in Fretilin, they would have killed me in 1979 when I surrendered. I was 16 years old."

99. Although they supported Fretilin and recognised the need to provide for the troops, others referred to the agricultural labour required of them as "kerja paksa secara halus" –a subtle form of forced labour. This was especially true for the women, who bore the main burden of feeding and clothing the troops.[99] Some describe it as more extreme, as a time of forced labour, increasing distrust, intolerance of dissent and harsh justice. Discipline was enforced by the linha da luta (the line of the struggle) and was very strict. Public as well as private problems were settled by political cadres.[100] The community of Defawasi (Baguia, Baucau) described the strict regime:

> Punishment and torture were part of the emergency situtation of war. Violators were put in traditional prisons such as pig-pens. [For] less serious violators, the punishment was to clear land to be cultivated over an area which was determined by the assembleia popular (a type of open people's court).[101]

* The Commission learned that Felisberto Gouveia Leite, his wife Alexandrina, four children and a foster-child were all executed in Fahenehan, Fatuberliu in July 1979 [see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances].

100. Food production generally met the needs of the population in the bases for more than one year. As attacks by Indonesian forces intensified, food supplies were disrupted. Civilian deaths from hunger, disease and constant shelling began to rise dramatically. People became increasingly concentrated in a few isolated locations such as Mount Matebian, Alas and the Natarbora Plain. The Commission received testimonies describing the hardship and loss of life during this period. The people of Ahic (Lacluta, Viqueque) recalled the losses they suffered:

> After the bombing began, Fretilin told people to flee to the forest and we constantly moved as Falintil ordered us. They began to open two places for processing sago, one in Kohok (now Wekfia), and the other called CP-2 (Centro Piloto-2). In CP-2 people were also to work the ricefields in Aitara, Buadara and We-Beikas, We-Look. On 10 July 1978, ABRI and Hansip broke through into Ahic and people began to flee to the west to Uma-Tolu, through Zona Barique Bora to the Sahen River. In Mauruick River in Zona Barique there was more fighting between Falintil and ABRI, and many families were separated. Falintil gave an order prohibiting livestock to be brought along, so all animals except horses had to be killed. From the post at Aito'os we had to flee to Natarbora at the Sahen River. From there we fled more attacks and headed back east along the beach south of Werow, Hali-Boco, Mota Dilor, Aimanas Rai and then to Welalir, Nuhukmesak and other places. Some people wanted to go back and harvest rice from their ricefields in Aitara and Buadara but the bombing campaign forced them to abandon their crops. No one had time to grow food because we were always being harassed by the enemy. We had to leave our belongings behind and they were looted by ABRI and Hansip. Many family members lost their lives…The value of our losses cannot be calculated.[102]

101. Many other people gave evidence to the Commission about the deaths of their family members due to hunger and lack of medical care in the mountains. The following accounts are examples of this suffering.

- Moises Quintão told the Commission:

  Mount Kablaki was destroyed. A Fretilin commander organised my family to go to the forest. My mother, Prisca de Araújo, died when [the Indonesian military] bombed Uskai. We ran to Mau-Ulo (Ainaro, Ainaro), then to Fatumeta. We stayed five days and my son Evalino died there. We walked on to Mauleo. My wife, Ludvina da Costa, died from hunger in the forest in the Ainaro area in 1977.[103]

- A man from Ainaro (identity withheld) described a mass population movement to the central sector during which more that 1,600 people died and only a few survived.[104]

- Mateus da Silva of Baucau told the Commission:

In 1976 to 1977, the Indonesian military conducted operations in Uato Carbau and Baguia. There was shooting between [ABRI] and Falintil. My family and our community fled to the foot of Mount Matebian. When they bombed Ketikura, the sound of weapons made people scared to look for food and children and old people died from lack of food. My child died because my wife could not produce breast milk. The shooting continued and my grandfather, who was about 60 years old, died due to hunger. In November 1978, we surrendered at the sub-district of Baguia, but we still did not have sufficent food and medicine. Many died, including my mother.[105]

- A man from Baucau (identity withheld) described how in October 1977 Falintil ordered people to move to Mount Matebian. Between then and their surrender in 1979, many died. After surrender, he said that deaths continued [106]

- Moises da Costa of Manufahi told the Commission:

  Because of the war we ran to Wetare, Alas in 1978. We planted crops but the Indonesian army attacked us and we could not harvest them. We left everything behind and moved to We Alas. We planted rice in large quantities but, again, because of enemy attacks we had to move to an area called Kolakau on the coast. We got separated there and my father was captured by Indonesian soldiers. We moved again to a place called Wemer where we stayed for eight months. And again we had to move, to Atabita. There my mother died due to hunger and sickness. There was no medicine. The next morning my younger sister died too. We buried them and moved to Lokfeu. A friend of ours named Calistro, under orders from [ABRI], brought us to surrender in Uma Metan. My brother, Domingos dos Santos, died in this place [Uma Metan] due to lack of food and medicine. He was only 22 years old.[107]

- Mateus da Conceição of Manufahi told the Commission that in 1978:

  We were concentrated in the area of Kolakau and Besusu (Uma Berloik, Alas, Manufahi) when the enemy attacked us. The population was not free to move around, and because of that many civilians died. Hundreds. They died because of hunger and sickness.[108]

- Luis Casimiro Martins from Aiceu in Raimerhei (Ermera, Ermera) told the Commission that many people died in his community between 1975 and1980. He recorded the deaths suffered among 27 families who lived in Aiceu and who ran to the mountains in March 1976 when the Indonesian army entered their village. In total he documented 230 deaths and their immediate causes. He listed 11 people who died in 1975, 51 in 1976, 74 in 1977, 54 in 1978, 30 in 1979, and ten in 1980. He categorised them according to the following: death as a result of bombing (3), not buried (12), deaths from wounds (14), missing (15), starvation (4), disease and hunger (181), shot by ABRI (1).[109]

102. As conditions worsened and the bombing increased, many people wanted to surrender in order to save their lives and those of their families. They were prevented from doing so for political reasons. Fretilin believed that its political legitimacy would be undermined if people surrendered, and that encouraging people to do so was an act of treason.

Detention for wanting to surrender

103. The Fretilin leadership kept strict control over the population living around the bases de apoio. A rudimentary judicial process was established to punish those whose actions were thought to harm the community or put it at risk. A person accused of wrong-doing would be arrested and brought first before the military leadership, and then before the civilian leadership of the zone. The person to determine if someone had done wrong was the regional political commissar (Comissário Politico Regional, CPR). It was his responsibility to ensure that the political line of the leadership was followed. Sometimes, especially in the early days, there would be a people's court (justiça popular). But the political commissar had a lot of influence on a people's court. Those found guilty would be detained in make-shift prisons known as Renal (Rehabilitação Nasional).

104. Many detainees in the Renal experienced ill-treatment and torture. [see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment] As the bombings and hunger increased, some people living in the bases de apoio wanted to surrender to the Indonesian military. However surrender was considered by Fretilin a risk to the security of the Fretilin forces and the civilians with them.

105. The Commission heard many accounts about people who were put in prison because the leadership believed they might surrender or suspected that they had had, or were intending to have, contact with Indonesian forces. Antonino Rodrigues from Faturilau, Fahi Soi (Lequidoe, Aileu) was arrested by Fretilin in 1978. Faturilau had come under attack by ABRI. Because Antonino was afraid and his 50-year-old father, Berleki, was ill, the two tried to escape on a horse under cover of night. Before they could leave Faturilau, they were caught by F41, the assistant for security to the adjunto, F42, and nine other men. F41 and his men arrested Antonino Rodrigues on suspicion of having been in contact with ABRI. The next morning they loosened, but did not remove, the ties on his hands and took him to Adjunto F42 at Sungai River, Sumiun. F42 told one of his commanders, F43, to beat, kick and trample on Antonino Rodrigues for one hour. After that, F42 ordered Antonino Rodrigues to carry equipment for Falintil during a move.[110]

106. Miguel da Costa, from Sabuli Village (Metinaro, Dili), reported that Fretilin troops arrested his brother, Jorgé Carvalho, in 1977 because he was playing with a football, which he had found on the beach. Falintil was suspicious, thinking he must have been in contact with the Indonesian troops in the town and concluded that he had become a spy for Indonesia. The Fretilin troops put him in the Renal in Remexio (Aileu), where he later died.[111]

107. Lucia de Jesus Barreto reported that in 1978 she and her family were in the base de apoio in Fatuberliu (Manufahi). Because they were desperate for food, her son Bastião da Silva, who was only 14, and a friend, Alcino da Costa, went to Lisimori in the village of Mada Beno (Laulara, Aileu) to look for food. They were arrested by Falintil on suspicion of being spies. The two were imprisoned in the Renal in Remexio, where they were given very little food. Bastião da Silva became ill and died in the Renal.[112]

108. Agustinho da Costa told the Commission that in 1976 he and his family fled an area called Komite Rame, Uatolari (Ossu, Viqueque) where many displaced communities had concentrated after an attack by Indonesian soldiers. They moved to Leki Loho, which was under control of Falintil and the location of a Renal. During this time a traditional leader (liurai) from Ossu, Gaspar Reis, escaped with his followers to surrender to the Indonesian military in the town of Ossu. Because of this Agustinho and his family were arrested by the Falintil leaders. He told the Commission:

> They put me and my wife, Dominggas da Costa, my child Mau-Naha and eight other people inside a "pig pen." We were beaten with a stick, kicked, punched and slapped. We were given water mixed with salt to drink. At night our hands were tied behind our backs. We were in the Renal in Leki Loho for one year. My friend, Olo-Gari, died from the torture by Falintil.[113]

Accused of planning to surrender[114]

Elias Quintão was the Fretilin leader (delegado) for the village of Hatu Makerek (Laclubar, Manatuto). In a detailed interview he told the Commission of his experience of detention by Fretilin and the suffering of hunger of prisoners in these circumstances. The following summary is based on this interview.

The people of Hatu Makerek had fled to the forest near their homes after the Indonesian armed forces invaded. On 15 August 1977 the Falintil zone commander, F44, and his men arrested Elias Quintão and his bodyguard, Luis Kehebau. They were still in the Hatu Makerek area. The Falintil men tied Elias Quintão's hands behind his back. Commander F44 shouted to the people who were watching that Elias Quintão was a traitor. They told him to walk to the front of the office where they handed him over to the zone secretary, F45, and to the commander of the Sector Centro Sul, F46.

The Laclubar zone committee said that Elias Quintão had been planning to surrender to the Indonesian military, together with the people from Hatu Makerek. They interrogated Elias Quintão and then put him in a cell. They put his feet in stocks made from bamboo. His hands were still tied behind his back. They only released his hands and his feet to let him eat. They did not beat him.

After 40 days, at the end of September 1977, F45 told Elias Quintão that he would send the prisoners to Rameliak (Turiscai, Manufahi), the command centre for Centro Sul Sector and the location of the sector's Renal. There the Minister for Justice, F50, would deal with the prisoners. F45 also threatened to cut off Elias Quintão's head. Then Elias Quintão walked to Rameliak, tied to another prisoner named Sabino, and escorted by four armed Falintil soldiers.

Arriving at Rameliak at 5.00 in the evening, the two prisoners were taken to see Commanders F48 and F49. The two commanders put the prisoners in a cell. Elias Quintão, his hands still tied, shared a cell with Father Mariano Soares. He stayed in this cell for nearly four months, until early January 1978. He had to work in the corn garden and cook for Falintil. He was always kept under guard, but was not beaten. His hands were not tied while he worked, but at night he was tied up. According to Elias Quintão, there were as many as 146 prisoners in Rameliak.

In early January 1978, he was moved to Alas where he was detained for five months until mid-May 1978. He was still waiting to see F50, the Minister for Justice. The prisoners were also required to work. After taking a bath in the river, they were told to work in the rice fields, while Falintil guarded them with guns. He was not beaten but received only one small meal a day, at 2.00 pm, after finishing his work.

When the Indonesian military surrounded Alas, the prisoners were moved to a place near Betano where they stayed He was there until the end of July 1978. The prisoners had to work making salt for Falintil. Again they were always guarded by armed Falintil soldiers though they were not beaten and they received one small meal every day. Elias Quintão was very weak by this time. He was sick and hungry, but he still had to work.

Finally, at the end of July 1978, Elias Quintão and 27 other prisoners met F50, the Minister of Justice. He told them: "Now I will interrogate you. Anyone who is proved to have done wrong will be punished. However, if the interrogation reveals no wrong-doing, you will be set free." After being interrogated one by one, all of the prisoners were set free.

Soon after they were released, the Indonesian military attacked again. Battalion 744 captured Elias Quintão and took him to Uma Metan (Alas, Manufahi).

109. The largest number of cases of imprisonment of people allegedly wanting to surrender happened in 1977. At this time, Indonesian attacks on the Fretilin-controlled bases de apoio were growing in intensity. Life in the bush became more difficult. Some Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders were in favour of letting people surrender, leaving Falintil in the mountains to continue the fight. The most important Fretilin leader to take this position was Francisco Xavier do Amaral, then President of Fretilin. For this reason the Fretilin Central Committee arrested him in September 1977. Although he survived, many of Francisco Xavier do Amaral's close colleagues and alleged followers were executed.

110. During the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict, Francisco Xavier Amaral described the rift in the Fretilin leadership, and his subsequent imprisonment by Fretilin as a "traitor". He recalled that he was very concerned about the many sick and hungry people amongst the civilian population in the mountains with Fretilin.

> I spoke with Nicolao Lobato about this. I said, "I think this problem is really serious. Firstly, we don't know when this war will end. Secondly, we cannot compare our forces to the Indonesian forces. Thirdly, our logistical preparations to provide food to the people [were not sufficient]. Fourthly, our wounded soldiers, women giving birth in the forest, orphans, people with broken arms and legs, and we have no medicine."
>
> So this was my idea. We should send the population to surrender. Only those men who were strong and could fight the war would stay with the Central Committee. Because we didn't know how many years it would be before the war was over. We planned this, and then we went to a Central Committee meeting…There I discovered that one or two had ideas that weren't the same as mine. There began to be a rift within Fretilin. We had begun to divide among ourselves. Some said that the doctrine [of Fretilin] was not right. Some said that the doctrine was right but people weren't following it properly. Some said it was good. We began to lose our trust in each other…
>
> Because of this they arrested me, put me in prison and accused me…of having sent people to surrender so that in the future when I surrendered to Indonesia, they would give me a position as a general or a minister. This was the argument of those who were against me.[115]

111. As many community discussions organised by the Commission attested, the affect of this rift on communities still in the mountains at this time was profound. This was especially so in those districts and sub-districts where support for Xavier do Amaral was alleged to be strong, such as Turiscai, Maubisse, Aileu and Manatuto. The entries for 1977 in two typical accounts from commuity discussions in the district of Aileu convey the atmosphere at this time. The community of Hoholau (Aileu Town, Aileu) told the Commission:

People were saddened by the arrest of Xavier. The situation became tight. The guia de marcha [travel pass] was introduced, and those who did not have them were dubbed traitors. The Central Committee ordered our commander F51 to move the people from Hoholau to Lequidoe. The colaborador of Zona 3, F52, came to tell the people that they must move to the forest in Lequidoe. About 500 people did move, a small number stayed in Hoholau. ABRI took advantage of the situation to kill three. F52 shot dead some people who do not want to go to Lequidoe. About 300 died in Lequidoe.*[116]

112. The community of Lausi/Bandudato (Aileu Town, Aileu) also explained to the Commission:

The arrest of Francisco Xavier do Amaral led to widespread suspicion. A commander from Bandudato, Paulino Xavier Pereira, was arrested. Nine days later his troops went to visit him in the Renal, but they could not find him. Those not in possession of a travel pass were accused of having contact with the enemy, arrested and punished in Rai Kuak Lebututu, which was under control of Adjunto F53... People wanted to surrender but had to keep it secret.[117]

On the run (1976–1978)

113. During the first three years of the Indonesian occupation increasing numbers of East Timorese people were constantly on the move. In the first year of the war people fled from the main administrative centres into the mountainous countryside as the occupying force took control of those centres. Then, in 1977 and 1978, the Indonesian military moved into the rural areas to gain control of the bulk of the population and weaken the armed resistance. Over time this action caused a massive dislocation of the bulk of population as it sought to avoid coming under Indonesian control. The effect of continual dislocation on the well-being of the population was calamitous.

Destruction of food sources

114. Traditional agricultural systems in Timor-Leste have supported the population for generations. Before the Indonesian invasion the bulk of the population was spread throughout the land in small settlements built close to fertile areas. The dislocation of the population from these settlements by military action led directly to food shortages.

* In the Central Committee denunciation of Francisco Xavier do Amaral, it is alleged that his associates had been crossing the lines to make contact with the enemy, and in what is probably a reference to the introdution of the guia de marcha, that such movement had been “sufficiently restricted” with the introduction by the North Central Sector Political Commissariat of direct controls on people’s movements. [A Nossa Vitoria é Apenas Questão de Tempo, Communicado do Comité do C C da Fretilin de 14/9/77, aquando do traição de Xavier do Amaral, (Our Victory is just a matter of time. Communiqué of the Fretilin Central Committee 14/9/97, regarding the betrayal of Xavier do Amaral p.20].

Worse, Indonesian forces also deliberately destroyed crops, fruit trees, livestock and food stores during this period of the occupation.

Food source destruction by Indonesian forces

115. Eye-witnesses told the Commission how, as the military campaign to force the surrender of the population in the mountains escalated, Indonesian soldiers destroyed food crops belonging to East Timorese civilians. By the end of the 1970s, this strategy of food crop destruction contributed directly to dire food shortages and famine conditions throughout Timor-Leste.

116. The Indonesian military destroyed food crops, fruit trees and livestock. From the accounts given below this tactic seems to have had a variety of motives and to have been implemented in different circumstances. Sometimes it appears to have been a form of punishment and a display of power over the civilian population. On other occasions it seems to have been intended to have had the more military objective of denying Falintil food. It was used as part of the forced displacement of people from one village to another. However, in those circumstances in which the civilian population had fled only a short distance from their homes, its purpose seems to have been to force people to surrender.

117. Examples of each of these phenomena follow.

118. The Commission received evidence that the military strategy of destroying food sources started in the earliest days of the Indonesian invasion. For example the Commission heard testimony describing the Indonesian military's systematic destruction of livestock in Metinaro in December 1975.[118]

119. Another deponent described an exodus of the population from Laleia (Manatuto) to Natarbora (Manatuto) in 1975. During the people's absence, the Indonesian military destroyed the villager's food crops. This led to great difficulty for the people in finding food, and deaths resulted.[119].

120. In another example described to the Commission, when ABRI attacked a village in Lacluta (Viqueque) in 1978, people fled to the forest. When they felt safe to return to their village, their houses, livestock and coconut trees had all been destroyed by the Indonesian military. The difficulties they faced finding food forced them to surrender in 1979.[120]

121. In 1977 in Laclo (Manatuto) Indonesian soldiers drove off hungry refugees who came down from the mountains to harvest their fields. The soldiers burned the gardens and shot the livestock.[121]

122. The Commission heard of a similar example in Laga (Baucau). After people fled to the forest, Indonesian soldiers killed their livestock, took away all the families' food supplies, and burned the people's houses.[122]

123. After Alda Pereira da Silva and his family evacuated their home in Osso Rua (Ossu, Viqueque) in 1976, Indonesian soldiers burned three of their houses, their livestock and rice barn.[123]

124. After Agapito Quintão and his family fled their home in Irabin, Letarea (Uato Carbau, Viqueque) Indonesian soldiers burned his house and rice stock, and killed a horse and five pigs.[124]

125. Francisco Barbosa was a Falintil commander. He and a large group of people from the villages of Foholau, Orana and Matorek (Turiscai, Manufahi) escaped south to Alas and Welaluhu (Fatuberliu, Manufahi) when the Indonesian military attacked Turiscai in 1978. When he was captured with a group of 150 others, Indonesian troops and Hansip brought them back to Turiscai. The Indonesian military had burned their houses, agricultural implements, stores of corn and dried cassava and had also taken some of their food to sell in the town. They were left with only some potatoes and cassava tubers in their gardens.[125]

126. In 1978, Indonesian soldiers and Hansip attacked the aldeia of Tasidadula, Dilor (Lacluta, Viqueque) where Guilhermino Campos and his family lived. They burned all his food supplies. The villagers fled. Guilhermino Campos later surrendered with his family.[126]

127. After Maria Alves surrendered in 1979, she returned to her village, Bubususu (Fatuberliu, Manufahi), and made a new house and prepared fields. The Indonesian military ordered her family to move again to another village, then burned her food crops (papaya and tubers) and her house to make sure she left and did not come back to her village.[127]

128. In April 1976, soon after Indonesian forces entered Lautém, Battalion 502 captured Paulo de Jesus in Parlamento (Com, Moro, Lautém). They burned all his food supplies (maize) as well as his house.[128]

129. In 1976, António Soares and his uncle, Cristovão da Costa, were guarding a Falintil post in Esa-Isi (Ossu, Viqueque). Three members of Hansip on patrol in Esa-Isi discovered them and shot Cristovão da Costa dead. They then burned the family's houses, and stole 40 buffaloes, 31 horses, 58 goats and the contents of their five rice barns.[129]

130. In 1977, in his presence, members of Hansip burned Berteti Mauhui's maize field in Hut-Manhati in Letefoho (Same, Manufahi) and took all his food supplies and livestock.[130]

131. The Commission also received evidence which shows that even after most civilians had surrendered, the Indonesian military continued to shoot livestock and destroy food crops by burning them or cutting down fruit trees and pulling them up by the roots. The objective was to deny food to Falintil. The Indonesian military called these operations curlog (penghancuran logistik, logistical destruction). This practice also affected the food security of civilians, as the fruit trees and crops belonged to ordinary people who needed them for their own survival.

Destruction of food crops by Fretilin

132. The Commission received testimony that Fretilin/Falintil forces were also involved in the destruction of crops. Compared with the number of reports of the Indonesian military committing such acts, reported instances of the burning and destruction of crops by members of Fretilin/Falintil were relatively few. Nevertheless, it is important to note that such violations did take place. For example, Father Eligio Locatelli of Fatumaca (Baucau, Baucau) told the Commission:

> Between 1975 and 1978, ABRI and Fretilin destroyed civilian agricultural plots and killed scores of livestock. Fretilin burned people's crops saying that people's farms needed to be far from the towns, so that they could make use [of the produce] for themselves. When people returned to their land, there were no animals to work it. As a result people could not plant and remained hungry.[131]

Driven by hunger and bombardment from the air

133. Between 1977 and 1978, the Indonesian military systematically attacked the bases de apoio using every means at their disposal to ensure their final destruction. This military campaign was in effect the final stage of Operation Seroja that began with the full-scale invasion on 7 December 1975. The Indonesian military deployed massive numbers of troops to surround the large population concentrations into which the Fretilin/Falintil leadership and the displaced civilian populations had either been driven or had fled, and then used overwhelming firepower to force them into submission. Because of the tactic adopted by the Indonesian military, the East Timorese Resistance called the campaign the encirclement and annihilation campaign (cerco e aniquilamento, see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict).

Manufahi

134. In August 1978, Indonesian troops attacked the base de apoio of the South Central Sector in Alas, Manufahi. The attacks lasted for three months, causing many civilian deaths from bombs and bullets but especially from starvation. Because the offensive took place during the dry season, fires started by bombs burned large tracts of vegetation and burned people to death. Thousands were forced to surrender or were captured, and were placed in military camps in Betano (Same, Manufahi), Selihasan (6 kilometres east of Betano township, Same, Manufahi), Uma Metan (a temporary camp 400 metres south of Alas Town, Manufahi), Lebos (a temporary camp 2 kilometres southwest of Alas Town, Manufahi), and the town of Same.[132]

Covalima

135. People displaced in Covalima were living on Mount Taroman (Fatululik, Covalima) and Maucatar (Suai, Covalima) when the Indonesian army attacked in September and October 1977. The Fretilin leadership moved the people to the Zoilpo/Zova area in the lowlands west of Lolotoe (Bobonaro). Many people surrendered to the Indonesian military before they reached the Zoilpo/Zova area and were directed to live near the military posts in Beco (Suai). By this time, the Fretilin leadership in Covalima had its base at Zuak, just south of the town of Lolotoe (Bobonaro).[133] Nearby was Zova Mount, four kilometers south-east of Lolotoe township, which was a leadership training centre for Fretilin cadres. The Indonesian military had occupied the town of Lolotoe, but not yet the countryside around it. During the move to Zoilpo/Zova many people died from Indonesia military attacks. Those who survived and did not surrender remained in the area around Zoilpa/Zova for about another 12 months. Indonesian forces did not conduct intensive operations in this area during that time. Their helicopters and planes frequently passed overhead without attacking. However, food supplies were dwindling and people were forced to eat wild foods such as roots and sago. Sometimes they secretly harvested fields planted by other people.[134]

136. When Indonesian forces began to attack the base de apoio again, the Fretilin leadership decided to evacuate the population to the Northern Frontier Sector (Sector Fronteira Norte), based in the Fatubessi area in Ermera. They decided to to split the population into two large groups. One planned to go west via Mount Taroman and then north; the other to go east via Beco and then north via Mount Ucecai, (Mape/Zumalai, Covalima). The first group managed to reach Ermera District on foot, but were then captured by the Indonesian military and were placed in a camp in Fatubessi. The second group did not succeed. Though weakened by hunger and disease, which had already taken many lives, they reached the lowlands south of Zumalai, an area known as Halic. They then crossed the Loumea River near Beco, but in January 1978, as they approached the Mola River, they came under attack from Indonesian forces.[135]

137. Many people are thought to have died in this attack. The survivors of the massacre at the Mola River retreated back to Halic, which was not yet under Indonesian control. Airplanes strafed and bombed the refugees; navy ships fired shells at them; machine gun fire continued into the night. The operation went on for two days and by the end most of the refugees who had survived had been captured.

> The dead were everywhere. They had died from starvation, the bombardments and sickness. There were some corpses still holding sweet potatoes, mangoes and food, even though parts of their bodies were rotting and snakes were crawling over them. But we still had to take and clean [the food] with a cloth or whatever was available, so that we could eat it, because we were also just waiting for our turn to die from hunger. There was no clean water, only pools of soiled water in which there were dead buffaloes and human corpses. We had to filter [the water] with clothes or sarongs so that we could drink it.[136]

138. The Indonesian military placed the people they captured in camps including one at Beco. Soldiers guarded them closely. The people received some food from the Indonesian army and from the Church, but it was not enough. Help from overseas had not yet arrived. The people were already weak; and many more died in the military-controlled camps.

Uaimori, Viqueque

139. When the Indonesian military attacked the Uaimori base in September 1978, the people first fled further south, walking all the way to the Natarbora Plain, just south of the village of Umaboco (Barique, Manatuto). Many people were killed when they were attacked during this journey. Those in the Vemasse group who survived this attack turned north towards their home village, but were captured by Hansip and ABRI at Osso-Ala (Vemasse, Baucau). Indonesian armed forces took them to Bucoli (Baucau, Baucau). Cosme Freitas from Vemasse (Baucau) described the terror and anguish of those on the run from Indonesian military attacks in 1978:

> When we evacuated from Uaimori, people began to die. From starvation or from illness. As we walked, death stalked us. Death was behind us as we walked, and people died. Not only old people, but children, through lack of food. The old people walked, their strength all gone, carrying just one maek [a species of tuber], or a kumbili [sweet yam]. And a little water in a bamboo container on their backs. This is how many of us died. The dead were scattered all along the way [from Uaimori to Natarbora]. Others died from the mortars, 80 to 100 a day. We wanted to bury them, but the enemy kept shooting, so how could we bury them? We ran on. An old woman said: "Please my son, dig a hole to bury my child's body." We dug a hole, but less than half a metre deep. Before lowering the little angel into the hole we wrapped it in a mat to the sound of continuing gunfire. How could we bury it? We bent our heads and buried it with our hands.
>
> Those we could, we buried. Otherwise they were left behind. How can we now find their bones? They rotted just as they were. We saw seven or eight people were sitting while leaning against a tree. They leaned against the tree and died like that. Flies and dogs were around them. In our hearts we were terrified.[137]

Turiscai, Manufahi

140. The community of the village of Liurai (Turiscai, Manufahi) told the Commission about the losses they suffered as they moved from place to place between 1976 and 1979. Their experience is summarised below:

> 1976: Indonesian forces entered Turiscai in March. The people and [our] forces stayed in the village of Liurai. Fretilin fought with ABRI in Geligili and three Falintil soldiers were killed. ABRI entered Liurai, killing two Falintil soldiers in Sakoko. People fled to the mountain top, some fled to Lequidoe [in Aileu], others to Orana and Foholau [both in Turiscai]. Of those who moved to Lequidoe, 80 died due to hunger and disease, and 220 died due to hunger and disease in Orana and Foholau.
>
> 1977: The Lequidoe base de apoio was destroyed. The villagers from Liurai living in Lequidoe ran in all directions, including to Orana and Foholau. 250 people died due to hunger and disease.

> 1978: In August the people left [Turiscai] to move to Alas and Fatuberliu. 50 people died due to hunger and disease in Besusu, Alas. Forty people died due to hunger and disease in Carauha (Fatuberliu).
>
> 1979: ABRI attacked from the sea, from the sky, and by land. The people ran from Alas and Fatuberliu back to Sarin in Alas. Others ran to the town of Turiscai (which was under Indonesian control). Twenty people died from hunger and disease in Sarin; 120 people died in Turiscai.
>
> 1980–1981: The people of Liurai lived in Turiscai. Three women (one married, two 14 year old girls) became victims of [sexual] violations by Indonesian soldiers. Indonesian and Hansip soldiers controlled members of the community who looked for food in Orana and Foholau.[138]

141. Tomás Barbosa, also from Turiscai, described the final days of the Sector Centro Sul *base de apo*io:

> The bombs they dropped destroyed everything. When we went to get water we did not know if it was contaminated. We did not know if we were going to die from that or from hunger. We still tried to help others who did not have food. We ran towards the coast, to Welaluhu and then to Alas. But the Indonesian forces kept coming. We ran in all directions. At the Suain River I saw a woman who had died holding her baby to her breast. The baby was still alive, suckling his mother's breast. I saw this with my own eyes. But what could I have done? I was sick, I could not walk, I was carrying my own child. I had to leave him behind. I saw people dying all around me.[139]

Mount Matebian

142. By October 1978, when the Indonesian military launched its all-out assault on Mount Matebian, tens of thousands of civilians were concentrated on Mount Matebian. Some had been there since 1975. Others had fled there from other bases that had fallen; yet others were organised by Fretilin to move to the mountain.

143. Immediately after the Indonesian invasion of Dili in 1975, people started to flee to Mount Matebian. Some came from as far away as Dili and headed east because that was where their original home was.[140] Most came from places nearby and were settled in villages on the lower slopes of the mountain such as the village of Lavateri in the sub-district of Baguia. In 1977 evacuees from other villages were organised into new aldeias, according to their place of origin. There were aldeias for people from the Baucau villages of Tekinomata, Samalari and Boleha (all in Laga, Baucau) and Guruça, Afaça, Namanei (all in Quelicai, Baucau). Those from Dili were impressed by the level of organisation they found on Matebian. People who had been at Matebian from the aldeias of Benamauk, Camea and Fatuahi (Cristu Rei, Dili) said that in Baguia up until the final assault there was sufficient food and people were not dying. They attributed this to the leadership in their zone, the political commissar, Abel Larissina, and Adjunto Xanana Gusmão, who was in charge of economic welfare.[141]

144. The Indonesian military earlier attacked the base de apoio at Mount Builo (Viqueque) in the middle of 1977. Since 1976, displaced people from Ossu, Uatolari, Viqueque Town, Uato Carbau (all in Viqueque) and Baucau had been concentrated there. According to Horacio da Silva, in the first few months after the evacuation to Builo, two or three people died from hunger and disease each day. The Fretilin leadership improved the situation by organising communal gardens but the Indonesian military discovered the location and attacked Mount Builo in 1977. Many civilians died as a direct result of the attack. Horacio da Silva told the Commission:

> Our homes were burned. Cattle, buffalo and horses were stolen or killed and left to rot. Our harvest was burned and destroyed as were our fields. The whole location was totally razed. The operation was carried out by ABRI, Hansip and Partisans. Many people surrendered or were captured and were taken to camps in Uatolari and Viqueque.[142]

145. Others ran to Mount Matebian, the last base de apoio in Timor-Leste. Fretilin organised the people into cooperatives and established communal gardens. The harvest was stored in "logistics warehouses" and food was distributed to Falintil soldiers and all those in urgent need. But conditions were not as good as on Mount Builo and more people died of starvation and illness on Mount Matebian.

146. Fretilin started organising the movement of people from Lautém to Mount Matebian in 1977. Not all moved willingly. The community of Puno (Pairara, Moro) told the Commission that they had been forced to move.[143] The people of Iliomar were the last group from Lautém to be moved to Matebian,[144] leaving their base on Mount Laqumau in the sub-district of Luro in June 1978, as they heard the gunfire of the Indonesian forces approaching from Uato Carbau.[145] When they reached Matebian they settled in Lavateri region. As the Indonesian forces stepped up their attacks, they moved up the mountain from Lavateri to Siriafa and from there to the top of Matebian.

147. Once the all-out Indonesian attack on Matebian began, life on the mountain became intolerable (see Box: Testimony of Survivors of Matebian par. 148). In their community discussion with the Commission, the people of Defawasi (Baguia, Baucau) said that Indonesian forces fenced off Mount Matebian like a noose. As the noose tightened, the people on the mountain were being more and more tightly packed together. Xanana Gusmão wrote that he began to doubt the wisdom of the strategy of concentrating people on Matebian:

> I regretted moving all those people to Matebian which was literally full and problems arose everywhere between the recent arrivals with the local residents.[146]

148. It was at this point that the Fretilin leadership changed its strategy, allowing the people to surrender but on the understanding that they "always fight for independence:

you may give your arms and legs to the enemy, but you must give your hearts to your country" ("nafatin ukun rasik aan: liman ho ain fo ba inimigo maibe laran fo ba o-nia rain").

Testimony of survivors of the Matebian bombings

Horacio da Silva, from Ossu (Viqueque), described the final days of those who had sought refuge on Mount Matebian. Between 1976 and 1977, many people from Ossu, Uatolari, Viqueque Town, Uato Carbau and Baucau lived under the protection of Fretilin/Falintil soldiers in an area called Builo. In Builo, Fretilin organised communal agricultural activities to provide for the needs of civilians and armed forces. In 1977, ABRI began intensive attacks on Builo. People surrendered in Uatolari and Viqueque, but others moved on to Matebian, the last base de apoio holding out against the Indonesian military assault. The final days in Matebian were very difficult.

People died of starvation and illness every day, especially the elderly and children who were malnourished…The death toll increased to 5 to 6 people per day. Although we set up a cooperative and organised people to plant communal gardens, the crops…were reserved mainly for Falintil and people who really needed it.

Horacio da Silva said that in October 1978, Indonesian forces launched an all-out assault on Mount Matebian from the air, sea and land, attacking Falintil forces and civilians alike:

We saw people die in front of us after being hit by bombs…We waited for our turn to die. There were also dead people at the water source…and we had to get drinking water from there…We walked among the dead, hid among them, because the situation made us lose our fear and we had to do it.

Horacio da Silva told the Commission that the air raids went on for two weeks without stopping. Attacks would normally start at seven in the morning and go on until about noon. There would be a short pause before they started again in the afternoon and went on until about 4.00pm. He said,

Civilians and Falintil forces were mixed together. Every day 20 to 30 people died from the bombing, stray bullets, starvation and illness. Those who could no longer walk were just left behind somewhere, under a tree. Most of the dead were children and the elderly.

While the bombings and shelling from the sea continued, the Indonesian army began to advance into the Fretilin/Falintil strongholds. ABRI forced people to surrender and come down from the mountain. They had to leave all their possessions, including their houses, personal effects, and tools to be burned by the Indonesian army. According to Horacio da Silva: "The situation at the time was like hell." [147]

Leonel Guterres, now a health worker from Quelicai (Baucau) who was a child at the time, ran to Matebian in early 1976, when he heard reports of the Indonesian troop landings in Laga (Baucau). He told the Commission:

Even before we arrived on Matebian, thousands of people were already there. People from Baucau, Laga, Laivai, Baguia, Venilale, Lospalos, Manatuto, Viqueque, Same and Dili. Many of them had been there for almost three years.

Leonel described how, in order to survive, people had to rely on the food they had brought themselves, supplemented by tubers growing around the mountain. Fretilin organised collective agricultural activities, planting maize, tuber roots and beans. After it was harvested, the food was stored in a special place to be distributed only when needed. Yet survival was difficult. He explained:

Every day more and more people became hungry. Death could no longer be avoided. Every day two or three people died from hunger and illness. Children and infants died. They could not stand the hunger, the cold and having to eat food that was difficult to digest. They were fading away from malnutrition. There was no extra food and mothers could not produce enough breast milk. Every day was full of death.

However, the worst came with the assault of Mount Matebian by the Indonesian forces in late 1978. Leonel Guterres continued:

We were attacked simultaneously from the air, land and sea. The worst attacks were from the air. In one day, ten planes would bomb Matebian. From 6.00am to 5.00pm the planes would drop their bombs, maybe between 5 and 20 times a day. I can't count how many hundreds of bombs were dropped on Matebian, killing civilians and destroying the Falintil base. Hundreds of people died from shrapnel. Many lost limbs and became disabled. Corpses were everywhere, being eaten by vultures. The smell of death was everywhere. The water was contaminated and could not be drunk. We could not cook, fearing that ABRI would discover our location from the smoke. In those days around 9 to 11 people died each day from hunger.[148]

Francisco Soares Pinto, deputy village head of Cainliu (Iliomar, Lautém), told the Commission:

By November 1978, ABRI had totally gained the upper hand, and we could not survive any longer. The planes bombed us from morning till afternoon. We lost so many people on Matebian. The people from the aldeia of Larimin [Cainliu, Iliomar, Lautém] were hit by four mortar shells fired from Indonesian [ships] off Laga. Dozens of people died. We were already weak from lack of food, medicine and clothing.[149]

Other survivors told the Commission:

We were bombarded from the air, from the ships in Laga, and by ground troops. Our situation was difficult, we ran frantically to the left, to the right. My family member, Isabel Morão, died after being hit by a mortar shell.[150]

Some people tried to run to the top of the mountain. By October–November the situation was really chaotic. Despite the deaths and continued attacks, we still tried to get to the top of the mountain, carrying what little food we had. When we reached Lavateri, between Baguia and Laga, they attacked us at night. Countless people died. That marked the beginning of the destruction of Matebian, on 24 November 1978.[151]

When Matebian was destroyed, the people ran in all directions. We were separated from each other, the Resistance going one way, and the people going the other way, each looking to save themselves. Some chose to surrender. Others continued to resist in the forest.[152]

Indonesian forces bombed Matebian from 7.00am to 10.00am, then from 2.00pm to 7.00pm. They targeted a watering hole. In one day ten to 20 people would die near that water source. Some died of thirst. We also ran out of food and medicine. We finally surrendered on 25 November 1978.[153]

After the destruction of our Resistance base in November 1978, Fretilin leaders held a meeting in Lavateri. They told us that those who want to continue to fight could stay but those who can no longer bear it could surrender in the town, particularly children and the elderly. In the middle of the meeting, ABRI began to attack again. In the end Fretilin could no longer protect us. They told us to surrender.[154]

Manatuto

149. In Laclo, (Manatuto), Manuel Carceres da Costa spoke of constant attacks from the Indonesian military on the base in Idada in the hills of Hatuconan (Laclo, Manatuto), including the use of the US-supplied slow-flying attack plane the OV-10 Bronco:

> In May 1978, the situation became even more difficult. The enemy started attacking from all sides. In July 1978, the military began to encircle and destroy us. Many died…because they were wounded in the leg and could not walk anymore. New-born babies died of starvation. When people died we could only wrap them in mats and leave them just like that. We did not have time to bury them because the enemy kept chasing us…We moved during the night, and during the day we had to hide because the OV-10 warplanes kept following us and shooting at us and dropping bombs on us, so that many friends, family members and others died…It continued on and on.[155]

Alas, Manufahi

150. Other witnesses from Manufahi testified about the use by ABRI of an accelerant to burn grass fields, forcing the population to flee and killing those who could not outrun the flames:

> In 1978, the enemy began to…surround Dolok [Alas]. Many died of starvation. All the food stocks were burned; some families just abandoned theirs. They surrounded us by using warships to bombard us from the sea, and warplanes to attack us from air and by burning the dry, tall grass. Then the troops attacked from land.
>
> It was the dry season at the time [in August]. The army burned the tall grass. The fire would spread quickly, and the whole area would be ablaze as if it had been doused in gasoline. Those of us who were surrounded didn't have time to escape because the flames were so big. Their strategy trapped many people.
>
> People managed to escape late at night when the Indonesian army withdrew to their camps. When we got out we would still be showered with shells from the warships at sea. I saw many people burn to death. My grandmother burned. At the time she screamed for water to drink because she was suffering from the heat, the fire had burned her up to her hair. I could only tie three jugs of water to her neck and then we continued walking out of the area. We couldn't help each other because of the situation.
>
> After we got out, I could still see the old people who had been left behind by their families. They were in a sitting position. The men put on new clothes, hung belak on their necks and wore caibauk*. The women had put on gold earrings and gold necklaces, prepared their* konde and wore black veils as if they were going to church for mass. We just looked at them but couldn't do anything. The enemy was still after us.*[156]

Other testimonies

151. Many who were not killed directly from the bombs and bullets died from lack of food and medicine. The Commission received many testimonies describing death by deprivation during this time:

- One deponent, from Cailaco (Bobonaro), fled to the forest when Indonesian soldiers first came to Maganutu, Ritabo, very close to her village, in 1975†. She fled with her father Lae Mau and they lived in a rocky cave in the forest for about a year. In 1977 they had to move again, so they fled to the sub-district of Maubara in Liquiçá to the north. But there was not enough food. For three months they were attacked continually, so they returned to their home area. Her father died. He was sick and starving, and there was no medicine to help him. A month later she and other survivors surrendered.[157]
- Duarte da Conceição lived in Ecinesi settlement, in Culuhun, Leotela (Liquiçá, Liquiçá). In 1978, he fled his home because the Indonesian military was increasing its attacks in the Liquiçá area. He took his two younger sisters with him, Martina aged 11 and Marta aged seven. The three of them first went to Tambor, then to Goumaoloa. But it was not safe there, so they carried on to Darubutlao in Maubara (Liquiçá) where they stayed two days. They kept moving and hid at Malae Bui for two days and two nights. They planned to go on to Cailaco (Bobonaro), but decided against it and went instead to Ulukole for two days. They returned to Darubutlao in Maubara for two weeks before moving to Saibaidere for a month and to Hatuhada Leten to stay with relatives. Finally they moved via Lukubui to Mate Hata, back in the sub-district of Liquiçá. When they arrived, the two little girls died of starvation and illness.[158]
- Most people witnessed the death of people close to them both before and after they surrendered. Alarico de Jesus, from Guda Tas, Guda (Lolotoe, Bobonaro), told the Commission that he fled with his community to Mount Sabi, just south of Guda Tas, when the Indonesian military attacked the neighbouring village of Deudet in 1978. On the mountain they were short of food and medicine, and six people in the group died. They were Martino de Jesus, Ilimau da Costa, Ilda da Costa, Agata da Costa, Aurelia da Costa, and João de Jesus. In 1979, their situation grew more difficult. Unable to plant gardens, the survivors surrendered in the aldeia of Raimea in Opa Village, near the town of Lolotoe. More people in the group died of hunger and disease including Francisco, Martina and Salvador Fraca.[159]

* Belak: crescent-shaped metal chest-ornament worn around the neck; caibauk: crescent-shape crown; konde: A traditional way of styling hair by East Timorese women.

† According to other information received by the Commission, the Indonesian military did not enter Cailaco until June 1976 [CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004].

152. Those who testified to the Commission of fleeing attacks by the Indonesian military described the attacks as if they were aimed at them, the civilian population, as well as Falintil troops. Witnesses described attacks that did not seem to distinguish between military and civilian targets.

153. At the same time, the Fretilin strategy of having civilians living with soldiers exposed those non-combatants to Indonesian attacks on Falintil. Fretilin eventually allowed civilians to surrender but only after Indonesia had unleashed the full weight of its military resources against them. Fretilin's earlier decision to prevent people wanting to surrender from doing so undoubtedly put them at greater risk of exposing them to attack by Indonesian forces.

154. However, while it is clear that some who wanted to surrender were prevented from doing so, it is less clear how many actually wanted to surrender.

155. According to Jacinto Alves, the thinking of the Central Committee on the issue of whether the population should surrender began to change once the "encirclement and annihilation" campaign began in late 1977. At that time it was announced to the people that women, men over 56 years old and children under 18 years old could surrender. Jacinto Alves told the Commission about the reaction to this announcement in his area of Manatuto, where a group of 40,000 were then coming under heavy bombardoment:

> We were being attacked from all sides by TNI Infantry, including bombing from planes and mortar every day... Apart from that we did not have food. We did not have anything, but the population did not want to give up. The discipline among the 40,000 people was very high. There was an order to cook only in the evening until 3.00 in the morning. After that nobody was allowed to light a fire as it could attract the attention of the planes. Everyone kept strictly to this for three months. For three months we kept moving along the 40,000 people. And later we saw people could not walk because of hunger or age and they would look for a sheltered area in the caves and sit there, until they died. You would come round a second time and see corpses and then come round a third time and see more corpses, but still they did not want to surrender.[160]

156. Moreover, when the order to surrender finally came, it was not always well received. Adriano João, a political assistant in the Sector Centro Norte in February 1979, described the reaction of the people to the order to surrender:

> On 16 February 1979, when we called the people together to tell them we were going to surrender, they were all angry. The people and Falintil felt disappointed and angry. They pointed their weapons at us. They rebuked us: "It was you who taught us to continue the struggle till death. Now all of a sudden you tell us you are going to surrender." We informed them a thousand and one times, patiently and courteously: "The leaders in Fatubessi have all surrendered. If we don't surrender, we'll all die in the forest from the enemy's attacks and hunger." Fortunately Rui Fernandes

[the former adjunto in the base de apoio*, who had already surrendered with most of the other leaders] had sent a letter which had been delivered to us by João Freitas Maria, a platoon commander who had already surrendered. I read out the letter. They saw his [Rui Fernandes's] signature, and they agreed [to surrender]. But they said to us: "all our suffering at the hands of the enemy will be on your shoulders".*[161]

On the run in Katrai Leten and Lesemau (Ermera)

Agustino Soares was a young man of 17 when Indonesian soldiers reached Letefoho (Ermera). He told the Commission how he and his family ran from Letefoho to Katrai Leten (Letefoho, Ermera) where they lived with thousands of other displaced people for two years. In 1978, this Resistance base was destroyed, forcing him to go on the run until he finally surrendered in Letefoho Town. He told the Commission:

Indonesian [forces] entered Letefoho on 3 May 1976. [ABRI] Battalion 512 came from the direction of Mount Baumalaria. After they entered Letefoho, the situation got worse. They attacked and killed, and also conducted operations in the villages to capture people. People became terrified and suffered trauma. Most people evacuated to the forest, including my family and me.

I was 17 years old at that time. We lived in Katrai Leten at the foot of Mount Ramelau. There were ten others in the family. Thousands of people were concentrated in Katrai Leten. They were from Letefoho, Ermera, Ainaro, Aileu and Cailaco (Ermera). Katrai Leten was a Fretilin stronghold, so we were quite secure. Fretilin troops guarded us from the front, while at the rear we grew crops. Initially we had enough food. No people died of starvation or illness.

About two years later Indonesian forces moved into the territory of Katrai Leten. Indonesian troops came from Atsabe, Ainaro, Same and Bobonaro. They encircled Katrai Leten. We were surrounded and they fired on us with mortars, bazookas and cannons. Their planes bombarded us from the air. The bombs didn't burn people, but the landmines killed many. The attack on 18 May 1978 destroyed the base at Katrai Leten where we were concentrated. My family and I managed to escape from the encirclement with some others, although ABRI blocked all the exit routes. Those who didn't manage to escape were captured by Indonesian forces and taken to Letefoho Town, while we fled to the area of Lesemau.

In Lesemau we couldn't plant crops because the enemy was always harrassing us. We found it very difficult to get food supplies and many people started dying of starvation. I estimate about ten to 11 people were dying of starvation every day. Their bodies were left on the ground. When we went out at night to search for food, we would accidentally step on dead bodies. Left and right, one or two bodies would be lying around. In this precarious situation, we survived by changing our eating pattern. We tried to eat only once a day and drank a lot of water, to keep our stomachs full. We cooked by mixing different kinds of food. We took just a few corn kernels and mixed them with herbs and vegetables from the forest like ortalan tahan [mint leaves] and angriao [water salad].This is what we ate to survive.

Lesemau was attacked by the Indonesians again. Smoke was visible to enemy planes from people's cooking fires and our defence base was bombarded. But this time it wasn't bombs they dropped but poison mixed with water, which they poured from the air. This toxic bombing contaminated all our food supplies. If people collected wild leaves to eat, when they cooked and ate them, they died. They also died from drinking the water. They even died when they ate cooked tubers, which had been dug from 15 centimetres under the ground. Around 400 people died as a result of the toxic bombing, mostly people from the aldeia of Katrai Kraik. The whole aldeia died. The only survivors were a woman and her granddaughter. They are still living in Katrai Kraik.

After the [toxic] bombing we moved again, from Lesemau to Hatulete [Katrai Kraik], once we were in Hatulete, we began to cook taro leaves, but before we had a chance to eat them we were captured by Battalion 512 and Hansip. We were beaten and taken to Letefoho Town and put in a concentration camp where we stayed for one month. We experienced much suffering from lack of food and medicine, torture and interrogations. I couldn't stand it so I fled to the forest and lived in Katrai Leten. But they captured me again in March 1978 and I was taken back to Letefoho Town.[162]

Surrender, camps and famine (1978–1981)

157. Testimony to the Commission shows that the Indonesian military operations between 1977 and 1978 to bring the areas not yet subjugated to Indonesian control made survival for the people living in those places impossible. Surrender or death in the mountains became the only options for most people. Whether in small groups moving from place to place trying to avoid the attacks, or in large concentrations surrounded and under heavy bombardment, most of those who survived ended up either surrendering or being captured.

158. The Fretilin policy of opposing surrender of civilians living in Resistance bases eventually became unviable. The civilians were in grave danger; they could no longer be protected or supported by the Resistance. Their presence put Falintil's dwindling force at risk of total annihilation. According to testimonies received by the Commission, at a meeting in Werou from 20 to 28 November, in a major shift of policy, the Fretilin Central Committee (CCF) decided that civilians should be encouraged to surrender. Fretilin/Falintil would continue to fight but would change its strategy from conventional war to guerrilla warfare.[163] The Fretilin leadership believed that people were more likely to survive if they surrendered and hoped that these people would become a source of support, food and information from inside Indonesian-controlled areas.

159. Taur Matan Ruak, then a company commander, described this policy change to the Commission:

> Many of the bases had already fallen, many of the population had surrendered and many of the leaders were dead. Our forces were dispersed and, many of them had also surrendered. Then the decision was taken to change the campaign. Although we were surrounded by the enemy, it was decided to give the order to continue the campaign and get away from the base area. First the population who wanted to surrender should surrender, but guided by the following idea: "Whether in the rice field, in the corn field, whether in the town or the countryside, everyone should continue the struggle for independence according to their capabilities."[164]

160. Marito Nicolau dos Reis, then a political assistant in the Uaimori base, described how he explained the policy change to civilians in the base:

> At the time many people came down and surrendered or were captured. It had become physically impossible to live in the forest. I told them: "Before I told you to leave the town, now I'm telling you to go back. If you still want to fight, you don't have to do it by staying here. You can do it from inside the town. You don't have to use weapons in the town. That is why you have to grow crops...and guard them well from the monkeys and the pigs, so you can give some of your crops to [Falintil]. If you want, you can give rice to Falintil. You will not be bothered by the army, so you can use the crops from the harvest...This is a useful way, you can go down…so we can prolong this war". After the meeting... many came down.[165]

The surrenders: distribution and numbers

161. It is difficult to calculate the number of people who moved into Indonesian-controlled camps after surrender or capture. A detailed study of this question not long after the events, drawing on reports and population counts from Indonesian Government and international aid agency sources as well as Indonesian and East Timorese Church sources, concluded that between 300,000 and 400,000 displaced people came under Indonesian control between early 1977 and early 1979.[166]

162. The evidence of witness statements to the Commission suggests that the surrender or capture of the population occurred at different times in different parts of Timor-Leste. Figures compiled by the Indonesian police in June 1978 showing the population under Indonesian control in each district between October 1977 and May 1978 provides some empirical confirmation of this testimony.

Table 5: Indonesian police data on population, October 1977 to May 1978

Districts	Population of Timor-Leste									Infor-mation
	Pre-invasion	Oct 77	Nov 77	Dec 77	Jan 78	Feb 78	Mar 78	April 78	May 78
[1]	[2]	[3]	[4]	[5]	[6]	[7]	[8]	[9]	[10]	[11]
Dili	28,149	35,541	35,233	35,233	35,209	33,733	33,834	33,618	37,818
Baucau	84,626	31,891	33,727	33,751	35,189	35,194	35,200	35,513	36,000
Lospalos (ie Lautém)	38,797	11,575	11,881	13,064	13,064	13,064	13,101	13,738	13,844
Viqueque	62,685	12,269	12,736	12,736	12,751	12,751	12,951	12,994	12,994
Manatuto	35,885	12,755	12,826	12,829	12,829	12,829	12,829	13,175	13,250
Aileu	33,033	1,310	1,310	1,310	1,550	1,550	1,550	1,762	1,772
Ainaro	49,644	22,209	41,296	41,296	41,297	41,729	41,794	41,794	41,794
Same (ie Manufahi)	35,327	6,369	12,551	19,346	14,114	14,114	14,115	17,283	17,023
Suai	40,655	19,392	23,202	23,202	27,730	27,730	27,730	27,714	27,741
Maliana (ie Bobonaro)	75,159	59,392	59,957	59,957	20,709	61,316	61,316	61,316	67,946
Ermera	70,294	47,661	47,670	47,670	49,021	49,281	49,281	50,507	51,078
Liquiçá	49,798	6,105	6,106	6,126	5,127	5,127	5,128	5,234	5,234
Oecussi	22,673	35,399	35,399	35,399	35,979	35,979	35,979	36,392	36,392
Total	626,725	301,868	333,894	341,919	304,569	344,397	344,808	351,040	362,886	0

163. While these figures must be treated with caution,* they give some indication of the increase in the number of people under direct Indonesian control during this period – about 60,000. It seems reasonable to attribute these increases to surrenders because most of them occured in short periods of time in particular districts: Ainaro (November 1977), Manufahi (October–December 1977), Covalima (October 1977-January 1978), Bobonaro (May 1978) and Dili (October 1977 and May 1978). Moreover, the timing of the increases in population in particular districts shown in the table is more or less consistent with what is known about surrenders during this period.

* The Commission does not know how these figures were arrived at; identical numbers across several months in some districts render their month-to-month accuracy suspect; the very low numbers for the districts of Aileu and Liquiçá beg an explanation.

164. When compared with pre-invasion figures, the relatively small number of people under Indonesian control in the eastern districts of Viqueque, Lautém and, to a lesser extent, Baucau is notable. This is consistent with the fact that large numbers of surrenders in these districts did not occur until the second half of 1978 (that is, after the period covered by the table).

165. The May 1978 figures for the western districts of Bobonaro and Covalima, and the central district of Ainaro, are similar to numbers recorded in the 1980 Indonesian official census.[167] This suggests a relatively stable population in these districts from mid-1978, with few surrenders after that time. Conversely, a comparison of the figures for many of the central and all of the eastern districts from Table 5 and the 1980 census suggests that large numbers of people were still outside Indonesian control in these areas in mid-1978. A simple comparison of the total population counts in the 1978 police figures and the 1980 census suggests that the number of people outside Indonesian control in mid-1978, across all districts, was in the order of 200,000 people (May 1978: 362,886; 1980: 555,350), but is likely to have been higher.*

166. In summary the Indonesian military campaigns in 1977 and 1978 resulted in ever-increasing Indonesian control of the population. Surrenders happened in waves over many months in different areas. Each new military operation caused people to surrender while others moved away to avoid surrender. Sometimes people who had already surrendered returned to the mountains.

167. Large-scale influxes of people into Indonesian-controlled centres continued until the end of 1978. Indonesian army figures, cited by an Indonesian priest who visited Timor-Leste in early 1979, indicated some 320,000 "refugees" had moved from the interior by early December 1978.[168] Reports from church and diplomatic sources at the time indicate that this flow slowed to a trickle during the first half of 1979.[169]

Life and death in Indonesian-controlled camps

168. East Timorese people who surrendered or were captured were typically held for extended periods in a succession of population-control centres often called "concentration camps" by local people.† On surrender people were often held for

* The simple comparison between the 1978 and 1980 population counts probably underestimates the number of people outside Indonesian control for two reasons. First the evidence before the Commission shows that the death rate in Timor-Leste due to killings, sickness and starvation was very high from mid-1978 to late 1979. This high death rate means that the number of people still outside Indonesian control in mid-1978 was considerably, but incalculably, greater than 200,000. Second there are strong grounds for thinking that the 1980 census underestimated the actual population in that year [see Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations].

† The term was often used in witness testimonies to the Commission. Fretilin radio broadcasts from Timor-Leste in 1977 and 1978 also used this phrase to describe places where the captured population was held [see for example summary of Radio Maubere message 10 July 1977, in Timor Information Service, No. 22, December 1977, p.4; Radio Maubere broadcast, 14 May 1978, in Timor Information Service, No. 26, August 1978, p.18].

relatively short periods in transit camps, which commonly doubled as military bases, specifically for the purpose of separating those with leadership positions in Fretilin or Falintil and Falintil soldiers from the mass of the civilian population. This process also took place in the so-called resettlement camps and relocation villages where the surrendering population could be kept under various forms of restriction for several years.

169. Security considerations and the achievement of military objectives, not the welfare of the people held in them, were the priorities of the Indonesian military in these camps. Any hope or expectation that the civilian population could be saved from death by surrendering proved false. Evidence gathered by the Commission shows that the Indonesian military failed to guarantee the basic needs of those who did surrender, many of whom were seriously hungry and weak when they surrendered, and that without access to adequate shelter, food, clean water and medical care in the army-controlled camps, thousands died.

Transit camps

170. After surrender or capture, people were first placed in transit camps. Usually established at or near an Indonesian army encampment, transit camps were located in the countryside and in sub-district capitals. While the Commission was not able to compile a complete list, there were dozens of these transit camps in Timor-Leste in the period 1977–1979. Each new major Indonesian military operation would be marked by the creation of new transit camps. Once established, they were maintained for as long as a year and people continued to brought into them, replacing others who had been moved elsewhere.

Famine and death

171. There was little preparation by the Indonesian authorities to house and care for the vast influx of displaced people, most of whom were weak and severely malnourished. Some could barely walk and were described by observers as "walking skeletons".[170] Gilman dos Santos, then working for US Catholic Relief Services (CRS), told the Commission of the terrible condition of those who came down from the mountains to surrender:

> In 1978 the food situation in the forest got more difficult because the Indonesian military controlled more of the territory, right down to the remote villages. This food problem was confirmed by the state of those who came down from the mountains. They were very thin and sick…The Indonesians made minimal effort to help relieve this situation …What I am trying to say is that most people in the camps who were sick, died.[171]

172. Emergency barracks were hastily constructed from palm thatch, but sanitary facilities were non-existent. On arrival in the camps people were usually given a small amount of food. In many cases this food was inappropriate for the severely malnourished with the result that many of those who ate it died. Such deaths led to the widespread belief that people were being poisoned by the military. Witness testimonies suggest that the amount of food available was generally vastly insufficient. The ration for a whole family for a week was often one or two rantang (meal tins), only enough to provide one person with one or two meals. Growing or searching for additional food was not possible because of restrictions on movement away from the camps and the extreme physical weakness of the inhabitants. As a result many died of hunger while under Indonesian control in these camps.

173. Father Eligio Locatelli has been living at the Salesian technical college at Fatumaca, Gariuai (Baucau, Baucau) since Portuguese colonial times. He told the Commission:

> People came down from the mountains to surrender between 1978 and 1982. In the beginning they had to stay for three months at ABRI surrender posts in Baucau and Uailili. After three months, they were allowed to return to their homes, but not too far from the roadside. These surrender posts were in use for one year. They [the people] were kept under close watch and were confined to a specified area. They weren't allowed to look for food and clean water.
>
> They were given assistance by the soldiers. But they received food only once a day, usually salted dried fish and mouldy corn. If they wanted to go out to look for food, [they] have to get permission…[from]…the Village Chief, Sub-district Administrator, the Koramil and the Kodim. Even with this letter people were still afraid. Going out meant risking death, but if they accepted their confinement, [they] would also die. Many people died.[172]

Capture: the people of Vemasse under Indonesian Army control[173]

When Uaimori's defences collapsed in 1978, people moved in stages to the Natarbora Plain on the south coast of Manatuto. Many people died during the journey from Uaimori to Natarbora, and many more died under the Indonesian bombardment of the Resistance base in Natarbora. A group of those who escaped the Indonesian encirclement in Natarbora managed to get as far as Osso-Ala (Vemasse, Baucau) where they were captured by Indonesian troops. Cosme Freitas gave an account of their treatment after capture to the Commission:

In 1978, ABRI and Hansip captured around 120 of us in Osso-Ala. They took us to Venilale [Baucau] and then ordered us to walk from there to the village of Bucoli [Baucau]. It took us more than two days. During our three months at the Bucoli concentration camp, we faced many difficulties. We weren't allowed outside the camp to look for food and clean water, or to bathe. We were forced to just sit there [in the camp].

*Because of ABRI's restrictions, we were badly undernourished, as we weren't given the chance to go outside to look for food. We were given only mouldy corn by ABRI, three meal tins (rantang) per family per week. But we finished all three sets of rotten corn in just one day. When the rotten corn was finished, we didn't have any more food. So we had to wait another week for more rations. That caused many deaths due to starvation in the concentration camp. Between 1 to 3 people died every day. The dead were buried by their families not far from where they were staying. Those who ate the corn were struck down with beri-beri and cholera. I estimate that around 2 to 4 people died every day from those diseases, sometimes even more. Most of them were children and the elderly.*

After three months the Indonesian army began to move us from Bucoli to Vemasse. When we arrived in Vemasse the army dropped us off in front of the Vemasse Church. They told us to stay in the church. We stayed in there for about two weeks before we were allowed to move back to our homes.

Back in our homes, we didn't receive any help whatsoever from the local government of Baucau, ABRI, the Church or the international agencies. We suffered severe hunger. Since we had just moved back to Vemasse, we hadn't had time to plant crops. Many people starved, some even died as a result. To survive, when there was no food, the people of Vemasse went to pick young vine leaves, which were then cooked for the whole family. This went on for around two weeks, causing many to suffer from beri-beri, cholera and vomiting. It was not just that people got sick, many of them died. I estimate that around 10 to 11 people were dying of disease daily, mostly the elderly and children. So the number of people who died during the period of those two weeks was estimated at around 150 people.

Only in 1981 did we receive assistance from CRS. They handed out rice, corn, mung beans, corn starch, medicine, clothes, and soap, so our lives became a bit better. The [Indonesian] army was just beginning to give us freedom to go outside to plant crops or work the rice fields, so the number of people dying from lack of food decreased.

Registration, interrogation, execution and control

174. Civilians who surrendered were usually held in transit camps for several weeks where, on arrival, they were registered and interrogated. Interrogations were designed to identify any Resistance members and to gain information about the Resistance still in the mountains. Those believed to be Fretilin or Falintil were sometimes immediately executed. Others were interrogated and tortured for an extended time before being executed. The screening process appears to have been formally the responsibility of a branch of the military command called the Komando Taktis (Kotis), but testimony given to the Commission indicates that troops belonging to almost any military unit – a district or sub-district command (Kodim or Koramil), a combat battalion or Special Forces (Kopassandha) – might in fact carry out the screening process assisted by East Timorese. Some people were taken to detention centres elsewhere for interrogation by other intelligence agencies. Many were executed. Some people were allowed to move to resettlement camps with the other civilians (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; and Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment).

175. Some civilians or Resistance members who surrendered were forced to return to the mountains to persuade relatives or comrades to give themselves up. They faced the danger of being killed by Falintil as possible spies, or by ABRI if they failed in their mission. Moises da Costa related to the Commission how his family had fled in 1978 to We Alas [Alas, Manufahi] and then to Kokolau (also in Alas), before his father was captured and taken to the Uma Metan surrender camp. His father was forced to return to Kokolau to persuade his family to surrender, but was killed by Falintil as a suspected spy.[174] The wife of Francisco Ximenes (Amelia do Rego) told the Commission how soon after she and her husband had come down from the mountains, the commander of Airborne Infantry Battalion 100, F55, came to their house in Caicasa, (Fatuberliu) and ordered Francisco to go to the forest to look for his former comrades. On his return, he said that he had not been able to find any of them. Members of Airborne Infantry Battalion 100 tied him up and beat him until he lost consciousness, and then shot him dead.[175]

Obligations under human rights law and the laws of war

Human rights law, which is applicable both in times of peace and in situations of armed conflict, also provides important protection to internally displaced persons (IDPs). It aims both to prevent displacement and to ensure basic rights should it occur. The right to personal safety and to a home, as well as the rights to food, shelter, education and access to work, offer vital protection to persons who have been displaced.

"If the civilian population lacks supplies essential to its survival, parties to conflict have the duty to accept exclusively humanitarian, impartial and non-discriminatory relief operations on its behalf." (Geneva Convention IV, Articles 38 and 59; Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions, Article 70; Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions, Article 18).

Transit camps: detailed data received by the Commission

176. Tome da Costa Magalhães vividly described his experiences in a notorious transit and resettlement camp called Uma Metan (Black House) in Alas, Manufahi:

> We lived in Uma Metan for three months. I saw a large concentration of civilians there, around 8,000 of them. They came from Aileu, Maubisse, Same, Ainaro, Manatuto, Dili, Liquiçá and Viqueque. They suffered greatly due to starvation, illness and lack of clothing. For the three months I was there, we weren't allowed to go further than one to two kilometres [from the camp]. If we did, they would suspect us of making contact with Fretilin. In Uma Metan there was no drinking water. The water source was far, about 500 metres from the camp. If we wanted to get water we had to be escorted by Hansip or soldiers, and only the strong could do the round trip. The weak ones would die along the way and were just left there on the slopes. We were given food, but only one small can of corn per person per week. We could cook only a handful every two days. Because of that, many couldn't endure the hunger and eventually between five and six people died each day due to hunger. Those who did eat the stale corn got sick with various illnesses such as swollen feet and hands, stomach pain and tuberculosis. Once they fell ill, they would soon die. The soldiers did not give medication to those who were sick and dying. Only the really lucky survived. The soldiers intentionally punished people day and night, and didn't allow them to go out to look for food, get water or collect firewood. Because the soldiers also did not give food to people or treat the sick, up to 40 people a week died of hunger, thirst and disease.[176]

177. Some reports to the Commission of life in the camps immediately after surrender follow.*

Baguia (Baucau)

178. After the assault on Mount Matebian on 24 November 1978 thousands of people began to come down into the town of Baguia (Baguia, Baucau). Those who surrendered in Baguia included people from Iliomar, Lospalos, Luro, Tutuala, (all in Lautém), from Laga and Baucau (in Baucau) and from Viqueque District, as well as people from Baguia Sub-district. When they arrived in Baguia Town, the only shelter they could find was under trees and bushes. They were not allowed to go beyond a fixed distance from the town and were tightly guarded. These conditions and the sheer number of people concentrated in the town made the already debilitated inhabitants prey to infectious diseases, such as cholera, diarrhoea and tuberculosis. The result, according to one community that surrendered in Baguia, was that around 500 people from their village alone died there.[177] Other communities reported similar experiences. The community of Ossouna reported that around 280 people from their village died in Baguia.[178]

* Other transit camps known to the Commission include camps in Com (Lautém), Laga (Baucau), Beaço (Viqueque), Zumalai (Ainaro), Laclubar (Manatuto).

179. People who had held any leadership position in the forest were targeted for punishment, including execution. Around 475 people from the sub-district of Baguia were detained and tortured during interrogation. Those who were released had to report to the authorities as often as twice a day, and perform night watch and forced labour, including as TBOs. All the executions recalled by communities in discussions with the Commission were committed by members of Kopassandha (Special Forces) and Battalion 745.[179]

180. People who originally came from the sub-district of Iliomar (Lautém) told the Commission they went down the south-east side of the mountain and on 28 November they met Indonesian troops. These troops took them to their military base in Baguia, where they interrogated everyone. After a week those among the group from Iliomar who had not been identified as Fretilin leaders were told to go back to Iliomar. Fretilin leaders were kept in Baguia where they were tortured and some were executed.[180]

Oso-leru (Quelicai, Baucau)

181. Until ABRI captured it in November 1978, the temporary transit camp at Oso-leru had been a Resistance base on Mount Matebian. The Indonesian military separated Falintil fighters from the general population and many of them later disappeared (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). They gave some food to the people in the transit camp but it was insufficient. The Indonesian authorities had not made preparations for such a large number of people and people continued to die of starvation. Their stay in this place was short as the military soon took them to larger centres such as the one in the town of Quelicai (Quelicai, Baucau).[181]

Uatolari Town (Uatolari, Viqueque)

182. Uatolari (Viqueque) was used as a transit camp for some time. People who surrendered in Uatolari also experienced famine. Every day people died there. Two weeks after most people came into Uatolari from Mount Matebian in November 1978, the Indonesian military and members of Hansip moved them by foot or truck to a resettlement camp in Viqueque.[182]

Lacluta (Viqueque)

183. People from Barique (Manatuto), Fatuberliu (Manufahi), Laleia (Manatuto), Ossu (Viqueque), Venilale (Baucau), Vemasse (Baucau), Manatuto, Dili, Maubisse (Ainaro), Viqueque and Natarbora (Manatuto) surrendered in Lacluta, where they suffered from lack of food, clean water and medical care. In his testimony, Antonio Vicente Marques Soares stated that more than ten people died there each day, mainly children and older people. Restrictions on civilians in the camps made it difficult to plant crops, fetch clean water or conduct other activities on which their survival depended.[183]

Parlamento (Moro, Lautém)

184. The people of Com and Asailano surrendered to Battalion 512 in 1977. Immediately after surrender they were concentrated on the beach at Com for one week. They were then moved to Parlamento to join other civilians who had surrendered from the all over the district of Lautém. Life was very difficult in the transit camp, with restrictions preventing movement further than 100 metres from the camp. This meant that the 2,000 people living in the Parlamento camp were extremely hungry, as no food was provided by their Indonesian military captors. A survivor told the Commission that between two and five people died each day at the camp. When an Indonesian naval ship landed at the Lautém port, some men were able to work as labourers, receiving two tins of rice for each day of work.[184]

Railaco Town (Railaco, Ermera)

185. The transit camp at the town of Railaco (Railaco, Ermera) in late 1979 was one of the worst camps. It contained people who had held out with the Resistance in the mountains longer than most. Eufrazia de Jesus told the Commission she was captured on 13 October 1979 and held in the Railaco transit camp by Battalion 721 for several months. No foreign aid agency ever visited Railaco, and the internees who survived did so by gathering roots and leaves from around the camp. Only once, more than two weeks after their capture, did the military give people a small amount of corn and salted fish. For those already badly malnourished, the fish caused diarrhoea which often proved fatal. Every day up to ten children and old people died.[185]

Fatubessi (Hatolia, Ermera)

186. Fatubessi was a Resistance base from 1976 until Indonesian forces captured it in 1978. Gabriel Ximenes told the Commission he surrendered to Battalion 611. They placed him in the transit camp at Fatubessi. The people were very hungry. The military gave them some food, but it was insufficient and was not distributed to everyone. Gabriel Ximenes said that conditions were worse in the Fatubessi transit camp than they had been just before surrender. After a month the military moved him and his group to a resettlement camp in the town of Ermera. There they were kept under tight restrictions which prevented them from planting food. Death due to starvation continued.[186]

Uma Metan and Lebos (Alas, Manufahi)

187. Uma Metan and Lebos were two important transit camps near the town of Alas in Manufahi. They were established as a base for operations against the Resistance in the mountains around Manufahi. Many ABRI units were based there, including troops from Airborne Infantry Battalion 700, Battalions 745 and 310, and Kopassandha (Special Forces), It was also the headquarters of a Sub-district territorial command (Koramil) and local Hansip. In August 1978, Uma Metan started to receive people who had surrendered or been captured. People who had surrendered in Alas, Same, Fatuberliu, Turiscai (all in Manufahi), Maubisse (Ainaro), Aileu, Soibada (Manatuto) and Natarbora (Manatuto) were brought there, and at its peak more than 8,000 people were living there. Many of the people held in Uma Metan continued to be held there rather than resettled elsewhere. Soldiers ordered the inmates to build a village hall and a school. The school was ostensibly built so that the soldiers could teach the Indonesian language to the camp's inhabitants. In fact only young women could attend the "school", which became notorious as an ABRI rape centre.[187] The military did not permit the detainees to go outside the camp to make gardens or look for food, and although the Church organised some food assistance for the detainees it was not sufficient. Many people died of starvation and illnesses like diarrhoea and beri-beri. Others were executed for their involvement in the Resistance (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). According to local leaders, some 2,000 people are buried in mass graves at the Uma Metan camp site.[188]

Fahinehan (Fatuberliu, Manufahi)

188. In 1978 the people of Fahinehan, Bubususu and Caicasa (all in the sub-district of Manufahi, Manufahi) surrendered to Indonesian soldiers after the destruction of the base de apoio of the South Central Sector. They were taken first to the coastal areas of Kolokau, Besusu and Dolok in Manufahi. They were then concentrated in the village of Fahinehan, under the control of Indonesian soldiers from Airborne Infantry Battalion 100. According to Eleajáro Teófilo, larger numbers of people died after the surrender from lack of food and medicine than had been dying in the forest:

> There were days when up to ten people died. There was no humanitarian aid. ABRI allowed us to look for food only if we were accompanied by soldiers or Hansip. We were not allowed to move further than 1 kilometre [from Fahinehan], or go anywhere where they could not see us. Two men were killed for going further.[189]

189. Between 1981 and 1983 the people of these three villages were moved twice. Each move created problems in food and security (see paragraphs 288-289 below).

Turiscai (Turiscai, Manufahi)

190. The town of Turiscai was also used as a transit camp for people who had been living in the base de apoio of the South Central Sector. Those confined included both people from the 11 villages nearby such as Foholau, Caicasa and Bubususu (in Fatuberliu) and from more distant places such as Maubisse (Ainaro) and Dili. According to witness testimony, the Indonesian military distributed food only once - each family received three tins of rice when they arrived at the camp. Tomás Barbosa told the Commission:

> The soldiers told us to look for arms in the forest. They said those who came back with weapons would get one more extra tin of corn, and those who failed to bring back any weapons would not get any more food.[190]

191. Witnesses told the Commission that many people died during this time. The people were made to build their own make-shift houses and, eventually, were able to cultivate their own food. The situation improved when the ICRC began to provide humanitarian aid. Four or five years after they surrendered, the people were allowed to return to their own villages.[191]

Metinaro Town (Metinaro, Dili)

192. A large combined Indonesian military operation was conducted in the Metinaro area (Hatu Konan, Laclo) in the middle of 1978. The military brought people whom they captured into the Metinaro transit camp. For example, Battalion 315 captured Manuel Carceres da Costa in the sub-district of Laclo (Manatuto) in July 1978. They held him and other prisoners at the battalion command post in Ilimano (Umakaduak, Laclo, Manatuto) for one day of interrogation. After that, the military sent them to Metinaro (Dili). The camp was surrounded by military posts. No one could move out; everyone was registered and they had to stay there. Death from famine ravaged the population held there. Metinaro then became a resettlement camp and people lived there for a year.[192]

193. The investigation process for leaders or people thought to have information that could be useful to the Indonesian military was different. Jacinto Alves, who had been concurrently an assistant to the Falintil General Chief-of-Staff and was private secretary to Nicolau Lobato in the latter's capacity as political commissar to the General Staff, was captured with Manuel Carceres da Costa. He was interrogated immediately after capture. They asked him what position he had held in the forest, what was Falintil's strength and where the leaders were. He said that he had worked in the logistics section of Falintil, but then they told him that they had found his bag with a diary, a pistol and a book called Contemporary Capitalism in it. On the basis of the book they called him a communist and on the basis of the pistol they said he must be a leader. In Metinaro he was brought to the commander of Battalion 144, a red beret (Kopassus) who was also the Kotis commander, and other officers. He was handed over to the chief of military intelligence, Major Ganap, for further interrogation. After three months in Metinaro he was allowed to go home to Dili, but there he was required to report daily at the Sang Tai Hoo centre for further interrogation.[193]

How some people survived in the camps

In a discussion with the Commission, members of the community of Ahic (Viqueque) recalled their experience of surrender and their struggle for survival:

In 1979 we surrendered in the Lacluta Old Town. About 500 people died from hunger and lack of medicine to treat tuberculosis, marasmus and diarrhoea. Many who died had no more family members to bury them. Some died in the camp and some died while they were out in the forest looking for food. We survived on foods such as:

- Sago made from Bebak palm
- Fruits from the rubber tree
- Guavas

- Leaves from the end of a coconut
- Maek (a tuber)
- Kuan (a small fibrous yam)
- Aidak (kind of lychee)
- Kangkung (green vegetable)
- Banana shoots
- Laho (mice)
- Samea (snakes)
- Manduku (frogs)

*Horses were sold for only Rp1,000 plus two meal-sized tins (rantang) of rice from the Hansip. Gold chains could be traded for 1 tin of rice.*

In exchange for food, such as buffalo or deer meat, daughters could be forcibly married to Hansip and ABRI even though they were already legally married.

ABRI and the Sub-district administrator (camat) decided to move everyone from Lacluta Old Town to the village of Dilor. In Dilor political leaders and Falintil members were tortured and killed. All men above 15 years old were required to report to the military post in the morning and evening, and do guard duty at night. If they did not comply, all their belongings were stolen and they could be tortured. This could involve being submerged in filthy water for three hours, made to walk on thorn bushes, standing on coals or be hung upside down. Women were frequently raped and forced to "marry" Hansip and soldiers without agreement from them or their families. Many children resulting from these forced marriages were left abandoned.

In 1979–1980, we received aid from the Indonesian Red Cross such as dried fish, chickens, milk, flour, salt, blankets and medicines and were treated by medical staff – one doctor and two nurses. However the food we received had too much protein for malnourished people to digest, and many died. We began to be allowed to garden, but only less than 1 kilometre from Dilor, and only with a travel permit from the Chief-of-Security. There was frequent forced labour without pay. There was no education because there were no facilities or teachers. Schoolchildren were forcibly recruited as TBOs (tenaga bantuan operasi, operations assistants).[194]

Resettlement camps

194. With the completion of registration and screening by the Indonesian military civilian detainees were settled in controlled population centres referred to as "places of settlement" (tempat pemukiman). In some cases these were located in the same place as the site where transit procedures had been carried out. They could also be in the detainees' home village, in another existing village that was not the detainees' own or in a newly-created village. Security rather than welfare considerations determined which of these options applied in any particular instance. The resettlement camps became the homes for hundreds of thousands of East Timorese. Many of these camps also became the sites of catastrophic famine in 1978 and 1979.

195. The key characteristics of the resettlement camps have been well known internationally since the early 1980s.[195] The camps were the central element of the strategy of the Indonesian military to control the population and isolate it from the East Timorese Resistance. Internees were tightly controlled and limited in the extent to which they could travel beyond the camps. The resulting lack of access to adequate agricultural land for food production resulted in widespread hunger and starvation. The camps were places of suspicion, fear and insecurity designed to control and crush nationalist sentiment among the East Timorese population. Despite official Indonesian claims to the contrary, they were never designed to assist the material development of the population.

Location of resettlement camps

196. The Commission has sought to identify all resettlement camps established in the late 1970s. Table 6: Resettlement camps in late 1979, shows a list of 139 known resettlement camps. The list was mostly derived from a crude map showing the locations where US CRS and the ICRC were distributing aid at the time.[196] The Commission believes the actual number was greater than the 139 points shown on the map because it received evidence from other sources that some places identified on the map by a single dot had several camps: Ainaro, for example, had three camps.

197. All districts except Oecussi had resettlement camps. In each of the 12 districts where camps were located, almost every sub-district had at least one camp, some had as many as five and most had three or four. Many camps were temporary. Some such as Dataran Faebere (Iliomar, Lautém) were later closed down and the area left uninhabited. Quite a few were located in new settlements that had not existed in Portuguese colonial times.

Table 6: Resettlement camps in late 1979

District	Sub-district	Place
Aileu	Aileu	Aileu Town
		Bandeira Hun (Liurai) and Fatubosa
	Laulara	Tohumeta
	Lequidoe	Lequidoe Town
	Remexio	Remexio
Ainaro	Ainaro	Ainaro Town, Soro and Builico
		Manutassi and Fatuk Maria
		Mau-Nuno

District	Sub-district	Place
		Mau-Ulo
		Suro-Kraik
	Hato Builico	Hato Builico
		Nunumogue and Dare
	Hato Udo	Hato Udo Town
		Raimea
	Maubisse	Aituto
		Lientuto (Aituto)
		Maubisse Town
Baucau	Baguia	Baguia Town
		Ledena (Lavateri)
	Baucau	Baucau Old Town
		Caicido (Caibada Uaimua)
		Ceisal
		Fatumaca technical school (Gariuai)
		Uailili and Buibau
	Laga	Atelari
		Laga
		Saelari
	Quelicai	Guruça
		Quelicai Town
	Vemasse	Ostico and Loilubo
		Vemasse
	Venilale	Bercoli (Uma Ana Ulo)
		West Venilale
Bobonaro	Atabae	Aidabaleten
		Atabae
		Biacou (Aidabaleten)
	Balibó	Balibó Town
	Bobonaro	Bobonaro Town
		Leber
		Tasgolo (Lour)
	Cailaco	Cailaco
		Marco

District	Sub-district	Place
	Lolotoe	Lebos
		Lolotoe
	Maliana	Tapo/ Memo
Covalima	Fatumean	Fatumean
	Fohorem	Fohorem Town
	Mape/ Zumalai	Beco
		Kamenaca
		Mape
	Suai	Meop (Labarai)
		Orun (Debos)
		Suai Town
	Tilomar	Casabauk (Maudemu)
		Kui Tao (Maudemo) & Kawa Uman (Casabauc)
		Tilomar Town
Dili	Dili	Dare & others
		Dili Town
		Dili Town
	Hera	Hera
	Metinaro	Manleu
		Metinaro (Sabuli)
Ermera	Ermera Town	Ermera Town
		Borhei (Humboe)
		Hotkolat?
		Falimanu?
		Mangero (Riheu)
	Hatolia	Betu Bu (Ailelo)
		Hatolia Town
		Fatu Bessi
		Poelete
		Urahu
	Letefoho	Goulolo
		Letefoho Town
	Railaco	Railaco & others

District	Sub-district	Place
Lautém	Iliomar	Dataran Faebere
		Iliomar Town
	Lautém Moro	Buihomau (Serelau)
		Com
		Daudere
		Laivai (Ililai)
		Laleno (Maina 2)
		Lautém and Moro
	Lospalos	Lore
		Lospalos
		Rasa/ Bauro and Fuiluro
	Luro	Luro
	Tutuala	Mehara
		Poros (Mehara)
		Tutuala
Liquiçá	Bazartete	Bazartete Town
		Leorema
		Raukasa (Lauhata)
		Tibar
	Liquiçá	Caikasiko (Asumano)
		Dato (Liquiçá)
		Hatarlema (Hatuquisi)
	Maubara	Irlelo (Cuico)
		Lebumeta (Vaviquenia)
		Maubara Town
	Barique/ Natarbora	Barique Town
		South of Barique (not on regular maps)
		Further south of Barique (not on regular maps)
		Tuqueti (Cribas)
		Umaboku
	Laclo	Behau (Umakaduak)
		Laclo
	Laclubar	Laclubar Town
		Lafulau (Manelima)
		Le'i (Orlalan)

District	Sub-district	Place
	Laleia	Laleia New Town (Lifau)
	Manatuto	Carlilo (Aiteas)
		Manatuto Town
	Soibada	Maun Fahe/ (Teras)
		Soibada Town
Manufahi	Alas	Alas Town, Uma Metan and Lebos
		Besusu (Uma Berloik)
	Fatuberliu	Fatuberliu/ Fahinehan
		Welaluhu (Klakuk)
	Same	Betano
		Daisua
		Holarua
		Letefoho
		Same Town
		Babulu
	Turiscai	Turiscai
Viqueque	Lacluta	Aimeta Hun (Dilor)
		Dilor
		Lacluta Old Town
		Uma Tolu
	Ossu	Buanurak (Loi Huno)
		Builale and Kaiwatu
		Loi Huno
		Ossu
	Viqueque	Buicarin (Lacluta Lama)
		Viqueque (Beloi & others)
	Uato Carbau	Irabin Leterae (Irabin de Cima)
		Uato Carbau Town
	Uatolari	Afaloicai (Babulo)
		Vessoro
		Uatolari Town

Source: interpreted from a map presented by US Ambassador Edward Masters at Hearing before the Sub-committee on Asian and Pacific Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, 96th Congress, 1st session, 4 December 1979, p. 28.

Conditions in the resettlement camps

198. Testimonies received by the Commission supports the following conclusions about conditions in the resettlement camps:

- In many cases resettlement camps in an existing town or village were in a distinct area within or apart from the town. In Hatolia (Ermera), for example, the people who had recently surrendered from places outside the area were kept in a separate area called Modolaran.
- In other cases no distinction was made between people who had lived in the village before it became the site of a resettlement camp and people resettled from outside the locality. In Iliomar (Lautém), for example, residents and internees alike were confined to a small area inside a ring of military posts.
- Normal residents and internees alike were subject to a travel permit system (surat jalan) if they wanted to work in gardens outside the area of the resettlement camp. In this sense all East Timorese people held in camps were subject to the security function of resettlement.
- There was no barbed wire. The real enclosure was the ring of military posts and a permit system that limited access to wild food and gardens and kept people hungry.
- There were some differences in conditions for internees and those who surrendered early or never evacuated to the mountains. The latter had more access to land and better connections to authorities, making life somewhat easier.
- The towns of Dili and Baucau were the only places where life approached normality for most people. Even here there were exceptions, for example the tightly controlled camps at Dili's Municipal Market, Manlewana (near today's airport) and West Beto in Comoro.
- Most resettlement camps were maintained until about 1980 or 1981. However, many continued to exist until well into the 1980s. Moreover, after the dismantlement of a camp its inhabitants were often not allowed to return to their home villages. Instead many were forced to settle in newly created villages located in areas that were considered safe or had strategic value to the Indonesian military. If they did return to their villages they continued to live under various kinds of restrictions that affected their mobility and where they were allowed to build their houses.

Life in Iliomar resettlement camp

Fernando Amaral is a former head of the village of Fatt Iliomar (Iliomar, Lautém). He gave a detailed interview to the Commission describing the conditions of living under Indonesian military control in a camp in the town of lliomar after the population surrended from Mount Matebian in November 1978. The following is a summary and excerpts from this interview.

The people from Iliomar came down from Mount Matebian in November 1978. After the military interrogated them in the transit camp in Baguia, they told the people to walk back to the sub-district of Iliomar, where the military established a resettlement camp. As they walked, no one was escorting them and some escaped back into the mountains at this time. When the remainder arrived in the sub-district of Iliomar, the place was completely empty. The people decided they should stay near the sub-district office built by the Portuguese (the Posto). About 4,000 to 6,000 people stayed around the office building where they lived in temporary shelters. Some came from other places, such as Lospalos, Tutuala, and Uato Carbau. They did not run away because they were afraid of being caught by Indonesian soldiers. But they moved around freely looking for food. They took food from their old homes and brought it back.

Three weeks later ABRI soldiers from Battalion 328 and Hansip arrived in Iliomar. They immediately built six military posts around the population concentrated around the Posto. Two days later they told the people to register. They summoned the village chiefs from the six villages in the sub-district and ordered them to help them organise the people. Then they told the people to rebuild their shelters inside the ring of posts. They also ordered that no one could go more than 1 kilometre from the Posto, warning that anyone who broke the rule would be shot. Fernando Amaral said:

We weren't allowed to visit our neighbours, or even to come out and work our fields…We tried to look for food for our own needs, but we were required to report daily to the soldiers or Hansip. And we weren't allowed to speak Portuguese.[197]

The people had just come down from Mount Matebian and were very weak and hungry. The soldiers gave them some corn, about three meal-sized tins a week per family. Although this was not nearly enough, the soldiers did not permit the people to make gardens for food. This rule very soon caused famine among the people at the Iliomar Posto. At first there were still coconuts in the trees, but with thousands of people picking them they were soon gone. People started eating wild roots and leaves. After that they cut the middle part out of banana trees, boiled and ate it, thus surviving on what was normally regarded as pig food. They suffered from diseases such as cholera and beri-beri, and people began to die every day.

The people begged the military for permission to go outside the resettlement camp. They asked the soldiers to send Hansip with them as guards, so they could go to their old homes and gather the food that was there. At their old homes there were edible tubers, coconuts, jackfruit, cassava, and edible leaves. ABRI eventually gave them permission to go, but before a person was allowed out the military wrote their name on a plywood board, which they had to wear around their necks. When they returned, they reported in by giving the board back. However, not long afterwards, 162 people ran away to the forest from the Iliomar camp, hoping to ease their hunger. After that the soldiers stopped giving permission for people to go out of Iliomar, and the hunger worsened again.

Fernando Amaral said that the 96 people who died from his village alone during the famine were buried at the three-way intersection at the entrance to Iliomar. Gaspar Seixas, who was the Deputy Sub-district administrator of Iliomar between 1979 and 1985, estimated that between 200 to 300 people died in Iliomar in 1978-80. Most were buried next to the old Portuguese school. Since then the families have exhumed the bones and reburied them.[198]

Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro)

199. Mount Kablaki, which straddles the districts of Ainaro and Manufahi, was a major Resistance base. People fled there for safety in 1976 from towns and villages in the vicinity, including Same, Maubisse, Ainaro, and even from the sub-districts of Ermera and Atsabe in Ermera District. In September 1977, Indonesian forces, including Battalions 121, 521 and Airborne Infantry Battalion 100, attacked the base on the mountain and captured a large group of the people who had taken refuge there. Some of them came from the village of Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro). The community of Mau Chiga told the Commission of its experience on surrender to the Indonesian military. The military immediately sent these people back to Mau Chiga to live. The people of Mau Chiga found that Indonesian forces had destroyed their houses, killed their cattle, and stolen the gold ornaments from their homes. About two years later, in the middle of 1979, all but a few of those who remained on Mount Kablaki surrendered. Once more, those who came from Mau Chiga were sent back home. They lived at Dare, on the Ainaro road. They could make gardens outside the settlement, but only with a permit from the military. Each time they wanted to go out they had to ask for a permit. If the military found anyone outside without a permit, they would punish them by placing them in water for a night or beating them. These restrictions made it impossible to live a normal life, and the people suffered serious starvation until the ICRC food aid arrived in 1980.[199]

Hatolia, Ermera

200. The township of Hatolia (Hatolia, Ermera) was another resettlement camp. Idelfonso dos Reis told the Commission he surrendered to ABRI Battalion 507 on 20 July 1978, somewhere in the sub-district of Hatolia. The military took him and his group to the town of Hatolia and told them to live in the neighbourhood of Modolaran. The military gave them some corn, salted fish and salt. The salted fish gave people diarrhoea, from which many died. Old people and children were the most susceptible. For about a year conditions in the Modolaran camp were very bad for the 7,000 or so people who lived there.

201. Modolaran was surrounded by eight military posts. Nobody was allowed more than 100 metres from the camp. The internees asked the soldiers to accompany them to find food. Occasionally the soldiers gave permission and they went to a neighbouring village, Leimea Kraik or Samara, to look for edible root crops. Starvation in the Hatolia camp continued until 1979. Refugees from areas other than Hatolia, for example Zumalai (Covalima), appeared to suffer more fatalities than those from Hatolia. When the ICRC came with food aid at the end of 1979, the families received sufficient food and medical care to return them to good health. Not long afterwards, in 1980, the soldiers gave more freedom of movement to the internees. In the beginning they moved the internees to Leimea Kraik. Afterwards they gave them permission to leave and return to their homes. Many left for Ermera and Dili.[200]

Betano, Manufahi

202. Maria José da Costa told the Commission that in August 1978 Airborne Infantry Battalion 700 captured her and others in the area of Dolok (Alas, Manufahi). She was taken to Betano (Same, Manufahi), where the military gave them only a small, insufficient amount of food. People were allowed to make gardens, but within a limited area and not on the other side of the Cara Ulun River, 4 kilometres west of Betano. No one was allowed to go to their gardens outside limited times. These restrictions caused starvation and many people died. In Betano people lived under these conditions for five years, until 1983. After that the military allowed people to leave Betano. Maria José da Costa went to Same with her husband.[201]

Death in the resettlement camps

203. The physical condition of many arriving in transit camps was extremely poor. Minimal food provision, combined with restrictions on movement to seek or grow food and population densities swollen by outsiders and the confined space in which people were required to live, continued to apply in the resettlement camps. As the months went by, especially in 1978 and into 1979, the death toll reached horrendous proportions and continued at these levels until international humanitarian aid programmes began in late 1979.

204. Witness testimony already recounted here paints a picture of death from weakness, illness and starvation, as seen through the eyes of survivors in the camps.

The Indonesian Jesuit priest Father Alex Dirdjasusanto, who visited various parts of the territory in early 1979, provided some independent insight into the death toll at the time. In early March, he visited the town of Maubisse (Maubisse, Ainaro) and was invited four times in the course of one day to bury the dead. The catechist in Maubisse had recorded in his prayer book the deaths for 1979: January, 79; February, 101; first week of March, 26. In Turiscai (Manufahi) a week later Father Dirdjasusanto was told that the death toll had climbed steeply since 1977: 1977, six deaths; 1978, 164 deaths; 1 January to 13 March 1979, 120 deaths. He was also told that the death rate among "refugees" in the town of Ermera was about ten per day.[202]

205. Other independent testimony to the appalling physical conditions in the camps came from the visits to Timor-Leste in September 1978 of several foreign diplomats and journalists. In the company of Indonesia's Foreign Minister, Mochtar Kusumaatmadja, the visitors were reportedly shocked at the conditions they saw in a camp in Remexio (Aileu) where 4,000 people were held. A journalist was told of the deaths of thousands in the district and that worse was happening in camps elsewhere, including Suai (Covalima). Photographs of severely malnourished adults and children, taken by another journalist and published in newspapers around the world, provided incontrovertible evidence of the famine and of the urgent need for emergency relief.[203]

206. Data compiled by CRS provides further insight into the death toll in a few places before the international aid programmes began in Timor-Leste (see Table 7 below). While CRS disclaimed "scientific accuracy" for the data, they are broadly consistent with other material received by the Commission.

Table 7: Estimated monthly death rates in some resettlement camps, before and after international aid*

District	Resettlement camp	Before aid (Jan-Jul 1979) (Av. monthly deaths)	After aid (Sep 1979-Jan 1980) (Av. monthly deaths)	June 1980 sub-district population
Lautém	Lospalos	72	12	15,693
	Lore	8	N/a
	Lautém	171	20	9,143
	Tutuala	21	2	2,623
	Luro	479	25	5,205
	Iliomar	305	10	5,435
Baucau	Laga	200	30	13,989

* Derived from: CRS Indonesia, Emergency assistance for East Timor (Phase I): Final Report, 18 March 1980, p.8, CRS Submission to the CAVR, Annexe 10. Note: only Columns 2-4 appear in the CRS report. The total surviving sub-district population in 1980, shown in Column 5, is given for comparison only. Most sub-districts had three or four camps. The population figures for 1980 for Lore and Lospalos, which are both in Lospalos Sub-district, have been combined.

District	Resettlement camp	Before aid (Jan-Jul 1979) (Av. monthly deaths)	After aid (Sep 1979-Jan 1980) (Av. monthly deaths)	June 1980 sub-district population
Ermera	Hatolia	13	1	15,096
	Letefoho	13	n/a	11,501
	Railaco	4	n/a	n/a

207. The data clearly show one thing – that international relief programmes were absolutely necessary to arrest the spiralling death toll in the resettlement camps of Timor-Leste.

Emergency humanitarian response (1979–1980)

208. The overwhelming memory East Timorese people have of life just before and after their capture or surrender is of hunger. All governments have an obligation under international law to provide humanitarian aid when it is needed, or to permit others to provide such aid. After the 1975 invasion the Government of Indonesia had these obligations towards people under its control in Timor-Leste. For people not under its control, those in Fretilin-controlled areas, the Government of Indonesia still had an obligation to permit others to provide aid. This section describes what the Commission has learned about the humanitarian aid effort.

209. In Timor-Leste, Indonesian government policy on humanitarian relief was determined entirely by the military. Until September 1979, international relief agencies were unable to operate in Timor-Leste. Up until late 1979, the Indonesian government did supply some aid to the camps under its control, but much less than was needed. The evidence for this can be seen in the rising death toll. Neither did the Indonesian Government allow aid to go to areas outside its control. Only from September 1979 did it permit two international aid agencies to conduct large emergency relief programmes in the territory.

Before September 1979

210. The Government of Indonesia made some provision to meet the needs of people in the camps before September 1979. Officially, it required that any aid from international sources be channelled through the government; humanitarian relief was to be relayed to Timor via the Indonesian Red Cross as the responsible agency in the field.[204]

211. Several governments gave aid for Timor-Leste to the Indonesian Government, and which was then channelled through the Indonesian Red Cross. The Australian Government made cash donations in October and November 1976, and again in September 1978. The New Zealand Government did the same at the end of 1978.[205]

212. World Vision Australia and the Australian Government sent a barge of food to Dili in January 1979. But the latter were not allowed to send monitors and they received no report on its distribution. This lack of accountability was a problem with all government-to-government aid for Timor-Leste. The Australian Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA) reported that it had received several letters from Timor-Leste about the problem. One of them read:

> Goods from the Australian Government-chartered barge Alanna Fay, which arrived in Dili in January 1979, and medicines flown in from New Zealand, were on sale at the Toko Vong Vung in Kampung Bairo Central in Dili and another shop, the Casa Vitoria.[206]

The Church

213. The Indonesian Government did also permit some aid to come through the Catholic Church. The first Church food aid was organised by Bishop Antonius Pain Ratu SVD, from the Indonesian town of Atambua, through the Social Delegate (Delsos) of the Atambua Diocese. With the help of his order, the Society of the Divine Word (SVD), he obtained food from a German organisation interested in Timor and from US Catholic Relief Services (CRS).

214. Father Stanislaus Bessin, an SVD missionary in Atambua at the time, told the Commission that he helped prepare the first food aid shipment of 100 tons in April 1976. The Church did not deliver the aid directly to Timor-Leste, as the Indonesian military insisted that the Church surrender the truck to them. The military took the truck and promised to deliver the aid to those in need. Between December 1976 and March 1977, Father Bessin helped prepare more food aid for Timor-Leste. Using trucks rented from the military, the Church sent corn, beans, sago and rice twice a week. He was only permitted to accompany the cargo to the border town of Balibó (Bobonaro). After that the military took over the convoy, promising to deliver it. Father Bessin was unable to verify that the aid reached those in need and he feared much was corruptly used by the military. In June 1978 he asked the Governor of Timor-Leste to distribute the Church aid, but the Governor said all aid had to pass through the military.[207]

215. One place that did receive Church assistance from Atambua was the town of Bobonaro, not far from the Indonesian border. As already noted above, Indonesian military restrictions on movement out of the town resulted in food shortages and hunger. Sister Consuela Martinez told the Commission she received food, clothing, blankets and medicines from the Atambua Delsos from the end of 1976 until 1983. The Indonesian Red Cross (Palang Merah Indonesia) delivered the aid in trucks and she used it to feed between 120 and 180 children each day.[208]

216. Nevertheless, people continued to die due to hunger in Bobonaro. Sister Consuela was told by the Sub-district administrator that from the time of the surrender to the Indonesian military in February 1976 until early 1977, more than 200 people were dying each month. The number of deaths decreased slightly in early 1977 soon after the Delsos aid began arriving, but the aid was still not sufficient to reduce the death rate to a normal level. The number of deaths fell again only when direct international aid began to arrive in late 1979.[209]

217. The Jakarta Catholic organisation LPPS also directed financial assistance to Timor-Leste through its East Timor Emergency and Rehabilitation Programme, launched in September 1977. Initally led by Father Zegwaard MSC, and working through the Timor Catholic Church's Dili Delsos, LPPS continued to do its work quietly for many years.[210]

218. A report on this programme written in early 1979 said that some Rp110 million had been distributed in the programme's first 18 months. This money from Church and charitable organisations in Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, Austria, the US, Australia, Indonesia and the UK was used for emergency clothing, food and medicine, assistance for widows and orphans, housing, agriculture, cattle breeding and schools. The report also confirmed that the Indonesian authorities controlled the distribution of the aid. It noted that in early 1979 it was difficult to distribute aid because:

> the local government wants to have a monopoly on this kind of distribution of aid, for security and social education considerations… [For this reason] a priest in one town is forbidden to buy rice or corn for distribution to the people.[211]

219. No foreign personnel involved with any of the Church programmes were permitted to visit Timor-Leste.[212]

Witness reports on Indonesian government aid

220. Many people told the Commission that immediately after surrender the Indonesian military gave them some food. Often it was dried fish, poor quality weevil-infested corn (jagung lapuk in Indonesian, batar fohuk in Tetum), sometimes with rice or corn flour. Every report to the Commission emphasised that the aid was not enough to sustain life. The report from Cosme Freitas of Vemasse (Baucau) is typical:

> We received only stale mouldy corn distributed by ABRI, three meal-sized tin-cans for one family for one week. We would consume all three cans of stale corn in just one day.[213]

221. Some more examples are given in the table below.

Table 8: Food aid by ABRI in transit and resettlement camps, 1978

Date	Place	Type	Witness	Food aid
Throughout 1976-77	Bobonaro Town	Resettlement camp	Sister Consuela Martinez HC	A small amount of corn for each family as they surrendered, depending on the number of children. After that, the same amount every two weeks.

Date	Place	Type	Witness	Food aid
After July 1978	Modolaran, Hatolia Town, (Hatolia, Ermera)	Resettlement camp	Idelfonso dos Reis	One meal-sized tin of corn and one of salt fish per person per week. Eaten in three days. Assistance received only four times, then not again.
After August 1978	Uma Metan, Mahakida (Alas, Manufahi)	Transit camp	Tomé da Costa Magalhães; Mateus da Conceição	One small milk tin of corn per family per week. Eaten in two days and provided just once, then not again.
December 1978	Iliomar (Iliomar, Lautém)	Resettlement camp	Fernando Amaral	Three tins of corn per family per week.
February 1979	Fatubessi Town (Hatolia, Ermera)	Resettlement camp	Adriano Soares Lemos	One tin of corn and one tin of rice per family per week. Plus some salted fish and salt. Insufficient.
November 1979	Railaco Town, Railaco Leten (Railaco, Ermera)	Transit camp	Eufrazia de Jesus Soares	Two small milk tins of corn and a tin of salt fish, once only, two weeks after capture. Caused protein shock deaths.

222. The Commission also heard that the food often caused diarrhoea. Idelfonso dos Reis said that many people died of diarrhoea in the Modolaran resettlement camp in Hatolia Town in mid-1978. Similar deaths occurred in Railaco, Remexio and Aikurus from food aid eaten shortly after capture.[214] Some people thought the food had been poisoned. On the balance of probability, the Commission believes that the victims suffered from protein shock. When a seriously malnourished person eats protein rich food, it can cause a severe reaction marked by chills, fever, bronchial spasms, acute emphysema, vomiting and diarrhoea. The fact that some people died in this way from eating the food they were given demonstrated further negligence by the institution administering the aid, namely the Indonesian military.[215]

After September 1979

223. Direct international aid began to flow to those in need in Timor-Leste from September 1979. By then the famine had been critical in parts of Timor-Leste for two years or more. The first question the Commission considers in this section is: Why did it take so long for international aid to arrive?

224. The answer to this question cannot be that Timor-Leste's aid needs were not known.

225. US Catholic Relief Services (CRS) told the Commission that the top levels of its organisation had credible information about the suffering of the East Timorese people by April 1977. The CRS knew this from Father Lieshout in West Timor, who was managing CRS assistance for East Timorese refugees in West Timor. Father Lieshout's information came from visits to Bishop Ribeiro in Dili.[216] Father José Alvaro Nolasco Santimano Meneses e Monteiro of the Diocese of Dili told the Commission that he attended a meeting with foreign ambassadors in Jakarta in July 1977. He appealed to them for food aid for Timor-Leste.[217] As already noted, on 6-7 September 1978 a delegation of 11 foreign ambassadors, accompanied by journalists, visited Dili, Baucau, Maliana (Bobonaro) and Remexio (Aileu). They were told that up to 125,000 people had come down from the mountains, and 20,000 to 30,000 of them were in an appalling condition, suffering from illnesses including cholera, malaria, tuberculosis and advanced malnutrition. The ambassadors of Australia, Canada, the US and Japan called for an urgent international relief operation. World Vision Indonesia visited Timor-Leste in October 1978 and reported that 70,000 refugees were in desperate need and that most were malnourished women and children. One team member said about the children in Metinaro (Dili):

> They were extremely thin; we could see the bones in their legs and arms; some were so weak they could not walk.[218]

226. Clearly enough information about the humanitarian situation was available to Western and other governments and aid agencies for them to raise serious concerns about the situation for more than two years before a significant aid effort began.

Access to Timor-Leste denied

227. Some aid agencies did act on what they knew. CRS said that it had made regular requests to enter Timor-Leste during 1977 and 1978.[219] Other agencies sent similar requests. Within the space of little over a year after the Indonesian invasion, Australia's umbrella organisation for NGOs engaged in aid and development work, ACFOA (The Australian Council for Overseas Aid), called five times for the ICRC and other agencies to be admitted to Timor-Leste.* The ICRC itself negotiated continually with the government in Jakarta for access to Timor-Leste on acceptable terms. It wanted access to all parts of Timor-Leste, including Fretilin-held areas.[220] The Government of Indonesia rejected all requests for access to Timor-Leste to assess needs and distribute aid.

228. However, in 1979 Indonesia changed its policy and agreed to admit the two international agencies, CRS and the ICRC. CRS attributes the shift in the Indonesian Government position to January 1979 when its executive director, Bishop Edwin B Broderick, received encouragement from the Indonesian Vice-President, Adam Malik, to institute an emergency relief programme. However, it was not until May 1979 that the Indonesian authorities gave CRS clearance to carry out an assessment of the situation on the ground. And despite the finding of CRS's assessment report that 200,000 people were seriously or critically malnourished, it was another four months before the relief programme was able to begin. By the time it did begin, in September 1979, the CRS estimated that the number of seriously or critically malnourished had risen to 300,000.

* ACFOA issued its appeals in December 1975, April 1976, October 1976, February 1977 and September 1977.

229. It was only in late 1978 and early 1979 that the situation changed drastically. A massive flow of sick and emaciated people came down from the mountainous interior regions of Timor-Leste and inundated the coastal settlements and villages.[221]

230. In so far as it gives the impression that the situation had become critical only in late 1978, this is not an accurate depiction of the situation. East Timorese had been coming out of the forest and mountains in large numbers since at least late 1977 in the same emaciated condition as those who came down from Mount Matebian in late 1978. This is confirmed by a variety of sources ranging from the Indonesian Government itself, to various churchmen and women, to the ambassadors and journalists who visited Timor-Leste in September 1977 as previously described.

231. The Commission does not have privileged information about internal Indonesian Government and military decisions. However, the Commission believes that the more likely reason for the change in aid policy arose from the fact that the Indonesian military had by 1979 achieved its main military objectives: the destruction of the last major Resistance base on Mount Matebian; the significant weakening of the organised armed resistance; and the control of the bulk of the population.

232. The Comission concludes that before these objectives had been achieved, the Indonesian military saw international humanitarian aid as a potential barrier to defeating the Resistance and, especially, forcing the desperately hungry population to surrender to its control. In addition, in keeping with its very tight control on any foreign visitors to Timor-Leste, it had no interest in any foreigners observing its conduct of military operations in the territory.

233. Moreover, when it did change its policy on emergency relief, the Indonesian Government permitted only CRS and ICRC to work in Timor-Leste, and required both to adopt a low profile by, for example, not making public appeals for funds. It continued to refuse access by other aid organisations, including Oxfam and ACFOA.

CRS survey and aid programme

234. When CRS and the ICRC were finally permitted to conduct a survey of needs in Timor-Leste, they found a population shattered by famine and death.

235. In May 1979, CRS's programme director for Indonesia, Frank Carlin, made an assessment of conditions in Timor-Leste. He visited 16 sites where East Timorese people lived under Indonesian control. CRS later described what he found in the following terms:

> The situation observed by Mr Carlin, a seasoned veteran of 14 years of relief work in Asia, was, in many locations, one of intense human suffering due to illness, hunger and starvation. Death rates were high. Those critically ill and dying were not limited to the very young and the very old - normally the first to succumb to sickness and starvation. Many persons in their prime years were dying. There were a large number of teenaged youths and young adults in a marasmatic state*, a condition which had reduced them to little more than walking skeletons. Among the children, severe malnutrition was almost universal. Because of their bloated bellies and wasted limbs, children had to hold on to their tattered shorts with one hand to prevent them from sliding off; the few children less affected appeared normal by comparison.

At many of the sites visited, the people had only the most meagre of possessions: a pot, a sleeping mat and perhaps a little food from local officials. The clothing worn by the people were little better than rags. Sickness in the camps was rampant. Illnesses such as malaria and influenza, which would be serious even under normal conditions, took a deadly toll on the severely malnourished. Other health problems, such as scabies, conjunctivitis and tropical ulcers, were common. Great care had to be exercised in giving food to these people because they had been surviving on a diet devoid of protein. If given food too concentrated in protein, their systems could not absorb this. They would then go into protein shock and die. Cases of protein shock were witnessed by Mr Carlin. While it was observed that serious conditions did not exist everywhere in Timor-Leste, in those locations where large numbers of people had recently come down from the mountains conditions were as critical as anything Mr. Carlin had ever encountered.[222]

236. By September 1979, when it was able to begin its relief programme, CRS estimated that the number of people in a "serious or critically malnourished condition" was 300,000.[223] As described previously, this number coincides with the number of people believed to be in Indonesian-controlled camps by the end of 1978. Given their known physical condition and lack of access to food, it seems that many identified by CRS as in distress were indeed camp internees. In any case, it means that about 55% of Timor-Leste's surviving population (according to Indonesian Government figures) were thought to be in a serious or critical condition in September 1979.†

237. The CRS programme was the larger of the two emergency aid programs. CRS and the ICRC agreed to divide their work so that the ICRC concentrated on the 60,000 people whose condition was most grave, while CRS focused on the remaining 240,000 people. The first CRS aid reached Dili in September 1979. It went out immediately to

* Marasmus is the "dry"' (thin, desiccated) form of malnourishment, which results from near starvation with deficiency of protein and nonprotein nutrients. The "wet" (edematous, swollen) form known as kwashiorkor occurs when protein deficiency is more marked than the calorie deficiency.

† The Indonesian Government estimated the population of East Timor in June 1979 at 533,176. A year later, a more exact estimate was 555,350 [Quoted in "East Timor: how many people have died?" pp. 22-24, ACFOA Development Dossier No. 1, July 1980, 2d edn; Bappeda Tk. I, Timor Timur dalam angka: 1988, Dili: Kantor Statistik Propinsi Timor Timur, (Agency for Regional Development (Sub-District level), and The Statistics Bureau of East Timor East Timor in figures 1988 Dili.) 1989, p. 27].

about 120,000 people and was later extended to some 240,000 people in about 120 settlements (see Table 6: Resettlement camps in late 1979; for settlement names see par. 197).

ICRC survey and aid programme

238. In April 1979, ICRC delegates conducted a preliminary survey and found that "tens of thousands of people displaced by military operations ... (were) facing starvation unless aid was brought to them rapidly, a situation aggravated by the absence of any medical service".[224] This was followed by a survey in late July 1979 of 13 villages or camps where conditions were known to be particularly bad. Of the 75,230 people in these places, ICRC delegates estimated that 60,000 were "in a state of alarming malnutrition" including "20,000 dying from hunger". * Abandoning the usual low-key language of the ICRC, delegates publicly declared the situation was "as bad as Biafra and potentially as serious as Kampuchea". The ICRC medical coordinator for the aid programmme said "he had rarely been so distressed by what he had seen."[225]

239. As shown above (see Table 7 par. 206), CRS figures showed high death rates in Luro (479 per month) and Iliomar, both in Lautém, (305 per month) – both places on the ICRC's list. The Commission has also received evidence of very bad conditions in Laclubar (Manatuto), Uatolari (Viqueque), Natarbora (Manatuto), and Lolotoe (Bobonaro). All were strategic locations, mostly in the mountains. The Indonesian military prevented people from leaving the towns, each of which held only a few thousand people. The traumatic impact of such massive numbers of deaths on these small communities is now difficult to imagine and continues in its long lasting impact on the social, cultural and economic fabric of these communities

240. ICRC aid began to arrive in Dili in October 1979. It was administered jointly with the Indonesian Red Cross. The first assistance went immediately to Hatolia (Ermera) and Laclubar (Manatuto). The initial six-month relief operation was expected to distribute 1,800 tons of corn, 360 tons of rice, 1,080 tons of beans, 216 tons of vegetable oil, 270 tons of milk powder, and 180 tons of protein biscuits to 60,000 people. By 1981 the ICRC's food aid programme was reaching 80,000 people in 15 settlements.[226] It budgeted A$7 million (US$ 6.26 million) for the first stage of the operation, almost half of which was earmarked for the transportation of the aid by helicopter.[227]

Controls and limitations

241. Both the CRS and the ICRC aid programmes were subject to stringent Indonesian military control. Military intervention often served to restrict the relief programme rather than to facilitate it. The CRS submission to the Commission shows that all government decisions in Timor-Leste, including on matters relating to CRS operations,

* ICRC Communication, 21 August 1979. John Waddingham, "Notes on 'counter-insurgency' in East Timor: The Indonesian government's resettlement program", in Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence [Reference: East Timor – Human Rights and Condition of the People, Commonwealth of Australia, Canberra, 1982, pp. 715-748]. Places named were Uatolari, Iliomar, Luro, Abafala, Seiçal, Ostico, Cassa, Zumalai, Hatolia, Fatubessi, Natarbora, Laclubar and Dilor.

were controlled by Lieutenant General L B (Benny) Moerdani, who in 1979-80 was Assistant to the Minister of Defence and Security for Intelligence (Asintel Hankam) and Deputy Chief of the State Intelligence Coordinating Agency (Badan Koordinasi Intelijen Negara, Bakin). General Moerdani had been closely involved in planning the invasion of Timor-Leste in 1975 and it remained his area of competence.*

242. Security was so tight that CRS Jakarta was not permitted to telephone its office in Dili, leading CRS to directly ask General Moerdani to authorise a phone line. CRS also asked him to intervene when a helicopter was withdrawn for use by the oil industry. General Moerdani vetoed a proposed school-feeding programme and blocked the appointment of Father Locatelli as project manager for a proposed development programme in 1981. A proposal to recruit Indonesian doctors for CRS was also blocked.[228]

243. On the ground, a severe shortage of trucks could have been relieved by a military organisation maintaining tens of thousands of troops in the field. As it was, CRS had to build its truck fleet by chartering private trucks, and repairing and then renting the civil administration's broken-down trucks. Even these trucks were sometimes taken back for use by their owners.[229]

244. The actual ICRC presence in Timor-Leste during the emergency aid programme was minimal. The distribution was actually conducted by Indonesian Red Cross personnel. This compares unfavourably with the level of ICRC presence in Timor-Leste before the December 1975 invasion when no famine conditions existed in the territory.[230]

245. Gilman dos Santos, who worked for CRS in 1979, gave valuable testimony on the scale and nature of the humanitarian crisis at this time and of the limited ability of agencies to address it. During his work with CRS, Gilman dos Santos travelled to all districts across Timor-Leste and observed for himself the condition of communities and the role of the Indonesian military:

> In 1979 CRS arrived. The presence of international organisations in 1979 was due to the terrible situation of famine across all of Timor-Leste. This assistance came one year after the reports from the ambassadors' visit. Imagine, one year later! But still it helped. At that time we never heard of anyone visiting from the United Nations, even though we were engaged in a colossal conflict. I want to say that the humanitarian assistance that came was late, but it also saved many people. It was too late because Timor was closed off. Not even Indonesian civilians knew what was happening here. Journalists, whether they were Indonesians or foreigners, could not report on what was going on here. We couldn't even telephone other parts of Indonesia. It was very closed off. Very closed and tightly watched by the

* "The agreement signed between CRS and the Department of Home Affairs was a legal device to legitimize CRS's presence in East Timor.... The fact is that this agreement with Home Affairs had no real power as all decisions in East Timor matters was [sic] really controlled by ASSINTEL HANKAM. This was pointed out in the cover letter accompanying the agreement when it was sent to CRS/ NY. This situation has been acknowledged by USAID..." [Enclosure with Patrick C. Johns, CRS Indonesia Director, to Donald J. Crosson, CRS Director-Region II, 15 December 1980, in CRS Submission, Annexe 4].

Indonesian military. Because of these tight controls, CRS left Timor-Leste after five years of its humanitarian mission.

Just travelling between Dili and Baucau we had to stop 13 times, at every district and sub-district command, to have our papers checked. We already had 26 signatures but they would require more…There were some military people who were helpful, in Vemasse for example, and in Turiscai and Alas…To overcome problems with the military we told them the food came from America. We showed them the US flag on the packages, and the Indonesian soldiers were very afraid of the Americans.[231]

246. The Commission notes that aid was not distributed in a non-discriminatory manner to those in need. According to Gilman dos Santos, CRS was not able to distribute humanitarian relief in a politically neutral way:

CRS was allowed to distribute food only to people in ABRI-controlled areas. We could not distribute to people in the mountains. ABRI did not want food distributed to people in the mountains, because they thought that way they could force them down to surrender.[232]

247. The Commission also heard testimony alleging that the Indonesian military misappropriated aid. According to Gilman dos Santos, aid goods often surfaced in the local market or were witheld for personal use:

Our job was to go to the district or sub-district and count the number of families. Then we would report back and be given 10kg of food for each person, plus medical supplies. We were supposed to distribute the food [directly] but were forced to surrender it to the Koramil district military post. They would not permit us to give out so much food at once because they said it would be given to Fretilin. They would only give out 5kg. They were supposed to give out the other 5kg when new supplies were sent by CRS. The rest, we were told, they used themselves or sold or used as wages for building programmes, although the goverment had already made funds available. Or they exchanged it for eggs, chickens and so on…We know food was sold by ABRI in the following places and we reported this to the CRS head office in Dili: Maubisse, Ermera, Hato Builico, Liquiçá, Manatuto, Baucau, Lospalos, Laga and Suai. Clothing aid was sorted and the good clothes were kept by the military. If a CRS worker protested they would be hit and threatened with a pistol: "You must be one of the Fretilin – I will kill you."

We were told by people, and sometimes we would see this ourselves, that aid was being sold by soldiers from the Kodim or Koramil to local stores or to wealthy civilians. Often it was just given to members of their family.[233]

248. In a separate interview with the Commission, Father Eligio Locatelli of Fatumaca (Baucau) confirmed these allegations:

Several Chinese shopkeepers were forced to buy some of the aid rice from soldiers and resell it in their shops. One Chinese man came to the priests worried about what he was being forced to do.[234]

Impact of aid on the population

249. During its emergency programme (5 September 1979 to December 1980), CRS delivered 17,000 tons of food, 430 water buffaloes, 195 tons of rice seed and 326 tons of corn seed. It claimed to have reached 240,000 people. In its Final Report of 18 March 1981, CRS noted that based on data collected in ten of the locations where it had been working, its programme had had the effect of sharply reducing mortality rates:

> In the period of January 1979 through July 1979, the average number of deaths per month was 1,296; in the period September 1979 through January 1980, the rate had dropped to 70, clearly illustrating the positive impact of the emergency feeding programme.[235]

Concluding comment

250. From evidence it has gathered, the Commission acknowledges the already desperate condition of the people when they surrendered to Indonesian forces. However it believes that the famine took place because the Indonesian military was negligent by not ensuring basic needs were met after people entered camps under its control. From the evidence it has gathered, the Commission believes that, for the many who surrendered, famine began some time in 1978 and continued for at least a year, up until September 1979.

251. The famine was not caused by unusual seasonal conditions (see Box below, par. 252). The Commission believes if the military had arranged or permitted the delivery of emergency food aid, or allowed the population to return to their home villages and work their gardens, there would have been no famine in Timor-Leste. But the military did not permit them to do so because its overriding objective was the military defeat of Fretilin/Falintil. This same objective meant the military continued to prevent aid distribution in areas outside its control, even after admitting international aid agencies into Timor-Leste.

252. In short the Commission believes Indonesian military policies and practice were directly responsible for the disastrous 1978–1979 famine in Timor-Leste.

El Niño was not the cause of the famine

Several people have suggested that famine in Timor-Leste in the years 1978-79 was caused by drought rather than the actions of the Indonesian miltiary. For example, the US ambassador to Indonesia at the time, Edward Masters, told the US Congress after a visit to Timor-Leste in September 1979 that the rain that year had been only 25% of that during the previous season. Although he said the famine was due to war and environmental factors, he testified at length about the drought and local agricultural practices, ignoring the effects of the war and the use of internment camps.[236]

Periodic extended drought caused by El Niño weather patterns often affects Timor-Leste's agricultural production. In Timor-Leste, if the El Niño event begins between February and April, it can cause drought or late rains. During the period of the conflict in Timor-Leste, significant El Niño events occurred five times, as shown in the table below. At other times the rainfall was normal.[237]

An El Niño event can change the weather in two ways. It can delay the start of the wet season, and it can reduce the rainfall during the wet season. If the wet season starts late, the harvest is also late and food stored during the dry season can run out while people wait for the rains to come. However, East Timorese farmers normally turn to other food sources at such a time, for example wild foods. So a late wet season is not a major cause of hunger. If less rain falls in the wet season, the result is much worse because the harvest will be small or it might fail completely. This can cause food shortages until the following harvest.

The Commission found that little rainfall data was freely available for this historical period in Timor-Leste. However, Dr John McBride of the Australian Bureau of Meteorology prepared an analysis of the potential impact of El Niño on Timor-Leste from sets of historical rainfall data for Dili as well as a number of towns around the eastern Indonesian archipelago, which appear on a publicly accessible website.[238] These data show that the El Niño event of February 1977 to April 1978 occurred roughly at the time when famine was serious in Timor-Leste. However, this particular El Niño event was one of the mildest to occur in Timor-Leste. Rainfall during the wet season was only 7% less than normal. The wet season did start late, but this, as explained, is not in itself a major problem. Moreover, there was no El Niño event in 1979.

Table 9: El Niño events and rainfall in Timor-Leste

El Niño event (Shortage Months)	Wet Season Start	Wet Season Rainfall Decrease	Potential Food Shortage
Feb 1977-Apr 1978	70 days late	7 %	Apr 1978
Apr 1982-Jul 1983	40 days late	53%	Apr 1983-Apr 1984

Feb 1991-Jun 1992	10 days early	22%	little effect
Mar 1994-Jun 1995	30 days early	68%	Apr 1995-Apr 1996
Mar 1997-Apr 1998	on time	71%	Apr 1998-Apr 1999

Source: http://www.bom.gov.au/bmrc/clfor/cfstaff/jmb/east_timor_5.html

The rainfall data for the eastern end of the Indonesian archipelago are not conclusive. The average for the whole north coast of Timor-Leste (known as DMP91) does not show lower than normal rainfall in 1979.

This was based on three or four stations. But Dili was very dry between January and April 1979. It experienced a meteorological drought in those months. For the whole year of 1979, rainfall in Dili was 31% below normal (not 75% below normal as alleged). However, Dili is much drier than other parts of Timor-Leste. It lies on the north coast, which receives much less rainfall than the mountainous interior and the south coast. Low Dili rainfall is not a good indicator of drought in Timor-Leste's agricultural regions. We have no data for those regions. Other towns in the eastern archipelago also experienced low rainfall at this time, namely Kendari (South-east Sulawesi), and Waingapu (Sumba). Some had normal rains, namely Kupang (West Timor) and Saumlaki (South-east Maluku). Ujung Pandang (South Sulawesi) had above average rainfall in the first months of 1979.

Thus the data are insufficient to be completely sure that there was no drought in 1979. However, several reasons suggest that 1979 was not a drought year for all of Timor-Leste. They are: absence of an El Niño event; normal average rainfall along the north coast (DMP91); and the absence of consistent drought in towns around the region. Therefore the Commission does not believe that rainfall (whether late or absent) was a significant enough factor to have caused the famine of the years 1978-79. Only the actions of the Indonesian armed forces, described in this section, can explain the famine.

More serious El Niño events occurred at other times during the period 1974-99. Some of these did cause food shortages. The years 1983, 1995 and 1998 were years of fairly severe drought. The hunger that occurred in parts of Timor-Leste in 1983-84 may have been partly caused by drought. However, none of these hunger years were as bad as 1978-79. The people of Timor-Leste can generally cope with drought. The real problem was war and the actions of the Indonesian military.

Forced displacement and localised famine in the 1980s

253. Forced displacement, causing localised food shortages and sometimes resulting in deaths, continued to take place in the 1980s. From evidence that it has gathered, the Commission has found that there was an Indonesian policy with two main patterns of forced displacement in this period:

- relocation to new resettlement areas in order to achieve better military control of the population
- relocation and concentration in a defined area under restriction, in retaliation for, or as collective punishment for, an attack on Indonesian military targets.

254. During the early 1980s, Resistance forces regrouped and reorganised, and staged a number of localised attacks on ABRI units, such as the Marabia (Dili) attack of 10 June 1980, the Kablaki (Ainaro and Manufahi) uprising of 20 August 1982, the Kraras (Viqueque) and Lautém uprising of 8 August 1983. These attacks were followed by retaliatory operations by the Indonesian military, one consequence of which was the displacement of thousands of civilians in the surrounding areas, with severe humanitarian impact.

255. In the early 1980s, thousands of young men were forcibly recruited to join military operations to search for Falintil. This mass forced recruitment affected agricultural activities, and thus food security. Forced recruitment of the civilian population is not discussed at length in this section, but in Vol. III, Part 7.7: Violation of Laws of War.

Dismantling the resettlement camps: strategic relocation

256. By the 1980s the Indonesian military had control over much of the territory. Many of the resettlement camps were closed. Some of their inhabitants moved back to their own villages. Some remained confined in the places where they had been resettled after surrender, subject to the same restrictive regime of control. Others spent several years being moved from village to village before finally being allowed to return to their home villages. Yet others were moved to strategic relocation villages, sometimes called "new settlements" (pemukiman baru), usually located near major roads. The decision seems to have been based on a variety of security considerations, including the accessibility of the villages from which camp inhabitants had originated.

257. The Indonesian Government claimed that the resettlement policy was designed to help people. In various parts of Indonesia such as Kalimantan and Sulawesi, the government also moved people out of remote areas to live in towns or near roads with better access to schools, clinics and markets. The policy was a part of the government's rural development programme. In Timor-Leste the authorities often said that their reason for establishing these new villages was to ease delivery of services to otherwise remote populations, or because "slash-and-burn" farming practices had destroyed the soil in areas where the people transferred to the new villages had previously lived, rendering agricultural production impossible.

258. The Commission notes that there were positive aspects in the resettlement policy. Even after independence, many East Timorese people chose to stay in the towns and villages where they had been resettled. However, the evidence in this section shows that to portray these forced relocations as part of a rural development programme is misleading. It overlooks the fact that in Timor-Leste the transfers were organised by the military with military objectives in mind. Military documents make plain that the overriding reason for the creation of the new villages was to remove people from areas where the Resistance was active. Especially in its early years, the programme did not improve people's welfare but had the opposite effect, starvation. Consequently many people moved away from these relocation villages as soon as they could.

259. The creation of relocation villages occurred in different ways. They were often built from forced unpaid labour. Some were already existing villages, which grew much larger as the military forced people from the countryside around them into these places. In some cases entire communities were relocated into existing villages along major roads, often causing land and resource disputes (see Vol. III, Part 7.9: Violations of Economic and Social Rights). Some existing camps became strategic villages as people continued to be held there.

Relocation in the 1980s: the options

Return to the home village

260. A series of military manuals were written in 1982. They contain detailed information about the Indonesian army's strategy for establishing security in areas of the district of Baucau that were still considered "sensitive", and provide some insight into military thinking about resettlement at this time. One of the manuals makes it clear that the military thought that returning people to their home villages could have security benefits:

> The Sub-district of Laga has proposed the relocation of the Soba village to [Boleha], and of the [Tekinomata] village to Sama Guia. If settlements are established in these two places, it will be possible to gain control of the north side of Mount Matebian and the region of Susugua. Meanwhile, the administration of the Sub-district of Baguia has proposed that the village of [illegible] should be returned to its original site in the region of Bahatata while the village of Lari Sula should for the time being be resettled in the region of Caidawa…The opening up of these new resettlement areas will open up the way to [Uato Carbau].[239]

261. Another manual contains an analysis of one village, Bualale, on the slopes of Mount Matebian, whose population had been allowed to return home from the town of Quelicai in 1982 in the general context of its "comprehensive development".[240] It is acknowledged that in the town of Quelicai the villagers were unable to cultivate their own gardens, and therefore they did not have enough food. This was given as one reason for returning them to Bualale. But there was another reason, based on security considerations. It was noted that Bualale was the home village of David Alex, the commander of the 2nd Company of the Red Brigade of Falintil, and therefore a potential breeding ground of support for the Resistance. The manual makes it clear that the Indonesian military believed that the return of the population could actually bolster security in the area. Several measures had been taken that, it was hoped, would produce this outcome. Most of the families with relatives still in the forest had already been sent to the island of Ataúro. A new village head had been appointed, who was regarded as supportive of Indonesian aims. The people were described as "participating well in security and development", although it was admitted that because of intimidation by Fretilin and "for other reasons" a resistance network was still thought to be operating in the village. There were ten Hansip and one platoon of Ratih, and another 50 people who could be mobilised on an occasional basis.

262. Another of the military manuals gives an indication of the real impact of the military's security priorities on village populations. In a section on "Intensified Control of the Population" it prescribes heavy surveillance and restrictions on movement. The manual instructs units operating in villages that "every single activity of the population should be known precisely". It advises establishing networks of informers, requiring travel permits for journeys out of the village, setting up checkpoints around the village, holding unscheduled roll calls or inspections and house-to-house patrols.[241]

263. The Commission's discussion with the people of the village of Bualale about their lives during the Indonesian occupation reveals how the village viewed the regime imposed on them by the military after they returned to their homes:

> *1981: About 20 inhabitants of Bualale were suspected of being "GPK" [Gerombolan Pengacau Keamanan, members of the "band of security disruptors", that is, the Resistance] and were arrested by Battalion 521 and brought to Quelicai. They were detained for one year. While in detention, their activities included the following: constructing the meeting hall in Quelicai, building the health clinic and forced labour repairing the roads around the town of Quelicai…That year [1981] about five families suspected [by ABRI] of being in contact with Falintil were forcibly moved to Ataúro. At that time the people became more afraid and traumatised because they were always under suspicion of being in contact with the people in the forest (Falintil). One woman, Eugenia, from the* aldeia of Lialura, died of hunger on Ataúro…Three families, who were due to depart for Ataúro, ended up staying in Bualale, because there was no ship to take them. So they remained in Bualale, but lived under constant threat [from ABRI] who were always accusing them of being "GPK" or "Fretilin".
>
> 1982-83: It was only [in 1982] that the people of the village of Bualale who had been living in the Quelicai camp were sent home to the village of Bualale.
>
> At this time the inhabitants of Bualale were always under suspicion because there was still a group from the village who were still in the forest, and [ABRI] were always doing things such as:

- Ordering the women to prepare food for the Hansip who were assigned to Bualale
- Holding entertainments (dances) with the women every night
- Forcing women whose children were still small to participate in these events
- Forcing women to perform the night watch.

> At that time Battalion Zipur 9 (109) and Team Saka (Railakan) led by F57 tortured the inhabitants and there was one person, Mateus from the aldeia of Lialura, who was tortured to death…
>
> 1984-86: In these years the situation continued as before.[242]

New villages

264. Villagers were often moved from resettlement camps to entirely new villages located in places that were deemed by the military to be more secure than their home villages.

265. Between 1979 and 1981 people from six villages in the sub-district of Quelicai (Baucau) – Quelicai, Guruça, Afaça, Abafala, Uaitame and Bualale – were forcibly moved from the camp in town of Quelicai to a new settlement on the coast called Kampung Mulia, sited between the villages of Tequinaumata and Seiçal (Laga, Baucau). Approximately 205 families were made to move to Mulia because their own villages were close to the forest and it was thought that they might give support to Falintil. When it was the turn of the people of Guruça and Afaça to move, they refused to leave their villages. All their belongings were then taken out of their houses. The houses were then burned, their crops and livestock were destroyed, and several of the inhabitants were beaten and stabbed. They were then put in army trucks and taken to Mulia under heavy guard.[243] The community of Uaitame recalled that on 8 January 1979 Indonesian troops under the command of a Special Forces (Kopassandha) officer came from Laga to move all 600 inhabitants of Uaitame from the town of Quelicai to Mulia. The people refused to go at first but the next day the Kopassandha commander and his men returned and forced them to board the 13 trucks they had brought with them while shooting wildly into the air.

266. The first few months in their new location were the most difficult. The people of Uaitame described to the Commission the conditions they lived in when they arrived in Mulia:

> The people living in Mulia did not have houses, beds, cooking equipment, food or clothes. As a consequence about 250 people died of hunger and disease. At that time those who died were buried naked and without coffins. Between 8 and ten people were dying every day.[244]

267. After three or four months the people started receiving food through the Catholic Church. Two months later the local government provided them with zinc sheets for roofing so that they could build houses.[245]

268. The situation improved slowly. Restrictions on movement caused the inhabitants of Mulia to face continued food shortages, as they were unable to farm away from their immediate surroundings. Their living conditions were still very basic and there was no access to medical care. As a result, according to a source who did not wish to be identified, people continued to die during this period. In 1980, CRS and the ICRC began distributing aid in Kampung Mulia. The Indonesian military began to ease the restrictions on movement, allowing people to find suitable agricultural plots away from their homes, though they were still required to carry travel passes (surat jalan).[246]

Repeated resettlement

269. The people of some villages were not allowed to return to their homes for many years. In such cases, after the dismantlement of the resettlement camps the population was often moved several times before being allowed to settle again in their home village.

270. The people of Lelalai (Quelicai, Baucau) experienced this. They told the Commission of years of forced displacement and control at the hands of the Indonesian military-supported militia, Team Saka, before they were allowed to return to their home village in 1988:

> 1982: The population was moved to an area near the village of Aba. There they were ordered to build an emergency school, but the children could not go to the school because they did not have clothes to wear.
>
> 1984-86: The population was moved again, to the village of Laisorulai, where they were kept under close surveillance by the Team Saka militia [Railakan] led by Julião Fraga and others. At that time the people were allowed to go looking for food, though at night they had to return to the "concentration camp". [When they went out to look for food] they were told to collect candlenut and copra to give to them [the militia]. If they failed to bring back [candlenut and copra], whether they were men or women, they would be tortured, beaten and put in a drum filled with water.
>
> 1987: The commander of Team Saka told the people of Lelalai that they could go back to their aldeia*, but first they had to make gardens and plant candlenut, copra and teak in them. At that time the local government paid no attention to the needs of the people of Lelalai, whose life and death was in the hands of Team Saka.*
>
> 1988: After the villagers had done what they had been told to do by the commander of Team Saka…they were told to go to their former homes. But still their everyday lives were not free or normal. All their activities were subject to exactly the same restrictions as before.[247]

Continued restriction in resettlement areas

271. As noted previously in this section, when people returned to their home sub-district of Iliomar (Lautém) in late 1978, they were not allowed to return to their own villages, but rather were resettled into strategic settlement areas (daerah pemukiman). The villagers of Iliomar II, who had previously lived in the area of Kampung Lama about three kilometres south of the town of Iliomar, were relocated in an area north of Ailebere Village and south of Iliomar I. The people of the village of Fuat, who had previously lived in the Bubutau area north of Maluhira, were concentrated adjacent to the northern edge of Iliomar I. Villagers from Cainliu, including those from the distant aldeia of Larimi, were forced to settle in the area of the present day junior high school and church, with the villagers from the aldeia of Caidabu resettled nearby. Tirilolo villagers were also resettled near the church.

272. In the resettlement area of the town of Iliomar, the villagers were only permitted to farm within 500 metres of their new homes, with any further movement requiring approval and the issue of a travel permit. These restrictive measures were intended to cut supplies to the Resistance by isolating the civilian population from Falintil who remained in the forest. Unable to gain access to their traditional gardens and fields, the villagers suffered considerable hunger and hardship.[248]

273. In 1982, the people of four of the villages of Iliomar Sub-district were allowed to return to their villages. However, for the villagers of Iliomar I and Iliomar II, the situation did not change. They were forced to remain in their resettlement area until 1988.

274. The people of Iliomar suffered considerable hardship and hunger in the years 1984-85. The villagers of Tirilolo and Cainliu had been allowed to return from the town at the Iliomar resettlement area to their original village locations in 1981. The people of the aldeia of Larimi had been moved to an area adjacent to the aldeia of Liufalun, Cainliu in 1982. Even so, access to many of their traditional fields remained restricted by the Indonesian security forces. Conditions were particularly difficult for the villagers of Iliomar I and Iliomar II, who had not been allowed to return to their homes.[249] The ICRC conducted an emergency feeding programme in Iliomar from 1979 to 1981. This was continued by UNICEF from mid-1982, but suspended in 1983 when there was an escalation of Indonesian military activities in the area.* Mário Viegas Carrascalão, who was the Governor of East Timor at the time, recalled that his "bitterest memory was when famine hit the district of Iliomar in 1985".[250]

275. In 1988, the Indonesian military adopted a new strategy for the people of Iliomar II by moving them from the sub-district centre of Iliomar to the area of Iradaruta, on the northeastern fringe of their original village. This amounted to the creation of a strategic relocation village: the aim, the community of Iliomar II told the Commission, was to "cut Falintil routes and support the military's operations in the area". The community also told the Commission that the military did not achieve their objectives because the population did not give them information.[251]

* Ramos-Horta, 1987: p. 196. Budiardjo, 1984: p. 94 quotes a comprehensive Fretilin report on conditions: "in Luro... starvation is the constant companion of people here who have no staple food at all.... All that can be said of conditions in the Iliomar camp is that they are just as bad as in Luro".

Population redistribution

276. The forced relocation of people, first during the surrenders and captures between 1977 and 1979 and then later when further forced transfers took place, caused a radical change in the settlement pattern in Timor-Leste. Entire areas were emptied of people, who were moved to new places, some previously uninhabited.

277. The table below shows the change in population in different sub-districts between 1970 and 1980. While the two sets of figures should be compared with a great deal of caution,* they certainly indicate major changes in population distribution. Most of these changes were the direct result of the Indonesian military operations between 1977 and 1978 and the forced resettlement which followed.

278. On the whole, the areas where population declined were in remote forest or mountain areas, such as Barique/Natarbora (Manatuto), Fatuberliu (Manufahi), Lolotoe (Bobonaro), Lacluta (Viqueque), Turiscai (Manufahi), Maubisse (Ainaro), Mape/Zumalai (Covalima), Laclo (Manatuto), Quelicai (Baucau), Luro (Lautém), Fatululik (Covalima), Baguia (Baucau) and Laclubar (Manatuto). Many of these areas had been Resistance strongholds in the late 1970s, and certainly suffered many fatalities. After the destruction of the Resistance bases between 1977 and 1978 the Indonesian military moved many survivors out of these areas in the hope that the remnants of the Resistance would be starved of support.

279. By contrast other sub-districts contained a larger population in 1980 than in 1970, far more than could be caused by births alone. This happened because survivors of the war moved to these places. Many of the places were district capitals, situated along main roads and in the lowlands. The towns of Dili, Manatuto, Viqueque, Baucau, Atabae (Bobonaro), Lautém/Moro, Lospalos, Maliana (Bobonaro), Hato Udo (then in Manufahi, now in Ainaro) and Bobonaro are examples. Sub-districts in Oecussi grew for a different reason. In Oecussi there was no war, and no displacement. In the late 1970s Indonesian civilians began to settle in Oecussi. Growth in Dili was also partly due to Indonesian immigration.

Table 10: Sub-district population change 1970–1980

District	Sub-district	1970	1980	% Change
DECREASE
Ainaro	Maubisse	20,119	10,409	-48.3
	Turiscai	5,981	2,890	-51.7
Baucau	Baguia	12,239	8,138	-33.5
	Laga	14,914	13,989	-6.2
	Quelicai	18,780	11,258	-40.1
	Vemasse	5,727	4,977	-13.1
	Venilale	11,736	11,148	-5.0

* On the shortcomings of data derived from both the 1970 and 1980 censuses, see Vol. III, Part 7.6: Profile of Human Rights Violations.

District	Sub-district	1970	1980	% Change
Bobonaro	Balibó	30,743	13,179	-57.1
	Cailaco	6,753	5,240	-22.4
	Lolotoe	11,689	4,502	-61.5
Covalima	Fatululik	1,899	1,215	-36.0
	Fatumean	2,379	2,164	-9.0
	Fohorem	4,677	3,515	-24.8
	Mape/Zumalai	13,494	7,043	-47.8
Dili	Aileu	26,217	9,241	-64.8
	Remexio	7,851	4,880	-37.8
Ermera	Atsabe	15,325	10,668	-30.4
	Hatolia	20,743	15,096	-27.2
Lautém	Luro	8,212	5,205	-36.6
Liquiçá	Bazartete	16,610	8,997	-45.8
	Liquiçá	16,416	8,895	-45.8
	Maubara	14,610	11,450	-21.6
Manatuto	Barique/ Natarbora	5,744	1,683	-70.7
	Laclo	6,512	3,578	-45.1
	Laclubar	15,316	10,611	-30.7
	Laleia	3,169	1,695	-46.5
Manufahi	Alas	5,034	3,574	-29.0
	Fatuberliu	8,942	3,074	-65.6
	Same	18,438	17,250	-6.4
Viqueque	Lacluta	9,965	4,132	-58.5
	Ossu	16,655	12,022	-27.8
	Uato Carbau	6,071	5,802	-4.4
INCREASE
Ainaro	Ainaro	8,985	10,428	16.1
	Hato Builico	6,829	8,459	23.9
Baucau	Baucau	20,398	25,317	24.1
Bobonaro	Atabae	5,013	6,346	26.6
	Bobonaro	11,085	20,480	84.8
	Maliana	7,508	12,233	62.9
Covalima	Suai	13,484	15,250	13.1
	Tilomar	3,272	3,501	7.0
Dili	Ataúro	3,133	5,206	66.2
	Dili	28,516	62,874	120.5

District	Sub-district	1970	1980	% Change
Ermera	Ermera	18,506	18,816	1.7
	Letefoho	11,410	11,501	0.8
Lautém	Iliomar	4,136	5,435	31.4
	Lautém/ Moro	7,088	9,143	29.0
	Lospalos	10,992	15,693	42.8
	Tutuala	2,200	2,623	19.2
Manatuto	Manatuto	5,703	6,875	20.6
Manufahi	Hato Udo	4,724	7,871	66.6
Oecussi	Nitibe	4,753	7,058	48.5
	Oesilo	5,922	7,296	23.2
	Pante Makassar	10,698	17,034	59.2
	Passabe	4,379	5,722	30.7
Viqueque	Viqueque	14,665	17,986	22.6
	Uatolari	13,911	14,683	5.5
Totals		610,270	555,350

Sources: 1970: Repartição Provincial dos Serviços de Estatistica. 1972, "Recenseamento Geral da População e da Habitação (as 0 horas de 30 de Dezembro de 1970)." [Provincial Statistics services 1972, General "census of the population and dwellings" (as at 12:00 December 30 1970] Lisbon (unpublished report).
1980: Biro Pusat Statistik, Penduduk Propinsi Timor Timur 1980: Hasil Pencacahan Lengkap, Kantor Statistik Propinsi Timor Timur, SP80-54.2, 1980. The Central Bureau of Statistics, The population of East Timor 1980: Results of Census Survey, Statistics Office of East Timor, SP80-54.2 1980.

Relocation after resettlement: some examples

280. To better understand the nature and impact of forced population movements in the 1980s, the Commission conducted research to document people's experience of relocation and its consequences. The Commission believes these relocations were not organised in a way which guaranteed the protection of life. The basic needs of the affected people were not met, particularly during the transition period before the relocated population could support itself.

Natar Ulun (Vemasse, Baucau)

281. In 1979 or 1980, the people of Caicua and other aldeias in the hills behind the town of Vemasse were forced to move to Natar Ulun, three kilometres outside Vemasse. Because of Caicua's isolation (there was no road connecting Caicua and Vemasse), Indonesian patrols had difficulty in gaining access to the area. Manuel Alves Moreira told the Commission that the Indonesian military believed that the people of Caicua were supporting Fretilin/Falintil and that some had fled to the forest to join the Resistance.

282. Sixty-nine families were forced to move. They were made to dismantle their houses and pack all their possessions. Their agricultural plots were razed to ensure that

Falintil forces did not take their crops. With their meagre possessions on their backs, the families were forced by the soldiers to walk through mountainous country to their new location, Natar Ulun. The move took three days.[252]

283. On arrival their movements were limited to the immediate area. They experienced hunger and sickness due to this restriction. Manuel Alves Moreira recalls that during the first year between 2 and 5 people died every day of hunger, malaria, cholera and tuberculosis. In 1980 CRS and the ICRC began to provide relief aid. At the same time the Indonesian military began to allow the community more freedom to go beyond the new village to farm. However, their movements were still under strict control. They were required to obtain special permits (surat jalan) if they wished to move outside the village, and to report in on their return (wajib lapor). The situation improved with the opening of access to agricultural land, but the strict permit controls continued until 1988.[253]

Laclo (Laclo, Manatuto)

284. After fleeing to the mountains of Hatu Konan during the invasion, the people of Laclo were driven out of the mountains by repeated bombing and surrendered in Ilimano (Uma Kaduak, Laclo) in July 1978. They were brought to the camp in Metinaro (Dili) where 40,000 people who had surrendered were being held. Manuel Carceres da Costa told the Commission that he was eventually allowed to move back to the town of Laclo in August 1979. The move back was not easy. First only the men could go, and only as far as the bridge near Manatuto where they stayed for a month. Then the soldiers took the men to Laclo where they built barracks to live in. The women followed in October. Soldiers from Battalion 405 guarded the community for three months. The ground in the town is stony and hard, but the soldiers would not allow the people to go to their old gardens outside town. During this time the people went hungry and many died due to hunger and illness. Manuel Carceres told the Commission that there were deaths every day during this period, and that only in early 1980 did the soldiers give people freedom to go out to make gardens:

> During the three months we were held in a "concentration camp", around 300 residents of Hatu Konan perished. Only after many people had died did the Indonesian military began telling people to go home. By then there were only 400 of us left.[254]

Lacluta (Viqueque)

285. José Andrade dos Santos gave evidence to the Commission about the forced displacement of the people of the village of Ahic (Lacluta, Viqueque) at the foot of Mount Laline in 1980. As already noted, people from Viqueque, Manatuto, Manufahi, Baucau, Ainaro and Dili had been concentrated in the town of Lacluta after surrender. Under instructions from the Sub-district administrator (Camat) of Lacluta and soldiers from Battalion 745, the population of Ahic and other villages in the sub-district were moved to Rade Uma (Dilor, Viqueque).

286. In their testimony to the Commission the community of Ahic described their treatment after the move as much the same as it had been when they were still in the town of Lacluta. Women continued to be subject to rape and "forced marriages" by members of the Indonesian military. People who had held positions in Fretilin and former Falintil soldiers continued to be subjected to regular interrogation and ill-treatment. All males over the age of 15 were forced to perform nightly patrols, and if they failed to do so were subjected to such punishments as having to walk on hot ashes and lie in dirty water for several hours. At least one person, Carlos from the aldeia of Halimean, was killed by ABRI. Another, Mario Lopes, also from Halimean, was taken to Baucau and disappeared. The men also had to do forced labour. They built six public buildings without pay, including a clinic and houses for the Sub-district military command (Koramil) and government officials. They were made to work on the water system for one month. The distribution of food, blankets and medicine by the ICRC in 1980 helped improve living conditions, but restrictions on movement one kilometre beyond the village continued, making it difficult to carry out routine tasks essential to making a livelihood, such as cultivating gardens, cutting sago palm and tending buffaloes.[255]

287. In 1982 the people of Uma Tolu, another village in the sub-district of Lacluta, who had also been resettled in Dilor, were forced to move to Uma Lor in the village of Luca (Viqueque, Viqueque). The reason given for the move was to "facilitate ABRI control of the area".[256] The operation was led by the head of the military, the head of police, and other officials of the sub-district of Lacluta.[257]

Weberek, Weto (Alas, Manufahi)

288. The people from the villages of Fahinehan, Bubususu and Caicasa (Fatuberliu, Manufahi) were forced to move in 1981 to a new location called Weberek, in the aldeia of Oeto (Dotik, Alas, Manufahi), because they were suspected of providing food and support to Falintil. They were made to leave their agricultural plots, which were burned and destroyed by Indonesian soldiers to prevent Falintil from harvesting the abandoned food sources. As mountain people who had originally lived in a fertile area, the villagers found it difficult to adjust to living in the hot swampy lowlands. Sebastião Magalhães told the Commission: "During these moves many people died because they could not cope with the heat and the hunger."[258]

289. The Indonesian military provided only tarpaulins for shelter and insufficient rations of poor quality corn and rice for emergency consumption. During the first year and a half the people living in Weberek suffered from malnutrition, malaria, cholera and tuberculosis. It was only after the arrival of the ICRC in the middle of 1982 that the situation improved. The Indonesian military began to allow villagers to return to their fertile agricultural plots to plant food during the rainy season, but in 1983 they were moved back to Weto and their agricultural plots were destroyed for the second time. This situation continued until the 1990s when some people returned to their original homes. Others moved to sites established by the Indonesian government under its "local transmigration" programme in the newly-established sub-district of Weilaluhu.[259]

Gleno (Ermera, Ermera)

290. Gleno was a new township, created to replace Ermera Town as the district capital. It was built on the riverflats several kilometres north of Ermera Town. Gabriel Ximenes told the Commission that he had been moved to a resettlement camp in Ermera Town with his family after surrendering in Fatubessi in February 1979. Shortly after the family had been allowed to return to their home in Ermera, Indonesian soldiers took him and about a hundred other men from Ermera Town and the nearby village of Ponilala. Their families stayed behind in Ermera Town. The military forced them to start clearing the uninhabited area that later became Gleno Town. Every day they were ordered to clear vegetation from a fixed area. If they failed to meet their daily quota they were punished by being tortured. Gabriel Ximenes said that the soldiers killed three men who were too ill to work. They worked on the construction of the new town for four years. They had no time to make gardens, and ate their meals at the ABRI posts. In 1983, once the work was finished, ABRI no longer fed the men. Nor did they permit them to return to Ermera Town. Instead, their families came down to Gleno. The men still had not been able to make gardens and with the arrival of the families, there was starvation and some people died. Only in 1985 did the military allow them to move about freely. Gabriel Ximenes became a successful coffee trader.[260]

291. The Commission received many other accounts of forced displacement where isolated communities were made to move by the Indonesian military for security reasons. In the table below a selection of accounts from community discussions is summarised.

Table 11: A selection of accounts of forced displacement of communities

Source	Location and Date	Description
CAVR Community Profile	Rotutu, Same, Manufahi 1981	About 800 people from the village of Rotutu were forcibly moved by ABRI to Raifusa (Alas, Manufahi), Ataúro and Aileu because they were suspected of being in contact with Falintil in the forest.
CAVR Community Profile	Caicasa, Fatuberliu, Manufahi 1981	The people of the village of Caicasa were forcibly moved by ABRI to Welaluhu. Many died of malaria and hunger, and eventually the people were moved back to Fatuberliu.
CAVR Community Profile	Soibada, Manatuto 1982	F58, the deputy governor, and ABRI forced about 57 families from Soibada to move to the village of Manehat to build ABRI posts there.
CAVR Community Profile	Fatisi, Laulara, Aileu 1984	The people of the village of Fatisi were forcibly moved, some being taken to Dili and some to Aileu Town, because the village was suspected of being a Falintil base. As a result of the forcible transfer, the village was uninhabited between 1984 and 1990.

Retaliatory internment and collective punishment: Ataúro and other internment camps

292. Uprisings (levantamentos) against the Indonesian military in the 1980s precipitated an Indonesian military response that produced a new form of internment. People taken to the camps included those who were directly involved in the uprisings, although most of them fled to the mountains immediately after the attacks. A large number of the detainees were relatives of those who had attacked the military posts. Often entire villages bore the brunt of the Indonesian retaliation, making their internment a form of collective punishment. The interrogation and torture of people involved in the attacks (and sometimes their relatives) was brutal and protracted, and often ended in death (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

Ataúro internments

293. The most notorious and the largest of these internment camps was the island of Ataúro (Dili). The Commission received evidence from a wide variety of sources on the number of people held on Ataúro at different times. It has concluded that the displaced and detainee population of the island peaked around September 1982 at just over 4,000, although various sources have put the figure much higher and cumulatively the number of people transported to Ataúro between 1980 and 1984 may well have exceeded 6,000.*

Displacement to Ataúro, 1974–1999

Source: Narrative statements given to CAVR

* The data given in Amnesty International, East Timor: Violations of Human Rights (p. 71), based on a variety of public and confidential sources, show the number of people held on Ataúro at different times between mid-1980 and late 1984. Higher estimates from a number of other sources ranged between 5,000 and 9,670, but these may have been estimates of the cumulative total [see CAVR Interview with Faustino Gomes da Sousa, Ataúro, Dili 1- November 2003; Ceu Lopes Federer, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003; and CAVR Interview with Luis da Costa Soares, Letefoho, Same, Manufahi, 23 February 2003].

294. Internment on the island of Ataúro was a unique case. Because of its isolation from the mainland, it did not require the tight security measures imposed in the resettlement camps and relocation villages discussed above.* Ataúro served a dual role as internment camp for families of Resistance fighters and detention for individuals directly involved in the Resistance (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment). No clear or consistent reasons for these forced relocations were given by authorities. No judicial or formal administrative process to support the internments were in evidence. Instead, the majority of those transported to Ataúro were generally people, including women and children, who had been picked up in large groups after attacks on military posts by the Resistance or as part of military operations intended to eliminate the Resistance. By contrast the number of people who were arrested as active members of the clandestine movement and transported to Ataúro was relatively small.†

Forced displacement, internment or detention?

The people who were rounded up and brought against their will to the island of Ataúro used different terms to describe their experience. Some said that they were in exile on Ataúro. Others said they were detained or imprisoned there.

Human rights principles and international humanitarian law prohibit the arbitrary transfer of civilians. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights clearly states that everyone has the right to liberty of movement and freedom to choose his or her residence.[261] The UN Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement provide that every person has the right to be protected against arbitrary displacement from his or her home, including in situations of armed conflict.[262] Where people do suffer displacement, authorities must ensure their well-being including their access to food, water, shelter and medical services.[263]

Article 49 of the Geneva Convention IV prohibits an occupying power from carrying out individual or mass forcible transfers or deportations of the population.[264] Internment of civilians can take place under special conditions. Article 78 of Geneva Convention IV

* The island of Ataúro was used as a prison island during the Portuguese colonial period. According to Vasco Lopes da Silva, in 1937 dissidents from Portugal and its colonies began to be exiled to Ataúro. After the Portuguese regained control of Timor at the end of the Second World War, many Timorese were sent to Ataúro for alleged collaboration with the Japanese.

† One example is Marito Nicolau dos Reis, who was arrested in December 1980 with other members of a clandestine group operating in Ostico, Baucau, and sent to Ataúro for four months [CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Baucau, 17 November 2002]. Another is Adelino Soares, who was one of a group of nine members of a clandestine cell arrested in March 1982 in Uatolari, Viqueque who were sent to Ataúro in May 1982 [CAVR Interview with Adelino Soares, Viqueque Town, 27 October 2003]. At least by March 1984, the Indonesian authorities seem to accept that those held on Ataúro comprised distinct groups. At that time detainees were classified as "detainees", "former detainees" and "displaced persons" with the majority falling into the last category [Amnesty International, East Timor: Violations of Human Rights, 1985, pp. 65-66].

states that decisions on internment have to be made according to a specified procedure, which includes the right of appeal for all parties involved and to have rulings regularly reviewed.

Ataúro internments: 1980

295. The former prisoners of Ataúro told the Commission that forced displacement to Ataúro was organised in waves.[265] The first wave took place on 10 July* and 3 September 1980, moving those allegedly involved in the guerrilla attack on the Marabia radio and television station and the Battalion 744 barracks in Becora, Dili on 10 June 1980. Bernardino Villanova described his experience to the Commission during its National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment:

> On 10 June 1980, I took part in the attack on Marabia. I was the Falintil contact in Lorosae region. First we attacked the Gedung Negara Lahane (Lahane Government Building), then we continued to the television tower in Marabia. The aim of the attack was to show that Fretilin still existed. On 11 June I was taken to the Kodim. I was told to go home, but then I was called back again. I hid in a church. But in the church there were members of the intelligence and I was taken again on 12 June.
>
> [Recalling his detention and torture in Mes Korem, Kartika Sari (SGI headquarters in Colmera) and Comarca Balide]
>
> On 3 September 1980 I was put in a black car at midnight and taken to Tacitolu. I didn't know where I was being taken. From Tacitolu a navy ship took us to Ataúro. The first group included Commander Nahak and his family. In the second group there was me and 13 other people including Custódio, Tarzizu, Alfredo, Geraldo, Vicente Simões, Domingos Santos, Domingos Santos from Becora, Bernadino from Lacoto. In the third group were José Soares Guterres and Maria Fatima. There weren't many in the second group, so we stayed with the locals. We were told to live near the Koramil.
>
> In Ataúro I moved freely but I had no contact with my family. We received very mouldy corn. Each family received equal rations, regardless of its size. The people of Ataúro shared their soil with us, even though they were also hungry. We...helped them by working in their fields and received part of the harvest. People also gave us land to work on. I was forced, with the 13 others involved in Marabia case, to work the fields in Beloi which were not very fertile. Armed soldiers kept us under guard. In 1983 I was declared

* Casimiro Suriano da Silva gave evidence to the Commission about the detention and forced displacement of his family and others, a total of 9 persons, after his son was implicated in the Marabia incident in 1980 [HRVD Statement 01498].

"free" but there was still a very long rope tying me. I decided that I would stay on Ataúro.[266]

Ataúro internments: 1981

296. In 1981 another wave of mass transfers occurred, mainly of people from the eastern districts of Baucau, Viqueque and Lautém. Most of these people were transferred during August–November 1981. It therefore partly overlapped with Operation Kikis, the "fence of legs" operation in which 60,000 civilian East Timorese civilians were mobilised to converge on Falintil (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict). The transportation of people to Ataúro appears to have been part of an overall strategy for destroying the Resistance by eliminating its fighting forces through Operation Kikis and removing its support base by sending them into exile on Ataúro.

297. The Commission received evidence that around 300 families were moved to Ataúro from the 15 villages in the sub-district of Quelicai (Baucau) alone.[267] One person in this group was Joana Pereira. Having lost her parents to hunger and disease in 1978 while the family was living in the mountains, Joana Pereira was forcibly moved to Ataúro from her village of Laculio (Quelicai, Baucau). She described to the Commission her and her brother's experience as orphans brought to the island:

On 29 August 1981, the Koramil commander said: "Those who still have family members in the forest will be punished." He then made a list. After a couple of days I saw lists of names that were put on the board in front of the village office. By then I knew that we would be imprisoned on Ataúro. I was only 13 years old, and my brother Mateus Pereira was only 9 years old. We were to be imprisoned on Ataúro because our brother Pascoal Pereira (Nixon) was still in the forest. On 30 August 1981, the Koramil [commander] of Quelicai forced us, under tight guard, onto four military trucks and brought us to the port in Laga (Baucau). We stayed there for a day and a night. Then we were brought to Dili in a warship numbered 502. On this ship there were other families from Seiçal, Buibau, Quelicai and Laga.

When we arrived in Dili, ABRI soldiers gave us some food in buckets. I made Mateus take some for both of us, since we had not eaten… on 1 September, we were boarded on another warship, number 511. We left at 8.00am and arrived around 12.00 noon. When we disembarked at the Ataúro port, the Ataúro Koramil commander and other prisoners who had arrived earlier greeted us… the Koramil [commander] of Ataúro made us stand in line, and our names were listed one by one. After that we were brought to our prison. When we got there, my brother and I were separated. I don't know why, but he lived in Barracks Number 22 together with 60 other people and I lived with 70 other people in Barracks Number 24. We were put in barracks with nothing in them. There was a zinc roof and the walls were made of tarpaulin. There were no beds. In the beginning we were given no food by the military. Mateus and I only ate the food we brought from Quelicai. One month later we received an allocation of three small tins of maize from a soldier. Each family received this much once every fortnight.

These conditions caused famine. Many people from Lospalos and Viqueque died. Between two and five people died every day, especially small children and old women and men.[268]

298. Hermenegildo da Cruz was a member of the Indonesian district parliament [DPRD II] in Viqueque and the liurai of Ossu (Viqueque). He described to the Commission a ceremony in 1981 to send off 700 families to Ataúro from villages in the sub-districts of Viqueque, Ossu, Uatolari, Uato Carbau, and Lacluta (all Viqueque), and Barique (Manatuto). The deportees to be were gathered in a soccer field for the ceremony, which was attended by the sub-regional military commander (Danrem), the head of the provincial parliament (DPRD I), the district administrator (Bupati) of Viqueque, his deputy (the Sekwilda), the district military commander (Dandim), and other military and civilian officials. The Danrem explained to Hermenegildo da Cruz that although 700 families were to be moved to Ataúro, only about 32 families had strong connections to Fretilin/Falintil. Hermenegildo recalled that the Sub-district administrator (Camat) of Lacluta, Antonio Vicente Marques Soares, intervened during the ceremony and succeeded in preventing the people from Lacluta being moved to Ataúro. He told the Commission of the plight of those who were interned on Ataúro:

Many of those people from Viqueque died on Ataúro due to the hunger, disease and change in climate. Old people and children died every day, until the ICRC were finally able to provide assistance in 1982. In 1985 and 1986 people began to return to Viqueque, although many chose to stay elsewhere.[269]

The Kablaki uprising

299. After the 20 August 1982 uprising in the Kablaki area, more than 600 people from Mau Chiga, Dare, Nunumoge, Mulo and Hato Builico (in Ainaro) and Rotutu (in Manufahi) were brought to Ataúro.

300. Abilio dos Santos, from Mau Chiga, was detained by the Indonesian military on 10 July 1982 after he attended a secret meeting to organise the uprising. Despite his capture with 15 others, the uprising still took place. In retaliation, Indonesian forces destroyed Mau Chiga, burning all the houses, food stores and killing all livestock. The whole village of Mau Chiga was evacuated. Some were killed in Builico, others were detained in Dare, Dotik, Ainaro and Ataúro (see Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment and Part 7.7: Sexual Violence).

301. Abilio dos Santos was among those brought to Ataúro. He and 14 of the 15 who had been arrested in July were taken to the Balide Prison in Dili on 29 August 1982 by the Indonesian military. The other member of the group, Ernesto, had been shot dead shortly after their arrest.[270] Two days later, at three in the morning, they were taken to the Dili port. There they were told:

> The state is not punishing you. The state must evacuate you because your area is not secure. If the people of Dare and Mau Chiga stay in their villages, and there is an Indonesian soldier or Hansip killed, then you would be killed. That is why we are taking you to Ataúro now.[271]

302. The Commission has received a list of 373 names of people from the village of Mau Chiga who were forcibly displaced to the island of Ataúro in 1982, including 73 people who died on the island between 1982 and 1987.*

Conditions on Ataúro

303. People were held on the barren island in makeshift bare barracks in overcrowded and unhygienic conditions. Plaçido Lisboa was forcibly moved from Viqueque to Ataúro on 15 November 1981. He described the living conditions:

> There were two settlements at that time. One barracks was 12 by 6 metres, for one Neigbourhood Unit (Rukun Tetangga, RT) of 80 to 90 families. There were usually six rooms in one barracks, and each room had six families. There were 45 barracks on Ataúro. Between the church in Vila and the junior secondary school (SMP) there were 32 barracks; from the market to the end of the road, 13 more barracks. The reason we were moved [there] was to be "secured", so we wouldn't support people in the mountains.[272]

304. There was little food or fresh water, and starving internees were forced to survive on what wild roots and fruits they could collect around the camp or beg or steal from the local community. They also collected small fish and shellfish on the beach at low tide. According to witnesses, Indonesian officials distributed corn to each family, but the amount and quality was not sufficient for survival.[273] According to Adelino Soares, who later became the local health coordinator of the ICRC's aid programme, between 300 and 350 people died in the early years of their time in Ataúro, before the arrival of aid from the ICRC in 1982.† This was confirmed by Faustino Gomes de Sousa, a native of Ataúro and currently the village head in Vila (Ataúro, Dili), who as a child witnessed the situation of the deportees:

> I remember seeing 5 to 6 children dying every day from diarrhoea. They were all buried at the back of the barracks. There used to be gravestones to mark their graves but a flood and landslide in 1998 washed all the graves away.[274]

* Submission to CAVR, List of victims from Mau Chiga. The people of Mau Chiga were also forcibly moved to Dare (Hatu-Builico, Ainaro), Dotik (Manufahi).

† CAVR Interview with Adelino Soares, Vila, Ataúro, Dili, 7 March 2002. Corroboration from Rui de Araújo who cites 319 deaths in Ataúro in CAVR Interview with Rui de Araújo, Maumeta Ataúro Dili 27 October 2003.

305. Ceu Lopes Federer, another local from the island of Ataúro, also joined the ICRC effort to assist the internees. She described the living conditions in the barracks, where each room housed 5 to ten families. An outbreak of cholera resulted in scores of children and adults dying. She told the Commission:

> The little children were dying like ants, like flies. The mothers would call out to their [dead] children through the night. Some wanted to kill themselves, going out of their minds, their breasts full of milk.[275]

306. Luis da Costa Soares was a carpenter and member of the clandestine movement, working in the area of Tutuluro (Same and Ainaro). In 1982, after the 20 August uprising in Mau Chiga, he was detained and eventually brought to Ataúro. His transfer from Manufahi was handled by the district military command (Kodim) in Same and provincial military command (Korem) in Dili. He told the Commission:

> The situation on the island of Ataúro was very difficult, particularly for those from eastern areas such as Baucau and Viqueque, and Lospalos [and also those from] Dili, Aileu, Ainaro and Manatuto Districts. Many died, mostly children and old people. Five to six people died a day. There was hunger, mental depression and malnutrition. People were traumatised… This situation continued for about one year, until the arrival of the ICRC [when] the deaths began to decrease.[276]

Civilian detainees

307. The majority of people brought to Ataúro were not political detainees, nor were they armed Resistance fighters. For the most part the people who found themselves on Ataúro were ordinary villagers from areas where Fretilin/Falintil was considered to be active. "Separating the fish from the water" was a phrase often used by Indonesian military authorities to explain the strategy of mass removal of the population.[277] The following table presents a selection of testimonies given to the Commission by survivors of the Ataúro island prison camp:

Table 12: A selection of testimonies of survivors of Ataúro

Source	Name and Location	Description
HRVD 00047	An East Timorese man Dili	In June 1980, after the Marabia incident, the deponent was captured by Battalion 744 soldiers, along with two women. They were brought to Ataúro and placed under the control of the Koramil commander, Suryana. The two women were sexually violated by soldiers at the Koramil. The deponent cited 5,000 detainees in Ataúro. Many died of hunger and lack of medicine.
HRVD 05668	Paulo Soares, Viqueque, Viqueque	Paulo Soares, with four others (Builou, Gamalu'u, Lorenço Soares and Lorenço) were captured by the intelligence section (Kasi 1) of the Viqueque Kodim and brought to Ataúro. They experienced hunger every day on Ataúro, eating only sago and corn from the church. There was not enough food for all those brought to Ataúro. Lorenço died from hunger and lack of medicine.

Source	Name and Location	Description
HRVD 06489	Maria Soares, Ailili, Manututo, Manatuto	Maria Soares and her cousin, Juliana Soares, were arrested by Hansip at their home in Malarahun. They were detained at the Manatuto Kodim for two nights then brought to the Dili port. The following day they were transported to Ataúro where they stayed for 4 years. The reason was because her three sons remained in the forest with Falintil forces. She suffered from lack of food during her time in Ataúro.
HRVD 04801	Evalina de Jesus, Daisua, Same, Manufahi	Because her son Alexandrino Buti Bere did not surrender with her and her family, Evalina together with her husband, César Doutel Sarmento, and other members of her family were brought to Ataúro. The military alleged that she and her family were supplying food to Falintil. They were interned on Ataúro for four years.
HRVD 07503	Olinda Cabral Matahoi, Uatolari, Viqueque	Based on an order from the local liurai, F56, Olinda was told to prepare for her family to be moved to Ataúro. She, her parents (José Sarmento and Lourença) and other family members travelled to Viqueque to report to the liurai. They were forcibly moved to Ataúro. There both her parents died from illness. She was in Ataúro for five years before she was returned to her village in Uatolari.
HRVD 08717	Sebastiana Soares, Aiteas, Manatuto, Manatuto	Because her husband was a Falintil soldier in the forest, Sebastiana Soares was taken from her village in Hirileun and brought to the Manatuto Kodim. She was transferred to Ataúro where she stayed for three years. She was released in 1984.
HRVD 00039	RL, Viqueque, Viqueque	On 28 August 1983 RL, along with 98 others was forcibly moved to Ataúro by members of the Viqueque Kodim. On arrival on Ataúro, they were interrogated by members of the Kopassandha (Special Forces), being made to walk on their knees on the ground covered with soybeans and cow dung. They were tied up and given electric shocks. Domingos Boek was taken out and disappeared. In Viqueque, during the time he was detained on Ataúro, RL's wife was subjected to sexual violations by an Indonesian soldier.
HRVD 00076	An East Timorese man Lahane, Dili	After one year of detention in the Balide Prison, 46 detainees were taken to Ataúro on 5 September 1981. They received one can of corn per week. Malequias and many others died there from lack of food. There was some improvement after the arrival of ICRC in 1982. The survivors of this group were released in 1984 and returned home.
CAVR Community Profile[278]	Vemasse, Baucau	Forty people from Vemasse Sub-district were displaced to Ataúro because they were suspected of being supporters of Fretilin
CAVR Community Profile[279]	Eraulo, Samalete, Railaco, Ermera	The people of the aldeia of Eraulo were forcibly displaced by ABRI to Ataúro in 1992 because they were said to have family members in the forest. After two months on Ataúro, three died of starvation.

Leaving Ataúro – but not always returning home

308. The ICRC's humanitarian aid programmes that began in 1982 alleviated much of the immediate suffering. Witnesses speak of a slow decrease of the number of deaths due to the regular distribution of aid and provision of medical care. Conditions improved to the extent that the Indonesian authorities allowed international observers to visit the island in 1982, including journalists from Portugal and the former Prime Minister of Australia, Gough Whitlam.

309. According to statements received by the Commission in 1983, the Indonesian military began to return people in large numbers from Ataúro after pressure from the ICRC. As with their original deportation to the island, they were returned in groups. The first group to be returned were from Baucau. One year later, in 1984, the internees from Lautém were allowed to go home. People from Viqueque were returned between 1986 and 1987. Everyone else was returned by 1987 except for 17 families who chose to stay on Ataúro.[280]

310. The suffering of those who had been interned on Ataúro did not end with their release. Many of them experienced discrimination and hardship after their return. SL was a single mother whose husband was a Falintil soldier in the mountains. While in detention, but before being sent to Ataúro, she was raped. She and her two sons, then aged four and six, survived the hardships on Ataúro, and with the help of ICRC were returned home to Same. SL told the Commission:

> My husband and four of our children ran to the forest. I stayed behind with our other children. In 1981, during Operation Kikis in Aitana, I was detained in an ABRI post for seven months, with three other women. An Indonesian military commander raped me and a colleague of his raped my sister-in-law, even though she was pregnant at the time. They raped us for seven months… We were moved to the Same Kodim, then my children and I were moved to Ataúro…We were imprisoned on Ataúro for four years, seven months and seven days…on Ataúro it was terrible, there was no food. With the help of ICRC, we were returned to Same. But the people there would not accept us. They called us batar fuhuk (rotten corn). They said we were Fretilin and they wouldn't give us food.[281]

311. Ermelinda Nogueira was released from Ataúro with members of her family in 1982, where she had been sent because she had relatives who were fighting in the forest. She returned to her home in Maluro (Lore I, Maluro, Lautém). Not long after her release she was caught up in the backlash against the levantamentos of August 1983. Because she still had relatives in the forest she was brought to the ABRI post in Maluro with four of her children where she was interrogated and tortured for two days, including by being given electric shocks, hung upside down and beaten by the post commander. Soon after this two other members of her family were arrested and disappeared. Nine months later her husband, Carolino, was arrested and tortured by the local Babinsa by being beaten with a rifle butt on his face, head and chest. He was so badly injured as a result of this treatment that when the Babinsa summoned him again, he was unable to go. When Ermelinda Nogueira went in his place, the Babinsa threatened to kill her before releasing her.[282]

312. Others returned from Ataúro only to find that while they had been interned, relatives who had been fighting with Falintil had been killed or disappeared.[283]

313. Yet others were brought back to the mainland from Ataúro only to be relocated to another internment camp. The locations included Bonuk (Manufahi), Cailaco (Bobonaro) and Dare (Ainaro).

314. Among these new camps the one in Kale in the village of Purogua (Cailaco, Ermera) was used for the longest period.[284] For example, João Bosco from Bucoli (Baucau, Baucau) was detained by members of Kopassanda (Special Forces) in 1982. He was interrogated at the Hotel Flamboyan in the town of Baucau for three days, and then moved to a location in Fatumaca, then back again to the Hotel Flamboyan. He was then taken by military plane to Dili and detained at the Battalion 744 headquarters. After nine days, he was taken to Ataúro where he stayed for three years. In 1985, he was "released" but brought to Cailaco (Bobonaro). Three years later he was returned to his village with the assistance from the ICRC.[285]

315. Felijarda Florinda Pereira, Domingos da Silva, Natercia da Silva and Dircia Fatima Corsila were also relocated to Cailaco (Bobonaro) after their time in Ataúro. They stayed in Cailaco for another three years and finally returned to their village in Osso-Ala (Vemasse, Baucau) in 1986. They never saw their fathers or husbands again.[286]

Sexual violation and starvation in Bonuk (Ainaro)

316. For those brought to Bonuk from Ataúro the situation went from bad to worse. SL (from Hato Builico, Ainaro) was forcibly displaced to Ataúro in 1982 after her husband fled back to the mountains. She was there for two years and two months, during which time her eldest child died due to lack of medical care. From Ataúro she was brought to Bonuk. She was intimidated by soldiers from the local Koramil and raped by a Hansip. She became pregnant and had a child from the sexual violations she experienced.[287]

317. Mário de Araújo gave evidence to the Commission about his internment in Ataúro between 1982 and 1985 and subsequent removal to Bonuk. During the two months he was held in Bonuk he saw eight people die from hunger and malaria.[288]

318. Abilio dos Santos told the Commission how when he and about 30 others were being returned from Bonuk by truck, they were ordered to get down in an area called Mau-ulo III, near Builico in the town of Ainaro. There were some make-shift houses already prepared by the military, surrounded by Hansip guard posts. They lived there for one and a half months, without receiving any assistance except for a few hand-outs from the local priest.[289]

319. The people of Mau Chiga who had been interned on Ataúro were not returned to their original villages, but made to stay in the sub-district town of Dare (Hato Builico, Ainaro) where hundreds had already been displaced in the aftermath of the 20 August uprising in 1982. The sudden influx of people to Dare brought about another crisis in food security. They were finally allowed to return to their homes three years after their forced relocation to Dare.

Displacement, violence and hunger in Dare

Amelia de Jesus testified about her experiences during the three years she and many others from Mau Chiga were forcibly displaced in Dare after the Falintil attack of 20 August 1982. The following text is excerpted from her testimony to the Commission:

On 20 August 1982, the guerillas entered Mau Chiga and we helped them by giving them food. When Indonesian soldiers later came to our village they burned all the houses. My family and I hid in the caves, with 29 other people including children, women and men. We stayed there for about one week. My son, Bernadino Tilman, a teacher, was shot dead when he went down to Mau Chiga to look for food.

Four days later Hansip and the Indonesian military found us. They had brought gasoline to burn the grass. They asked: "Who told you to hide here? The people in the forest? Are Falintil hiding weapons here?" So finally I left the hiding place. They told us to leave all our belongings and food. Throughout the journey to Dare we were verbally abused.

We were taken to the primary school in Dare and they kept us there. When we got there, they took down our names and gave them to the Koramil. The name of the Koramil commander at the time was Rusu. While we were in the school, we were treated very harshly. I was there with my husband Alarico Tilman and two of my children Angelita da Silva (one-and-a-half years old) and Alexito Araújo (9 months old). At the end of August a Hansip, F40, stabbed my husband until he bled. Another Hansip, Paulo, a man from Mau Chiga who also happened to be our relative, helped us. He told them "don't hurt my uncle", and said that we had better give them something. So my husband gave a surik (traditional sword) and a tais (traditional woven cloth) to a soldier to save our family.

One night a group of Hansip forced their way in by breaking the door open. They ordered me to come out for questioning. I realised that they actually wanted to rape me. My husband said: "You go out, so you won't be killed." Indonesian soldiers came, their faces masked so that only their eyes were visible. They yelled: "Come out, come out." I held on to my husband's arms and didn't let go. They pulled my hair and hit me, but I didn't let go of my husband. They hit my head and back. I shouted: "Let us both die, but let my children live." So finally they gave up and left us.

While we were in the school, we had to find our own food. Every morning we were taken out to look for food.… They [Indonesian soldiers] followed carrying weapons.

During that time people died from two things: hunger and night-time interrogations. At night at the school, we weren't allowed to go out. We had to relieve ourselves in a can and clean it up in the morning. We slept on a cement floor stained with blood. The blood was from those who had been detained there earlier. So many people died. Some were burned alive. Some were thrown into the river. Hundreds from villages nearby were detained there. Every night they took women to rape them. They said "to get information," but actually they were raped. This was done to girls and mothers. They were called and raped in the forest near the school.

Then we were allowed to stay with my father in Dare. But every night, Hansips and the people were required to do night watch, including my husband. About three years later, people were returned from Dotik and Ataúro, causing another period of hunger in Dare. We weren't free to plant crops, and we had to have a travel pass if we wanted to go to Ainaro, Suai or Maubisse. Every time we worked the gardens, they [Indonesian soldiers] followed holding weapons. We remained hungry, because there wasn't enough land for such a dense population. We lived like this for three years.

Alternatives to internment on Ataúro: Raifusa and Dotik

320. In addition to places of detention in Dare, Ainaro, Aileu and Ataúro, inhabitants of the villages around Mau Chiga were also sent to Raifusa (Betano, Same, Manufahi) and Dotik (Alas, Manufahi) after the 20 August uprising. In some cases, after their release from Ataúro, detainees did not return to their place of origin, but instead joined those already in Dotik and Raifusa.

Dotik (Manufahi)

321. After the 20 August incident hundreds of villagers fled to Mount Kablaki in the hope of escaping the expected reprisals. They were eventually rounded up and detained at the Same Kodim and Koramil. From there they were eventually brought to Dotik, a village south of Alas on the southern coast of Manufahi.

322. Laurinda dos Santos, told the Commission how, when they heard of the Falintil attack, she and 95 other villagers fled to Mount Kablaki. They were pursued by Indonesian forces who shot one of them, Domingos Lobato, dead and captured the rest. They were detained in Same for one week, before being moved to Dotik.[290]

323. UL later joined those already in Dotik. She had managed to evade capture for three months, living with about 30 other families on the mountain. They were captured and brought to the Rotutu Koramil, then transferred to the Kodim in Same, where they were interrogated. She told the Commission that she was transported in a convoy of ten military trucks to Dotik. When they arrived there, there was no shelter for them. They had to stay in the houses already built by the internees, or build their own. UL told the Commission how she and two other young women in her family were frequently raped by soldiers during the three years that she was in Dotik.[291]

324. After being captured in November 1982 and held for one month in the Same Kodim, João de Araújo was reunited with his wife and children in Dotik. He described the living conditions there:

> We were just dumped there without being told where we should live. The village head gave us some land on which we built our homes. We were about 100 people, but so many died during this time from shortages of food and medicine. We were sick from mosquito bites. Initially we had no food to eat. Luckily some of the families already living there gave us some cassava and sago so we could survive for a few months. After a few months ABRI came and gave us agricultural tools so we could plant food.[292]

325. João de Araújo lived in Dotik for three years. Mário Viegas Carrascalão, then the provincial governor, visited the people in Dotik in 1984 and promised to secure their release. João de Araújo told the Commission that the Governor sent some food to them but the army swapped the rice for corn. In 1985 they were brought to the Dare Koramil where they lived for another two years, before being allowed to return to their homes in Mau Chiga.

326. While he was in Dotik, Januario de Araújo and others were ordered to go out and find a Falintil commander and his men, and was told that if they did not succeed, their families would be killed:

> *When we got to Rotutu, they took our machetes and did not return them until we reached this abandoned place called Dotik. We were given two weeks to build our own houses, or else we would be killed. We were given only two sacks of corn, which had the letters USAID written on it. Troops from Same guarded us. After two weeks we had built our homes and guard posts for the platoon. Forty-three men were ordered back to Same. There they were put in a dark cell for four nights and given a task of looking for people in the forest. If they succeeded in capturing Commander Sarmento and Pires then our families in Dotik would live. If not, they woud die. They spent two weeks in Kablaki but did not succeed.

327. Later people from Ainaro, who had been released from Ataúro, were brought to Dotik for a few months before being moved to Dare. Candida Pinto told the Commission that the group with which she returned from Ataúro was sent to Lafukar in Dotik (Alas, Manufahi) by the Ainaro Kodim, which refused to let them resettle in Mau Chiga:

* CAVR Interview with Januari de Araújo, Mau Chiga, Ainaro 4 June 2003; HRVD Statement 07200 [José Rosa de Araújo] corroborated the practice of forcibly recruiting civilians in operations to look for Falintil. He gave evidence of the killing of two civilians by ABRI during such operations.

[Lafukar] was completely uninhabited. Seventeen people died from lack of food during the three months of our stay there.[293]

Raifusa (Betano, Same, Manufahi)

328. The Commission was told that many of the people of Rotutu (Same, Manufahi) were forcibly displaced to Raifusa. This occurred as reprisal for a raid by local Hansip and Falintil on 20 August 1982, the same day as the attack on Mau Chiga, on the offices of the village Babinsa and Bimpolda in which a number of weapons had been taken.[294] People from Mau Chiga were also brought to Raifusa. Most of those displaced to Raifusa from Rotutu and Mau Chiga were brought there almost directly after the 20 August 1982 uprising, following a brief stop at the Same Kodim. A few were brought to Raifusa after years of internment on the island of Ataúro. As in Dotik the conditions in Raifusa were harsh. The Commission received statements from survivors describing their own suffering and the deaths of others during their internment in Raifusa.

329. An East Timorese man told the Commission how his family was forcibly displaced to Raifusa after a number of human rights violations including the rape of his wife by Hansip and the Babinsa, and the beating of a group of young men. According to the man:

There was a decision by ABRI that all the people of Rotutu were to be moved to Raifusa to make it easier for the authorities to control the population and prevent them from contacting Fretilin. We were hungry in the new location. Two of my family members, Paulo da Silva and Francelina dos Santos, died from lack of food and medicine.[295]

330. After the incident in Rotuto Domingos Melo, a member of Hansip who had not participated in the raid, was arrested and brought to the Same Kodim where he was detained for three months. While there he was beaten with a stick and his knee was stabbed with a knife. After being released he found that all the people of Rotutu had been moved to Raifusa. He joined them but found the living conditions in Raifusa very difficult. The people of Rotutu are mountain people and were unaccustomed to the coastal lowlands. One of the victims of the inhospitable environment was Domingos Melo's wife, Constantina Soares, who died there from disease.[296]

331. The vulnerability of those displaced to Raifusa is evident in a number of testimonies.

332. Armando Borsa also told the Commission how he and seven others were detained one week after being forcibly moved to Raifusa from their village in Rotutu. They were beaten and interrogated at Same Kodim, and finally released 11 days later, but only after giving their captors took traditional jewellery (belak) and a chicken.[297]

333. In 1982, the ICRC began to provide aid in Dotik and Raifusa. Saturnino Tilman was employed as a health worker in the malaria prevention programme. He remembers that even after ICRC began relief work in Raifusa, the mortality rate was still high. People died of tuberculosis, malaria, marasmus (beri-beri), diarrhoea and cholera.[298]

334. Joaquim da Silva and his wife, Alexandrina, were captured by Hansip in their home in Rotutu. They were brought to the Same Kodim where both were interrogated. Joaquim da Silva was released, but his wife and their children were sent to Ataúro for five years. On Ataúro their daughter, Frentelina da Silva, died. Alexandrina was eventually moved to Raifusa, with her two remaining children. Both children died in Raifusa from lack of food.[299]

335. Eventually the people displaced to Raifusa were allowed to return to their home villages in 1986. A number of families chose to continue to live in the government-supported local transmigration locations called SP1, SP2, SP3 in Colacau, Besusu and Dotik.[300] During the Commission's research in Raifusa, witnesses showed Commission staff a graveyard with approximately 800 gravestones which they believe is where the dead from Rotutu and Mau Chiga were buried.[301]

Lalarek Mutin (Viqueque)

336. In Kraras (Viqueque) on 8 August 1983, 14 Indonesian soldiers from the combat engineering battalion, Zipur 9, were killed in an uprising of Ratih, the village civil defence force. This incident brought about a protracted military response throughout the district of Viqueque that involved widespread detentions and mass executions (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). The people of Kraras who survived, most of whom were women, were moved to a new location called Lalerek Mutin.

337. The people of Kraras had already experienced forced displacement and its harsh consequences. They were originally from the village of Bibileo, which in 1970, at the time of the last Portuguese census had had a population of 3,000. The people of Bibileo fled to the mountains in the 1977 as the Indonesian forces advanced into their area. They surrendered in the town of Viqueque in 1979, and were in an area of the town called Beloi. According to José Gomes, restricted movements and lack of basic provisions caused 1 or 2 people to die each day in Beloi.[302] In 1980 they were about to move back to Bibileo, but at the last minute were moved to a new location called Kraras. Kraras was considerably more fertile than Bibileo, and the community were initially content to resumer their agricultural activities.

338. In testimony to the Commission, José Gomes described the background to the Ratih attack on 8 August 1983. The killing of seven civilians by soldiers from Battalion Zipur 4, including during the period of the ceasefire between Falintil and the Indonesian forces, and persistent cases of sexual violation and harassment had raised tensions in the village to the point where they exploded in the violence of 8 August. After the killings the population of Kraras fled to the villages of Luca, and Buikarin, to the town of Viqueque and into the mountains, knowing that the repercussions would be harsh.[303] The Commission received evidence about the series of massacres and mass executions that followed, including the massacre on 17 September 1983 in the area of Tahubein in the village of Buikarin, in which as many as 181 people are believed to have been killed (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

Creation of Lalerek Mutin

339. The survivors from the village of Kraras gathered together from Buikarin, Luca and Viqueque and moved to Lalerek Mutin (Luca), a previously uninhabited area due to its extremely hot, dry climate and infertile soil. On arrival in September 1983, they were ushered into make-shift barracks built by the military. Rita Amaral da Costa told the Commission:

> *There was no office, not even a house then. It was an empty place, just forest. Food was difficult to come by. No shelter. All our farming tools – our hoes, machetes and so on – had all been taken by ABRI. We were able to use only a broken old machete, which had been left there. We used it to cut the bushes and tall grass to clear new land. We built a simple garden hut for temporary shelter. For something to sleep on we cut branches and arranged them on the ground, then on top we placed spliced bamboo, and we slept on top of it. We looked for old fallen coconuts to eat. We'd split the coconuts with used tools. We used a pickaxe and the used machete in turns trying not to be detected. For the children we had to find food from sago trees. We would cut down a sago tree from morning until late at night, and would only manage to do one tree. We would first take the fresh part of the sago, boil and eat it. Then we would peel off the skin and cut it in small pieces to be dried, while waiting for the pounding tool (oro) to be made. After it was finished, we'd begin pounding and process it into flour, only then we'd be able to feed our children.*
>
> We were left for two months [not under the control of security apparatus]. Only then a Nanggala and several Hansip from Buikarin were assigned in Lalerek Mutin. It was then that ABRI began pressuring and forcing people to work on building the village of Lalerek Mutin. We were forced to cut and carry lumber, build houses, work the fields and do other such work. During the daytime we worked on village projects while at night we did night watches and guard duties around the village, both the men and the women.[304]

340. The new inhabitants of Lalerek Mutin were mainly women, children and elderly men. The able-bodied men had either been killed, had run to the mountains, or had disappeared.* The women of Lalerek Mutin spoke of the hardship they faced during the first years of their lives in Lalerek Mutin. They were made to do "men's work" – such as planting, constructing public buildings and taking part in security operations. At least four women became victims of sexual violence perpetrated by members of the Indonesian military (see Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence).

* Olinda Pinto Martins gave evidence to the Commission that 17 men were boarded on a truck, under the premise of fetching food from Kraras, never to be seen again. In the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict (28–29 April 2003), Beatriz Miranda Guterres spoke about her husband being recruited as a TBO and never to return. [Corroboration in HRVD Statement 00155. See also CAVR Interview with Honorio Soares de Gonzaga, Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque, 30 May 2003].

Extreme conditions

341. The residents of Lalerek Mutin lived in conditions of severe deprivation and close surveillance: no accessible source of clean water; strict security control of all movements; compulsory attendance at morning and afternoon roll-call; restricted communication with any persons from neighbouring villages; no medical care; and permits required for anyone wanting to travel more than 200 metres away from the village centre. The most severe deprivation was the lack of food. The people of Kraras came with no food, received none from the military, and had been left without agricultural tools.

342. Domingos Rangel was in school in Viqueque when the Kraras incident occurred. He and nine members of his family fled to the mountains, fearing retaliation from the army. After three months on Mount Bibileo, he and his family surrendered in Lacluta (Viqueque) where he witnessed his uncle being tortured under interrogation. A day later they were put on an army truck and taken to Lalerek Mutin. Domingos told the Commission:

> I remember four or five people dying every day. We just wrapped them in mats and buried them.[305]

Forced food destruction

343. One of the operations internees were forced to participate in was curlog, the Indonesian abbreviation for penghancuran logistik or destruction of all food sources. The curlog operations were organised by Chandrasa 7 Group 2, a Kopassandha unit (Special Forces). Soldiers and Hansip would go out with the people once or twice a week. Before going out, everyone was required to assemble and be counted. No one was allowed to walk alone. Wherever they found coconuts, bananas, papaya, breadfruit, jackfruit or other fruit trees, they would take all the fruit and then have to cut down the trees. The purpose was to deny Falintil access to food supplies. When they returned to the village, everyone had to assemble and be counted again. Some people did not mind doing this because it was an opportunity for them to go outside and find food. However, it also had the result that fruit trees were destroyed and these resources lost for the future.

344. In 1984 José Gomes, as the village head of Lalerek Mutin, was asked by the military to conduct a census of the village population. He counted approximately 1,300 people, many less than the 3,000 who had been living in Bibileo in 1970. He believes that more than 1,000 persons died between the events in Kraras and the census. The curlog operations only ended in December 1985 when the Chandrasa unit returned to Java. Around this time life in Lalerek Mutin began to improve as the people were able to resume their normal agricultural activities.[306]

345. Lalerek Mutin remained closed to outside help, and never received assistance from the ICRC or CRS. It was known, popularly, as the "village of widows". Access to Lalerek Mutin remained difficult even into the 1990s.

The uprisings in Lautém

346. Between 5 and 8 August 1983, hundreds of members of civil defence groups, including Wanra, Hansip, and other able-bodied men from the villages of Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém), Lore and Leuro (Lospalos, Lautém) and Serelau (Moro, Lautém), fled from their villages to join Falintil forces in the mountains. Many of the armed members of the civil defence groups carried their weapons with them into the forest. The villages from which the men fled were severely punished by the Indonesian army.[307] In response to the mass defection, Indonesian soldiers gathered all the women and others who were left behind. The people of the town of Tutuala (Tutuala, Lautém) recalled what happened:

> On 9 August 1983, the people of the aldeias of Loikero and Porlamano were forcibly moved from their homes by Indonesian soldiers from Territorial Units 515 and 641 and Commando Groups 1, 2 and 4, under the overall command of Second Lieutenant Toto (Airborne Infantry Battalion 100), to the elementary school and church buildings in Mehara. This was done to increase control by ABRI after the Mehara incident. Two people died from lack of food.[308]

347. An East Timorese woman told the Commission how she and the people of Mehara were loaded on to two military trucks and taken to Tutuala where they were interrogated about their contacts with Falintil.[309] Another East Timorese woman whose husband was among those who ran to the mountains, recounted how she and hundreds of women were made to gather all their belongings, including food and livestock, to be relocated in the village centre in Mehara. They were made to live there for two months.[310]

348. VL told the Commission about sexual violence committed against her by Indonesian soldiers from Infantry Battalion 100, about two months after the relocation:

> After two months the soldiers from Infantry Battalion 100 ordered all the women whose husbands had run off to the forest to assemble…After all the women had gathered, they said: "Everyone can go home except for VL and WL. They must stay and be examined"...[We] were taken to the ABRI Infantry Battalion 100 post…Then they started beating and stripping us... from 6.00pm until 1.00am. They hit us with wooden sticks, they kicked, stripped and threatened us with weapons, ordering us to confess. We did not confess to anything because we did not know anything. [T]hat night an army intelligence officer (Kasi I) started to interrogate me while pulling out my pubic hairs one at a time…I remained silent although I was in great pain. Because I did not confess they became increasingly angry and beat me until blood was coming out of my nose and mouth. Then at 1.00am they stopped torturing me.[311]

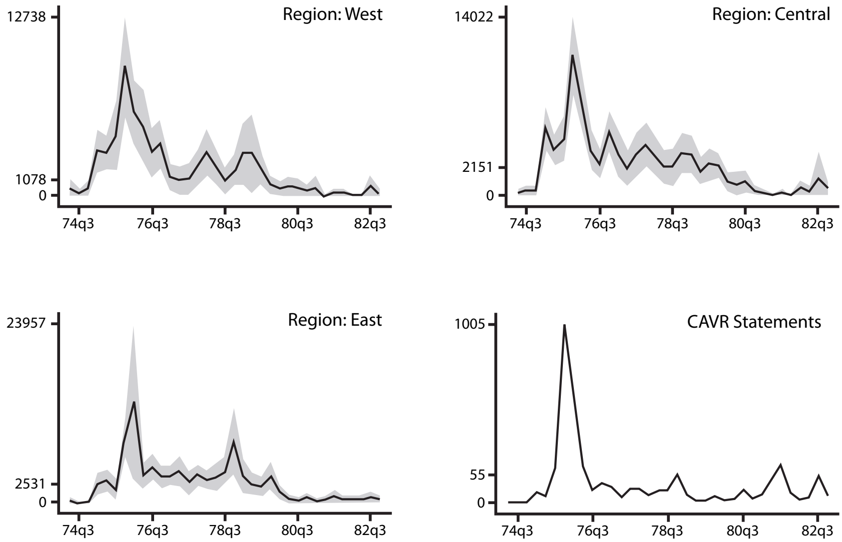
349. After the August incident, hundreds of people from the district of Lautém were moved to the island of Ataúro. Families from at least three villages in Iliomar, where a planned uprising had been prevented by divisions among the local Hansip, were forcibly removed to Ataúro. Gaspar Seixas, a community leader from the village of Iliomar (Iliomar, Lautém) told the Commission that about 300 families were rounded up and moved to Ataúro from the villages of Iliomar I and II. Fernando Amaral, from the village of Fuat (Iliomar, Lautém), recalled that 300 families were brought to Ataúro, in the aftermath of the August uprising.[312]

Displacement before and after the Popular Consultation, 1999

350. The fall from power of President Soeharto in May 1998 ushered in great changes in Indonesia and Timor-Leste. The demand for greater political freedom and democracy in Indonesia, known as Reformasi, was also taken up in Timor-Leste by the recently-formed CNRT, by students and youth, and by the broader East Timorese public. For the East Timorese, Reformasi opened up new horizons. As the Habibie Government began to define a new Indonesian position on Timor-Leste with its offer of a special status for the territory, these hopes quickened. Public demonstrations and debate put the Indonesian authorities on the defensive.



351. The most disturbing response of the Indonesian authorities to the new-found confidence of the independence movement was the formation, beginning in late 1998, of militia groups. These groups, ostensibly a spontaneous pro-integrationist backlash against the gathering momentum in favour of independence, were in fact the culmination of the Indonesian militarisation of East Timorese society (see Vol. I, Part 4.2: The Regime of Occupation: The Militarisation of East Timorese Society). By early 1999, soon after President Habibie had announced that the people of Timor-Leste could choose between continued integration with Indonesia and independence, well-armed militia groups had been formed in every district and had begun to terrorise the population. The proliferation of hand-made guns and modern weapons, in the hands of newly formed militia groups, fuelled a wave of violence. This began at the end of 1998, reached a peak in April 1999, tapered off between May and August during the months leading to the UN-supervised Popular Consultation, and culminated in the frenzy of violence and destruction that followed the announcement that the people of Timor-Leste had voted for independence.

352. The violence of the militia groups, often working openly with their TNI sponsors, resulted in human rights violations on a scale not seen since the late 1970s. Detentions, torture and ill-treatment, killings, sexual violence and forced recruitment all reached new peaks in 1999, as did displacement. During 1999 displacement occurred both as spontaneous flight from militia violence and intimidation, and as the organised movement of people from their homes and places where they had sought refuge. As in earlier years, displacement in all the variety of circumstances in which it occurred in 1999 had a severe impact on people's ability to feed themselves, especially as the Indonesian authorities made a concerted effort to deny them humanitarian assistance.

353. From the mobilisation of the first militia groups in late 1998, violence and intimidation by the militias caused people to flee their homes. In the early months of 1999 militia attacks on pro-independence communities in villages and the attempted forced recruitment of a largely unwilling population to militia ranks was already causing the internal displacement of many thousands of East Timorese, who sought refuge in what they supposed to be the safety of churches, urban Dili, Falintil strongholds and inaccessible mountain and forest areas. In April, as the UN-sponsored negotiations between Portugal and Indonesia in New York entered their final phase and rallies and inaugurations were held to consolidate the militia structure, militia violence and the displacements that were its by-product reached new heights. In the months of campaigning leading up to the ballot on 30 August, there was a reduction in the number of people displaced from their homes. However, the lull in both violence and displacements was relative. Militia and TNI intimidation continued during the campaign, and although many of the displaced returned to their home areas to register and vote, they often did not return to their actual homes but to places that they hoped would provide safety, such as the church in Suai. The paroxysm of violence that occurred after the ballot caused the displacement of the overwhelming majority of the population of Timor-Leste, both through the organised deportations to West Timor of about 250,000 East Timorese and the internal flight of most of the remainder of the population. Both forms of displacement were again accompanied by widespread human rights violations of other kinds, including detention, torture and ill-treatment, sexual violence and killing, on a massive scale.

Estimates of displacement in Timor-Leste in 1999

Source: Retrospective mortality survey, CAVR

Initial turbulence (November 1998–March 1999)

354. In June 1998, the newly appointed President Habibie launched the idea of "special autonomy" for Timor-Leste. Determined to see an internationally acceptable solution to the question of Timor-Leste, Habibie's Government entered into tripartite talks on this proposal with the UN and Portugal in August 1998. This initiative had major repercussions on the ground in Timor-Leste.

Table 13: Popular Consultation and civilian displacement: key dates and events

27 January 1999	President Habibie announces that the people of Timor-Leste will directly determine whether they will accept or reject Special Autonomy
11 March 1999	Agreement is reached between Portugal and Indonesia that the people of Timor-Leste will exercise their right to self-determination through a direct ballot
5 May 1999	A tripartite agreement between Indonesia, Portugal and the UN gives the UN responsibility for administering the Popular Consultation
1 June 1999	UNAMET arrives in Dili
16 July 1999	Voter registration begins
5 August 1999	Voter registration ends; 451,792 potential voters registered
14 August 1999	Campaigning begins

30 August 1999	Ballot day, 98.6% turn-out
4 September 1999	Results of the ballot announced, 21.5% in favour of autonomy within Indonesia, 78.5% against.
12 September 1999	Indonesia agrees to a multi-national force (Interfet) to restore order in the territory
20 September 1999	Interfet arrives in Timor-Leste

355. On 9 November 1998, Falintil forces attacked the Sub-district military headquarters (Koramil) in Alas (Manufahi). The attack resulted in the deaths of at least three Indonesian soldiers and nine Falintil soldiers and their supporters.[313] For more detail on the Alas incident see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment and Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances. The TNI launched a large-scale military operation in retaliation, attacking civilians and burning the homes of suspected independence supporters in the surrounding villages of Taitudak, Aituha (Alas, Manufahi), Manumera, and Lesu Ata (Turiscai, Manufahi).

356. The village head of Taitudak (Alas, Manufahi), Vicente Xavier, and the young men of the village ran off to the forest. A few days later they were discovered by soldiers from Airborne Infantry Battalion 744 and Vicente was shot dead. The troops ransacked people's homes, their food supplies and livestock.[314] Alcina Fernandes, the wife of Vicente Xavier, described to the Commission how she, along with others, sought refuge at the church:

> In November 1998 I heard gunshots. I ran to the house. But my husband, Vicente Xavier, had already fled. So I ran to the church with my baby, and my house was burned and all our belongings were looted and stolen. Our livestock, such as horses, cows and pigs, were killed. After this I sought shelter in the school building. While I was staying in the school, the wives of soldiers assigned there came by and verbally abused me every day. [One day] the food I was cooking on the stove was tipped over [by them].[315]

357. One account described how the Sub-district administrator (Camat) moved the people from the church to the local school. They were only allowed to return to their homes on 20 December 1998, more than one month after the incident.[316] An eyewitness, who was still a refugee in West Timor when the Commission took his statement, described the burning and looting:

> On 12 November 1998, Timorese members of the Koramil in Alas, F1, F2 and their men burned the houses of civilians in Kampung Lurin, Kulutetuk, Hasbot and Kampung Natarwen. As a result of the house burnings a number of traditional items and people's possessions were destroyed. The perpetrators also looted people's property. I witnessed the burning of the first house. All the residents were told to leave the houses and the village.[317]

358. In response to these widespread retaliatory attacks, some people ran to the forest.[318] Others sought safety in the relative anonymity of Dili. Luis Godinho Manuel da Costa, for example, told the Commission that after initially seeking refuge at the house of the local parish priest in the village of Liurai (Turiscai, Manufahi), he discovered the shallow grave of a local youth and fled to Dili until after the Popular Consultation.[319]

359. By early January 1999 people from other districts were also forced to flee violence and intimidation. The Commission received reports of violent incidents which led to the flight of civilians in January 1999. Some people remained displaced for the whole period of the Popular Consultation-related violence.[320] Most of the early reports of violence and displacement received by the Commission came from the district of Liquiçá.

Liquiçá

360. In Liquiçá, the newly formed Besi Merah Putih (BMP) militia were already active in early January 1999. Forced recruitment into the militia, particularly in the sub-district of Maubara, where the BMP had its headquarters, was one of the factors leading to displacement. An East Timorese man was abducted by five members of BMP militia in January 1999 in Maubara (Liquiçá). He was slapped, beaten and forced to "guard" the BMP post for the following nine months. After the Popular Consultation he was forcibly deported to Atambua. He was in West Timor for one year before he returned home.[321] Others fled their homes to avoid forced recruitment into the militia.[322]

361. The Commission received statements describing a BMP attack in Maubara on 19 January 1999, causing many to flee to villages in the mountains such as Leotela (Liquiçá, Liquiçá).[323]

362. Typically, those who were displaced in these early months stayed away from their homes until the arrival of Interfet in Timor-Leste in late September 1999. For example, on 16 February 1999, a local East Timorese BMP militia commander, F3, together with 35 militia men, captured Alarico Manuel and his family in Vatuboro (Maubara, Liquiçá). They were held and beaten at the local health centre, then moved to the agriculture department's housing complex in Cuico (Maubara, Liquiçá). BMP militia attacked Cuico four days later on 23 February 1999. Alarico ran to Dili and sought protection at the house of Manuel Carrascalão in Lecidere. Over 100 displaced persons were in this house when Aitarak and BMP militia attacked it on 17 April 1999.[324] Again, Alarico was detained in various places, this time by the Indonesian police. He was released by Interfet in Dili in late September.[325]

Deaths by deprivation in Liquiçá

363. Although the humanitarian consequences of displacement in 1999 were less severe than those of the displacement and famine of the late 1970s, the Commission received reports of death by deprivation related to these displacements. Augusta da Costa Freitas was pregnant when BMP militia attacked her village of Vatuvou (Maubara, Liquiçá). She fled with her husband Domingos and their children to Faulara in Leotala (Liquiçá). After two weeks, her husband contracted malaria. Physically exhausted and weak, with insufficient food and no access to medicine, Domingos died on 29 February 1999. Soon after, Augusta gave birth to her child. The baby died at the age of two weeks and four days.[326]

364. A similar story was related by Miguel dos Santos. When, on 15 February 1999, BMP militia began attacking the villages of Vatuvou and Cuico (Maubara, Liquiçá), a large number of people sought safety in the mountains and other places. Miguel ran away with his wife and their new-born baby to escape the violence. They hid in the Bikolo area near the Kaisavo River for 30 days. Living in very poor conditions, the five-week-old baby died. After burying their child, Miguel and his wife fled to Sare, Asulau (Hatolia, Ermera), which borders the sub-district of Maubara. Thousands of displaced people were already gathered there, and the family stayed there until the arrival of Interfet in late September 1999.[327]

365. Marcelino Utasulu told the Commission how he and his wife, Magdalena Marcal, fled to Asulau when his wife was three months pregnant. Magdelana died during childbirth on 3 June 1999. The new-born baby could not survive without his mother; and died six days after his birth.[328]

366. Security continued to deteriorate in the district of Liquiçá, culminating in the massacre on 6 April 1999 of those seeking refuge at the Liquiçá Church (see par. 379 and 459 below). The Commission received accounts of acts of violence by BMP militia against suspected pro-independence supporters in the district, forcing thousands to flee to the mountains and to cross the border into West Timor, even before April 1999.[329]

Viqueque

367. Two other districts which reported violence and displacement before April 1999 were Viqueque and Covalima. In this period the number of reported cases of violence leading to displacements occurring in Viqueque was exceeded only by the number reported from Liquiçá. The earliest incident was reported by Domingos Gomes. It occurred on 4 January 1999 when soldiers from Kodim Viqueque and the Team Makikit militia began firing into the air. The shooting continued for some hours, scaring people in the immediate vicinity to run into the forest. The shooting did not stop until the village-level military officer and the local parish priest, Father Francisco, intervened.[330]

368. The Commission also heard evidence about coordinated attacks by the Team Makikit and Naga Merah militias in a number of locations in Dilor (Lacluta, Viqueque) on 20 March 1999:

> On 20 March, after gathering at the TNI post in Dilor, in Lacluta Sub-district, newly-recruited militias attacked people in surrounding villages; beat and threatened alleged supporters of independence. Roughly 160 people were briefly detained at the Koramil in Dilor by TNI and [the Team] Makikit militia and an estimated 500 people from the area fled their homes in fear.[331]

369. The Commission received a report that 11 militia members assaulted an East Timorese man during March 1999, causing him to flee to the forests of Wefia Aitana. He returned home but was assaulted again on 17 and 19 April 1999 and fled to Kakae Uma.[332] The Commission also received a report that seven men fled to the mountains in Luca. They were eventually captured by a Babinsa and detained in the Koramil in Viqueque. They were released on 15 April and again ran to the forest.[333]

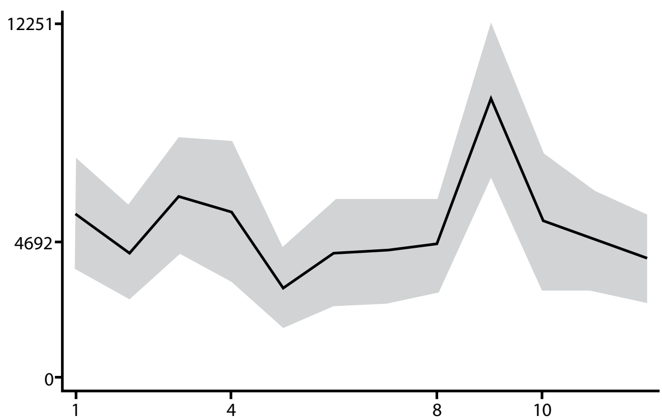
370. An East Timorese woman from the village of Dilor (Lacluta, Viqueque) described an attack on her house by Team Makikit militia on 20 March 1999. Failing to capture her son who had earlier fled to safety, the militia moved on to the house of another person thought to be a pro-independence supporter. However this person also escaped. The militia looted the family's possessions.[334]

371. The Commission also received a report that an East Timorese woman and her family fled their home in the village of Dilor (Lacluta, Viqueque) to Laline, after hearing that there would be an attack by Naga Merah militia. She was found by members of the Koramil who threatened her with weapons as they tried to extract information about the whereabouts of a family member who was active in the clandestine movement.[335]

372. The Commission received reports about the detention of three civil servants in Lacluta by Team Makikit, led by an East Timorese F4. After vowing to "eradicate civil servants known to be two-faced", F4 and about ten militia members sought the three men in their homes in Rade Uma, Dilor. They took Arthur to the Koramil headquarters in Lacluta, but allowed Filomeno and José Andrade to come unaccompanied the following morning. One of the men, who was wounded by an arrow that night by a Makikit militia member, F38, ran to the mountains with two of his friends. After asking for protection from the local priest and being detained for a short while, they fled to Dili.[336]

Covalima



373. In Covalima, the Avé Maria Church in Suai was already being occupied as a place of refuge as early as February 1999. The Mahidi militia, based in Cassa (Ainaro) had killed at least five civilians in Galitas (Quimaki, Zumalai, Covalima) on 25 January 1999.[337] While the Mahidi militia continued to operate in the sub-districts of Zumalai and Suai, the Laksaur militia, formed in early January 1999, began terrorising the population in Suai, Tilomar and other sub-districts of Covalima.

374. Maria Amaral told the Commission that in February 1999 F5, the East Timorese Sakunar militia leader, and his men threatened the residents of the housing complex in the village of Salele (Tilomar) who were thought to be pro-independence. She said that about 200 people sought refuge in the Suai Church. They stayed there until the ballot, and were joined later by thousands of others before the attack on the church on 6 September 1999.[338] By March the militia members had begun to focus their attention on the displaced people in the church, seeing them as supporters of independence. An East Timorese man told the Commission that when he was captured by Laksaur militia on 13 March 1999, he was told that he would be killed if he took refuge in the Avé Maria Church.[339] By March 1999, the climate of terror created by militia violence in the area meant that the mere accusation by police and TNI that villagers were supporters of independence was enough to cause them to flee in fear to the mountains or to the Avé Maria Church in Suai.[340] In the coming months, the church was to become an epicentre of militia and TNI intimidation and violence against the population who had fled their homes.

375. By the end of March, the problem of internal displacement was serious enough to warrant Dili-based NGOs to decide to develop a mechanism to distribute humanitarian aid.* In an activity report for the period of March to May 1999, the local NGOs listed a total of 12,073 internally displaced persons known to them at the time. They comprised 2,670 displaced to Dili from various districts and 9,403 displaced in other districts. The report gave a breakdown showing large concentrations of displaced people in specified locations: 2,753 people in Gariana (Vatuvou, Maubara, Liquiçá) displaced from the town of Maubara and Vatuvou Village; 375 people living with the Carmelite nuns in Lisadila (Maubara, Liquiçá); 3,033 people in Sare (Hatolia, Ermera), most from the neighbouring Maubara Sub-district; 2,753 at the church in Suai, most from Tilomar; and 489 in the town of Viqueque from neighbouring villages.[341]

First mass displacements, April 1999

Estimated numbers of households displaced in 1999

Source: Database statements given to CAVR

376. In March 1999, Indonesian and Portuguese ministerial-level negotiations in New York, facilitated by the United Nations, worked towards an agreement on the modalities to offer the East Timorese people a choice to accept or reject the Indonesian Government's offer of "wide-ranging autonomy". In the month of April, during the period leading up to the 5 May Agreements, there was an upsurge of violence that caused thousands of people to be displaced.

* The Emergency Secretariat (Posko) for Internally Displaced People was established on 27 March, 1999 by East Timorese NGOs, church organisations, volunteers and representatives from displaced communities after a disaster preparedness workshop held by Yayasan HAK in cooperation with Oxfam Australia. Its aim was to coordinate humanitarian aid by local NGOs as well as collect and disseminate information on internally displaced people (IDP's). Members included Yayasan HAK, Etadep, Caritas, Timor Aid, Yayasan Kasimo, Biahula, and Volunteers for Humanity (Jakarta).

377. Although there had been sporadic violence in the early months of 1999, inauguration ceremonies for militia from early April sparked organised waves of violence, especially in the western districts. The Commission received more than 120 statements from the districts of Liquiçá, Dili, Bobonaro, Ermera, Manufahi and Oecussi, describing incidents of violence leading to displacement in the month of April. Major human rights violations took place in Liquiçá, Cailaco (Bobonaro), and Dili (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

Liquiçá

378. In the district of Liquiçá the BMP militia began a campaign of violence on 5 April, when BMP militia from Maubara attacked the town of Liquiçá.[342] The attack left at least seven dead or disappeared and 150 houses burnt. More than a thousand people sought shelter at the main church and adjoining parish priest's residence in the town of Liquiçá.

379. BMP militia surrounded the church grounds the next day. After hours of tense negotiations during which police officers demanded that the parish priest surrender a CNRT leader, BMP militia with support from the Indonesian police and military attacked the church compound. Between 60 and 100 people were killed or disappeared during this attack[343] (see Vol. II, Part 7.2 Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances for detailed account of the Liquiçá Church Massacre).

380. The killing spree continued and spread to other areas in the district. Thousands of people fled to the mountains, including to Sare in the village of Asulau (Hatolia, Ermera), which was considered to be under Falintil control.[344] Some were forcibly displaced by the BMP and Indonesian military to Maubara and West Timor.[345]

381. The violence in the month of April in the district of Liquiçá did not end with the massacre at the church. Villagers were forced from their homes in Luculai, Loidahar and Darulete in Liquiçá Sub-district to the town of Liquiçá, where they were subjected to intimidation and abuse and pressured to support autonomy. Men were forced to join the militia groups or flee. People were also forced to fly the Indonesian flag, to build militia "guard posts", and participate in "night watch" patrols to search for and capture independence activists. Girls and young women were forced to attend parties where they had to dance for the militia.[346] In this context of violence and intimidation people continued to flee Liquiçá for their safety. Approximately 150 people fled to Dili, seeking refuge at the house of Manuel Carrascalão, a public figure from Liquiçá. Two weeks later they became victims of further militia violence, when militia groups attacked Manuel Carrascalão's house in Dili (see Dili, par. 399 below).

Bobonaro

382. On 8 April 1999, a large rally was held in Maliana, the capital of Bobonaro District, to announce the district inauguration of the United Front for Unity, Democracy and Justice (FPDK, Forum Persatuan Demokrasi dan Keadilan, a recently formed pro-autonomy political group with close links to the civil administration and the military)

of the militia groups in Timor-Leste. In attendance, among others, were the district military commander (Kodim commander), Lietenant Colonel Burhanuddin Siagian, his intelligence chief, Sutrisno, João Tavares and the district administrator, Guilherme dos Santos. District civil servants were required to attend the rally, during which Lieutenant Colonel Siagian and João Tavares publicly threatened to kill independence supporters.[347] After the ceremony, an order went out that all householders were required to raise the Indonesian flag or risk being beaten. More than ten pro-independence leaders were killed and mutilated in the weeks immediately following (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). By late April several hundred people had fled to the Maliana Church, hoping that the priests could protect them from the escalating violence.[348]

383. On 12 April 1999, the TNI-escorted vehicle of a pro-autonomy leader, Manuel Gama Soares, was ambushed in Poegoa (Cailaco, Bobonaro). Gama and a TNI soldier were shot dead by unknown perpetrators. In retaliation on the same day TNI soldiers and Halilintar rounded-up men, women and children from surrounding villages and brought them to the Koramil in Marco. In two separate incidents, seven men were executed while in TNI custody (see Vol. II, Part 7.2 Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). The bodies were kept on public display for the rest of the day, apparently intended as a warning to terrorise the population. That night they were removed and were never recovered.[349]

384. Indictments filed by the Prosecutor General at the Special Panel for Serious Crimes in the Dili District Court allege more events followed the Cailaco incident.[350] Between 12 and 13 April 1999, in the sub-district of Cailaco and the town of Maliana, the houses of pro-independence supporters were burned and their property stolen. On 13 April 1999, the villagers of Daudo were rounded up and forced by TNI members to move to the village of Biadila. The men were also forced to join the Cailaco-based Guntur militia. On 14 April 1999, at the funeral of Manuel Gama, João Tavares made a speech promising to kill all Falintil members and their supporters. The TNI district commander, Lieutenant Colonel Burhanuddin Siagian, also told mourners that if there were any pro-independence supporters among them, they would suffer the same fate as those who had been killed. In the following days TNI and militia members went to various villages in Cailaco believed to be supportive of independence. Under threat of death, villagers were forced to move into camps in Samutaben and Raiheu.

385. On 15 April, the approximately 700 to 800 people of Goulolo were forced to move to Turema. Once resettled, the men were forced to join the newly formed Guntur militia. On 16 April, the population of Raiheu in the sub-district of Cailaco (approximately 800 to 1000 people) were forced to move to the village of Ritabou in Maliana Sub-district.[351]

386. Members of the TNI and the Guntur and Halilintar militias gathered for a roll-call at the Koramil in Marco on the morning of 18 April. In the presence of TNI officers, the East Timorese Halilintar militia commander, F6, told militia members they were going to go to the villages in the surrounding mountains and destroy the homes of independence supporters. Militia members were also told to shoot at anyone making trouble or running away. The members of Guntur and Halilintar militia split into groups and went to Bisale, Samutaben, Asalau, Adusleten and Kalicoe and looted, burned and destroyed the houses of independence supporters.[352]

387. Between 14 and 19 April, members of the TNI and numerous militia groups from the district of Bobonaro went to Manapa in Cailaco Sub-district and forced the population to walk to the aldeia of Samutaben. Many of the men who were independence supporters had already fled from Manapa. On or about 19 April, members of the DMP (Dadurus Merah Putih) militia went to Manapa and began burning the village and destroying houses.[353]

388. The violence continued and spread to other areas, including the sub-district of Atabae. The Commission received numerous testimonies describing the forced displacement by the Halilintar and Armui militias under the command of F6 of people from villages in Atabae Sub-district to other villages in the sub-district, such as Koilima and Atabae, and to West Timor.[354] Others fled to the mountains to escape the violence.[355]

Covalima

389. By April 1999, the Laksaur militia had begun to attack pro-independence supporters in the town of Suai and the surrounding sub-districts. The Commission received at least 17 testimonies of violent incidents causing displacement in Covalima in April 1999.[356]

390. Rosantina de Araújo told the Commission of an attack on 9 April 1999 by Laksaur militia. Armed with modern weapons, they attacked Nainare (Suai Town) from their post in Leogore. The civilian population fled to the forest as the militia burned and destroyed their properties.[357] A similar incident took place on the same day in Holpilat (also in Suai Town), resulting in hundreds of civilians fleeing to the forest.[358]

391. The attacks continued throughout the month of April, causing hundreds of people to flee their homes. On 12 April 1999, Laksaur militia broke down the door of Madalena Moniz's house in Asumaten (Debos, Suai Town). They were looking for her husband, who had already fled.[359] On the same day, in Camanasa (Suai Town), Francisco Cardoso, a treasurer in the local Education Department, was assaulted by an East Timorese Laksaur commander F7. Cardoso was also threatened with death if he did not withhold the salaries of teachers who supported independence. Francisco Cardoso's wife, Felismina de Jesus and her sister Angela Maia, fled to Lospalos (Lautém) after being told that if they became "mistresses" to militia leaders, Francisco Cardoso's safety would be guaranteed.[360]

392. Ermelinda Moniz told the Commission of the brutal killing of at least three suspected independence supporters in Nikir Raihun (Foholulik, Tilomar, Covalima) on 23 April 1999. One of the victims was beheaded (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Led by East Timorese militia leader F5, the militia then burned the surrounding houses causing the population to flee into the forest. Three civilians were shot from behind as they attempted to run away.[361]

393. Julião Gusmão was detained by Laksaur militia in Leogore (Suai Town) on 24 April. He was beaten and interrogated about the activities of his relatives. When he was released, he did not return home but sought refuge in another village, Ogues (Maucatar). He later moved to the Suai Church.[362]

394. Paulus Vicente told the Commission that, on 24 April, he was abducted by Laksaur militia from his home in Belulic Leten (Fatumean). He was taken to the local Laksaur post where he was beaten by at least six militia members known to him. After being detained there for one week, Paulus fled to the town of Suai.[363]

395. On 26 April, Francisco Espirito Santo and Vicente Alves were attacked and abducted in Debos (Suai Town) by ten Laksaur militia. They were detained at the Laksaur post in Leogore for about one week. Finally they were released after they signed a letter pledging their support for pro-autonomy. They sought refuge in the forest because they felt unsafe.[364]

396. The Commission received evidence that women became vulnerable to sexual violence during their displacement (see Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence). At least three cases of sexual violence against women from Covalima are known to have occurred in April 1999. WL reported her rape by a member of Laksaur militia when she fled her home and sought protection with relatives who were members of Laksaur.[365] On 25 April 1999, YL's house was taken over by Laksaur militia, led by F5, for use as a militia post. Her husband fled to the forest. YL became a victim of sexual slavery.[366] ZL fled to Labarai in Betun, Atambua (West Timor, Indonesia) together with five other members of her family. When they arrived there, F8, an East Timorese member of the Mahidi militia, asked them for their identity cards. Failing to produce these cards, they were forced to give a "donation" of cash. F8 then forced ZL to accompany him to an isolated rice field, while verbally abusing her with lewd remarks. He led her to an abandoned hut but ZL was able to escape.[367]

Dili

397. On 17 April 1999, an Apel Akbar (Great Rally) of Aitarak militia and pro-autonomy supporters took place in front of the Governor's Office in Dili. In front of Indonesian officials, Eurico Guterres, formerly head of Gadapaksi (Garda Muda Penegak Integrasi, Youth Guards for Integration), publicly announced his intention to kill pro-independence supporters. A secret TNI report quotes his words:

> Aitarak forces are going to carry out a cleansing operation (operasi sisir) against civil servants who have used official facilities while being traitors to the integration struggle. Aitarak forces are going to crush anyone – be they government officials, community leaders or businessmen – who has assisted the anti-integration camp. Aitarak forces will not hesitate to wipe out Mário Viegas Carrascalão and his circle, who have betrayed the Balibó Declaration.[368]

398. At the end of the rally Aitarak militia went on a rampage across Dili. Targeting those suspected of having ties to the pro-independence movement, they destroyed five vehicles and seven buildings, including the offices of the local newspaper Suara Timor Timur (Voice of East Timor).[369] Julio da Costa Xavier described how members of Aitarak militia attacked him in his house at Metiaut, Bidau Santana (East Dili, Dili) after attending the rally. He managed to escape to the relative safety of Laga (Baucau).[370]

399. The Aitarak militia massed in front of the house of Manuel Carrascalão, where his family and villagers who had fled the violence in Liquiçá sought refuge, and killed at least 12 people (see Vol. II, 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

400. The day of this militia campaign, 17 April 1999, marked the beginning of large-scale displacement within Dili. Many people began to seek shelter in church buildings hoping that they would be protected by their sanctity. Others sought shelter with family members or in uninhabited areas. Local NGOs providing humanitarian aid to displaced people in Dili documented at least 44 locations in East and West Dili where more than 2,000 people sought safety away from their homes.[371]

Oecussi

401. Following the PPI inauguration at the rally in Dili on 17 April 1999. members of the Sakunar Militia returned to the district of Oecussi armed with automatic weapons. They began attacking CNRT leaders and terrorising the population. At the same time the militia began to recruit young men. Village heads who refused to produce recruits, and the young men who refused to join, were threatened that their families would be killed and their homes burned.

402. The Commission received at least ten statements recounting incidents of violence that led to displacement.[372] Julio Tout reported how he and three other men – Antonio Beto, José Sufa and José Poto – were captured by the Sakunar militia and brought to the aldeia of Bebo. Julio managed to escape to the village of Anfoang (Central South Timor district, West Timor, Indonesia.)[373] The remaining men, joined by Domingos Ele, were detained in an elementary school where they were severely beaten for two days. Antonio Beto died while in detention. Sakunar militia then burned the homes of the detainees and other houses.[374] Antonio de Jesus told the Commission how the Sakunar militia came looking for him on 25 April 1999. He ran off to the forest, leaving his family at home. However because they were also threatened, his wife and children followed him into forest soon after.[375] In another incident three East Timorese men were detained by Indonesian soldiers from Kodim 1639 in Oecussi. They were brought to Martinho Lelan, the East Timorese village head of Lela Ufe (Nitibe), and were beaten by members of Sakunar militia. Badly wounded, they managed to escape to the forest.[376] Bentu Bobo told the Commission that he and seven other men were forced to join the militia in Hoinino by the East Timorese Oesilo Sakunar commander, F10. In order to avoid this forced recruitment, they fled to the forest.[377]

403. By the end of April the situation in Oecussi was very tense and many fled to the forest or to West Timor. During the Sakunar inauguration on 1 May, CNRT leaders were rounded up at gunpoint and forced to drink their own blood and to publicly declare that CNRT was dissolved and to pledge their support for autonomy. Uniformed members of TNI publicly beat several of the CNRT leaders at this rally.[378]

Ermera

404. According to witness testimonies the month of April marked the beginning of a wave of violence in the district of Ermera. An East Timorese commander of the Darah Merah militia told the Commission that in April the district military commander (Kodim commander) of Ermera gave at least seven pieces of modern weaponry and two military vehicles to the militia group. Two hundred members of Darah Merah militia launched an attack against CNRT supporters in the sub-district of Hatolia. The CNRT members fought back and one militia member and two CNRT members were killed in the melée.[379]

405. The Commission received numerous statements describing cases of violence in April 1999 in Ermera, Gleno and Atsabe, causing the population to flee their homes.[380]

406. Erminia Soares do Ceu from Potete (Ermera) witnessed a military operation conducted on 10 April 1999, conducted by Indonesian soldiers from the Kodim in Gleno and Darah Merah militia in which dozens of houses in Ermera were burned.[381] These included the house of Alexandre dos Santos and his wife Regina de Araújo, both supporters of independence, who fled to the forest.[382] Some who fled, like Saturnino Borromeo, sought protection with Falintil forces.[383]

Conditions of the internally displaced in Sare (Ermera) and Faulara (Liquiçá)

From 2 to 4 July 1999 a group of NGOs, accompanied by UNAMET and UNHCR officials, distributed 25 tons of food and other humanitarian aid to the Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs) in Sare. The following are excerpts from a report of the visit:

"In Sare, we discovered that there were 3,800 IDPs from seven villages: Vatuboro, Cuico, Lisadila, Vatuvou, Maubaralisa, Vaveknia, Guguleur (all in Maubara, Liquiçá). On our drive to Sare we saw the villages of Cuico and Lisadila were completely burned to the ground, without a single house left. After a day in Sare we discovered a second location, Faulara, which had 3,500 IDPs according to the refugees themselves.

"We were told by the village head of Asulau [Sare is an aldeia within Asulau] that the displaced began to come in February, [when] the militia attacks began. Before the violence Asulau had a population of 1,449, and now it has more than 5,000 people. Earlier in February–March there were around 5,000 IDPs in Asulau. Some have moved on to Atabae (Bobonaro) and Hatolia (Ermera), leaving more than 3,000 here now. According to the village head of Asulau, most of the houses in the seven villages have been burned except the houses of those who have agreed to join the militia. According to him, the militia are trying to drive the people to Maubara Town where they will be under the control of the militia to ensure that they vote for autonomy. Families have been separated, some fleeing to safer areas, others having to comply with the militia's plan to relocate masses of people to Maubara.

"Since February at least five [people] have been killed by Besi Merah Putih and Halilintar, the two militia groups operating here. These people – Sabilu (21 years), Silvanu (35 years), Maubisa (50 years), Eduardo (18 years) and Amelia (60 years) – were killed when they attempted to return to their homes to pick cassava and find food for their families. The last shooting occurred on 16 June. During our time there we were also presented with a list of 23 women from one village who were raped by militia. According to the community leaders, women are called to the militia post where they are harassed and raped. They also testified to the fact that the attacks of the militia are supported by BTT Batalyon Tempur Teritorial, (Territorial combat battalion, the battalion assigned to the area), Koramil Maubara and Brimob. The Sub-district administrator (camat) and Sub-district military commander (Koramil commander) are leading the activities of the militia.

"In February the local community shared their food with the displaced people but by March their food supply could no longer support such an influx...Since March the IDPs have had to find their own food in the forests and by scavenging what they can from their gardens. But this is a risky endeavour as they must enter into BMP-controlled areas. The BMP not only burned their houses and granaries, but also looted anything that could be sold, such as zinc roofing and livestock. They also burned and destroyed the fields. [The IDPs say]: 'When it is safe we want to return to our homes, but where will we stay?' referring to the fact that all their resources have been destroyed. 'It is like we are back in 1975,' said one old man. Another refugee told us that this is now the time to begin preparing their fields for the next planting season. This may mean that they cannot plant in time for the rains in October.

"Some of the internal refugees from Cuico (Maubara, Liquiçá) said that all 400 families have lost their homes there. The IDPs from Cuico make up at least 2,250 of the refugees in Sare now. In Cuico, as in the other villages, they plant corn, beans, cassava, and coffee. When they fled their village they had not harvested their crops. This month is the beginning of the coffee harvest, however it seems that the militia are the ones who are picking coffee.

"According to the Asulau village head, at least 3 to 4 die everyday. There is a health centre in Asulau, however the nurse fled to Hatolia in March 1998 and prior to that there were no medical supplies. Many of the refugees have malaria, respiratory infections, diarrhoea, and dysentery. There are sources of clean water but not enough. Households who get to these sources earliest are the ones who have enough for their daily needs. Now, they are eating cassava and 'all that goats can eat, we can eat'.

"Faulara is a transmigration site in the village of Leolata (Liquiçá) which was opened in 1996. According to a community leader of this area, there are 1,600 original inhabitants. Now there are 5,100 people, which means an IDP population of 3,500. The IDPs have been arriving since January and February, approximately 70 people have died from disease since January. Because many were sick, the community decided to separate them into smaller groups. For example out of the 3,500, there are now 500 IDPs in Bantur which is about 8 kms from Faulara. They plan, however, to move these IDPs back to Faulara.

"The IDPs and local community in Faulara are living in fear of the militia. A man from the village of Asumanu (Liquiçá) told the story of how his house was burned by militia and military. On 17 May, militia encircled his house, assisted by military personnel. They closed the door to the kitchen in which his wife and three other women were trapped, and burned the kitchen. His wife and the three women eventually were able to escape, but three others died during this attack.

"In Faulara we also interviewed a woman who had just escaped captivity by BMP militia in the town of Maubara. In February 1999 she ran from her home in Maubaralisa due to attacks by militia to Gariana. She and her family were there until March when she moved to Asulau. After the Indonesian elections (June 1999) they moved to Faulara. She was captured on 17 June when she returned to her home in Maubaralisa to pray at her parents' grave and harvest cassava for her family. She was accompanied by her seven-year-old daughter. When the militia took her she resisted but then they took her daughter so she had to follow. She was held in captivity for two weeks. She said that she was put in the house of a militia family, was not mistreated but was not allowed to leave. When the militia told her that she and others would be brought to Atambua (West Timor) in order to register [to vote], she ran away. Asked how many others were captive like her, she said thousands. She and her daughter walked for two days through the forest. She arrived the morning that we were there. Her daughter looked very weak and tired."[384]

407. The Commission notes that in April 1999 violent incidents occurred in all 13 districts. However, the gravest human rights violations took place in the six districts mentioned above. These events, and others not described here caused large-scale displacement throughout Timor-Leste.

The quiet before the storm (May–August 1999)

408. With the arrival of UNAMET personnel and large numbers of international observers in June 1999, physical attacks on independence supporters declined somewhat.

409. The period leading to the planned August ballot was relatively quiet. In some areas however, serious incidents of human rights violations leading to further displacements continued to take place. Examples of such violations include: the detention, rape and torture of suspected independence supporters by militia in Lolotoe (Bobonaro) in June 1999;[385] the killing of two university students in Hera (Dili) in May and the attack on the UNAMET office in Maliana (Bobonaro). The establishment of militia roadblocks, forced relocation and the burning and looting of homes continued unabated and with complete impunity. As the day of the Popular Consultation neared, there was a dramatic increase in intimidation by the militia groups as well as the TNI, the police and the civil administration. These terror tactics were directed not only against those who were perceived to be pro-independence but also against UNAMET local staff, and anyone assisting internally displaced people.

Food security and humanitarian aid to the internally displaced

410. The violence and security situation exacerbated existing food shortages created by climatic extremes. Harvests were already depressed in 1998 by an El Niño drought and in 1999 by excessive La Niña rains. In addition the poor security situation in February–March made it difficult for people to sow and tend their fields, further endangering food supplies. Flight and forced relocation separated some from their farms completely, while those still at home found their food security imperilled by severe restrictions on mobility during the June corn harvest* and militia looting and destruction of crops and livestock. In addition travel restrictions also prevented the movement of food commodities to markets.[386] Intimidation of humanitarian workers made assistance virtually unavailable to most of the population, making the internally displaced people even more vulnerable to hunger and disease.

Attack on the humanitarian convoy in Liquiçá

On 4 July 1999, a humanitarian convoy organised by local NGOs and accompanied by officials from UNAMET and UNHCR was attacked by BMP militia in Liquiçá as it returned from delivering aid to IDPs.

* Travel permits (surat jalan) signed by the local militia leaders, the sub-district chief and the local military commander, were a requirement for anyone wishing to travel beyond their village. [UNAMET, Political Overview, Atambua-Covalima-Ainaro, 15–17 June 1999]

Several local NGO workers were seriously injured, a UNAMET staff member was directly threatened at gunpoint and vehicles were smashed with pipes and rocks. Militia pursued the convoy, clinging to the outside of one of the vehicles while threatening the NGO passengers with homemade guns and machetes. A joint statement issued on the day after the attack described attempts to obtain police escorts, including through meetings with officials at the police headquarters (Polda), and the governor days before the food delivery, as well as attempts by UNAMET to organise a police escort for the return journey.[387] In this joint statement the NGOs described the attack:

"A blue minibus [came] from the direction of the Koramil filled with armed militia. The militia were waving their weapons and screaming 'Kill, kill' at members of the humanitarian mission. Indonesian police and intelligence members at the location watched this happening, without reacting. Members of the humanitarian mission were pursued by militia with guns, knives, and machetes. UNAMET personnel attempted to intervene, to protect the NGO workers from the attacks of the militia. Gunshots were fired.

"Members of the humanitarian mission scrambled into some of our vehicles, and the UNAMET vehicle. We were pursued by the militia, who also hung onto the UNAMET car, smashed the windows. At one point a traditional gun was pointed into the car. One of our members saw a traditional gun dropped into the car in the fracas. Sixty-two out of our contingent of 77 escaped to the Polres [police station] in Liquiçá. At the Polres, humanitarian mission members were treated roughly by some members of the police as if we were the accused. A traditional (hand-made) gun was found on the floor of the UNAMET car. This gun was given to the Liquiçá police for evidence. UNAMET personnel being evacuated from Liquiçá joined us at the Polres. After a while the ten members were brought from the Kapolsek. Those who were held at the Polsek were intimidated and interrogated. After negotiations between UNAMET police and local police, we were allowed to leave with the UNAMET convoy to the Dili Polda where we would be questioned. We were missing five NGO workers and one refugee. We arrived late at night in Dili. After negotiations between Polda and UNAMET, the humanitarian mission was allowed to leave Polda together with UNAMET personnel."

The police took no action to arrest the armed militia members who remained outside of the police compound continuing to shout threats at the victims. On the contrary, a week after the attack, the police launched an aggressive investigation to bring a spurious weapons charge against the UN humanitarian officer, whom they alleged had been carrying arms.[388]

Ian Martin, UN SRSG (Special Representative of the Secretary-General) for the East Timor Popular Consultation and head of the UN Mission in East Timor from May to November 1999, assessed the impact of the convoy attack this way:

"The militia attack on the Liquiçá convoy had set back efforts to deliver assistance, although the ensuing publicity had compelled the Indonesian authorities to recognise the humanitarian issue and Habibie had ordered efforts to address it. Not only were [internally displaced persons] seen as undesirable pro-independence elements [the very reason they were targeted in the first place], but so were the East Timorese NGOs who wished to assist them. The Indonesians saw themselves in competition to deliver relief through government channels…Obstacles imposed by authorities meant that it was not until 2 August that another convoy reached one of the major areas of displacement – one month after the Liquiçá incident."[389]

The attack received widespread attention and forced Indonesian authorities to admit the role of intimidation in preventing humanitarian access. Despite President Habibie's demand that the attacks stop, the attacks on internally diplaced persons continued unabated, apparently in an attempt to keep them from polling places. On 16 July the BMP attacked them in Faulara, and on 18 July in Liquiçá, causing many to flee back into the mountains.[390]

411. The exact numbers of the internally displaced persons are difficult to estimate. The combination of frequent movement and the fact that most were not in formal camps (most sheltered either in the homes of friends or relatives or in remote areas) makes the calculation of numbers problematic. The biggest problem, however, was the lack of access to the displaced by humanitarian relief agencies because of poor security. UNAMET compiled data from humanitarian sources at the time and estimated that by mid-July there were some 40,000-60,000 people displaced, 80% of whom were from the border areas of Bobonaro, Covalima, and Liquiçá.[391] In Ermera 4,000 people were being held by militia in the sub-district of Cailaco in mid-July.[392]

The displaced return to register

412. In late July, the displaced began to return home. The return, however, was reportedly driven by the desire to vote and to be with their communities at this crucial time rather than improved security. There are reports that the CNRT also instructed people to return. In late July UNAMET reported that some 9,000 people who had been displaced in Liquiçá were returning to villages in the district or registering in Dili. Of the 5,000 people who fled from the district of Bobonaro, 3,500 had registered in Dili.[393] As a result many returned to the renewed danger of militia attacks and to locations without humanitarian access.[394]

413. The increased danger faced by displaced persons when they emerged from their hiding places is illustrated by the plight of those who returned to Suai. In late July, those who had fled to the surrounding mountains and villages came back to Suai where they sought refuge in the Avê Maria Church. The church was surrounded by increasingly threatening militia. There was no police or Brimob security presence. The number of people seeking shelter in the church rose from 700 on 12 July to 1,700 by 9 August and then to 2,500 by 19 August.[395] Following a large pro-independence rally and a visit from the UN SRSG (Special Representative of the Secretary General) and the chairman of the Indonesian Task Force for the Implementation of the Popular Consultation in East Timor (Satuan Tugas Pelaksanaan Penentuan Pendapat Timor Timur, SatGas P3TT) on 19 August, the district administrator informed a priest that the internally displaced were a political group and must disperse. The district administrator cut the water supply to the church in an effort to force the displaced people out of the compound. Water was restored on 22 August after protests from UNAMET and a visiting US Congress delegation.[396]

414. In the days leading up to the Popular Consultation roadblocks, armed patrols and open threats of violence if people did not vote "the right way" continued. In Bobonaro on 10 August, a meeting of the district administrator, the Kodim commander, the FPDK, the BRTT and several village heads openly threatened attacks on villagers if autonomy was not successful.[397] CNRT activity in Covalima prompted militia armed attacks on rallies, CNRT offices, and people displaying support for CNRT. In both Covalima and Ainaro, Mahidi and Laksaur militiamen, many of them armed, patrolled and intimidated with impunity, threatening to kill those on a list of pro-independence supporters reportedly provided by a TNI soldier.[398]

415. In Oecussi on 27 August 1999, community leaders in pro-independence strongholds had late-night visits from members of the Sakunar militia who threatened to burn their homes and harm their families. Militia prevented people attending CNRT events, while 300 BMP members "on a camping holiday" drove around with Sakunar, firing guns into the air. Both militia groups stoned the CNRT office all night and into the next day. CNRT members asked for police protection. Police arrived and lined up behind the militia and began firing at the CNRT office for several hours, killing six. Many houses in Santa Rosa near the CNRT building were burned and the CNRT building was totally destroyed. When the CNRT held a campaign event in Padiae (Pante Makassar) uniformed police attacked them. CNRT leaders, high-profile student leaders, UNAMET local staff, local election observers and ordinary community members, especially those from around Santa Rosa, fled to the mountains. Some 667 people sheltered together in Cutete in the hills outside Pante Makassar. Some took refuge in the church and police station, others were taken forcibly by police to the station.[399]

416. In Viqueque on 21 August, severe intimidation and gunfire in Uma Tolu (Lacluta, Viqueque) was reported by the international observer group, the International Federation in East Timor (IFET), in the final days before the Popular Consultation. On 22 August, Babinsa and soldiers from Battalion 406 surrounded a group of internally displaced people at the village meeting house near the football field in Uma Tolu. One villager was shot in the leg and nine others were wounded as well. Several houses were burned and belongings destroyed, including voter registration cards. One of the homes destroyed included that of the school headmaster, who had organised youths into an anti-militia guard. Some 260 people fled as a result of these events.[400]

417. Elsewhere in the district police did not intervene to stop militia attacks on a pro-independence student office and on CNRT offices in Viqueque Town. TNI and militia members came to a voter education seminar to photograph those in attendance and threatened to kill those who did not vote for autonomy. Militia knocked on people's doors, shouted obscenities and threw stones. There were militia checkpoints at key locations, especially in Uma Tolu.

418. In the village of Beloi, (Viqueque, Viqueque) a neighbourhood watch group put up a roadblock. Militia responded by descending on the village, firing weapons. Phone calls to the police for help produced no result. The militia continued the attack throughout the day, killing three. Many fled into hiding: 200-300 of 600 eligible voters fled the village of Lamaclaran; only four elderly people were left in Taular; 30 men fled from Buanarak; 25-30 people were left Mamurac. Residents fled to Ossu, Raitahu and the nearby transmigration area. The displaced in Ossu came from Bubur Laran (273), Buanurak (9), Loi Huno (65) and Lia Ruca (102).[401]

419. The campaign period saw the threat of violence increase in many places. In the district of Bobonaro the Indonesian authorities did all they could to prevent the CNRT campaigning. The CNRT office was sacked by militia one day after its opening.[402] The CNRT had to stop open campaigning after one day when students were attacked by militia with machetes. Meanwhile, the pro-autonomy campaign continued aggressively. On 17 August, people were forced to attend an Indonesian Independence Day rally. People in Moleana and Halecou were beaten by Dadurus militia from Ritabou for not attending. Militia attacked student centres, wounding students, and a church youth centre where IDP families were sheltering in Luguli near Maliana. Militia fired on fleeing people, burnt 15 houses, causing locals to flee to the seminary.[403]

420. In the district of Covalima local leaders reported that military and government officials were actively campaigning and issuing threats against people in public meetings.[404] In July and August Laksaur blocked major roads and confiscated personal property and food.[405] In August the traditional house "Seri Bein" was burned and everything inside stolen, including livestock and food.[406] These militia activities led to an increase in the number of people sheltering in the church compound at Suai. In addition a pro-independence activist was kidnapped and murdered. After a clash between militia and pro-independence supporters waiting to leave a campaign rally on 19 August, the CNRT suspended its activities.[407]

421. On 26 August, the last day of campaigning allocated to the pro-autonomy camp, the militia engaged in aggressive intimidation, especially in Dili where they had gathered from across the country. Eurico Guterres, addressing a pro-autonomy rally of 15,000 in Dili stadium, promised that Timor-Leste would become a "sea of fire" if independence won the vote.[408] Violence on that day killed eight; all but one at the hands of militia or security forces.[409] Militia either directly interfered with or prevented people from attending UNAMET voter education activities and CNRT campaign events.[410] Threats against UNAMET local staff increased greatly in mid-August, causing many to cancel their contracts and flee to the forest.[411]

422. On polling day, 30 August, in Boboe Leten (Atsabe, Ermera) militia armed with firearms and stones attacked a polling centre, killing two local UNAMET staff and attempting to kill a third. Although Brimob were present, they did not intervene. A special polling site had to be set up in Asualu/Sare (Hatolia, Ermera) for the internally displaced who were too scared to return home to vote. For those who had returned however, most – especially CNRT leaders, UNAMET staff, and student activists – returned to their hiding places in the mountains and forest after casting their ballots, in anticipation of violence. In Bobonaro many hid supplies and belongings in the mountains and the forest in expectation of the coming upheaval. The village head of Atabae (Bobonaro) reported that a Halilintar leader told them in July to prepare their belongings because if they did not leave after the ballot they would be killed. Pro-autonomy supporters immediately left for Atambua (West Timor, Indonesia).[412]

Massive displacement and deportation, September 1999

423. Following the announcement of the result of the ballot, widespread violence was unleashed against the East Timorese population. The Commission received 713 statements describing acts of forced displacement and destruction of property in September 1999.* The evidence of an organised scorched-earth campaign of property destruction and mass deportation is overwhelming. UNHCR estimated that some 300,000 people fled to the hills and forests near their homes, and 250-280,000 people were deported to West Timor (Indonesia).[413] Amid mass killing (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances) and destruction of 70-80% of buildings, hundreds of thousands of people were rounded up by militia and TNI and herded like cattle from their homes or places of shelter onto trucks and boats bound for West Timor. Some went willingly to West Timor to flee the violence or because they were supporters of the autonomy option. However the evidence also clearly demonstrates that thousands were forced to leave against their will, under threat of death. By 31 December 2002, some 224,570 had returned to Timor-Leste.[414]

Dili

424. The scale of the violence in Dili is explained by its special character as the headquarters of the TNI and one of the fiercest militias in the territory, the site of numerous public buildings and already the most populous town in Timor-Leste before its numbers were swelled by an influx of displaced people in the months leading up to the ballot.

* The Commission received 414 statements describing forced displacement and 469 statements describing destruction of property, totalling 813 statements. However subtracting the 170 statements which record both forced displacement and destruction of property from this total leaves 713 statements.

425. Dili predictably became a crucible of post-ballot violence and destruction. Immediately following the ballot thousands of people began to take refuge from militia violence in the compounds of the Dili Diocese, the house of Bishop Belo and the ICRC, and in hundreds of other locations throughout the city. The announcement of the results of the ballot by UNAMET on 4 September 1999, broadcast by radio throughout Timor-Leste, raised the tensions and fears felt by ordinary East Timorese people.

426. By 5 September, there were some 300 people in the Camara de Ecclesiastica compound of the Diocese of Dili, 5,000 at Bishop Belo's residence and 2,000 at the ICRC compound. Bishop Belo and the director of the Justice and Peace Commission of the Dili Diocese, Manuel Abrantes, reportedly went to the regional military headquarters (Korem) and asked TNI to act. They asked the military to take control of the city from the militias in order to protect the people in the Bishop's compound. João Tavares, who was also present at the meeting, said his militia would not surrender until Falintil surrendered and that his militia did not accept the results of the Popular Consultation and were ready to fight.[415]

427. While this meeting was underway Aitarak militia attacked the compound of the Dili Camara de Ecclesiastica, killing at least eight people and injuring scores more. The militiamen were armed with M-16 rifles, pistols, homemade guns and sharp-edged weapons. According to the Serious Crimes Unit indictment, a large number of heavily-armed Indonesian military and police were present but took no action to disperse the militia or stop the attack. A priest inside the compound phoned the police headquarters (Polda) to report they were under attack. He was told that officers were on their way.

428. People were forced outside and were moved to the harbour, being beaten as they went. At least 14 men who were badly beaten were forced into trucks by militia and were never seen again. Once the group from inside the compound arrived at the harbour, militia and police separated the men from the women. The women were taken by the poIice to their headquarters in Comoro (Dili). The men remained at the harbour where several were attacked by militia and TNI, without intervention from the police. Those known to be independence supporters were singled out for abusive treatment.[416]

The attack on the Bishop's compound

429. The following day, 6 September, Bishop Belo telephoned both the provincial chief of police (Kapolda), Timbul Silaen, and the provincial military commander (Danrem), Colonel Nur Muis to ask for protection and assistance in evacuating the thousands of people in the compound of his residence. Both refused the Bishop's plea. However, an unidentified TNI Lieutenant Colonel came in person to assure the Bishop that the TNI were available to protect the residence. He left after 15 minutes and shortly after militia began to arrive.[417]

430. An eyewitness reported that some 100 militia arrived by Kijang vehicle, motorbike and dump truck and began shouting threats and circling the compound.[418] Witnesses report that the militia began firing into the air and then threw Molotov cocktails into the Bishop's house, setting it alight.[419] Militia then stormed the Bishop's compound and the Canossian Convent behind the Bishop's house where some 100 people were hiding. The militia arrested young men and forced the remainder of the people out of the compound. The indictment states that TNI and mobile brigade police (Brimob) also entered the compound firing their weapons, assaulting the occupants and ordering them outside. Police also assisted in ordering them into the square in front of the Bishop's house, one police officer reportedly dousing the Bishop's house with gasoline and setting it on fire. Militia and TNI searched the house to ensure that there were no displaced people left inside.[420]

431. Militia freely interrogated the civilian population in the presence of TNI, Brimob and police, searching for independence supporters. Some were ordered to walk to the harbour where they were loaded onto boats for Kupang. Others were taken to the village office at Bidau Santana (Nain Feto/Dili Oriental, Dili) or to the police headquarters to board trucks, minibuses, or Indonesian air force planes for West Timor. They were warned that if they did not comply they would be killed.[421]

432. The Commission received a number of statements on the attack on the Bishop's house. Herminia Godinho and her family sought protection at the Bishop's residence on 4 September. She told of the attack on the residence by Aitarak militia, including the fatal shooting of a number of civilians:

> After the attack, I was brought to the Bidau Santana village office. Others were brought to the Dili port. I saw four militia take Mario Correia Fernandes to be killed.[422]

433. Francisco Tilman reported to the Commission the disappearance of a family member, Vicente da Costa Carlos Tilman. He was among the displaced people at the Bishop's residence but has never been seen since the attack on 6 September.[423] Fernando da Silva also reported the disappearance of his brother, Mario Correia Fernandes. They sought refuge at the Bishop's house after the announcement of the ballot results. After the attack they were forcibly moved to Bidau Santana. In the middle of the night, masked men took his brother Mario away. He has not been seen since and is survived by his wife and three children.[424] Armindo Moniz told how his child, Etelvina Martins aged 13, became ill with fear and shock when Aitarak militia began their assault on the Bishop's residence. He and his family were forcibly deported to the island of Alor (Nusa Tenggara Timur, Indonesia) where his child eventually died from illness.[425]

434. At about the same time as the Bishop's house was attacked, the ICRC compound was also under siege from Aitarak militia armed with automatic weapons, homemade guns and sharp-edged weapons. At least two persons were killed and the remaining displaced persons were forced either to the port or the police headquarters for deportation.[426]

Evidence from militia members

435. In Metinaro (Dili) in a large-scale operation coordinated by the Sub-district military commander (Koramil commander), the Aitarak militia carried out deportations of thousands of people to West Timor. Orlando de Meio Maia was an Aitarak militia leader in Metinaro who participated in the violence. In his statement to the Commission he described a meeting on 5 September called by the Koramil commander, F13, at which other TNI soldiers were present. During this meeting F13 ordered Orlando and other civil servants to become Aitarak militia, arming them with guns. On the same day, the newly-armed Aitarak members attacked. They burned the house of the local CNRT leader and, the following day, a local leader named Antonio Saldanha was shot by militia in front of the Metinaro military headquarters. Orlando and his family were brought to Atambua by TNI on 10 September 1999.[427]

436. An East Timorese man told the Commission that he was under orders to burn and kill. He understood that unless he did this BMP militia from Liquiçá would attack him. He and his friend burned houses, boats and nets in a village in Liquiçá, and burned a private house in another village. Later they were deported to Atambua.[428]

437. The Commission received a report that Mateus de Carvalho, the village head of Hera (who was also commander of Aitarak militia), fired guns and threatened to deport the civilian population to Kupang (West Timor).[429] The Commission was told that on 6 September an East Timorese woman went to the police station in Metinaro, under instructions from TNI soldiers who shouted at her: "Those who do not want to go will die." At first the soldiers said that only civil servants and soldiers would go to Kupang for three months. However, after learning about the murder of the principal of the local school (Antoninho), she became very frightened and agreed to go to Kupang.[430]

438. The mass deportation did not mean suffering and death was then confined to refugee camps in West Timor. Madalena da Costa Aleixo told the Commission:

> On 7 September when we were forcibly moved to Kupang I had to leave my invalid mother behind in our traditional house in Metinaro. My mother died while we were in Kupang. She was traumatised by the situation which reminded her of the civil war in 1975.[431]

439. At the same time as hundreds were being herded onto trucks to be brought to the Dili port, some people, led by pro-independence leaders, escaped from the Koramil in Metinaro where they were being held. They fled to the mountains while their homes and villages were burning.[432]

440. For days groups of heavily armed militia continued to roam freely in Dili, attacking unarmed civilians and driving them from places of refuge to collection locations where they were loaded on to trucks or boats and deported to West Timor. Militia checkpoints were set up throughout the town and along all roads leading out of Dili to ensure people did not leave for anywhere other than West Timor. Dili became a ghost town as most of its inhabitants were either deported to West Timor or fled to the nearby hills.[433] Only a handful of people managed to stay in the town, hiding among the smoking rubble.

441. The following table contains further statements from residents of Dili who experienced violence, deportation and displacement in September 1999.

Table 14: Deportation and displacement, Dili District (Aitarak and Makikit militia)

HRVD	Name and Location	Summary
03726	Brigida Freitas Correia, Comoro, Dili	On 1 September militia came to my house looking for my husband who was not home. Our house was burned and destroyed. They took me and my child to the Aitarak Post 2. There we were threatened and later moved to the Tropical. A member of Team Makikit from Ossu (Viqueque) intervened and saved us. We were brought to Atambua where we stayed for two months.
05705	Domingas da Silva Andrade, Camea, Dili	My family was forced by Aitarak militia from Post 13 to go to Kupang. We were there until April 2003.
05744	Filomeno Matos Guterres, Becora, Dili	After the ballot, militia and TNI began attacking the population. I took my family and ran to Darlau (Aileu). We came back on 22 September 1999 when the situation was better, only to find our house burned to the ground.
08117	Florentina Rodrigues, Santa Cruz, Dili	On 7 September Aitarak militia burned and attacked my house. I ran to Dare and returned only after the arrival of Interfet.
00342	Cosmos Olin, Comoro, Dili	On 3 September Aitarak militia dressed in black came to our area. I recognised one person in the militia who was a friend of mine. He allowed me to leave and I ran to the Don Bosco Church compound in Comoro. More than 1,000 people were already there. After four days Aitarak militia came and ordered us to move to the Museum. My friend made me join Aitarak and go on operations in Manatuto and Aileu. When I returned I took my wife and our two-month old child to Atambua.
05725	Antonio Henriques Soares, Bidau Santana, Dili	On 4 September after the announcement of the ballot results, the local Aitarak militia from Post 12 ordered me and my family go to the Dili District military headquarters (Kodim). Later on we were moved again to Hotel Mahkota. We were there until Interfet came. On 27 September we returned to our house which had turned to ashes.
00150	Gaspar Mesquita Mendonça, Duyung, Metinaro, Dili	On 5 September the militia which was formed by TNI began to conduct an operation against people who were pro-independence. My house was burned, so we moved to Besahe in Kampung Baru. On 14 September the same militia group led by the same local commander burned this place as well.
00143	Manuel Mendonça, Besahe, Metinaro, Dili	On 6 September I was detained together with three other men by Aitarak militia in Basahe. I was beaten with a handmade gun and then shot at, but the bullet missed. We were then brought to the Koramil. There we were ordered to put our names on a list, along with all our family members, to be taken to Atambua. We managed to slip away.

HRVD	Name and Location	Summary
05720	Manuel Sarmento, Camea, Dili	After the announcement of the ballot result, my family and I sought safety in Kaisabe as we were frightened of threats from BRTT and Aitarak militia from Hera, Dili. When we returned home, our house was burned and all our livestock gone.
00153	Manuel Maria de Carvalho, Duyung, Metinaro, Dili	On 4 September the village head of Hera, who was also the local commander of Aitarak, ordered his men to force me and my family to go to Kupang. We were brought to the Dili port and put on a boat. We lived in the refugee camp in Noelbaki, Kupang, and returned on 23 November 1999.

Bobonaro

442. Even more than other western districts, Bobonaro was a pro-autonomy stronghold and as such was the site of extreme militia activity in September 1999. The backlash against UNAMET local staff began before the Popular Consultation results were announced. On 2 September two local UNAMET staff, Ruben Barros and Domingos Pereira, were killed by Dadurus Merah Putih (DMP) militia and TNI. This led to the evacuation of UNAMET staff the same day. Militia began burning and looting the UNAMET offices and the houses nearby.[434] Agapito Soares told the Commission that DMP militia attacked the CNRT's Maliana office, during which a CNRT supporter named Mateus Breok was shot dead. Agapito along with others fled to Mount Loelaku (Balibó, Bobonaro) seeking protection with Falintil soldiers.[435]

443. By the day of the announcement of the results of the ballot thousands of people had already left their homes seeking safety. The TNI and the militias completely controlled the town of Maliana. People remaining in the town were forced to go to the police station, as TNI and militia threatened to kill all independence supporters. Once the police station compound was full, members of the DMP militia and TNI forced people from their homes to the hospital or the Maliana sports stadium (GOR) nearby. Eventually the militia brought everyone they could find across the border to the refugee camps in West Timor.

444. Laurentina Amaral and her husband, Florindo da Conceição, for example, were brought to Hakesak (West Timor) by DMP militia on September 8.[436] On the same day Jaime dos Santos, Felix Laku and Luis de Jesus hid at the house of a TNI soldier when they were attacked by DMP militia, some clad in all-black "ninja" uniforms. They were forced to go to an area called Turiscai in West Timor.[437] Some however escaped the militia. Julião Marques fled his home to hide in the village of Tapo (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) on the day after the ballot. On 7 September DMP militia and soldiers from the Kodim in Maliana attacked her and the community. They ran to the forest in Lepgeun, Tapo Memo (Maliana, Bobonaro).[438]

The Maliana Police Station massacre

445. By 8 September, about 1,000 displaced people were in the Maliana Police Station compound. Some had been there several days. At about 6.00pm the TNI and militia, their faces covered with masks or red-and-white bandanas, attacked with knives, machetes and swords. Witnesses recount that pro-independence leaders were separated out and hacked to death. Some sought Brimob protection but were offered none. Some were killed in front of their families, others as they tried to escape. Some had their bodies burned. People scattered: some hid in trees, others crawled up into the ceilings of buildings or hid in wardrobes or rolled-up mattresses.[439] There were some 435 police present in the compound at the time of the attack, including the local police, mobile brigade and the eastern contingent (Kontingen Lorosae), which had been brought in to secure the ballot.[440] All the police officers, except eight who were suspected of being independence supporters, were armed, yet no shots were fired by them to prevent the attack. Police officers took no steps to protect the internally displaced people and stopped those who attempted to escape the rampage from doing so.[441] The attack lasted three hours and afterwards the bodies were loaded on to waiting trucks and transported to Batugade (Balibó, Bobonaro) to be dumped at sea. It is not known how many were killed.

446. That night independence supporters who had survived escaped to hills. The following day DMP militia from Ritabou (Maliana, Bobonaro) tracked a group of 13 survivors to a waterhole in Mulau, Ritabou (Maliana, Bobonaro) All were shot and hacked to death (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).[442] One of the bodies later washed up on the beach and was positively identified. The survivors in the police station and hospital who had not been able to escape to the hills were forced to go to West Timor.[443]

447. Following the massacre TNI soldiers and militia began clearing the town. People were either forced to walk to West Timor or had to pay for it if they were transported by truck. The TNI coerced people on to the trucks by threatening to drop bombs on Maliana, to destroy the villages in the mountains or to wage all-out war.[444]

448. At the same time those who attempted to avoid the violence by fleeing to the forest were pursued by militia, driven back into town and then forcibly deported to camps in West Timor. In these camps they continued to suffer violence and extortion by the militia. The people in the village of Saburai (Maliana, Bobonaro) recalled their capture when they were attempting to flee to the forest. Their houses were burned and they were brought to the sports stadium:

> TNI and [DMP] militia led by their East Timorese leader F15 attacked [those of] us who had fled to the forest in the foothills and took [us] back down. On 8 September [they] forced people to come down to Maliana and burned all the people's houses. On 10 September all the people concentrated in the GOR [stadium] Maliana were taken to Turiscai in West Timor.[445]

449. Around the time of the attack on the police station, other militia groups across the district of Bobonaro, including Halilintar, Armui (Atabae), Firmi Merah Putih (Balibó), Guntur (Cailaco), Hametin Merah Putih (Bobonaro) and Kaer Metin Merah Putih (Lolotoe) were burning houses and herding people to West Timor.[446] In the district of Bobonaro some 13,500 homes were rendered uninhabitable. Only a handful of villages, in Falintil-controlled areas, were not utterly destroyed. Almost all government buildings, schools and clinics were also destroyed and completely emptied of their contents. Only some churches were left untouched. Some 30,000-40,000 people were deported. Large numbers of people from the villages of Balibó, Atabae, Soileso, Oeleo, Malilait and Kotabot have yet to return.

Covalima

450. Following the pre-ballot violence, Covalima was a key site of post-ballot violence, displacement and destruction. Witness testimonies recount that Laksaur militia together with Indonesian TNI and civilian authorities organised the deportation of all civilians they could find.[447] On 6-7 September the Laksaur commander, Olivio Moruk, drove around Suai Town using a loudspeaker to announce that any villagers remaining on 9 September would be killed. In response, fearful villagers gathered their belongings and waited for transport along the main roads. Witness testimonies describe how the district administrator, F17, arranged for more than 30 trucks to deport the population.[448] Some community members reported being made to pay Rp800,000 for their own forced deportation.[449]

Suai Church Massacre

451. The Commission received numerous testimonies on killings and displacement of those who sought refuge at the Suai Church.[450] One eyewitness vividly recounted the attack on 6 September:

> Since July 1999, the situation in Suai had been very unsafe. My husband, who was a member of the CNRT, fled to the mountains. CNRT people were being searched for by Laksaur, so my family and I ran to the Suai Church. On 6 September 1999, at around 2.00pm, the Laksaur militia attacked the Suai Church. During the attack I saw TNI soldiers dressed as civilians using handmade guns, machetes and swords. They killed the parish priest. I saw three Indonesians, the district administrator of Suai, F17, and the Salele Koramil [commander], F18, and another man F19 walk away together, just before the attack. I saw people being attacked with machetes and being shot. We were told to gather and not move, unless we wanted to be killed. At about 10 minutes to three in the afternoon, my family and I were brought to the Kodim in Suai. On 7 September, at about midnight, an East Timorese militia member, F20, who is also a Babinsa in Suai Loro, part of the Koramil, came and threatened me. He raped me, and I could not do anything because I was frightened.[451]

452. After the massacre at the Ave Maria church in Suai, members of Laksaur militia and TNI forced the survivors to the Suai Kodim and the high school (SMP 2) building.

Guarded by militia and TNI, they were detained for eight days before being forcibly deported to West Timor, where violations continued. While being held at the school and the Kodim, and later in the camps in West Timor, some women were repeatedly raped by militia (see Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence). Such violations are described in the two statements below:

> We were brought to the Kodim. Every night we were harrassed. They came in and took away women at night. They used a flashlight on us while we were asleep and forced women to come out with them. They would not allow them to bring their things.
>
> We stayed at the Kodim until 14 September 1999, then we were brought to Betun. That night, at about 6.00 or 7.00pm, a hardtop car with four people, two of them armed, took me to the forest. I was raped by two men, one after the other. They were two Laksaur militia, F21, who was a taxi driver, and F22, a man from Fatumean. I did not recognise the other two because it was dark and I was frightened.[452]

453. Another survivor told the Commission:

> Then they forced us to go to the junior high school (SMP2). The militia continued to insult us. We were not given any food for three days. We were hungry and divided pieces of burned corn among the other refugees. We picked up crumbs that had fallen because we were so hungry. At night they disturbed us, especially the women. We were so scared we could not sleep. They turned off the electricity we lit some candles but they were put out by militia. Then the militia took a flashlight and shined it on us women. At night, the militia came with weapons and swords, and they would take away women and young girls.[453]

454. Laksaur militia members, under orders from their East Timorese commanders, F5 and F24, went to the forests in the district of Covalima to kill people hiding there trying to avoid deportation.[454] Among those who fled were villagers from Nikir, Raihun (Tilomar, Covalima) who were attacked by Laksaur militiamen and a member of TNI on 25 September in the Wea Forest. Armed with automatic rifles and machetes, the militia began shooting. They killed Januario Maya, Damião Ximenes and Titua Mali, and injured Juliana Moniz. The militia arrested Juliana along with seven others who did not manage to escape. They deported them to West Timor.[455] Others, like Eugenio de Deus, were able to escape to the forest.[456]

455. The following table contains a selection of statements received by the Commission describing the violence and forced deportations and displacements across the district.

Table 15: Deportation and displacement in Covalima District (Laksaur militia)

HRVD	Name / Location	Summary
03624	Aquelina Cardoso, Debos, Suai	I was a refugee at the Suai Church when Laksaur militia attacked us on 6 September. I saw East Timorese militias F25 and F26 shoot dead ten people, including a woman named Matilde who was seven months pregnant. We were moved to the local high school (SMP 2). At the school, I was beaten and kicked. One day I saw two Laksaur militia who were also policemen rape four women. Then the four women were taken to Atambua.
05162	Manuela Cardoso, Fatumean	My husband was detained by Laksaur militia at their post in Bubur Fehan on 2 September. Two days later they killed him and dumped his body in West Timor. I was scared for my life and ran to the Koramil in Tilomar. My family and I were taken to West Timor. I was still threatened there by Laksaur militia.
08587	Adão Mali, Camanasa Suai	I ran to Mount Fohorau with two friends to avoid the rampage of killing and burning by Laksaur militia against the people in Camanasa (Suai, Covalima). After four days on the mountain, we were attacked by the TNI and militia carrying automatic weapons. My two friends were killed in the shooting. That afternoon I returned with other members of my community and found their remains.
01302	Pedro de Jesus, Fatululik	On 4 September Laksaur militia opened fire at me in front of the chapel in Fatuloro. I ran to Beco where a militia member and a policeman from the Lorosae Contingent told me I had to go across the border if I did not want to be shot dead.
02025	Carlito da Costa, Fatululik	On 5 September I ran to the forest with other members of my community. On the way Laksaur militia shot dead one of the young men in our group named Domingos Taiasa. He was only 17 years old.
02034	Abilio Gusmão, Hopilat, Suai	I had already run to the Suai Church on 27 March 1999, but in April I moved to Hasain Belekasak because the situation was too difficult at the church. I was attacked by militia that month, and one month later Laksaur militia and soldiers from the Suai Kodim burned my house. On 1 July I was again a refugee at the Suai Church. We ran to the mountains on 5 September, fearing an attack by militia and the TNI. My family was forcibly deported to Atambua by Laksaur militia and the TNI.
08485	Madelena de Jesus, Suai	On 5 September I was captured at my home in Babu Lakunak by ten Laksaur militia. They also took my motorbike. I was detained at their post in Leogore for one night. The following day my family and I were moved to West Timor.
01266	Lucia Guterres, Fatululik	I was a refugee at the Suai Church when we were attacked on 6 September. Four Laksaur militia took me and another woman out of the church. Right in front of the building I saw a woman named Jacinta Gusmão fall down after being hacked in the neck with a machete by militia. We were boarded on to a truck which took us to the Kodim in Suai. We were held there for six days. On 12 September we were brought to Atambua.

Liquiçá

456. The district of Liquiçá was also hit hard by the post-ballot violence. BMP militia forcibly deported thousands of people to the port town of Atapupu, about one hour's drive from Atambua [NTT/West Timor, Indonesia].

457. On 31 August, Armindo da Silva Cloria was captured and beaten by Halilintar militia when he attempted to take food to Falintil soldiers in the forest. He was brought to a BMP post in Batubetilu, Vatovoru (Maubara, Liquiçá) where he was detained and tortured for one day. The next day a local nun, Maria Lourdes, negotiated his release. He stayed with this nun in a refugee camp in Atabae (Bobonaro) and was later deported to Atambua (West Timor, Indonesia).[457]

458. An East Timorese women described the killing of her husband on 7 September by more than six BMP militiamen. Led by F39, the militia shot her husband in the back at least eight times. She ran to Bazartete.[458] Similarly, another East Timorese woman told the Commission that on 7 September BMP militia, while conducting an operation in Leorema (Bazartete, Liquiçá) killed her husband. Her husband was standing in front of their house when the BMP militia came and accused him of providing food to Falintil and shot him on the spot. She ran to Ermetalau, Leorema (Bazartete, Liquiçá) but was captured by BMP militia, brought to Bazartete, and later deported to West Timor.[459] BMP militia conducted these deportations for at least two weeks. On 19 September 1999, BMP militia hunted down a family who had avoided deportation by hiding in an area in the mountains at Ailetehei (Bazartete, Liquiçá). Mariano de Jesus was shot in the shoulder and had to be carried by his mother back to Lauhata village for medical treatment.[460]

459. Amelia dos Santos became a widow after the attack on the Liquiçá Church on 6 April 1999. She and her husband, Victor Manuel da Conceição, were refugees at the church. BMP militia beheaded her husband at the church door. She continued to suffer violations and, under duress, paid a member of the BMP militia to deport her and her children to West Timor:

> Close to the day of the ballot, the district administrator of Liquiçá, Leoneto, wrote a letter ordering my arrest. I was detained in the Maumeta Police Station for two days. Then I was moved to the Koramil. They said to me, "If autonomy wins you can be a maid to our wives." When we heard that the pro-independence side won, the militia came to the Koramil threatening me, "You have to die because you chose independence." I was very frightened. I paid Rp100,000 to a militiaman to bring us to Atambua. In Atambua I met a militia who said that after my husband was killed his body was put in a burlap sack. They stripped him naked first because he owed his clothing to the people of Indonesia.[461]

460. For those who escaped forced deportation to West Timor, survival in the mountains was difficult. Mário dos Santos told the Commission how he ran with his wife and child to the mountains at Asaleten (Suai, Covalima). His 7-year-old child, Germano dos Santos, died due to lack of food while they were in the forest.[462]

The central districts

461. Although the western districts were hardest-hit, the central districts of Aileu, Ainaro, Ermera and Manufahi were not spared post-ballot destruction and deportation. Villages in the district of Aileu were destroyed in a systematic fashion. Beginning on 4 September the following villages were razed on consecutive days: Mantane (4 September), Aissirimou (5 September), Aeloi Malere (6 September), Saboria (7 September), Sukuliurai (8 September) and Hoholu (9 September). TNI and militia members reportedly drove around all day on 4 September shooting livestock. Then AHI (Aku Hidup dengan Integrasi/Indonesia) militia rounded up people in aldeias near the main road, including Fatubossa, Hoholete and Likilaukana, and forced them to the town of Aileu. From there they were loaded on to vehicles and taken to Atambua.[463]

462. The Commission received many statements from Talitu (Laulara, Aileu) describing acts of violence and deportation. For example, Francisco Carvalho reported the burning of his house by AHI militia and then his deportation with his family to West Timor.[464] Clementino Araújo and the people of Fahiria (Aileu, Aileu) were forcibly displaced to the town of Aileu on 4 September by AHI militia after their homes in Fahiria were burned and their livestock killed.[465] Domingos de Araújo told the Commission that on 5 September he was taken from his home in Aissirimou to the town of Aileu. When he and the people of Aissirimou left their village, AHI militia burned their homes and feasted on their livestock. They were later taken to the provincial police headquarters (Polda) in Dili, before being taken by truck to Atambua.[466]

463. Others were able to escape deportation. Eduardo Moniz and his family ran to Motakuak on 2 September after his house was attacked by AHI militia. When they returned, after the arrival of Interfet, they found their house burned to the ground and all their possessions destroyed.[467]

464. In the district of Ainaro an estimated 13,000 civilians were ordered to leave their homes between 4 September and 23 September. Mahidi militia attacked villages, burning homes and blocking all exit routes. In Maubisse the militia first looted and killed the livestock of those people already in the hills. Then they burned the houses. In Hato Builico residents were ordered out of their houses which were then set alight. People from surrounding villages were assembled near the church in the town of Ainaro and forced onto trucks leaving for West Timor. The militia then burned houses before they too left for West Timor around 22 September 1999.[468]

465. Prisca da Conceição described the burning of her house and the shooting to death of her husband on 4 September. She ran to the police station for protection. During her 6-day stay there she was continually harassed and threatened by militia bearing traditional arms. On 11 September, all those sheltering at the police station were transported to Betun in West Timor. In Betun they continued to be threatened by Mahidi militia who tried to prevent them from returning home. She was able to return to Ainaro on 22 November 1999.[469]

466. Statements received by the Commission describe acts of violence perpetrated by Mahidi militia against defenceless civilians. Teresa da Silva told the Commission that she witnessed 15 members of Mahidi, including a police officer who she knew, attack her village of Lepo (Zumalai/Mape, Covalima) on 5 September 1999. They burned houses, including hers, and randomly fired their guns. André da Sena ran into the forest into the area of Lour in the sub-district of Zumalai (Covalima).[470] On 7 September, at least

50 Mahidi militia attacked the village of Fatulebo (Zumalai/Mape, Covalima) burning houses. An East Timorese man was shot in the leg but managed to escape into the forest along with others.[471] Isabel dos Santos was told by a Mahidi militia member that her husband was killed on September 7 1999. However, she found her husband still alive at the TNI post with gaping bayonet wounds to his thigh and back, and they managed to escape and sought refuge in Dare (Dili).[472]

467. The Commission received testimony about a Mahidi militia attack on the aldeia of Maununo (Ainaro, Ainaro) on 23 September. The militia killed people and burned the houses of the village, and forcibly transported 56 survivors to Betun in West Timor. Regina Beanto described the event:

> Because the militias carried sharp weapons the people were afraid and just obeyed. Otherwise we would be shot dead, our lives taken…People followed the militia on foot. Children, pregnant women and old women and men were all threatened. [We] had to cross the river on foot. People were thirsty and hungry. We had no energy. There were about 50 militia involved.
>
> [Regina described how a militia member threatened the group with a grenade, then fatally shot her mother in front of her]
>
> A member of the militia pulled my arms and forced me onto a truck. The path to the truck was steep and we were ordered to climb fast. Those who were slow to do so, children and the elderly, were just thrown onto the truck. We just managed to set our feet on the truck…We rode with the militia and went straight to Betun.
>
> In Betun we suffered a lot…We only stayed there for two months. On 26 November we heard information that refugees could return. We registered and went back home right away.[473]

468. In the district of Ermera there were not enough vehicles to carry everyone. Militia and the TNI arranged for trucks to make several trips to Atambua and return.* People were forced from their homes by Darah Integrasi militia and members of TNI and on to trucks. Their houses were set on fire. The Human Rights Unit of UNTAET estimated that after the ballot some 43,000 people were forcibly displaced from Ermera to West Timor, while some 10,000 fled to the mountains. Entire villages were completely emptied and people reported that only families of militia members and the TNI left voluntarily.[474]

469. Gracilda told the Commission that Darah Integrasi militia, with TNI members, searched for her husband who had fled to the mountains. She ran to the Letefoho Koramil for protection. While she was there the militia took possession of her truck,

* Fokupers, Gender-based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, HRVD Statement F9430. Evalina Soares described how her son met a convoy of 20 vehicles returning after taking people from Atsabe (Ermera) to Betun (West Timor) on 16 September 1999. When he tried to run he was shot.

filled it with goods from stores and kiosks at the market and ordered her two sons to drive the truck to Atambua.[475]

470. Some communities were able to resist deportation. On 9 September, Darah Integrasi militia burned 20 houses in the aldeia of Hunda (Letefoho, Ermera) and most people sought protection in the house of the head of the aldeia.[476] On 13 September Darah Integrasi militia and BTT soldiers tried to force Anita dos Santos and her family to go to Atambua. They refused but continued to receive death threats, particularly aimed at a daughter who was a member of UNAMET local staff. On 20 September militia came back and shot at the house, smashing the windows. The family had already left the house to hide.[477]

471. The looting and burning continued for two weeks. Teresa de Deus told the Commission that her house was doused with gasoline by Darah Integrasi militia members when they came searching for her two older sons. They had burned a motorcycle owned by this family and were about to take her and her young children to Atambua when Interfet arrived.[478]

472. An East Timorese man testified about his forced recruitment into the Darah Integrasi militia. During a meeting between the Darah Integrasi commander, F27, and all the village heads of Letefoho Sub-district, each village head was obliged to provide 50 names of young men to be recruited as militia. His name was among the 25 submitted by the head of his village. He described how the Babinsa and other TNI soldiers posted in his village coordinated militia members to burn most of the houses in the village. He said that on 19 September he fled to Atambua with F27 and other militia members.[479]

Displacement and sexual violence

The Commission found that in times of heightened conflict and wide-spread displacement throughout the mandate period, women became increasingly vulnerable to sexual violence. Sexual violence was experienced by women who were forced to leave their homes and by women who stayed behind in September 1999.

In town of Ainaro one young woman told the Commission that she was raped after most of the population fled after the ballot:

After the vote everybody had ran away to Ainaro Town. My family – my father, aunt, and younger siblings – all stayed home because we did not know that everybody had left. Many had secretly run to the mountains. A Mahidi member, F56, came to our house carrying a SKS firearm at about 9.00pm. He forced me to come with him. He said that there was nobody left in Cassa. He stripped off all my clothes and raped me. He said that they held power and only they could guarantee my family's safety. During August and September he raped me five times. My family could not bear this any longer so we ran to Betun in West Timor with my uncle, who was a low-ranking TNI soldier. We were in Betun for five months, until 10 February 2000.[480]

Some women were raped during deportation to West Timor. Example of testimonies from women who experienced this include:

We were brought to the Stadium in Maliana by Dadurus Merah Putih militia in order to be deported to West Timor. At about 4.00am I was dragged to the back of the stadium by a militia. He threatened to kill me and to cut off the sexual organs of my brothers in the forest if I did not let him rape me.[481]

We ran to the forest after my house was burned by Dadurus Merah Putih militia on 9 September 1999. Two days later my husband returned home to look for food but he was killed by militia. My son and I tried to find him the next day, but on the way there we were captured by militia. They held a knife to my son. I was raped. Eventually, we were forced to go to West Timor.[482]

Others were threatened in a sexual manner:

On 8 September, Dadurus Merah Putih militia forced me and my grandfather to go to Maliana. My grandfather was very tired and stopped walking. A militia threatened us. He said we were not allowed to stop or else he would put his sword into my vagina. I was very frightened. I carried my grandfather for the rest of the journey to Maliana.[483]

Finally, women were vulnerable in the refugee camps:

In October 1999, I was forced by a member of Sakunar militia to go to West Timor. He burned my house and six other houses. I was told to find the men so they could take us all to West Timor, and I was put in a vehicle and brought to West Timor. I was threatened and raped by a member of Sakunar militia in West Timor.[484]

473. The Commission received a report about the attack on Sura, Selihasan (Same, Manufahi) on 16 September. The ABLAI militia (Aku Berjuang Laksanakan Amanat Integrasi, I am fighting to carry out the integration mandate), members of Gadapaksi and TNI soldiers from Battalion 311 in Betano carried out the attack. Some villagers had already fled to the forest at Fatukuak. The militia and soldiers began burning houses and herding the people onto vehicles to be transported to Betano. The militia later returned to the village to kill all the livestock. People were forcibly taken to Atambua.[485]

474. Two women from the aldeia of Orema, Holarua (Same, Manufahi) told the Commission that they were raped on 17 April 1999 during an attack by the ABLAI militia. After the results of the ballot were announced they were deported to Atambua by militia and were only able to return to their homes on 7 December 1999.[486]

475. When ABLAI militia attacked her home in Betano on 16 September, Reinalda Tilman ran to the forest leaving her invalid husband, Guilhermino Tilman. ABLAI militia burned her house while her husband remained inside. He managed to escape but was badly wounded and died three days later.[487]

Eastern districts

476. Although the relative number of people forcibly deported to West Timor was much lower in the eastern districts (Baucau, Manatuto, Viqueque and Lautém), the Commission received evidence that widespread displacement due to the conflict did occur. Most people ran to the forest and mountains to seek safety and stayed for a short time until the arrival of Interfet in late September. Some were forcibly deported to West Timor by militia and the Indonesian military. Others moved voluntarily to West Timor, particularly East Timorese members of Indonesian security forces and civil servants. A selection of statements received by the Commission has been summarised in the tables below.

477. In Viqueque an estimated 10,000 people were deported. On 20 September four ships with a capacity of 4,000 people each reportedly departed Beaço (Viqueque, Viqueque) for West Timor filled with civilians. An estimated 2,149 homes and 70% of school buildings were destroyed.[488]

Deportation and displacement in Lautém, Baucau, Manatuto, Viqueque

Table 16: Deportation and displacement in Lautém District (Team Alfa militia)

HRVD	Name and Location	Summary
02268	Nicolau Mendes, Parlamento, Moro	In September 1999 the people of Lautém were forced by members of Team Alfa to gather in the village of Com, and to board boats going to West Timor. I was forced to join Team Alfa's operations in the villages of Serelau, Baduro and the aldeia of Laikara where they burned people's houses.
02270	Ilda Eugenia, Parlamento, Moro	On 12 September a member of Team Alfa who I knew forced me and my family to go to Kupang. We were transported to the port in Com and waited for a boat to take us. At midnight, a TNI member threatened me with a gun.
02285; corroboration 03941	Jorgé Ximenes, Parlamento, Moro	On 21 September I went with about 20 friends to Ira-ara, Parlamento to look for food because we had run out of food in the forest. Militia from Team Alfa began shooting at us. Two of my friends, Alfredo Araújo and Calisto Rodrigues, were shot dead.

Table 17: Deportation and displacement in Baucau District (Team Saka militia)
HRVD	Name and Location	Summary
07746	Tomás Soares, Abo, Quelicai	On 2 September members of the Team Saka militia and Rajawali soldiers beat me and four of my friends using their weapons and boots. One soldier cut the shoulder of one of my friends with a sword. Then we were brought to Luga, in the village of Abo. We witnessed a member of Team Saka strangle a mother and her son until they urinated. They were being forced to go to Atambua with the father. On our way back from Abo to Quelicai I witnessed Team Saka militia burn my house.
02311	Celestina dos Reis, Mulia, Baucau	On 7 September my family and I ran from Uaiaka (Laga) to Quelicai in fear of an attack from TNI and Team Saka. On 10 September a man named Sebastião dos Reis was shot dead by a TNI on board a Milsas (Team Saka) truck. Two of his friends escaped.
07089	Joaquim Maria Sarmento, Guruça, Quelicai	On 8 September Team Saka militia burned houses in Guruça and killed livestock. Children of police and TNI soldiers were forced to go to Baucau. The following day a youth from Guruça, Celestino, was killed by a Team Saka commander. This commander also threatened another person with a gun to his chest and then burned his house.

Table 18: Deportation and displacement in Manatuto District (Mahadomi militia)
HRVD	Name and Location	Summary
07949	Octávio Carceres de Carvalho, Lakumesak, Laclo	On 6 September the people of Laclo were expecting an attack by Mahadomi militia and TNI. We ran to the forest, but came back to our homes later that day. On 7 September we ran back to the forest as Indonesian police and military began burning public buildings and Mahadomi began patrolling Laclo. At least four people were killed and numerous others were wounded by gunshot.
08282	Roserio Maia, Manatuto	Because I was a known supporter of independence and had already been detained twice (at the Manatuto and Dili police stations), I was escorted to Kupang by the head of the local police (Kapolres) from Manatuto on 6 September 1999. I returned from Kupang to find my house had been burned by Mahadomi militia.
F9314	Ester Luruk Koli, Lakumesak, Laclo	On 7 September 20 TNI soldiers carrying weapons (from BTT and Koramil) and three Milsas began shooting in the streets and attacking my house, because my brother was a coordinator of the independence group. Some of the Laclo youth fought back with stones. Two people were shot dead, including my husband, Domingos Carceres. The people ran to Hatu'un where we stayed for two weeks.
06561	Antonio Almeida, Aitas, Manatuto	On 15 September my family, my neighbours and I ran to the mountains because there was shooting between pro-autonomy and pro-independence factions. We went to a place where we had previously hidden food, but were captured by Mahadomi militia and Milsas soldiers and taken to the TNI headquarters. We were handed over to the Mahadomi militia and beaten at their headquarters and then returned to the TNI to be interrogated. My neighbours, Sebastião Biti and Cazamiro, were dragged away by four TNI and never returned. The next day my wife and I managed to escape.

Table 19: Deportation and displacement in Viqueque District (Naga Merah militia)
HRVD	Name and Location	Summary
03730	Victor Soares, Bairro Pite, Dili	After the announcement of the ballot result, my wife ran to Dare on 7 September. I stayed home with my mother. The next day at 1.00am Naga Merah militia together with Mobile Brigade police (Brimob) took us by force to the Brimob headquarters in Bairro Pite for interrogation. We were moved to Balai Prajurit, a public meeting place for soldiers. On 13 September, about 20 Naga Merah militia and TNI known to me came looking for me. Because they could not find me they beat my brother-in-law, Afonso Gonçalves, and then shot him dead.
04129	Paulino Freitas, Carabaco, Viqueque	On 4 September my family and I fled my home in Rai Tahu, Uma Uain Kraik. On 18 September we could see the smoke from fires burning from where we were. TNI and Naga Merah militia torched the houses and all the possessions of the people of Uma Ain Kraik.

Oecussi

478. The enclave district of Oecussi, which had largely escaped forced displacement during the occupation, experienced large-scale deportations following the ballot. The late deployment of Interfet to Oecussi also meant that militia were free to wreak violence and destruction in the district for much longer than in the rest of the territory.[489]

479. On 6 September, UNAMET evacuated its office in Oecussi to Dili and the violence and deportations became more intense. Using machetes and homemade guns, some 200 armed militiamen attacked Tumin, Quebesiolok, Nonquican and Nibin, killed 17 people with machetes and homemade guns, and attempted to kill another five people. Homes were burned and looted, and the surviving population was rounded up and taken to Imbate in West Timor. On arrival in West Timor the refugees were registered and sorted into age and educational groups. TNI, Polri and members of the Sakunar militia isolated 80 young educated men and tied them up in pairs. Beaten while being marched to the riverbank in Passabe, they were then killed by being shot and stabbed with machetes. Seven people escaped and ran away into the forest (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).[490]

480. The UNTAET Human Rights Unit reported that following the ballot, some 4,500 people were forcibly deported to West Timor in trucks brought to Oecussi for the purpose. Others were forced to walk to Kefamenanu (North Central Timor, West Timor Indonesia). TNI reportedly distributed firearms and motorbikes to members of Sakunar militia. Militia used trucks to loot all moveable property and deport civilians across the Indonesian border. Members of Sakunar militia went house to house forcing people into trucks and firing their guns into the air as they drove around. Some 10,000 people fled to the hills.[491]

481. By 18 September, homes in Pante Makassar had been indiscriminately looted and burned. The only buildings not destroyed were two Catholic churches. Militia and TNI looters took everything: roofs, windows, doors and furniture were all carried off to

West Timor. The only areas to avoid destruction were Citrana, Bebo and Baoknana in the sub-district of Nitibe, (where a local leader was able to persuade the militia not to destroy buildings), Mahata in Pante Makassar and Passabe.[492]

482. On 23 September, Sakunar militia attacked a refugee camp in Cutete where 5,000 people were sheltering under the protection of Father Richard Daschbach. The temporary shelters were burned, two people were shot and the refugees scattered. A 14 year-old boy from Oecussi walked overland, across West Timor, to the border to tell the authorities in Timor-Leste about the dire situation in Oecussi and plead for Interfet to intervene.[493]

483. Militia killings and destruction continued well into October. On 20 October, Sakunar militia moved into Maquelab to search for people hiding in the forest surviving on whatever wild leaves and roots they could gather. The militia found one group of 300 people and forced them back down into town, beating the men. Two CNRT leaders were identified, separated from the group and killed. A Sakunar deputy commander ordered the IDPs to gather together and to sit on the ground. He selected four men, a UNAMET local staff member, two CNRT leaders and a student leader. He forced them to stand and shot them in front of the terrified civilians. Later that day Interfet arrived in Oecussi and the militia fled to West Timor.[494]

484. The following table summarises other testimony on violence, displacement and deportation in the district of Oecussi after the ballot.

Table 20: Deportation and displacement in Oecussi District (Sakunar militia)

HRVD	Name and Location	Summary
00335	Bento Bene, Bene Ufe, Nitibe	In September 1999 the situation was very bad and I had already become a refugee in Oepoli, Kupang. However, I was forced to join Sakunar militia operations in Citrana by East Timorese militia leaders F28 and F29. In Citrana, together with about 30 militia, I dismantled government-owned houses. I told the people in Citrana to flee to Oepoli to escape the wrath of the militia.
00346	Simon Palat, Bene Ufe, Nitibe	We ran to the forest when Sakunar began their large-scale operations in September 1999. My house and 65 others were burned.
00368	Martino Seco, Banafi, Nitibe	Because of the Sakunar attack in the aldeia of Tumin (Bobometo), I ran to Sai-Tau, West Timor. There, under threat of death, I was forced to join military exercises by an East Timorese Babinsa named F30.
00382	Fernão Sequeira, Lela Ufe, Nitibe	TNI and Sakunar militia burned our homes in September 1999. We were made to pay Rp70,000 to militia to guarantee our safety before we could return to our homes in Oelfab.
00383	José Poto Lela Ufe, Nitibe	The situation in our village was very tense after Sakunar militia, led by East Timorese F31, killed two CNRT supporters. My wife, Celeste Busan, was stopped by militia who were asking for me. Because she did not give a satisfactory answer she was made to stand under the sun for four hours. She was about to be deported, together with our two children, when I disguised myself as a militia and took her to safety. Our house and many others were burned by militia, TNI and police.

00399	Fermino Taequi, Bobocase, Pante Makassar	After witnessing the killing of two young men by 12 Sakunar militia in Sikone-Cunha, I ran with at least 15 others to the mountains of Fatubena. We stayed there for a few weeks.
00891	Angelina Cuono, Usi Taco, Nitibe	Thirty militia under the command of East Timorese F32 burned the houses in the village of Usitaco. I ran to West Timor but was continually harassed until I returned.
02192	AM, Tokoluli, Railaku	On 15 September I was raped by an Aitarak militiaman. The next morning I reported this incident to the local Sakunar commander, Domingos Marcelino, but he did nothing about it. Later the Aitarak militiaman came again and tried to kill me near the river. I screamed for help and a local policeman and a relative intervened. After that my family and I became refugees in Hali Ulun, Atambua (West Timor).
00333	Juliana Ua, Bene Ufe, Nitibe	On 15 September, Sakunar and Besi Merah Putih (BMP) militia threatened to kill me and my relative Celestino Te'u Elo because we supported independence. We ran to the church. Three days later our house was burned and the militia came after us in the church. They grabbed my hair and threatened to cut my throat. We were forced to go to Oepoli, Kupang.
00321	Anastasi Quelo, Lela Ufe, Nitibe	In September 1999 the situation was very bad, so we paid Rp70,000 and a cow to a member of Sakunar militia. But things did not improve and my family and I fled to Neon Ben in West Timor.
00310	Martinho Mene Bene Ufe, Nitibe	We were made to pay money to the Sakunar militia commander, and were then moved to West Timor. The militia took all the zinc from the roofs of the houses and stole things from the local cooperative in Citrana and Boaknana.
00358	Marcolino Tafin, Bobocasae, Pante Makassar	On 23 September Sakunar militia under the command of East Timorese F32, F33 and F34 burned all the houses of the village of Bobocasae. This included furniture, corn and rice in the granary. They also looted all our livestock. My family and I ran to the forest, hiding in Faub for one week.
00371	Ilena Mauno, Taiboco, Pante Makassar	On 20 October 40 militia attacked our house, saying that we had given refuge to people who have fled to the forest. They killed my husband, Antonio Beno, and tried to burn my house while I was still in it. I fled. Many houses were burned that night, including the house of our neighbour, Quelo Meni. He was also killed near the Suni Ufe River.
00375	Terezinha Kolo, Taiboco, Pante Makassar	On 20 October my husband, children and I ran from an attack by Sakunar militia. My husband was shot in the elbow by an East Timorese militia commander F10. We were brought to the market where four men were killed with a machine gun.
00377	Matias Slain Colo, Taiboco, Pante Makassar	We were taken to the Makelab market where a member of Sakunar militia hit me in the mouth with a machete. My teeth were broken but I stayed silent. About 30 minutes later a Sakunar militia F10 took two men, Atili da Costa and Paulus Cussi, behind the toilets and shot them dead. After a further 30 minutes, F32 came on a motorbike. Without much comment, he called for João Talias, Paulus Kelu, Mateus Ton and Francisco Taek (secretary of Taiboco Village), and shot them one by one. We were told to hold our heads down. We were not allowed to scream or cry.

00384	Fatima Aban, Taiboco, Pante Makassar	On 20 October my family and I ran to Sai Laut. We witnessed the killing of a person there by the TNI and Sakunar militia. We were forcibly brought to Maun-Ana and later moved to a refugee camp in North Central Timor District (TTU) in West Timor.

Refugees in West Timor

485. By 6 September 1999, a stream of refugees began to arrive in West Timor. This included those who fled of their own accord seeking safety and those who were forcibly boarded on to trucks, boats and planes. Some were able to stay in the homes of family members or had enough resources to rent their own accommodation. Most refugees, however, stayed in groups organised by their place of origin and remained under the control of militia from those places. The people of Belacasac (Maucatar, Covalima) recalled their time in West Timor:

> In the refugee camp in Wemasa (Belu, West Timor) and the surrounding area the people suffered from lack of food, shelter, clothing, and medicines. We were not free to go about our activities. We were always intimidated and terrorised by Laksaur militia under the command of F35.[495]

486. In total there were at least 200 refugee camps throughout West Timor. According to NGO workers who conducted a documentation project on conditions in the camps, with particular attention to the situation of women refugees, life in the camps was difficult. In some camps barracks were laid out in rows. Other sites consisted of living spaces defined by plastic sheeting or whatever materials could be scrounged, haphazardly constructed around local homes, in woods or along riverbanks. Sanitation facilities in the camps were virtually unavailable. Many refugee locations were close to each other and situated in the midst of West Timorese communities.[496]

Mass deportation to West Timor

An NGO working in West Timor reported on the situation in Belu regency on 15 September 1999:

The [refugees] arriving from Timor-Leste were primarily from Dili, Maliana, Bobonaro, and Ainaro. Approximately 80% were women, 10% children under 5 years, and 1% infants. There were 20% school age children. Male refugees were rarely found in the camp, except the elderly and children under five.

The first East Timorese refugee exodus entered West Timor on 3 September 1999 using trucks, cars, and ships. The second massive group of refugees came in on 10 September 1999, loaded down with their belongings such as refrigerators, television sets and so on.

Along the roads from Kupang to Atambua we also witnessed a lot of looted goods from Dili brought into West Timor by TNI, policemen and militias.

"In the district of Belu-Atambua (about six hours of inland travel from Kupang, or about three hours driving to Dili), the militias, primarily from the groups Aitarak and Besi Merah Putih, are roaming the streets on trucks, cars and bikes with guns and swords. These militia have been searching for anyone suspected as pro-independence supporters. Some of the vehicles are clearly UNAMET property. Policemen and TNI are never seen stopping these cars for questioning or obstructing them in any way. Similar cases have been reported in Kupang.

The refugees were placed in public schools, fields, bus terminals, and parish (facilities)/convents. Most of them were from the middle class. The elite have already fled by plane to Darwin or Jakarta. The poor East Timorese were left behind in camps or are hidden in the mountains still in Timor-Leste. The local government of West Timor has provided plastic sheeting for tents and lean-to buildings for refugees. In Nenuk and in Kupang in parishes and convents, refugees sleep in halls and under eaves, in garages and classrooms.

The normal population of the Atambua is about 30,000 people (Regency of Belu: 243,169). This morning the Bishop of Atambua (15 September) informed us that as of this morning the count of refugees in his diocese had already reached some 85,000."[497]

Humanitarian aid

487. The humanitarian response to the flood of refugees to West Timor was relatively swift. UNCHR and international and local NGOs, as well as Indonesian government agencies and the Indonesian Red Cross had begun to provide emergency shelter, food, water and sanitation by September 1999. Up to the end of March 2000 a huge amount of humanitarian aid had flowed into West Timor. According to NGO observers, standard food allocations consisted of 400 grams of uncooked rice and Rp1,500 for food supplements per person per day.[498] The situation worsened when UNHCR and other agencies withdrew from West Timor in September 2000 following the murder of three of members of staff.

488. Despite this humanitarian effort many community members described conditions in the camps in West Timor as desperate:

While we were there we were very poor, threatened, and estranged from our environment – with no opportunity to work or farm, no house to take shelter in. Many died because of lack food, medicine and sanitation and clean water.[499]

Security

489. The greatest threat experienced by refugees and humanitarian workers was the lack of security. Domestic and international aid workers found ample evidence that armed, or potentially armed, militiamen were the ones actually in charge of the camps. Militiamen often held powerful positions as food distributors, camp leaders or guards at security posts. In a published report, NGO observers reported that they saw guns in the camps or heard references to them. Those who controlled the camps also controlled the aid flowing into them.[500]

490. Refugees were left largely unprotected from militia violence. Access to the camps was severely restricted by militia intimidation and violence. For example, the Commission received a statement from Deolindo Ximenes describing the abduction and disappearance of Venancio do Rego, the village head of Fatumean Village (Fatumean, Covalima). On 8 September 1999, eight known Laksaur militia took Venancio from the temporary shelter in the camp in Nenuk (Atambua) where he and his family were staying. They beat him and put him on the back of a motorcycle. Venancio never returned to his family.[501]

491. Militia also continued to loot and assault the refugees in West Timor. Ciprianus José (Covalima) told the Commission that 15 militiamen beat him and his uncle on 9 September 1999 in a camp in West Timor. They were detained and assaulted for one day by militia carrying guns and machetes and not given any food. The militia stole the buffaloes that they had brought with them from Timor-Leste.[502]

492. UNHCR staff faced various kinds of harassment from militia in West Timor. This included crowds of militia blocking entrance to the camps, stone throwing and firing guns into the air.[503] These militia actions prevented refugees from gaining access to the UNHCR, and as a result the UNHCR was forced to embark on "snatch-and-run" operations. UNHCR would park its trucks outside a camp and move in as quickly as possible to "extract" refugees before militia members were able to organise a response.[504] The UNHCR reported a total of 120 incidents of attacks, harassment, and intimidation of humanitarian workers and refugees during its 12-month presence in West Timor. In August 2000 UNHCR was forced to close down its operations in the camps when three of its staff members were attacked and seriously injured while delivering assistance to Naen camp, outside Kefamenaunu Town. A week after resuming operations UNHCR pulled out completely after the murder of three UNHCR staff members in Atambua on 6 September 2000.[505] Other international agencies followed. Some local NGOs also briefly stopped humanitarian activities due to the dangerous situation in the camps.

493. Refugees were vulnerable to everyday extortion by militia "protection rackets" in the camps. The Commission was told of an incident where an East Timorese man had his life threatened by members of Sakunar militia after they were captured when he and his family were on the run in the forest in Timor-Leste. They were caught by a member of Aitarak militia and taken to West Timor, where they were forced to pay Rp 40,000 to the village head as guarantee for their lives.[506]

494. In their discussions with the Commission the people of Memo recalled how a village-level Babinsa intimidated and forced the people to cross the border to Turiscai, Hakesak and Atambua (West Timor). Some ran to the house of the East Timorese district administrator F36 only to be ridiculed and beaten.

> When we arrived in the refugee camp in Turiscai, we were made to pay the village head to guarantee our safety. They asked us to pay three times. We paid Rp 5,000 to 10.000 for ordinary people and Rp10,000 to 20,000 for civil servants.[507]

Women refugees

495. Women in the camps were particularly vulnerable, both economically and physically. Female refugees had few economic opportunities to enable them to support themselves. They were dependent on men who were themselves often demoralised by the crowded, lawless post-conflict situation. Reports of domestic violence against women refugees were frequent. In the crowded conditions of the barracks privacy was non-existent. Their exposure, along with the near-absence of law enforcement and the presence of militia in the camps made women refugees particularly vulnerable to sexual assault.

496. The Commission received many statements from women who experienced sexual violence in the refugee camps in West Timor. Some had already been victimised in their homes before their deportation or in the places where they had sought refuge in Timor-Leste. The sexual violence they experienced in the camps was often a continuation of this violation; other women suffered sexual violence only after reaching the camps (see Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence).

497. BM described how she was virtually a prisoner in the hands of a militiaman who had already raped her in the school in Suai where she was held with other women after the massacre at the Church in the days after the announcement of the results of the ballot:

> On 13 September we were forced onto a Hino truck with "SOE-DH" written on it. We were brought to a refugee camp near a soccer field. The militiaman [who had raped me at the school building] found me and said that he had been searching for me for two days. He was angry, and hit me in the mouth with a handmade gun, and kicked me in the chest and back. That night he brought me to his house and raped me again. I was there for three months and 16 days. In the morning when he went out he would lock the door. When he came back he would rape me again. If he had to go somewhere far away he would take me with him. Every night I could not resist, because he would get angry at me and hit me. Every night he would rape me. He did not care, even if I got my period. In October I did not get my period, but he did not care either. When I was two months pregnant

I was nauseous and could not eat, but he did not care about my health and continued to rape me… In December when he went to Atambua he did not lock the door. I lied to his sister and said that I would visit my sick mother. Instead I met a young man sent by my mother, who already found out where I was held. He told me that my family was in Namfalus Wemasa. We walked to Namfalus and hid under a tree. The next day, we went back to Suai.[508]

498. Another woman was raped in front of her family:

On 4 September 1999 we ran from Salele to the Suai Church. After the attack on the church, we were brought to Manumutin, Betun. We slept on the verandah of the village cooperative (KUD), because there was no more space. On 11 September, around 2.00am, six Laksaur militia came in a vehicle. Five of them who were armed stayed guarding the vehicle. One person came to where we were sleeping. The man was F37, a Laksaur militia. He pulled out a bloody sword and said, "You see this. This sword is covered with the blood of the four people I have killed." I stayed quiet. They told me to get into the car...I had no choice because they were armed…F37 pushed me hard. I was raped in front of my own son-in-law. I cried and cried and felt so powerless. It was as if I had died.[509]

Returning home

499. In interviews in Dili in December 1999, many returnees reported being physically prevented from leaving the West Timor camps.[510] As one UNHCR spokesperson put it: "The moment an East Timorese expresses a desire to leave the camps and go home, their life is in danger."[511] One refugee described a daily roll call to make sure everyone was in the camp. They were terrorised at night by militiamen warning them of the dangers of returning to Timor-Leste. A man who had recently returned from Betun (West Timor) said militia members told refugees they would be killed if they went back to Timor-Leste. Another man said his family, who were staying in a house in Silawan (Atambua) wanted to leave but were afraid of the militias. When asked to fill out government forms stating their preferred destination, they had said they wanted to stay even though it was not true.[512] The effect of these physical threats was reinforced by a campaign of misinformation that told the refugees that war and chaos continued to rage in Timor-Leste. Refugees were told that there would be revenge attacks against them if they went back, and that Australian peacekeepers were committing atrocities including raping East Timorese women.[513]

500. Amelia Madeira told the Commission that refugees had to leave all their belongings and pay a fee in order to be able to return home:

After the Laksaur militia burned all the houses in Suai on 7 September, I ran with other members of my community to Alas [Betun, West Timor].

After three weeks we wanted to return home. The TNI and a village official from [my village of] Foholulik [Tilomar, Covalima] confiscated all our belongings. They said if you want to go home you have to leave all your possessions behind. Each family had to pay him and the soldiers Rp75,000 each. There were about 100 families wanting to return.[514]

501. In a discussion with the Commission, the people of the village of Beco II (Covalima) recalled the dangers of revealing that they wanted to go home and what they found upon return:

After things became calmer in Timor-Leste our desire to return had to be kept secret, because it was dangerous if people knew. Mutual suspicion in the camps was very high…

[Back in Timor-Leste] people came out of the forest and down from the mountains, but they had no houses or food or medicines. They returned to their villages to find their homes and schools had been turned to ashes. They found that all their possessions were gone and that they were poor. They felt very helpless.[515]

Findings

502. The Commission finds that:

1. The people of Timor-Leste experienced repeated periods of displacement, often in massive numbers, between 1975 and 1999. Most individual East Timorese people alive today have experienced at least one period of displacement. Many have experienced several. All displacements caused major disruption to the lives of those affected. Some directly caused major loss of life.
2. At a minimum, during the period 1975–1999, at least 84,200 people died due to hunger and illness in excess of the peacetime baseline for these causes of death. That is, these deaths were caused by the conflict, and the figure could possibly be as high as 183,000. The overwhelming number of these deaths occurred in the years 1977–1978 and during the period of large-scale Indonesian military attacks on Fretilin bases in the interior where large numbers of civilians were living and in 1979 during the subsequent period of Indonesian military detention camps and ABRI/TNI-controlled resettlement areas.
3. These displacements took many forms, occurred in a complex variety of circumstances and lasted for periods that could extend from days to years. For example:
   - In the period before and during the civil war of August–September 1975 displacement commonly took the form of flight to escape coming under the control of or being subjected to violence by one of the parties to the conflict.

- After the Indonesian invasion in December 1975 some people fled spontaneously either in response to perceived threats or to escape a very real and present threat. At the same time Fretilin organised the evacuation of communities, sometimes resorting to coercive methods.
- When the Indonesian military stepped up its attacks on Fretilin and the population under its control from 1977 onwards, some groups scattered, others were forced to keep constantly on the move to evade capture, and yet others moved in an orderly fashion to new locations.
- The massive Indonesian assaults on the population concentrations still under Fretilin control that lasted from late 1977 until the end of 1978 ended with tens of thousands of people being forced into resettlement camps under the strict control of the Indonesian military. In these and subsequent displacements by the Indonesian military, such as those to the island of Ataúro in the early 1980s, the displaced found themselves being subjected to a rigorous form of detention intended to further Indonesian military objectives.
- The large-scale movements that took place in the period surrounding the Popular Consultation of 30 August 1999 involved both flight from TNI and militia violence and forced deportations to West Timor.

503. However, whatever form it took displacement invariably had a seriously damaging impact on those affected, including by ending in the deaths of tens of thousands of people in the 1970s.

4. Death was caused by famine, famine-related diseases, vulnerability to sickness from hunger, fear or exhaustion and a lack of access to medical care. Although the actual number of deaths is incalculable, it is likely that more people died from the effects of displacement than from any other violation.
5. For the survivors, displacement was the direct cause of a deep and abiding anguish at the loss of family members in horrific circumstances, which they were powerless to control or change. Displacement also meant vulnerability to other violations, including arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment, extrajudicial killings, sexual violence, forced labour and forced recruitment. It also regularly entailed hunger and deprivation of the means of making a livelihood through the destruction of or loss of access to food crops, livestock, housing, agricultural implements and land.
6. Displacement also disrupted the fragile subsistence economy on which the majority of the population depended. One indication of this disruption was the dramatic fall between 1973 and 1980 in the number of livestock, which are crucial as factors of production, means of transportation and sources of wealth in East Timorese agricultural communities. The devastation of Timor-Leste's livestock was closely related to the wider disruption created by displacements, resulting as it did from their abandonment by fleeing communities, their intentional destruction by Indonesian forces, their consumption by a population desperate for any form of sustenance, and their deaths due to starvation and bombardment.

7. In Timor-Leste, displacement was a violation that primarily affected communities. Its affect on communities was often long-lasting and utterly destructive of their integrity. Displacement was often used indiscriminately by the Indonesian military against communities or groups within communities as form of collective punishment and sometimes as a form of hostage taking.
8. Displacement was a persistent theme running throughout the period of the Commission's mandate. This was so not just because 1974-99 were years of conflict in Timor-Leste. The Commission believes that some of the most harmful impacts of displacement were the direct result of mistaken policy decisions. The Commission believes, for example, that Indonesia displaced people from their homes repeatedly in order to control them, used food as a weapon of war, refused for reasons of military strategy to allow international humanitarian agencies access to Timor-Leste until famine had reached catastrophic proportions, and forcibly displaced East Timorese civilians to West Timor for purely political ends.

The internal conflict August–September 1975

504. The Commission finds that:

9. In the period after the formation of political parties, but before the outbreak of the internal armed conflict, there were instances where communities fled to escape violence at the hands of their political opponents. The scale of these displacements was relatively small and the length of time for which people were displaced relatively short.
10. The inter-party conflict in August and September 1975 resulted in population displacements. Fearing persecution from opposing parties, many people fled their homes to safety. Fretilin supporters were forced to leave their homes which were burnt by UDT supporters. After 20 August 1975, UDT supporters who felt threatened by Fretilin, spontaneously crossed the border into West Timor, Indonesia. Others were forced across the border by members of UDT. Smaller numbers went to Australia, Portugal and other countries, either at this time or later after a period spent in the camps in West Timor.
11. The Commission was unable to determine with any certainty the number of refugees in West Timor. The international aid agencies operating in West Timor at the time seem to have relied on figures received directly from the Indonesian authorities, who claimed that 40,000 East Timorese had taken refuge in West Timor. A wide range of informed East Timorese people who were in West Timor at the time has contested these figures. These latter sources say that the actual number of refugees in West Timor was significantly lower than the Indonesian figure. These sources have said that the Indonesian authorities inflated the figures both in order to receive larger quantities of relief aid than were justified by the true number of refugees in need of assistance and to create the impression that the scale of the fighting was greater than it actually was, that large numbers of East Timorese were unwilling to accept a Fretilin administration and that Fretilin's victory in the civil war posed a threat to regional stability.

12. The Commission is uncertain of the number of people who were internally displaced at this time. It has no way, for example, of verifying the ICRC's estimate that more than 50% of the population was displaced during this period. Whatever the number, most had spontaneously returned to their homes within weeks of having fled them.
13. A small number of the people displaced within Timor-Leste and of people who fled over the border into West Timor died as a result of the deprivation they suffered while displaced. In the camps in West Timor there were also cases of people being killed. Usually these people were Fretilin supporters who had been coerced into crossing the border.
14. International humanitarian agencies were able to provide emergency food and medical aid inside Timor-Leste and in the camps in West Timor.
15. The de facto Fretilin administration in principle allowed aid agencies access to all areas of Timor-Leste. In practice the main agency providing food aid to the population, the ICRC, chose to restrict its relief activities to a small area around Dili, while supplies provided by the Australian Council for Overseas Aid (ACFOA) were distributed by Fretilin in Fretilin-controlled areas. All aid programmes had only just got underway when they had to be abandoned in early December 1975 because of the impending Indonesian invasion.
16. Aid flows to refugees in West Timor after the invasion also diminished. The testimony of people who were in the camps, including church people, indicates that the food was used as both a political tool and as a means to recruit East Timorese to fight as auxiliaries with the Indonesian army. There is also evidence that food and other assistance was withdrawn in April 1976 when East Timorese in West Timor refused to endorse Indonesia's political goals in Timor-Leste. Thereafter the refugees suffered severe hardship, and some died.

The invasion

505. The Commission finds that:

17. Large numbers of people fled their homes in anticipation of and following the Indonesian invasion. Large numbers of people fled major population centres as Indonesian forces moved to control them from December 1975 onwards. Most who fled did so in fear for their lives.
18. Many people living in areas outside Indonesian control and in areas where fighting was not going on still fled their homes as soon as they heard that Indonesian forces had invaded. They fled for a number of different reasons: in fear for their lives; in response to Indonesian claims that they would achieve a quick victory; on learning of Indonesian atrocities in the early days of the invasion; and because Fretilin ordered them to do so.

19. The evacuation of the population took place in a variety of circumstances. Some evacuations from towns and villages were unorganised; others were coordinated by the Fretilin-led resistance.
20. The level of organisation of the evacuations varied according to the extent to which Fretilin itself had developed its own organisation during the period of its de facto administration and whether it had taken measures to prepare for the evacuation of the population.
21. Fretilin had a declared policy of evacuating the civilian population to safety and of organising a national liberation movement in the mountains and interior. The Commission learned of instances where, to achieve that objective, it forced communities to evacuate, including people who were reluctant to leave their homes.
22. The Commission has been unable to calculate the number of people who were displaced during the first two years of the occupation. The eventual movement of around 300,000 people into Indonesian-controlled centres by 1978-79 is the best pointer to the massive scale of the displacement which began in late 1975. In view of the fact that a large number of people died in the mountains, and therefore never became part of the Indonesian-controlled population, the actual number of people who were displaced after the invasion is likely to be higher than 300,000.
23. The mass evacuation to the mountains, including Fretilin's decision to take large numbers of people with it, was made without sufficient thought about the problems of housing, feeding and protecting such a large population. In many Fretilin-controlled areas living conditions in the months after the initial flight were extremely difficult. Their difficulty was somewhat alleviated once structures had been set up to mobilise the population for such tasks as communal farming and to provide for the needs of the most vulnerable. However, even where such organisation was in place, the Commission learned, the death rate continued to be abnormally high.
24. The Commission received evidence suggesting that in the years 1976-78 the desire to surrender was geographically widespread and persistent among the population under Fretilin control. It is impossible to gauge how many people wanted to surrender, particularly as those expressing their feelings on this matter were liable to severe punishment, including death. The Commission did receive testimony supporting the conclusion that some communities understandably concealed their true feelings on this matter. At the same time it also heard of instances where civilians given the opportunity to surrender refused to take it and where, when people were finally ordered to surrender, they did so with great reluctance.
25. For most people who stayed in the mountains until the end of Operation Seroja in late 1978-79, the pattern of their lives was that after a period of relative calm and adequate living conditions they were constantly on the move until the final stages of the military campaign. In these stages they were hemmed in with thousands of others in an isolated location where they came under terrifying attack by Indonesian forces using all the means at their disposal to force them into submission, including starvation. The incessant bombardments to which they were subjected made it impossible for them to look for food, much less grow or harvest it. In these final stages of resistance the number of people who died increased sharply.

26. Some communities either did not flee the invading forces or surrendered early to them. However, Indonesian forces also confined these communities in designated areas where they suffered from lack of food, restricted movement and harsh repression. The Commission was told that conditions in the camps where people who had surrendered to, or had been captured by, Indonesian forces in the first two years of the occupation were so inimical to survival that many deaths by deprivation occurred. All the elements that led to deaths by deprivation on a massive scale in later years were already present during this early period: the refusal to grant direct access to international aid agencies, minimal provision of food and medicines, the concentration of the population in camps, tight restrictions on freedom of movement which made it difficult to grow food crops, the use of intimidation and terror to punish and ensure the compliance of camp inmates.

Food crops and livestock destroyed

506. The Commission finds that:

27. From 1976 to 1978 the Indonesian armed forces systematically destroyed or removed food crops, food stores, agricultural implements, gardens and fields, and livestock belonging to East Timorese people who had fled from their homes and villages.
28. The Commission has not been able to obtain any documentary material which explains the thinking underlying this strategy. However, it can only conclude that the aim of these Indonesian military operations was to starve the civilian population under Fretilin control into surrendering, and to deny Fretilin/Falintil access to food sources.
29. The impact of the destruction of farmers' capital embodied in their gardens, agricultural implements and livestock was that when they did return to their home villages they found it difficult to resume agricultural activity.
30. As large numbers of East Timorese civilians came under direct Indonesian control the Indonesian military conducted special operations to destroy cultivated and wild food sources to deny food to the Resistance. This practice also resulted in long-term damage to food sources for all East Timorese people.
31. The Indonesian military also regularly burned and destroyed the crops and livestock of people already under their control, either as a form of punishment, as a means of ensuring that they did not stray beyond the limits of the camp to farm their plots, or to force them to move to a new place and to deter them from returning to their original homes once they had moved.

32. The Commission also received some reports of Falintil forces destroying agricultural plots of the local population. These were isolated reports of isolated incidents, and did not point to a systematic or widespread pattern.

Life and death in the mountains

507. The Commission finds that:

33. For many East Timorese civilians life in the rural areas and mountains was relatively peaceful and stable for the first year or two after the invasion. This changed when Indonesian military operations began in their area.
34. During this "normal" time, in many areas of Timor-Leste under their direct control, the Fretilin leadership took steps to organise food production and distribution and to provide basic healthcare. In the zonas libertadas it pursued this policy, which relied heavily on the support of the civilian population. In many of the cases of which the Commission has learned, attaining the level of organisation needed to meet the needs of the population under its control took time. In the period before minimal self-sufficiency was achieved the evacuated population suffered severe deprivation that caused some to die.
35. The Fretilin/Falintil leadership imprisoned people under its control for allegedly wanting to surrender. Preventing surrenders may have been a justifiable action to protect the security of Resistance bases and the civilian population in them. However, the persecution of people suspected of wanting to surrender became indistinguishable from the political conflict within the Resistance.
36. Reported torture or other inhuman treatment by Fretilin/Falintil and extended time in primitive prison pens for civilians attempting surrender or suspected of spying was cruel and excessive, and led to the deaths of many detainees. Fretilin/Falintil also executed persons suspected of wanting to surrender, often on the flimsiest of evidence and without following judicial proceedings.
37. Fretilin policy preventing surrenders changed only in late 1978 when it was forced on the leadership by the critical situation of the civilian population. The Commission is unable to determine how many people did want to surrender. It has, however, received testimony both that ordinary civilians who were offered the option of surrender before late 1978 refused to take it and that when finally ordered to surrender some were reluctant to do so. In some cases this reluctance appears to have driven by a determination to continue the struggle against the invading forces at all costs. However, the Commission also received testimony indicating that well-grounded fears of ill-treatment by Indonesian forces was also a reason for their reluctance. In the final stages of their displacement under Fretilin control the civilian population faced an agonising choice between death in the mountains and the possibility of a similar fate if they surrendered to Indonesian forces. In fact the conditions after surrender were not sufficient to sustain life.

38. Large numbers of people died of hunger and hunger-related disease while under Fretilin control. Although people were dying throughout the period when they were fleeing the Indonesian military or living under Fretilin control, the largest number of deaths occurred in the final months before surrender, both as a result of Indonesian bombardment and of hunger and hunger-related disease.

39. Between mid-1977 and late 1978 the Indonesian military launched a military campaign to crush the Resistance, conquer the extensive areas still outside its control and force the population living in those areas to surrender. Before launching this "encirclement and annihilation" campaign Indonesian forces constantly harried the population, forcing them to make repeated flights. These flights typically ended with many thousands of people being concentrated in particular areas, such as Mount Matebian, the Natarbora Plain, Fatubessi in Ermera, Mount llimanu in Manatuto and the coastal areas of Alas in Manufahi and Beco and Halik in Covalima, where they then came under intense bombardment from the land, sea and air.

40. As the intensity of Indonesian military operations increased in particular areas many displaced people were continually on the move to avoid death, injury or capture. While on the run from Indonesian attacks, many East Timorese civilians died from deprivation due to hunger, exhaustion, sickness and lack of access to medical services. Life on the run meant that food cultivation was virtually impossible.

41. In their attacks on Resistance bases or Fretilin-led population groups on the run, Indonesian forces did not discriminate between civilians and combatants. Many civilians were killed in these attacks.

42. As large concentrations of people came under attack, the wild foods and natural water sources that were their only means of sustenance often became contaminated. In most cases where witnesses reported the occurrence of such contamination it appears to have been the result of routine bombing attacks. However it was alleged that the Indonesian attack on Lesumau in Ermera in mid-1978 used toxic bombs which contaminated food and water supplies in the area.

43. Famine conditions began to emerge in Timor-Leste some time between late 1977 and late 1978 – that is death from hunger and associated weakness began to occur on a large scale. These conditions were increasingly present among people on the run and among those driven in large numbers into circumscribed areas where encirclement by Indonesian forces effectively prohibited further movements, even in search of food. During this phase famine was the direct result of military operations; it was not caused by drought.

Camps and settlements under Indonesian military control

508. The Commission finds that:

44. People who surrendered or were captured by the Indonesian military had to live in camps for up to several years. The camps were supervised and monitored closely by the military. They were created for security reasons, not for the welfare of the population in them.
45. Civilians who surrendered or were captured were first moved to transit camps for registration and interrogation before being relocated to internment and resettlement camps and later to resettlement villages. While security controls eased at each of these stages, a defining characteristic of all such camps or villages was restricted or no access to gardens located further than a specified distance from these settlements.
46. The Indonesian military gave a higher priority to the attainment of military objectives than to meeting its humanitarian obligations to the inmates of these camps. From the time of their creation, provision for basic food and survival needs in the camps was inadequate.
47. The camps became the sites for a fully-fledged famine in which unknown numbers died. Already in a weakened state when they entered the camps, internees endured extended periods without access to food gardens or emergency humanitarian aid. The food that they received from the military was utterly inadequate to keep them alive. It was also often inappropriate for people already suffering severe malnutrition. Even the meagre rations that the military made available to camp inmates were distributed in a discriminatory way. The Commission has learned that in exchange for food the military and their auxiliaries extorted money, family heirlooms and other valuables (for example gold and traditional beads), and sexual favours.
48. Although the military campaign waged by the Indonesian military in 1977-78 had aimed precisely at the outcome it achieved – namely the mass surrender of the population under Fretilin control into areas under Indonesian control – the Indonesian authorities made little or no preparation for meeting the barest needs of this population for shelter, food and medicines. In the early stages of this campaign it must have become apparent to the Indonesian military that the surrendering population was seriously debilitated and in dire need of these essentials for their survival. However, rather than creating conditions that might avert famine, it both neglected the basic needs of the surrendering population and imposed restrictions and sanctions on them that were bound to make their already dire circumstances even worse.
49. The scale of the famine in mid- to late 1979 and the fact that it was rapidly worsening can be seen in international aid agency reports of the time. For example, as a result of its survey in April 1979 US Catholic Relief Services estimated that 200,000 people were in a "serious or critically malnourished condition". By September 1979 it found that the number of people in this condition was closer to 300,000. The International Red Cross described 60,000 out of the 75,000 people it surveyed in July 1979 as being "in a state of alarming malnutrition" including "20,000 dying from hunger".[516]

Humanitarian aid

509. The Commission finds that:

50. The Indonesian Government refused permission for any international humanitarian aid agencies to operate inside Timor-Leste from the day of its invasion on 7 December 1975 until late 1979. There can be no doubt that the Indonesian military authorities in Timor-Leste were aware of the rising death toll due to famine in the camps under its control.
51. From at least late 1976, the Indonesian Government allowed food aid to reach the people and camps under its control through the Indonesian Red Cross and the Catholic Church. All reports to the Commission show this aid was far too little or too late to prevent famine in the camps between 1977 and 1979. The efforts of the Catholic Church to provide more aid and to handle or monitor its distribution were systematically frustrated.
52. Reports of death from protein shock after receiving food aid and the near universal observation of former inmates that the rice and corn they received were mouldy demonstrate the unfitness of the Indonesian authorities to handle famine relief.
53. Reports of famine began to reach international aid agencies as early as April 1977, prompting requests to the Indonesian Government for aid agencies to enter the territory. A high-level visit by nine foreign ambassadors in September 1978 to resettlement camps in Timor-Leste increased international awareness of the need for a major humanitarian aid programme. Yet the Indonesian Government did not permit international agencies to operate in Timor-Leste for another 12 months.
54. The Indonesian Government's refusal to admit international aid programmes, even when the need for them was widely known internationally, was almost certainly because the Indonesian military did not want any witnesses or impediments to its military campaign to bring the population under its control and weaken the Resistance. The Commission believes that the timing of the decisions to permit CRS and the ICRC to carry out surveys in Timor-Leste, in April and July 1979, and then to allow the agencies' operations to begin only in September 1979 is highly suggestive. What had changed by that time was not that the scale of the famine had reached massive proportions – that had already been known many months earlier – but that the Indonesian military believed that the campaign to destroy the Resistance was essentially over.
55. Once admitted, international aid organisations were still restricted in their operations. They were permitted few non-Indonesian personnel on the ground in Timor-Leste. They faced frequent impediments to their work in what was already a difficult operational setting. They were not permitted to deliver aid to areas outside Indonesian military control.

56. The international aid operation that began in late 1979 reached most of the population in the camps and others in need. It greatly relieved the famine conditions prevailing across Timor-Leste.
57. The Commission received evidence from East Timorese people who had worked with the international aid agencies, from church people and from the intended recipients of the aid that relief aid was routinely diverted from its supposed target, either to be sold for personal gain or to be used for personal consumption by members of the Indonesian military and some staff members of the aid agencies in question.

Strategic relocation villages and internment

510. The Commission finds that:

58. From the early 1980s the Indonesian authorities introduced new forms of displacement. These were related to two separate developments. The first was the decision to dismantle or scale down the resettlement camps that had been established to accommodate the population that had surrendered in the late 1970s. The second was the reorganisation of the Resistance as a guerrilla force capable of launching localised attacks on ABRI.
59. For many the decision to move them out of resettlement camps did not lead to a marked improvement in their living conditions. There were some positive aspects, in particular the provision of schools, clinics, markets and easier transportation. However, the Commission has overwhelming evidence that at least during the first half of the 1980s, this phase of displacement was often managed in such a way as to ensure that those displaced did not enjoy the supposed benefits of the programme. Yet again it was a programme that served military objectives, but did not guarantee survival. For many of those moved, their transfer from resettlement camps to strategic villages, new villages and even back to their own villages did not substantially improve their lot. Restrictions on freedom of movement continued to have a serious impact on food production and thus on people's well-being.
60. Moreover, even after the resettlement camps were dismantled, settlement patterns in Timor-Leste remained radically different from their pre-invasion form. Even today there are many signs of it. Many people were forced to live in towns and along major roads. Many fertile areas of the country were abandoned.
61. The displacements carried out in response to signs that the Resistance had survived the destruction of its bases were heavily punitive. These displacements took place following guerrilla attacks, defections to the Resistance by East Timorese who had been enlisted into Indonesian civil defence units, and the establishment of clandestine support networks. They involved the collective punishment of whole communities and the proxy punishment of relatives of people still fighting in the forest and interior.

62. A cumulative total of more than 6,000 people were forcibly displaced to the island of Ataúro between mid-1980 and 1984. At its peak in late 1982 the displaced population exceeded 4,000. The majority of people sent to the island were not political activists or Resistance fighters, but people from the 12 districts (excluding Oecussi) who were relatives of, or were suspected of having contact with, Resistance fighters still in the forest. They consisted predominantly of women and children, and found it extremely difficult to fend for themselves in an environment which was extremely barren. They were kept on the island for periods ranging from a few months to six years. Those who arrived in the first wave of forced displacement were not given adequate food or other support. The Indonesian military was also negligent in its provision of basic medical care, clean water, sanitation and shelter. About 5% of the people displaced to Ataúro died there. Some were able to survive because they received help from the local population, even though an influx of people in numbers that were not far short of the island's total indigenous population put a severe strain on its meagre resources. Conditions improved when the International Red Cross was permitted entry in 1982. When people were released from Ataúro, some were merely transferred to other areas for a further period of internment.

63. Some of those detained after attacks by members of the Resistance on military posts and units were also sent to Ataúro. Others were displaced from their home villages and sent to areas where they had to rebuild their lives virtually unaided in extremely inhospitable environments. This was the fate of many of the inhabitants of the villages in Ainaro and Manufahi that took part in the Kablaki uprising of August 1982 and of the mainly women survivors of the mass executions that followed the Kraras (Viqueque) uprising in August 1983. The latter group were sent to the previously uninhabited area of Lalerek Mutin where they were left to fend for themselves under tight military surveillance. The population of Lalerek Mutin suffered sexual violations, disappearances, hunger, disease and death there. Their treatment was strikingly similar to that of the people from Ainaro who had been moved to the villages of Raifusa and Dotik in the district of Manufahi the previous year.

Displacement before and after the Popular Consultation in 1999

511. The Commission finds that:

64. There was a direct connection between the creation of anti-independence militias in Timor-Leste from late 1998 and an upsurge in violence which caused fear, displacement, deprivation and death.

65. This fear was compounded by a widespread understanding that despite the obligation of the Indonesian Government under the 5 May Agreements to create and maintain a secure environment for the Popular Consultation, the militia groups had the support of the TNI and the wider governmental apparatus, and on that basis enjoyed impunity for their actions. Most of the violence and intimidation in Timor-Leste in 1999 was conducted by militia members rather than Indonesian military personnel. Much of this violence did however occur in the presence of armed Indonesian military or police who took no action to prevent it. People seeking police protection from militia violence were denied assistance.

66. There is strong evidence that the militia groups forcibly recruited members into their ranks. One reason why people fled their homes was to avoid recruitment into the militias.
67. Militia violence before the Popular Consultation reached a peak in April 1999 with attacks in many places, the massacre at the Liquiçá Church and spontaneous flight of many people. They sought refuge in the remote locations in the countryside, with relatives in other areas and in church compounds. Some, from the western districts and Oecussi, crossed the border into West Timor, Indonesia.
68. The objective of militia violence was to win a majority for the autonomy option in the ballot of 30 August. In the lead-up to the Popular Consultation it used violence indiscriminately to secure that outcome. Thus, while it also targeted those who were prominently identified as pro-independence, such as leaders of CNRT and members of pro-independence student organisations, ordinary civilians and whole communities and those who offered them protection, including the Church, also became its victims. One reflection of these priorities is that the militias (and the TNI) did not engage militarily against Falintil forces.
69. Under threat of this indiscriminate violence from militia groups, large numbers of people stayed away from their normal places of residence. One authoritative source estimates as many as 60,000 were displaced. Many returned only to register or vote before again returning to places of refuge.
70. As the number of displaced persons grew and settled in large concentrations in places where they thought they would find safety, their living conditions deteriorated, in some cases becoming acute.
71. The Indonesian authorities and their militia allies resorted to a variety of means, including bureaucratic obstructionism and violence, to thwart attempts by local NGOs, supported by UNAMET and UN agencies, to give humanitarian assistance to the displaced.
72. Poor security conditions and the associated flight of large numbers of people during 1998 and 1999 disrupted the planting of food crops. This compounded food shortages caused by a poor harvest in 1998 due to low rainfall.
73. The comprehensive "scorched earth" tactics employed by the TNI and the militia groups after the Popular Consultation, marked by threats of violence, killings, mass forced deportations and the destruction of public and private buildings throughout Timor-Leste, caused the bulk of the population to become displaced, either internally or externally.

74. About 250,000 people were displaced to West Timor after the ballot. Detailed plans for the evacuation of a large proportion of the population, involving several Indonesian Government ministries, had been drawn up well before the ballot. Most of these people were forcibly displaced, that is, violence or the threat of violence was used to ensure that the civilian population complied with the wish of the Indonesian authorities that they should leave Timor-Leste.
75. East Timorese in camps and other places in West Timor where people had settled continued to be subject to the control, intimidation and violence of militia members. Many who wanted to return to Timor-Leste were prevented from doing so by a combination or threats and misinformation from militia members.
76. While international aid organisations were able to distribute humanitarian assistance to the forcibly displaced, they were also subject to control, intimidation, attacks and killings by militia members.

Endnotes

1. International Criminal Court Elements of Crimes, Adopted by the Assembly of State Parties, ICC-ASP/1/3, Article 7(1)(d), p.118. This definition, taken from a draft version of the Elements of Crimes, was endorsed by the ICTY in Prosecutor v Radislav Krstic, ICTY Case No IT-98-33-T, Trial Chamber Judgment, 2 August 2001, Paragraph 529; and in Prosecutor v Milomir Staki, ICTY Case No IT-97-24-T, Trial Chamber Judgment, 31 July 2003, Paragraph 682.
2. ICC Elements of Crimes, Adopted by the Assembly of State Parties, ICC-ASP/1/3, Article 7(1) (d), p. 118.
3. ICC Elements of Crimes, adopted by the Assembly of State Parties, ICC-ASP/1/3, Articles 7(1) (d), 8 (2) (a) (vii)-1, 8 (2) (b) (viii) and 8 (2) (e) (viii), pp. 118, 130, 136 and 154.
4. Article 13(1) United Nations Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) and Article 12(1) International Convention on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR).
5. Article 12(3) ICCPR; Human Rights Committee (HRC) General Comment No 27, paras 11, 14 and 15.
6. Principle 6, UN Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement, E/CN.4/1998/53/Add.2, 11 February 1998.
7. See for example: Principles 7(2), 18 and 25, UN Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement, E/CN.4/1998/53/Add.2, 11 February 1998.
8. Article 49 Geneva Convention IV.
9. Article 49 Geneva Convention IV.
10. Article 147 Geneva Convention IV.
11. Article 25 Hague Regulations; Article 27 Geneva Convention IV; Articles 51 and 52 Geneva Protocol I.
12. Article 51(4) and (5) Geneva Protocol I; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports at para 78.
13. Article 33 Geneva Convention IV; Article 51(2) Geneva Protocol I.
14. See extract from John Osgood Field, The challenge of famine, Kumarian Press, Connecticut, 1993 in < http://www.ucc.ie/research/famine/About/abfamine.htm> at 26 March 2005
15. Amartya Sen, Poverty and Famines: An Essay on Entitlements and Deprivation, Oxford University Press, Oxford, 1981.
16. Article 25(1) UDHR and Article 11 (1) International Convention on Economic Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR).
17. Article 11(2) ICESCR.
18. ICESCR General Comment No 12 para 8.

19. HRC General Comment No 6, para 5.
20. ICESCR General Comment No 12, para 14.
21. ICESCR General Comment No 15, para 3; Article 11(1) ICESCR.
22. Article 25(1) UDHR; Article 11(1) ICESCR; Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR) General Comment No 4.
23. CESCR General Comment No 12, para 19.
24. Article 3 UDHR, Article 6 ICCPR.
25. Article 54, Protocol I of the 1977 Protocols Additional to the Geneva Conventions and Article 8 (2) (b) (xxv), ICC Elements of Crimes, adopted by the Assembly of State Parties, ICC-ASP/1/3, p. 144.
26. Article 7 (1) (b), ICC Elements of Crimes, adopted by the Assembly of State Parties, ICC-ASP/1/3, p. 116.
27. Article 55, Geneva Convention IV; see also Article 56 Geneva Convention IV re medical treatment and Articles 59-62 re accepting aid.
28. CAVR Community Profile, Tasi, Vemasse Sub-district, Baucau District, 28 March 2003; CAVR Community Profile Bahamori, Baha, Venilale Sub-district, Baucau District, 29 May 2003; CAVR Community Profile Mape, Zumalai sub-district, Covalima District5 June 2003.
29. CAVR Community Profile, Bemori, Dili District, 29 May 2003.
30. Memorandum by A. Pasquier to the ICRC Geneva titled International Committee of the Red Cross, East Timor Relief Operation, Concerning: Situation in Timor, Report of the Activities of the Delegation from 1 to 15 September. Dated, Darwin, 16 September, 1975.
31. UN CivPol National Investigations Interview with Paulo de Fatima Martins, 25 October 2000.
32. CAVR Interview with Emiliano Teixeira (Rui) Lopes, Kamenasa, Covalima, 26 March 2003. See also CAVR interviews wih João Sereno and Nito Lopes, Kamenas, Covalima 26 March 2003.
33. CAVR Community Profile, Odomau, Bobonaro District, 3 March, 2003.
34. CAVR Community Profile, Aitoun, Beidasi, Covalima District, 17 October 2002.
35. CAVR Community Profile, Lela, Covalima District, 18 February 2003.
36. CAVR Community Profile, Ritabou, Bobonaro District, 10 February 2003.
37. CAVR Community Profile, Holsa, Bobonaro District, 14 March 2003.
38. CAVR Community Profile, Memo, Bobonaro District, 22 January 2003.
39. CAVR Community Profile, Raifun, Bobonaro District, 3 February 2003.
40. CAVR Community Profile, Vaviquinia, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 3 July 2003.
41. CAVR Community Profile, Leimea Sorin Balu, Ermera District, 21 October 2002.
42. HRVD Statement 07025.
43. HRVD Statement 02450.
44. HRVD Statement 02473.
45. CAVR Interview with João Carrascalão, Dili, 30 July 2004.
46. Father Francisco Fernandes and Father Apolinario Guterres, Statement Delivered to the Fourth Committee of the UN General Assembly on behalf of the Comissão dos Refugiados de Timor Oriental, 26 October 1979.
47. Tomás Gonçalves, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
48. As cited in Richard Woolcott, The Hot Seat, HarperCollins Publishers, Australia, 2003 p. 156.
49. Situation in Timor, Reports on activities of the delegation from 1–15 September to the ICRC Geneva. 16 September 1975.
50. Telex from Testuz Jakarta 29/9/75 to Pasquier, Red Cross Darwin.
51. Submission from CRS to the CAVR, p. 17.
52. Telex to CRS from ICRC on October 31, 1975.
53. Telex from Testuz Jakarta 29/9/75 to Pasquier, Red Cross Darwin.
54. CAVR Interview with Nito Lopes, Kamenasa, Suai, 26 March 2003.
55. Ibid.
56. CAVR Interview with Emiliano Teixeira (Rui) Lopes, Kamenasa, Suai, 26 March 2003.
57. National Security Archives, Letter from José Martins to UN Secretary General, as relayed by the US Mission to UN to Secretary of State May 1976 (Document Number: 1976USUNNO1891).
58. Father Francisco Fernandes and Father Apolinario Guterres, Statement Delivered to the Fourth Committee of the UN General Assembly, pp. 2-3.
59. CAVR Interview with Emiliano Teixeira (Rui) Lopes, Kamenasa, Suai, April 2003.
60. HRVD Statement 02491.
61. ICRC relief program in Eastern Timor, André Pasquier, November 24 1975.
62. Memorandum by A. Pasquier to the ICRC Geneva entitled International Committee of the Red Cross, East Timor Relief Operation, Concerning: Situation in Timor, Report of the activities of the delegation from 1–15 September. Dated, Darwin, 16 September, 1975.

63. ICRC notes on telephone discussions relating to Portuguese Timor, 12 September 1975; Discussion between LG Stubbings, Pasquier and JT Ferwerda Darwin, 6-7 November 1975.
64. ICRC notes on telephone conversation with Mr Pasquier, November 21, 1975.
65. HRVD Statement 03788.
66. HRVD Statement 00606.
67. HRVD Statement 03412.
68. HRVD Statement 09071.
69. UN Security Council debate on East Timor, address by K.L. Fry, MP April 1976, based on his visit to East Timor in mid-September 1975; Telegram from José Ramos-Horta, to ACFOA, 24 September 1975.
70. CAVR Interview Benvinda G.D. Lopes, Darabai Village (Uatolari, Viqueque), 16 September 2003.
71. CAVR Community Profile, Uailili Village, Baucau Town, Baucau, 28 October 2003.
72. Manuel Carceres da Costa, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, Dili, 28–29 July 2003.
73. CAVR Interview with Francisco Bernardino Soares, Ermera Town, Ermera, 10 September 2003.
74. José Sereno, Maria José da Costa, testimonies to CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, Dili, 28–29 July 2003.
75. CAVR Community Profile, Suai Loro, Suai, Covalima, 10 December 2003.
76. C AVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman, Letefoho, Same, Ermera, 23 February 2003.
77. CAVR Community Profile, Coliate, Hatolia Sub-district, Ermera District, 1 September 2003.
78. CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 19 June 2003.
79. CAVR Community Profile, Defawasi, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 23 September 2003.
80. CAVR Community Profile, Caisido, Baucau Town Sub-district, Baucau District (undated).
81. CAVR Community Profile, Bidau Santana/Bidau Meti-Aut, Cristo Rei, Dili District (undated).
82. Ibid.
83. CAVR Community Profile, Buruma, Baucau Town Sub-district, Baucau District, 2 December 2003.
84. CAVR Interview with Alvaro dos Santos, 28 September 2003.
85. CAVR Interview with Paulino da Costa Neves Beikala, Hato Udo, Ainaro, 20 December 2003.
86. CAVR Interview with Sister Consuela Martinez, Bebonuk Clinic Dili, 4 July 2003.
87. Ibid.
88. Gilman dos Santos, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Famine and Forced Displacement, Dili, 28–29 Juli 2003.
89. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili 7 July 2004.
90. CAVR Interview with Cosme Freitas, Vemasse, Baucau, 10 April 2003.
91. Ibid.
92. Ibid.
93. CAVR Research Report on Suai 24–28 March 2003. CAVR Archive.
94. Ibid.
95. CAVR Interview with João Sereno 25 March 2003.
96. CAVR Research Report on Suai 24–28 March 2003.
97. CAVR Interviews with Bonfácio Reis, Hatolia, Ermera, 13 August 2003 Sebastião da Silva, Ossu, Viqueque, June 2003, Julio Maria de Jesus, Viqueque 29 May 2003.
98. CAVR Interview with Maria José da Costa, Letefoho, Same, Manufahi, 24 February 2003.
99. CAVR Community Profile, Baguia Laveteri CP, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 9 October 2003.
100. CAVR Interview with Eduardo de Deus Barreto, Gleno, Ermera, 24 November 2003.
101. CAVR Community Profile, Defawasi, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 23 September 2003.
102. CAVR Community Profile, Ahic, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 22 November 2002.
103. HRVD Statement 02005.
104. HRVD Statement 02054.
105. HRVD Statement 06080.
106. HRVD Statement 00522.
107. HRVD Statement 03403.
108. HRVD Statement 03409.
109. CAVR Interview with Luis Casmiro Martins; and his Submission to CAVR, "Data on those dead and sick due to hunger, disease and bombardments etc, in Hatolia (Ermera) and other places during the war." 29 September 2003.
110. HRVD Statement 5762.
111. HRVD Statement 0160.
112. HRVD Statement 02056.
113. HRVD Statement 03160.
114. CAVR Interview with Elias Quintão, Hato Udo, Ainaro 18 December 2003.

115. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
116. CAVR Community Profile Hoholau, Aileu Town Sub-district, Aileu District, 20 February 2004.
117. CAVR Community Profile Lausi/Bandudato, Aileu Town Sub-district, Aileu District, 16 February 2004.
118. HRVD Statement 0162.
119. HRVD Statement 5222.
120. HRVD Statement 0431.
121. Manuel Carceres da Costa Testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, Dili, 28–29 July 2003.
122. HRVD Statement 0583.
123. HRVD Statement 3090.
124. HRVD Statement 7336.
125. CAVR Interview with Francisco Barbosa, Manumera, Turiscai, 11 September 2003.
126. HRVD Statement 4195.
127. HRVD Statement 4045.
128. HRVD Statement 2250.
129. HRVD Statement 3116.
130. HRVD Statement 5443.
131. CAVR Interview with Father Eligio Locatelli, Fatumaca, Baucau, 8 April 2003
132. CAVR Research Documents; CAVR Interviews with Saturnino Tilman, Alas, Manufahi, 25 February 2003; Mateus da Conceição, Alas, Manufahi, 25 February 2003; Elias Barreto, Alas, Manufahi, 25 February 2003; and Maria José da Costa, Letefoho, Same, Manufahi, 24 February 2003.
133. CAVR Interview with Carmen da Cruz, Dili, 27 February 2004.
134. CAVR Interview with Rui Lopes, Kamenaca, Suai, Covalima, 26 March 2003
135. Ibid
136. CAVR interview with Carmen da Cruz, Dili, 27 February 2004.
137. Ibid.
138. CAVR Interview with Cosme Freitas, Vemasse, Baucau, 10 April 2003.
139. CAVR Community Profile, Liurai Village, Turiscai Sub-district, Manufahi District, 17 September 2003.
140. CAVR Interview with Tomás Barbosa, Foholau, Turiscai, Same, 9 September 2003.
141. See, for example, CAVR Community Profile, Benamauk, Camea and Fatu Ahi and Cristo Rei Sub-district, Dili District.
142. CAVR Research Documents; CAVR Interview with Horacio da Silva, Ossu Town, Viqueque, 6 April 2003.
143. CAVR Community Profile Puno, Paraira, Moro, Ossu Town Sub-district, Viqueque District, 6 April 2003.
144. Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar: Resistance in Rural East Timor, Point Lonsdale, 2003 p.13.
145. CAVR Research Report on Iliomar, p.4. 24 May–1 June 2003
146. Sarah Niner (ed.), To Resist is to Win! The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, Publisher: Aurora Books, 1994 p.55) Original: Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste Um Povo, Uma Pátria, p.39.
147. CAVR Interview with Horacio da Silva, Ossu Town, Viqueque, 6 April 2003.
148. CAVR Interview with Leonel Guterres, Letemumo, Quelicai, Baucau, 8 April 2003.
149. CAVR Interview with Fransisco Soares Pinto, Cainliu, Iliomar, Lautém, 1 June 2003.
150. CAVR Interview with Mateus de Jesus Miranda, Iliomar, Lautém, 1 June 2003.
151. CAVR Interview with Gaspar Seixas SMP I Iliomar, Lautém 1 June 2003.
152. CAVR Interview with Fernando Amaral, Fuat, Iliomar, Lautém, 29 May 2003.
153. CAVR Interview with Gaspar Seixas, Fuat, Iliomar, Lautém, 29 May 2003.
154. CAVR Interview with Fransisco Soares Pinto, Cainliu, Iliomar, Lautém, 1 June 2003.
155. Manuel Carceres da Costa testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine Dili, 28–29 July 2003.
156. Maria da Costa, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine Dili, 28–29 July 2003.
157. HRVD Statement 4277.
158. HRVD Statement 0239.
159. HRVD Statement 7139.
160. CAVR Interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 August 2004.
161. CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004.

162. CAVR Interview with Agustino Soares, Hatolia, Ermera, 30 September 2003.
163. CAVR Interviews with Mateus Torrezão, Fahinean, Fatuberliu-Same, 6 September 2003; Filomeno Paixão, Dili, June 2004; Agostinho Boavida Ximenes (Sera Malik), Soe West Timor, NTT-Indonesia, 28 August 2004; CAVR Community Profile Ossu-Rua, Ossu-Leki-Meta, Ossu Sub-district, Viqueque District, 13 February 2003; CAVR Community Profile Ahik Village, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 22 November 2003.
164. CAVR Interview with José Maria de Vasconcelos (Taur Matan Ruak), Dili, 9 and 14 June 2004.
165. CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 19 June 2003.
166. John Waddingham, "Notes on 'counter-insurgency' in East Timor: The Indonesian government's resettlement program", in Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence (Reference: East Timor – Human Rights and Condition of the People), Commonwealth of Australia, Canberra, 1982, p. 715-748.
167. The Central Bureau of Statistics, the Population of the Province of East Timor (Biro Pusat Statistik, Penduduk Propinsi Timor Timur) 1980, Dili, 1981. See Table 01.00.
168. Alex Dirjdasusanto, "Timor's continuing tragedy", Asia Bureau Australia Newsletter, No. 46, June 1979.
169. See John Waddingham, "Notes on 'counter-insurgency' in East Timor: The Indonesian government's resettlement program", in Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence (Reference: East Timor – Human Rights and Condition of the People), Commonwealth of Australia, Canberra, 1982, p. 724; Aid and East Timor, Australian Council for Overseas Aid, Canberra, 1979 p. 7.
170. Catholic Relief Services, "Final Report: Emergency Relief Assistance for East Timor (Phase I)." 18 March 1980.
171. Gilman dos Santos, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine CAVR Dili, 28–29 July 2003.
172. CAVR Interview with Father Egidio Locatelli, Fatumaca, Baucau, 8 April 2003.
173. CAVR Interview with Cosmé Freitas, Vemasse, Baucau, 10 April 2003.
174. HRVD 03403.
175. HRVD 03455.
176. CAVR Interview with Tomé da Costa Magalhães Letefoho, Same, Manufahi, 24 February 2003.
177. CAVR Community Profile of Alaua-Craik, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 6 October 2003.
178. CAVR Community Profile of Ossuhuna, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 15 September 2003; and CAVR Community Profile of Defawasi, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 23 September 2003.
179. CAVR Community Profile of Alaua-Craik, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 6 October 2003; and CAVR Community Profile of Ossuhuna, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 15 September 2003.
180. CAVR Interviews with Fernando Amaral, Fuat, Iliomar, Lautém, 28 May 2003; Fransisco Soares Pinto, Cainliu, Iliomar, Lautém, 1 June 2003; and Mateus de Jesus Miranda SMP I Iliomar, Lautém, 29 May 2003.
181. CAVR Interview with Horacio da Silva Ossu Town, Viqueque, 6 April 2003.
182. Ibid.
183. CAVR Research Report on Viqueque 12–15 Desember 2002.
184. CAVR Interview with Edmundo da Cruz, Com (Moro, Lautém), 19 June 2003.
185. CAVR Interviews with José Conceicão, Farol Dili, 19 April 2003; and Eufrazia de Jesus Soares Ermera, 29 September 2003.
186. CAVR Interview with Gabriel Ximenes, Fatubessi, Ermera, 28 September 2003.
187. CAVR Interviews with Tomé Magalhães, Letefoho, Same, Manufahi, 24 February 2003; Saturnino Tilman, Alas, Manufahi, 25 February 2003; and Maria José da Costa, Letefoho, Same, Manufahi, 24 February 2003.
188. CAVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman Fahinehan (Fatuberlihu, Manufahi) 5 September 2003.
189. CAVR Interview with Eleajáro Teófilo, Fahinehan (Fatuberlihu, Manufahi), 5 September 2003.
190. CAVR Interview with Tomás Barbosa, Foholau, Turiscai, (Manufahi) 9 September 2003.
191. Ibid.
192. Manuel Carceres da Costa, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.
193. CAVR Interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 August 2004.
194. CAVR Community Profile, Ahic Village Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 22 November 2002.
195. An authoritative summary from this period can be found in Carmel Budiarjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, pp. 74-95.
196. Hearing before the Sub-committee on Asian and Pacific Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, 96th Congress, 1st session, December 4th, 1979, p. 28.
197. CAVR Interview with Fernando Amaral, Fuat, Iliomar, Lautém 28 May 2003.

198. Ibid.
199. CAVR Community Profile, Mau Chiga Village Hato Builico Sub-district, Ainaro District, 17 September 2003.
200. CAVR Interview with Idelfonso dos Reis, Ermera, 13 August 2003.
201. Maria José da Costa, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine Dili, 28–29 July 2003.
202. Alex Dirjdasusanto, "Timor's continuing tragedy", Asia Bureau Australia Newsletter, No. 46, June 1979.
203. David Jenkins, "A new ordeal for East Timor", Far Eastern Economic Review, 16 November 1979. p.24.
204. See Submission of Pat Walsh to the CAVR and his testimony as Expert Witness to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.
205. Ibid.
206. Aid and East Timor, Canberra: ACFOA, July 1979, p.12.
207. CAVR Interview with Father Blassius Bessin, Kuluhun, Dili, July 2003.
208. CAVR Interview with Sr Consuelo Martinez, Bebonuk Dili, 4 July 2003.
209. Ibid.
210. Alex Dirjdasusanto, "Timor's continuing tragedy", Asia Bureau Australia Newsletter, No. 46, June 1979.
211. Ibid.
212. Ibid.
213. CAVR Interview with Cosme Freitas, Vemasse, Baucau, 10 April 2003.
214. CAVR Interviews with Abilio, Alberto Carlos, Aissirimou, Aileu, 27 June 2003; and Eufrazia de Jesus Soares, Ermera, 29 September 2003.
215. http://www.fasthealth.com/dictionary/p/protein_shock.php.
216. Catholic Relief Services (CRS) Submission to CAVR, 27 February 2004, p.8.
217. CAVR Interview with Father José Alvaro Nolasco Santimano Meneses e Monteiro, Becora, Dili, 29 June 2004.
218. Aid and East Timor, Canberra: ACFOA, July 1979, p. 6.
219. CRS-USCC, "Final Report, East Timor Emergency Program, June 1979-December 1980", 25 August 1981, p. 1; Bishop Broderick, "Historical Sketch of East Timor" (Draft), August 1982, in CRS Submission, Annexe 3, p. 8.
220. East Timor Today, ACFOA Development Dossier No. 1, Second Edition, Canberra: ACFOA, July 1980, p. 7; Aid and East Timor, Canberra: ACFOA, July 1979, p. 11.
221. Bishop Broderick, "Historical Sketch of East Timor" (Draft), August 1982, in CRS Submission, Annexe 3, p. 8.
222. CRS Final Report, p. 2.
223. CRS Final Report, p. 3.
224. ICRC Communication to National Red Cross agencies, 21 August 1979. Cited in John Waddingham, Pat Walsh, Bill Armstrong, International Committee of Red Cross in East Timor, Unpublished paper, 4 October 1979.
225. Cited in Patrick Walsh, "The Politics of aid to East Timor", in East Timor – Development Dossier, ACFOA, Canberra 1980.
226. Activity Report 1979, Geneve: ICRC, pp. 49-50; Activity Report 1980, pp. 44-45; Activity Report 1981, p. 41.
227. John Waddingham, "Notes on 'counter-insurgency' in East Timor: The Indonesian government's resettlement program", in Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence (Reference: East Timor – Human Rights and Condition of the People), Commonwealth of Australia, Canberra, 1982, pp. 715-748.
228. Francis X. Carlin, CRS Jakarta Director, to Lieutenant General Benny Moerdani, Assintel Hankam, 13 October 1980, CRS Submission, Annexe 5; Francis Carlin to Lieutenant General Moerdani, 30 October 1980, CRS Submission, Annexe 6; Patrick C. Johns to Bishop Broderick, 27 May 1981, CRS Submission, Annexe 20; CRS Final Report p. 29.
229. CRS Final Report pp. 4, 12 and 6; Francis X. Carlin to Bishop Broderick, Explanations of delays and setbacks in program implementation necessitating several extensions of grants, 12 September 1980, CRS Submission, Annexe 9; CRS Indonesia, Final Report: Emergency assistance for East Timor (Phase I), 18 March 1980, p. 4, CRS Submission, Annexe 10.
230. See Waddingham et al 1979; Aid and East Timor 1979.
231. Gilman dos Santos, testimony to National Public Hearing of CAVR on Forced Displacement and Famine Dili, 28–29 July 2003.

232. Ibid.
233. Ibid.
234. CAVR Interview with Father Egidio Locatelli, Fatumaca, Baucau, 8 April 2003.
235. CRS Submission to CAVR, p. 9.
236. Hearing before the Sub Committee on Asian and Pacific Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, 96th Congress, 1st session, 4 December 1979, pp. 20-28.
237. Hubungan erat antara El Niño dan curah hujan di kepulauan Indonesia dibahas dalam Neville Nicholls, "Air-sea interaction and the possibility of long-range weather prediction in the Indonesian Archipelago". Monthly Weather Review, 1981, v.109, hlm.2435-2443; Malcolm Haylock dan John McBride, "Spatial coherence and predictability of Indonesian wet season rainfall". J. Climate, 2001, v.14, hlm. 3882-3887; dan Harry H. Hendon, "Indonesian rainfall variability: Impacts of ENSO and local air-sea interaction". J. Climate, 2003, v.16, hlm.1775-1790.
238. http://www.bom.gov.au/bmrc/clfor/cfstaff/jmb/files.htm.
239. Komando Resor Militer 164 Wira Dharma, Seksi-Intel, Rencana Penyusunan Kembali Rakyat Terlatih [Sub-Regional Military Command 164 Wira Dharma, Intelligence Section, Plan for the Reorganisation of the trained civilian force].
240. Petunjuk Teknis tentang Desa sebagai Titik Pusat Perhatian dan Cara Membinanya secara Utuh (Juknis/01-A/IV/1982), 10 September 1982. [Sub-Regional Military Command 164 Wira Dharma, Intelligence Section, Technical Guidelines on the Village as a focal point and holistic development methodologies].
241. Petunjuk Teknis tentang Cara Mengamankan Masyarakat dari Pengaruh Propaganda GPK [Technical Guidelines on Protecting the community from the Influence of GPK (Armed Security Movement] Propaganda (Juknis/04-B/IV/1982].
242. CAVR Bualele Community Profile, Quelicai, Baucau, 16 December 2003
243. CAVR Reseach Report in Baucau, 7–11 April 2003.
244. Community Profile Uaitame (Quelicai, Baucau), 12 December 2003.
245. Ibid.
246. CAVR Research Report on Baucau, 7–11April 2003.
247. CAVR Community Profile Lelalai, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 20 October 2003.
248. Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Illiomar: Resistance in Rural East Timor, Point Lonsdale, 2003, p. 21.
249. Ibid, p. 32
250. "Carrascalao Cites Purwanto", The Jakarta Post, p. 2, 15 July 1992.
251. CAVR Community Profile, Iliomar II, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District, 29 May 2003.
252. CAVR Research Report on Baucau, April 2003.
253. CAVR Interview with Manuel Alves Moreira, Vemasse, Baucau, 10 April 2003.
254. Manuel Carceres da Costa, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing Forced Displacement and Famine, Dili, 28–29 July 2003.
255. CAVR Interview with José Andrade dos Santos, Dilor, Viqueque, 12 December 2002; and CAVR Community Profile, Ahic Village, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 22 November 2002.
256. HRVD Statement 00427
257. CAVR Interview with José Andrade dos Santos, Dilor, Viqueque, 12 December 2002.
258. HRVD Statement 04018
259. CAVR Research Manufahi; CAVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman, Fahinehan, Manufahi, 5 September 2003; CAVR Interview with Eleajáro Teófilo, Fahinehan, Manufahi, 5 September 2003.
260. CAVR Interview with Gabriel Ximenes in Fatubessi, Ermera, 28 September 2003.
261. Article 13(1) UDHR and Article 12(1) ICCPR.
262. Principle 6, UN Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement, E/CN.4/1998/53/Add.2, 11 February 1998.
263. See for example Principles 7(2), 18 and 25, UN Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement, E/CN.4/1998/53/Add.2, 11 February 1998.
264. Article 49 Geneva Convention IV.
265. CAVR Interview with Adelino Soares, Placido Lisboa, Ataúro, Dili, 7 March 2002
266. CAVR Interview with Bernadino Villanova, Ataúro Town,Dili, 7 March 2002.
267. CAVR Research Project in Baucau, 7–11 April 2003.
268. Joana Pereira, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.
269. CAVR Interview with Hermenegildo da Cruz, Viqueque, 15 December 2002.
270. CAVR Community Profile, Mau Chiga Village, Hatu –Builico Sub-district, Ainaro District

271. Submission to CAVR, List of victims from Mau Chiga.
272. CAVR Interview with Placido Lisboa, Ataúro, Dili, 7 March 2002
273. CAVR Interviews with Adelino Soares; Placido Lisboa Ataúro, Dili, 7 March 2002; and Rosalina da Costa, Dili, 27 July 2003.
274. CAVR Interview with Faustino Gomes de Sousa, Ataúro, Dili 7 March 2002.
275. Ceu Lopes Federer, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003.
276. CAVR Interview with Luis da Costa Soares, Letefoho, Same, Manufahi, 23 February 2003
277. CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 19 June 2003
278. CAVR Community Profile, Vemasse Town Sub-district, Baucau District 28 March 2003,
279. CAVR Community Profile of Eraulo, Samalete, Railaco Sub-district, Ermera District, 2 December 2002.
280. CAVR Interviews with Adelino Soares; Placido Lisboa; Maria Mendes; Faustino Gomes da Sousa, Ataúro, Dili, March 7 2002.
281. SL, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Force Displacement and Famine, 28–29 July 2003.
282. HRVD Statement 05400.
283. See, for example, HRVD Statements 09115 and 02308.
284. CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004.
285. HRVD Statement 07678.
286. HRVD Statement 02317.
287. HRVD Statement 07218.
288. HRVD Statement 03350.
289. CAVR Interview with Abilio dos Santos, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 4 June 2003.
290. HRVD Statement 07241.
291. CAVR Interview with UL, Nunumogue, Ainaro, 2 September 2003.
292. CAVR Interview with João de Araújo, Mau Chiga, Hato Builico, Ainaro, 4 June 2003.
293. HRVD Statement 08066.
294. CAVR Community Profile of Rotuto Village, Same Sub-district, Manufahi District 22 April 2003.
295. HRVD Statement 04117.
296. HRVD Statement 04434.
297. HRVD Statement 04711.
298. CAVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman, Letefoho (Same, Manufahi) 24 February 2003.
299. HRVD Statement 04714.
300. CAVR Interview with Saturnino Tilman, Letefoho, Same, Manufahi, 24 February 2003.
301. CAVR Research Field Notes, Manufahi, 21–26 February 2003.
302. José Gomes, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 28–29 November 2003.
303. Ibid.
304. CAVR Interview Rita Amaral da Costa, Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque, 29 May 2003.
305. HRVD Statement 04118.
306. CAVR Research notes on Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque 12–15 December 2002; CAVR Research Notes on Lacluta, Viqueque, 12–15 December 2002.
307. CAVR Research Notes, Iliomar, Lautém, 12–15 Desember 2002.
308. CAVR Community Profile, Tutuala Town Sub-district, Lautém District, 10 September 2002.
309. HRVD Statement 00745
310. HRVD Statement 00719
311. CAVR Interview with VL, Mehara, Lautém, 21 March 2003
312. CAVR Interviews with Gaspar Seixas, Fuat, Iliomar, Lautém, 29 May 2003 and Fernando Amaral Fuat, Iliomar, Lautém, 28 May 2003.
313. HRVD Statements 1593 and 0150.
314. HRVD Statements 3462 and 1524.
315. HRVD Statement 1524.
316. HRVD Statements 1580 and 1581.
317. HRVD Statement 9022.
318. HRVD Statements 1593 and 1573.
319. HRVD Statements 6642 and 6605.
320. HRVD Statement 4638.
321. HRVD Statement 4668.
322. HRVD Statement 4637.
323. HRVD Statement 0292.

324. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes against Eurico Guterres et al Indictment number 2a/2002, 18 Febuary 2002, Dili 18 February 2002, Paragraph 27.
325. HRVD Statement 4629.
326. HRVD Statement 5907.
327. HRVD Statement 4649.
328. HRVD Statement 4687.
329. HRVD Statements 5915 05939 04685 and 04612.
330. HRVD Statement 6019.
331. Geoffrey Robinson, East Timor 1999: Crimes Against Humanity - a Report commissioned by the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, 2003 [Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR], p. 189
332. HRVD Statement 0410.
333. HRVD Statement 0411.
334. HRVD Statement 0458.
335. HRVD Statement 0455.
336. HRVD Statement 0481; HRVD Statements 0414 and 0413.
337. HRVD Statement 3684; The Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes vs Cancio Lopes de Carvalho et al SCU indictment for Case No. 06/2003, Dili, 9 December 2004.
338. HRVD Statement 8447.
339. HRVD Statement 3615.
340. CAVR Community Profile, Fatuleto Village, Zumalai Sub-district, Covalima District, 21 May 2003; Belakasak Village, Maucatar Sub-district, Covalima District, 29 March 2003.
341. Joint Statement Humanitarian Mission for Internally Displaced Persons, Yayasan HAK, ETADEP, Caritas, Yayasan Kasimo, Posko for Emergency Aid to IDP's, Timor Aid. April 1999.
342. General Prosecutor of the UNTAET, Indictment against Leoneto Martins, et al., Case No. 21/2001, 3 December 2001 paragraphs 85-95.
343. HRVD Statements 0873; 0876; 5881; 0276; 2326 and 5544.
344. HRVD Statements 1823; 1952; 4706 and 7656.
345. HRVD Statements 004644; 04633; 00699; 05854; 05858 and 05859.
346. CAVR Community Profiles, Luculai, Loidahar and Darulete, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District 19 February 2003; See also CAVR Community Profile Aiasa Village, Bobonaro District, 17 December 2003.
347. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes Amended indictment against Burhanuddin Siagian et al case number 18-2003, 15 July 2004 paragraphs 35-37.
348. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Bobonaro.
349. HRVD Statements 4236; 4240 and 4341; see also Robinson, op cit.
350. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes Indictment against Burhanuddin Siagian et al, Case number 2-2003, Dili 3 February 2003.
351. Ibid. Paragraphs 110-111.
352. Ibid. Paragraph 113-120.
353. Ibid. Paragraph 127-133.
354. HRVD Statements 1119; 1178; 1129; 1175; 1174 and 5507.
355. HRVD Statements 1177 and 1190.
356. HRVD Statements 7422; 3613; 3629; 8441; 5148; 3631; 1216; 1239; 3676; 8451; 8463; 3656; 5125; 8595; 3618; 3640; 8449.
357. HRVD Statement 1216.
358. HRVD Statement 1239 and 1739.
359. HRVD Statement 8461.
360. HRVD Statement 8541.
361. HRVD Statements 08578; 8449 and 8595.
362. HRVD Statement 3613.
363. HRVD Statements 5130; 5196; 5148 and 3640.
364. HRVD Statement 6349.
365. HRVD Statement 3631.
366. HRVD Statement 5125.
367. HRVD Statement 5179.
368. Dan Satgas Pam Dili to Danrem Up. Kasi, Intel Rem 164/WD [the Head of the Security Task Force Dili to the Sub-regional Military Commander for Intelligence, and others Secret Telegram No. STR/200/1999, April 17, 1999 (Yayasan Hak Collection, Doc #16) as cited in Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p 201.

369. Ibid.
370. HRVD Statements 05723; 5726; 5736 and 5739.
371. Joint Statement Humanitarian Mission for Internally Displaced Persons, Yayasan HAK, ETADEP, Caritas, Yayasan Kasimo, Posko for Emergency Aid to IDP's, Timor Aid. April 1999.
372. See also HRVD Statements 0324; 0364; 0396 and 6887.
373. HRVD Statement 0378.
374. HRVD Statement 0401.
375. HRVD Statement 4687.
376. HRVD Statement 0311.
377. HRVD Statement 2609.
378. HRVD Statements 2609 and 2195.
379. HRVD Statement 9031.
380. HRVD Statements 8311; 1705; 4541; 6201; 8295; 8385; 8389; 8297 and 6233.
381. HRVD Statement 4541.
382. HRVD Statement 8297.
383. HRVD Statement 6158.
384. Posko for Emergency Aid to IDP's. "Report on Humanitarian Aid Convoy, Sare 2-4 July 1999."
385. See Special Panel for Serious Crimes Judgment in case number 4-2001 the Prosecutor Vs Jose Cardoso, Dili, 5 April 2003.
386. UNAMET Preliminary Report on Humanitarian Issues, 19 June 1999, Update on Situation after Field Trip to Atambua, Suai, Fatumean, Ainaro.
387. Joint Statement Humanitarian Mission for Internally Displaced Persons, Yayasan HAK, ETADEP, Caritas, Yayasan Kasimo, Posko for Emergency Aid to IDP's, Timor Aid. April 1999.
388. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR.
389. Martin, Ian, Self-determination in East Timor (The United Nations, the Ballot and International Intervention), Lynne Rienner. USA, UK 2001, p. 58
390. UNAMET Assessment of Security Conditions.
391. UNAMET Assessment of Security.
392. UNAMET Weekly Siterp #2 (5 July– 11 July).
393. UNAMET Weekly Sitrep #4 (26 July– 1 August).
394. UNAMET Assessment of Security Conditions.
395. UNAMET Political Affairs, Assessment of Security Conditions, 26 July 1999.
396. UNAMET Review of Recent Militia Activity, August 22, 1999.
397. UNAMET Weekly Sitrep #6 (16 August–23 August).
398. UNAMET Weekly Sitrep #6 (16 August–23 August).
399. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Oecussi.
400. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Viqueque.
401. Ibid.
402. Ian Martin briefing 19 August 1999, UNAMET Headquarters, Dili.
403. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Bobonaro.
404. CAVR Community Profile, Village Ila/Dais, Maucatar Sub-district, Covalima District, 29 March 2003
405. CAVR Community Profile, Village Lela, Maucatar Sub-district, Covalima District, 18 February 2003
406. CAVR Community Profile Village Holpilat, Maucatar Sub-district, Covalima District, 13 March 2003
407. Ian Martin, Self-determination in East Timor (The United Nations, the Ballot and International Intervention), Lynne Rienner. USA, UK, 2001. p. 75
408. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes against Eurico Guterres et al Indictment number 2/2002, Dili, 18 Febuary 2002.
409. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, p. 46.
410. UNAMET Weekly Sitrep #6 (16 August–23 August).
411. Ibid.
412. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Bobonaro.
413. Dolan, C., Large, J. and Obi, N., Evaluation of UNHCR's Repatriation and Reintegration Programme in East Timor, 1999–2003, Geneva: UNHCR, Evaluation and Policy Analysis Unit, February 2004.
414. Dolan, C., Large, J. and Obi, N., Evaluation of UNHCR's Repatriation and Reintegration Programme in East Timor, 1999–2003, Geneva: UNHCR, Evaluation and Policy Analysis Unit, February 2004.
415. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes Indictment against Eurico Guterres et al. Case no 13-2003, Dili, February 27, 2003.
416. Ibid.
417. Manuel Abrantes, testimony recorded and compiled in Brisbane, Australia, November 26, 1999. Cited in Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, pp. 221-222.

418. Ibid
419. Ibid.
420. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes Indictment against Eurico Guterres et al. (case no 13-2003, Dili, 27 February, 2003.
421. Ibid; Manuel Abrantes statement cited in Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, pp. 221-222.
422. HRVD Statement 5734 and 5690.
423. HRVD Statement 5664.
424. HRVD Statement 5678.
425. HRVD Statement 8123.
426. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes Indictment against Eurico Guterres et al. Case no 13-2003, Dili, 27 February, 2003; HRVD Statements 09189 and 08993.
427. HRVD Statements 00110; 0131 and 0159.
428. HRVD Statement 0147.
429. HRVD Statement 0166; Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes Indictment against Eurico Guterres et al. Case no 13-2003, Dili, 27 February, 2003
430. HRVD Statement 0111.
431. HRVD Statement 0117.
432. HRVD Statement 0116.
433. For some examples of those who managed to escape deportation, see HRVD Statements 0199; 0117; 5690; 5725 and 5710.
434. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Bobonaro.
435. HRVD Statement 3766.
436. HRVD Statement 2436; Laurentina Amaral; HRVD Statement 2444.
437. HRVD Statement 2444.
438. HRVD Statements 8157; 01142 and 1110.
439. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Bobonaro and Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes Amended Indictment against Burhanuddin Siagian et al, Case no 18-2003, Dili, July 15, 2004.
440. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes Amended Indictment against Burhanuddin Siagian et al, Case no 18-2003, Dili, July 15, 2004, paragraph 180.
441. Ibid. Paragraphs 180-182.
442. HRVD Statement 02587.
443. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Bobonaro; HRVD Statements 02464; 3729 and 2593.
444. Ibid.
445. CAVR Community Profile, Saburai Village, Maliana Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 13 January 2003.
446. HRVD Statements 01874, 01195, 08239, 02594, 05220 eyewitness accounts of Halilintar militia burning and deporting people to West Timor. HRVD Statement 05597 describes an attack by Kaer Metin Merah Putih on the people of the aldeia of Baoutal Suco Deudet on September 16 1999. The people were able to escape to the forest, while their houses were burned to the ground.
447. Forced deportations by Laksaur militia and TNI around Suai Town are described in HRVD Statements 2023; 8485; 7385 and 3672.
448. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes against Egidio Manek et al indictment, case number 9-2003, 28 February 2003, paragraphs 385-387; Manuel Abrantes, testimony recorded and compiled in Brisbane, Australia, November 26, 1999. cited in Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, pp. 221-222.
449. CAVR Community Profiles, Belakasak, Maucatar Sub-district, Covalima District, 29 March 2003, and CAVR Community Profile Fatuleto, Zumalai Sub-district, Covalima District, 29 March 2003.
450. HRVD Statements 08463, 03643 and 03638 recount details of the Suai Church Massacre on September 6 and their subsequent deportation; HRVD Statements 05116 and 08577 describe the attack on the church; HRVD Statement 08459 gives an account of the assaults and rapes after the church attack.
451. Fokupers, Gender-based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, HRVD Statement F9389.
452. Fokupers, Gender-based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, HRVD Statement F9268.
453. Ibid, HRVD Statement F9264.
454. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes Indictment against Egidio Manek et al, case number 9-2003 Dili, 28 February 2003, paragraph 331.

455. Ibid.
456. HRVD Statements 1232; 8508 and 07396.
457. HRVD Statement 4650.
458. HRVD Statement 0919.
459. HRVD Statement 0957.
460. HRVD Statement 7632.
461. Fokupers, Gender-based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004 and HRVD Statement F9311.
462. HRVD Statement 7141.
463. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Aileu.
464. HRVD Statement 2068.
465. HRVD Statement 3265.
466. HRVD Statement 3763.
467. HRVD Statement 2071; For others who reported running to the mountains from militia violence see HRVD Statements 03247 and 03229.
468. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999 District of Ainaro; CAVR Community Profiles in Hora Kiik, Manetu, Ainaro District, 8 July 2003.
469. Fokupers, Gender-based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, HRVD F9372.
470. HRVD Statement 5174.
471. HRVD Statement 3680.
472. HRVD Statement 7182.
473. Fokupers, Gender-based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, HRVD F9374; See also HRVD F9371 [Sebastiana da Costa] and HRVD F9395 [Casilda da Costa] for similar accounts of forced deportation at gunpoint by Mahidi militia on 23 September 1999.
474. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999 District Ermera; HRVD Statements 2198; 8083; 3510 and 8303 describe forced deportation to West Timor by Darah Integrasi militia and TNI.
475. HRVD Statement 1101.
476. HRVD Statement 1046.
477. HRVD Statement 1774.
478. HRVD Statement 1678.
479. HRVD Statement 1062.
480. HRVD Statement F9387.
481. HRVD Statement 2466.
482. HRVD Statement 2430.
483. HRVD Statement 2465.
484. HRVD Statement 0350.
485. HRVD Statement 4079.
486. Fokupers, Gender-based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, HRVD F9290 and F9291.
487. HRVD Statement 4084.
488. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Viqueque.
489. UNTAET Human Rights Unit Report on 1999, District of Oecussi.
490. Ibid; see also Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR.
491. Ibid.
492. Ibid.
493. Greenlees, Don and Robert Garran, Deliverance: The Inside Story of East Timor's Fight for Freedom, Allen and Unwin. New South Wales. 2002.
494. Ibid.
495. CAVR Community Profile, Belakasak Village, Maucatar Sub-district, Covalima District, 29 March 2003.
496. Campbell-Nelson, Karen, Yooke Adelina Damapolii, Leonard Simanjuntak, and Fredrika Tadu Hungu, Perempuan Dibawa/h Laki-laki yang Kalah: Kekerasan terhadap Perempuan Timor Timur dalam Kamp Pengungsian di Timor Barat [Women Carried by/Underneath Men Who Lost: Violence Against East Timorese Women in Refugee Camps in West Timor], Ford Foundation, 1999, Jakarta.
497. Jesuit Refugee Services, Kupang Report, 15 September 1999.
498. Campbell-Nelson et al, op cit.
499. CAVR Community Profile, Fatuleto Village, Zumalai Sub-district, Covalima District, 21 May 2003.
500. Campbell-Nelson et al, op cit.
501. HRVD Statement 5188.

502. HRVD Statement 5173.
503. "Indonesia: UNHCR Asks Government to Control Militias," Refugees Daily, 10 November 1999. Cited in Human Rights Watch, Indonesia/East Timor: Forced Expulsions to West Timor and the Refugee Crisis, December 1999, Vol. 11, No. 7(c), http://www.hrw.org/reports/1999/wtimor.
504. "Timor: `Snatch-and-run Operations'", UNHCR Press Briefing Note, 19 November 1999.
505. Human Rights Watch, Indonesia/East Timor: Forced Expulsions to West Timor and the Refugee Crisis, December 1999, Vol. 11, No. 7(c), http://www.hrw.org/reports/1999/wtimor.
506. HRVD Statement 0334.
507. CAVR Community Profile, Maliana Memo, Bobonaro District, 21 January 2003.
508. Fokupers, Gender-based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, HRVD F9320 and F9248.
509. Fokupers, Gender-based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, HRVD 99COV006.
510. Human Rights Watch, Indonesia/East Timor: Forced Expulsions to West Timor and the Refugee Crisis, December 1999, Vol. 11, No. 7(c), http://www.hrw.org/reports/1999/wtimor.
511. "Indonesia: Most East Timorese Returns Blocked", Refugees Daily, 10 November 1999 (quoting UNHCR spokesman Yusuf Hassan). Cited in Human Rights Watch, Indonesia/East Timor: Forced Expulsions to West Timor and the Refugee Crisis, December 1999, Vol. 11, No. 7(c), http://www.hrw.org/reports/1999/wtimor.
512. Human Rights Watch Confidential Interviews, Sports stadium, Dili, 5 November 1999.
513. Ibid.
514. HRVD Statement 6284.
515. CAVR Community Profile, Beco II Village, Suai Sub-district, Covalima District, 2 June 2003.
516. Communication, 21 August 1979. John Waddingham, "Notes on 'counter-insurgency' in East Timor: The Indonesian government's resettlement program", in Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence [Reference: East Timor – Human Rights and Condition of the People, Commonwealth of Australia, Canberra, 1982, pp. 715-748].

After looking at forty truth commissions world-round, I concluded that the truth commission of East Timor was among the five strongest. It was an impressive, passionate and scrupulous exercise. And its report, Chega!, stands in testament to this careful and rigorous exercise, honestly re ecting the victims' stories as well as the far-reaching conclusions that emerged from this work. It is wonderful that this will now be available, in full, in English; it will be an important reference for others embarking on a similar path.

Priscilla Hayner,
Author, Unspeakable Truths: Transitional Justice and the Challenge of Truth Commissions (2nd ed., 2011)

"The extensive CAVR Report is an encyclopedia of our history, rich in both teachings and suffering. We must utilise its great teachings to better understand today's crisis and to help prevent future crises."

Jose Ramos-Horta,
Nobel Peace Laureate, former President and Prime Minister of Timor-Leste (July 2006)

"Chega! is troubling testimony. This report will jolt Indonesian readers who think that under the Soeharto regime everything was peaceful in Indonesia's then 27th province. Page after page recounts the stories of victims of massacres, rape, forced disappearances, torture and other unimaginable crimes ... Indonesia can learn from Chega! This report is an important contribution to democratisation and security sector reform in Indonesia."

Ifdhal Kasim,
Chair, Indonesian Commission on Human Rights (August 2010)

"The CAVR Report constitutes an important milestone in the search for justice, truth and reconciliation in Timor-Leste. It is my sincere hope that (it) will be an enduring contribution to building the Timorese nation and will help to prevent the recurrence of such tragic events in Timor-Leste and elsewhere."

Kofi Annan,
UN Secretary-General (July 2006)

KPG (KEPUSTAKAAN POPULER GRAMEDIA)
Gedung Kompas Gramedia, Blok 1 Lt. 3
Jl. Palmerah Barat 29-37, Jakarta 10270
Telp. 021-53650110, 53650111 ext. redaksi 3366
Fax. 53698044, www.penerbitkpg.com
redaksi.kpg@gramediapublishers.com
Facebook: Penerbit KPG; Twitter: @penerbitkpg

cavr-timorleste.org

timor-leste.gov.tl

KPG: 901 13 0739
ISBN: 978-979-91-0644-5
9 789799 106445

Chega!
The final report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)
III

Chega!

Volume III

OTHER CAVR PUBLICATIONS

CAVR report – Chega!

Indonesian version of Chega! plus summary (2010)
Comic book version of Chega! (Tetum, Portuguese)
Chega! exhibition

Public hearing books

Women and the Conflict
Massacres
Forced Displacement and Famine
Political Imprisonment
Internal Political Conflict 1974-1976
Self-Determination and the International Community Children and the Conflict

Other titles

Hear Our Voices
The Balide Comarca Prison
History of Timor-Leste in Posters
Dalan ba Dame (dvd with sub-titles)

Website

www.cavr-timorleste.org

Chega!

The Final Report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

Volume III

JAKARTA
KPG IN COOPERATION WITH STP-CAVR

Chega!

The Final Report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

Volume III

KPG 901 13 0740
First printing, November 2013

Author:
The Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)

Cover photo:
Poriaman Sitanggang

Editors:
Rani Elsanti, Mirna Adzania, Ninus D Andarnuswari, Mariana Hasbie, Ining Isaiyas, Pat Walsh

Design and layout:
M. Roniyadi, Rio Ardani, Dadang Kusmana,
Fernandus Antonius, Wendie Artswenda

Project management:
Rev. Agustinho de Vasconselos, Ligia Hermenegildo da Costa,
Candra Gautama, Christina M. Udiani

Library of Congress Cataloguing-in-Publication Data

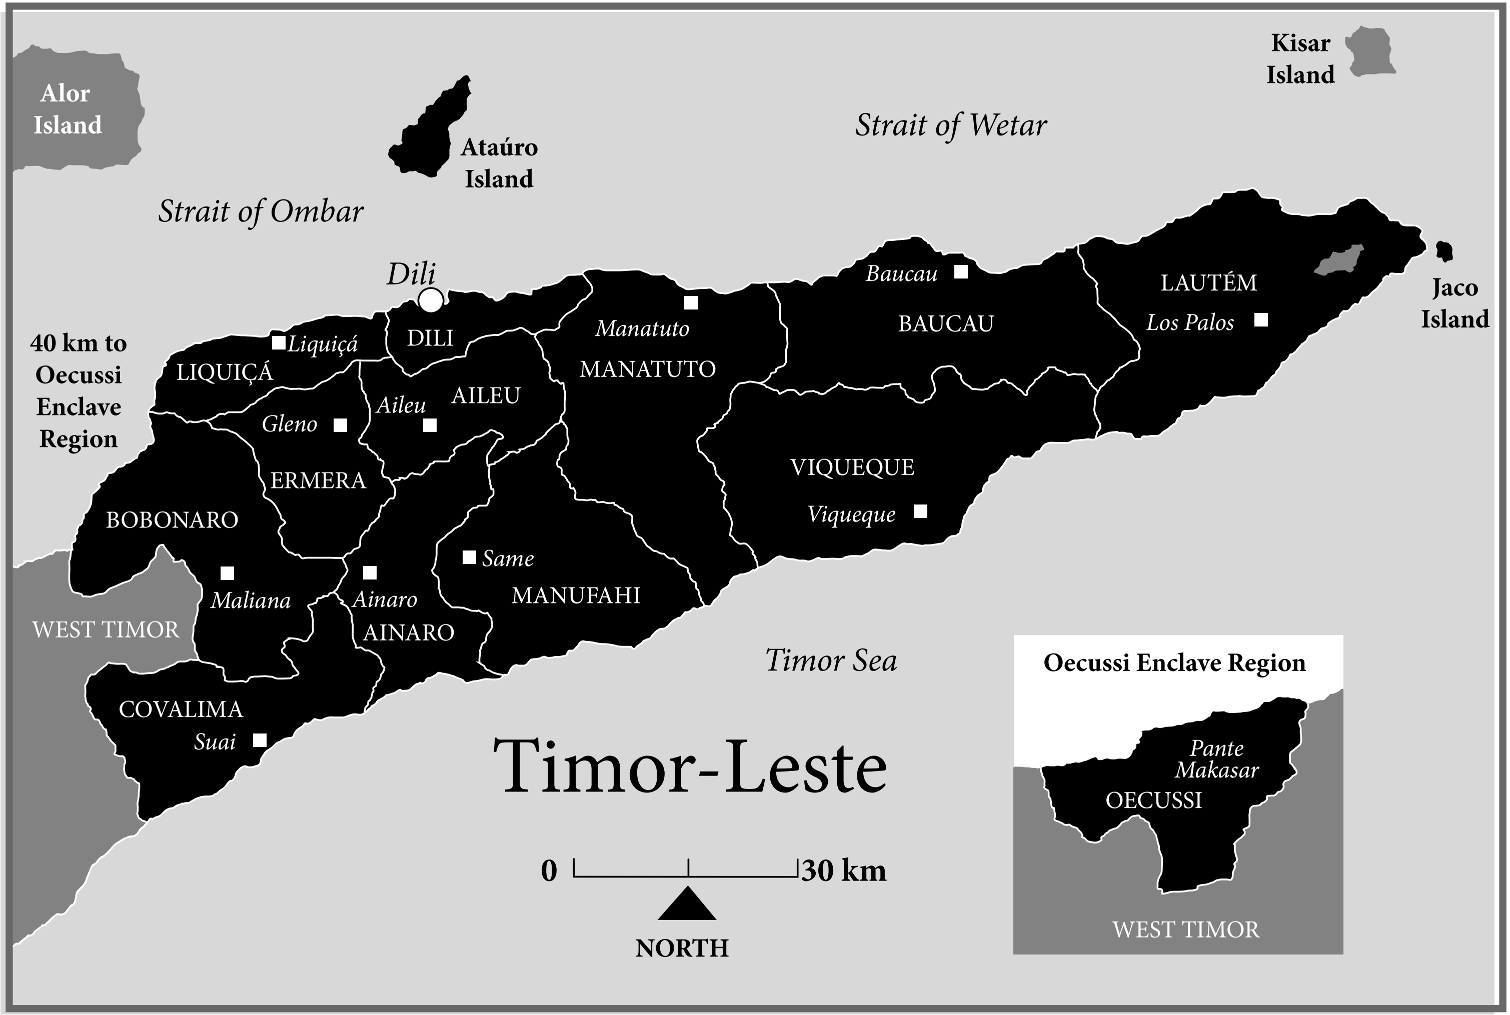
The Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR)
Chega!: the final report of the Timor-Leste Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR): full report / author, CAVR.—Jakarta: KPG in cooperation with STP-CAVR, 2013. 5 volumes; vol. III: xiv + 888 pages; 15 cm x 23 cm

ISBN-13: 978-979-91-0645-2

1. Timor-Leste—History—Autonomy and independence movements. 2. Human rights—Timor-Leste. 3. Crimes against humanity—Timor-Leste. 4. Truth commissions--Timor-Leste. 5. Indonesia—Politics and government—1966-1998. 6. Comissão de Acolhimento, Verdade, e Reconciliação Timor-Leste. I. Comissão de Acolhimento, Verdade, e Reconciliação Timor-Leste.

DS649.6 .C3913 2013 2013451418

Funding for this publication was provided by the Government of Timor-Leste.



Every effort has been made to ensure that the contents of this English language version are faithful to the approved Indonesian version entitled Chega! Laporan Komisi Penerimaan, Kebenaran, dan Rekonsiliasi (CAVR) di Timor-Leste (KPG, 2010).

Printed by PT Gramedia, Jakarta

Content

Tables:

Graphics:

Timor-Leste
Alor Island
Ataúro Island
Strait of Ombar
Strait of Wetar
Kisar Island
Jaco Island
Dili
40 km to Oecussi Enclave Region
LIQUIÇÁ
Liquiçá
DILI
AILEU
Aileu
Gleno
ERMERA
BOBONARO
Maliana
WEST TIMOR
COVALIMA
Suai
Ainaro
AINARO
Same MANUFAHI
Manatuto
MANATUTO
Baucau
BAUCAU
VIQUEQUE
Viqueque
LAUTÉM
Los Palos
Timor Sea
0
30 km
NORTH
Oecussi Enclave Region
Pante Makasar
OECUSSI
WEST TIMOR

Chega!

Part 7.4.

Arbitrary Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment

Part 7.4. Arbitrary Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment

Tables:

Graphics:

7.4. Arbitrary Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment

Introduction

1. Arbitrary detention, otherwise known as the arbitrary deprivation of liberty, was suffered by East Timorese people more than any other violation recorded by the Commission. It occurred throughout the entire period of conflict in Timor-Leste, during both the internal armed conflict and the conflict with Indonesia, and it occurred in all districts. Although all sides to the conflict arbitrarily detained people, members of the Indonesian security forces were responsible for the vast majority of cases documented by the Commission.

2. Arbitrary detention is important to consider not only because it is a violation in itself but also because it exposed victims to many other violations. Ill-treatment and torture (the third and fourth most frequent violations respectively) occurred overwhelmingly while victims were in detention. Other parts in this report also find that sexual violence, executions and disappearances, forced recruitment, forced labour, looting of belongings, deprivation of food and forced displacement all often occurred while victims were in detention and therefore in the power of the perpetrators.

3. The extent to which the people of Timor-Leste suffered being locked up and physically abused reveals a 24-year period of brutality and the repeated use of violence to crush political opposition, which eventually culminated in the violence and destruction of 1999. The UN Special Rapporteur on Torture concluded in his January 1992 report that torture was commonplace in Timor-Leste.* As this part sets out the occurrence of these violations was too often condoned, ignored or even perpetrated by those in command in each stage of the conflict. Impunity for the perpetration of arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment was standard.

* The UN Special Rapporteur put forward 11 recommendations to be implemented by the Indonesian authorities to put a stop to torture. Only two of those recommendations were implemented, namely the establishment of a National Human Rights Commission and accession to the Convention Against Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. The latter was not carried out until 1998.

4. This part looks at the nature and extent of arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment over the period 1975-99.* There were very few cases reported in 1974, the start of the mandate period. It is hoped by examining these patterns and the structures and strategies behind them, that the people of Timor-Leste can understand how these violations were able to occur and what can be done to prevent them occurring again.

Definitions and legal principles

Arbitrary detention

5. International human rights law guarantees every person the right to liberty of the person and freedom from arbitrary arrest or detention by the state.[1]

Arrest

6. In this Report the Commission has used the word "arrest" broadly to describe the process whereby a person is taken into detention, regardless of whether that process is carried out by proper authorities acting within the law or not.

Detention and imprisonment

7. The words "detention" or "imprisonment" have been used to refer to any enforced deprivation of liberty, whether in a formal prison environment or elsewhere. That is, detention is any situation in which a person is held within a confined area against his or her will.

8. Under international law, detention is arbitrary where any of the following occurs:

- There is no legal basis justifying the detention
- The detention arises from the legitimate exercise of fundamental rights (for example freedom of expression or opinion)
- The situation involves human rights violations of such severity that the detention may be regarded as arbitrary (for example, where due process or a fair trial is lacking).[2]

9. In an armed conflict, it is permitted to capture enemy combatants and detain them as prisoners of war. However, under domestic criminal law civilians must not be detained without there being a legitimate reason for doing so.

10. Where a civilian or an unlawful combatant is detained on a criminal charge that person must be brought promptly (within a few days)[3] before a judge, and must either be tried within a reasonable time or released.[4] If this does not occur, the detention may be considered arbitrary.

* Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances, reports on killings and disappearances in detention.

11. The Commission notes that these standards have been used only as guides to the Commission's research and has not made a finding of whether the detention was arbitrary in each case.

12. Under Indonesian law, kidnapping or depriving a person of his or her liberty were prohibited.* These offences applied equally to officials including members of the Indonesian Armed Forces, and sentences were specified as higher in cases where an official used his power to commit an offence.† Portuguese criminal law prohibited illegally detaining, arresting or restraining a person.‡

Torture

13. Torture is considered a grave violation of human rights and is prohibited absolutely in all circumstances.[5]

14. Under international law, "torture" involves the intentional infliction of severe pain or suffering, usually for the purpose of punishment, intimidation, coercion, obtaining information or a confession or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind.[6] Although this definition also requires the involvement of the state in perpetrating the act of torture, the Commission is of the view that, in the light of authorities from other international bodies, under customary law acts carried out by non-state actors without the acquiescence of the State may also constitute torture.[7]

Cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment (ill-treatment)

15. Where an act falls short of torture, either because it is not severe enough or because it is not clearly carried out for one of the required reasons, it may still be cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment (referred to generally as ill-treatment). This covers, for example, solitary confinement,[8] sleep deprivation,[9] restraining a person in painful positions,[10] keeping a person's head hooded,[11] and subjecting a person to death threats.[12] Ill-treatment is also prohibited in all circumstances by international law.[13]

16. Where the conditions in which a person is detained fail to meet minimum standards set by international law, it may amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[14] International law requires that all detainees must be treated humanely.[15] They must not be subjected to hardships or constraints other than those resulting from the deprivation of liberty and must be allowed to enjoy all human rights subject to the restrictions that are unavoidable in a closed environment.[16] In particular, prolonged periods of solitary confinement or incommunicado detention may violate these standards.[17]

* Articles 328 and 333 KUHP (Kitab Undang-Undang Hukum Pidana – Indonesian penal code).

† Articles 421 52 KUHP.

‡ Article 330 Portuguese Criminal Code.

17. More specific standards are contained in international instruments such as the Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment; the Basic Principles for the Treatment of Prisoners; and the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners. These standards include requirements that prisoners be provided with the following:

- Accommodation meeting all requirements for health, taking into account climatic conditions, cubic content of air, minimum floor space, lighting, and ventilation
- Sufficient windows and artificial light to enable sufficient ventilation and lighting
- Toilet facilities allowing use in a clean and decent manner
- Adequate bathing facilities
- A separate and clean bed for each prisoner
- Food of sufficient quality and quantity adequate for health and strength
- Drinking water whenever it is needed
- Regular opportunities to exercise
- Access to medical treatment
- Opportunities to communicate with friends and family by correspondence and receiving visits
- Access to books, newspapers and other sources of information
- The ability to satisfy the needs of religious life so far as practicable.

18. Not all of these requirements are binding in themselves, but they provide standards that help in determining when the general obligation to treat prisoners with humanity and respect for the inherent dignity of the person has been breached.

Distinguishing between ill-treatment and torture

19. The Commission notes that drawing a distinction between torture and ill-treatment is often difficult, involving questions of fact and degree. Especially in the light of linguistic considerations – the word in Indonesian for "torture" is commonly used to cover a wide range of forms of mistreatment from light ill-treatment to severe torture – it has not always been easy for the Commission to determine which violation has occurred in a particular case of physical or emotional abuse. Further, as victims are not often aware of such fine legal distinctions they do not always describe what they suffered in sufficient detail for their experience to be classifed under international law.

20. As the Commission is not a court, it was not essential for the Commission to make a finding on the legal nature of the victim's experience. Unless the treatment was clearly in one category or another, the Commission has not classified the treatment under either category but rather has set out the specific acts of physical or emotional abuse suffered by the victim. In cases where the victim did not specify the particular forms of abuse and simply described his or her experience as "torture", this description was accepted for statistical purposes.

Prohibitions under domestic law on assault and mistreatment

21. In addition to international standards dealing with torture and ill-treatment, domestic laws prohibiting the commission of various forms of assault and mistreatment also applied so as to criminalise this type of conduct. Under Indonesian criminal law "maltreatment" of a person was criminalised, and a higher penalty prescribed in cases where it had the effect of causing serious physical injury or death or was done with premeditation.[*] It was a crime to deliberately cause serious physical injury to another person.[†] These offences applied equally to officials including members of the Indonesian Armed forces, and sentences were specified as higher in cases where an official used his power to commit an offence.[‡] In addition, certain specific conduct by officials was prohibited, including the misuse of power by an official to force someone to do, not to do, or to tolerate something,[§] and the use of coercion by an official to procure a confession or statement in a criminal case.[¶] Portuguese criminal law also prohibited assault, especially in cases where an illness, injury, psychological harm or death resulted.[]

Patterns of detention, ill-treatment and torture over the mandate period

22. As mentioned above, detention, torture and ill-treatment were among the most frequently reported violations across the entire mandate period. Of all the non-fatal violations reported to the Commission, 42.3% (25,347/59,972) were detentions, 18.5% (11,123/59,972) were acts of torture and 14.1% (8,436/59,972) were acts of ill-treatment.[††] Nearly 67%, or two-thirds, of victims of non-fatal violations reported being detained at some point. Most torture and ill-treatment occurred while in detention.

* Articles 351-353 KUHP.

† Articles 354-355 KUHP.

‡ Articles 421 52 KUHP.

§ Article 421 KUHP.

¶ Article 422 KUHP.

 Articles 359, 360, and 361 Portuguese Criminal Code.

†† These numbers do not by any means represent the total number of cases of arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment to have occurred in Timor-Leste over this period. They are the result of statements from only around 1% of the population, and have not all been statistically "matched" so that two statements may refer to the same incident of detention, torture or ill-treatment [see Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of human rights violations].

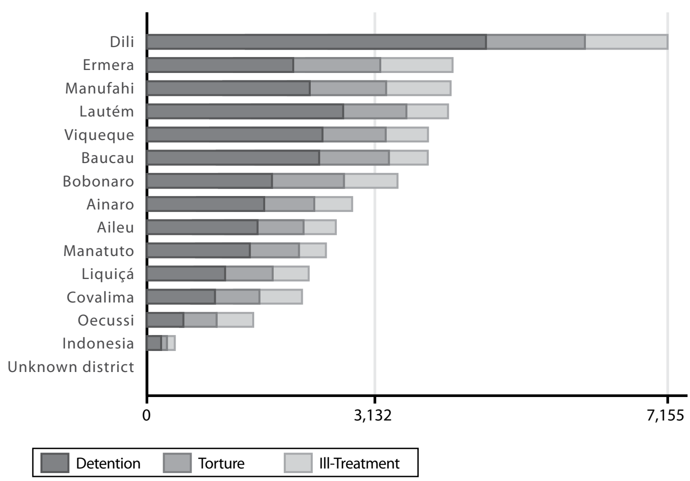
Patterns over time

23. The incidence of arbitrary detentions was not uniform over the period. The graph below shows the pattern of reported detentions, torture and ill-treatment over time.

Number of reported acts of non-fatal violations, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

24. It reveals that all three violations followed similar patterns and that there were two peaks in the levels of such violations: in 1975 during the period of the internal armed conflict and the Indonesian invasion of the territory, and in 1999 when the population of Timor-Leste voted for independence and the Indonesian military departed. During the entire period 1976-84, however, when large-scale Indonesian military operations to conquer Timor-Leste and destroy the Resistance were conducted, there were high levels of detention, torture and ill-treatment. During the 14-year period of 1985-98, when Timor-Leste was supposedly a normal province of Indonesia, arbitrary detention and torture was still reported to have occurred every year and took the form of sporadic low-level violence.



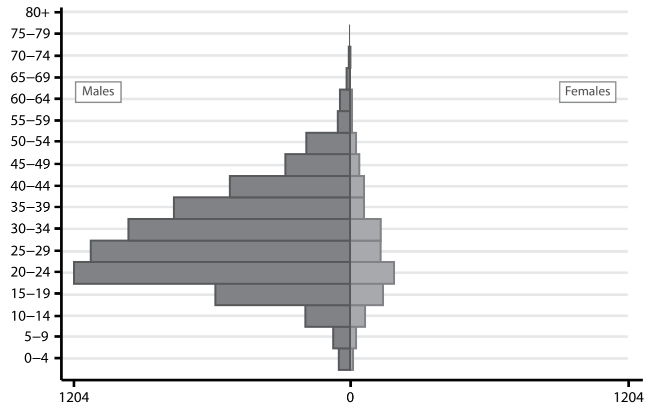
25. This pattern is consistent with the pattern of fatal violations: at times when more people were being arbitrarily detained and physically abused, larger numbers of people were also being killed (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

Patterns over space

26. Patterns over space also were not consistent throughout the conflicts. In the first years of the mandate period, the highest numbers of detentions and cases of ill-treatment and torture were in the western districts. By 1980, this had swung sharply to the eastern districts, where the Resistance was based and most resistance activity occurred, and this continued until 1984. Between 1985 and 1998, there was sporadic violence at similar levels in all regions of the territory but not in all districts in all years. In 1999, districts close to the border – Bobonaro, Covalima and Liquiçá – again saw most of the violence.

27. Overall, the highest number of people detained over the mandate period (18% of total reports) were detained in Dili, followed by Lautém, Viqueque and Baucau (the eastern region). The least number of documented cases came from Oecussi (0.8%),* followed by Covalima and Liquiçá Districts. Torture and ill-treatment, however, while highest in Dili (12% and 13% of total reported cases respectively), occurred most frequently in Ermera and Manufahi Districts.

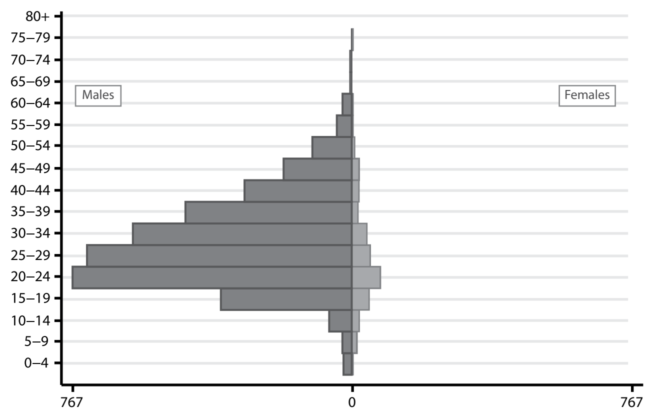
Count of reported violations, by type and district



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

* Until 1999, there were almost no cases of detention, torture and ill-treatment in the enclave of Oecussi, apart from in 1975. This changed in 1999 when militia violence targeted the area.

The victims



28. The Commission's statement-taking process identified 17,169 victims of arbitrary detention, 8,508 victims of torture and 6,872 victims of ill-treatment. From these cases it is clear that young men of military age involved in Fretilin/Falintil or other groups resistant to the Indonesian occupation, suffered the majority of violations.

Number of reported acts of detention, by age and sex, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR
Note: 72.4% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

Number of reported acts of torture, by age and sex, 1974–1999

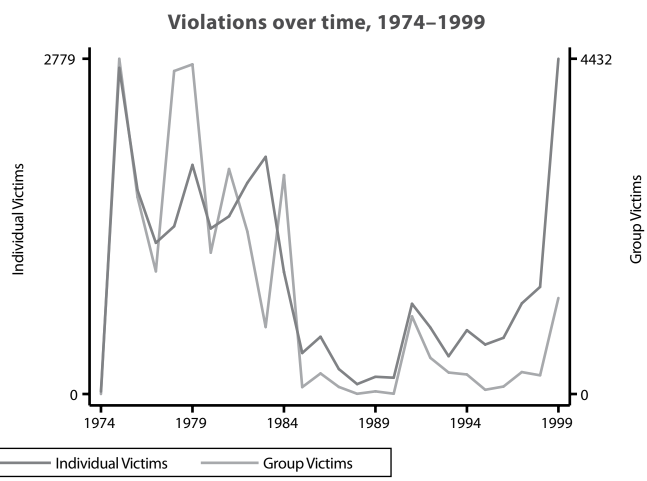
Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR
Note: 63,9% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

Gender

29. Overall, women comprised 13.9% of victims in cases of arbitrary detention, 12.3% in cases of torture and 7.7% in cases of ill-treatment. This strong gender bias reflects both that men were at the forefront of the conflict, fighting in the internal armed conflict and taking part in the armed resistance or the clandestine networks during the occupation, and also that less women came forward to give statements than men. Only 21% of statements in the Commission's statement-taking process were given by women.

Affiliation

30. Victims of detentions and torture and ill-treatment were mainly members of the Resistance and the clandestine movement, as well as students and other real or suspected supporters of independence. Many people only indirectly involved in the struggle were also detained and tortured. Family members and friends of alleged insurgents and clandestine members were detained, often in an effort to isolate alleged members of the armed or clandestine Resistance from their support networks and so force them to surrender. Relatives and associates were also detained, tortured and ill-treated to extract information from them on the whereabouts and activities of their suspected family member or associate. An example of this is the hundreds of families that the Indonesian authorites sent to Ataúro in the early 1980s because they had family members in the Resistance or were from areas where the Resistance was strong. That is to say, very few of the detentions or cases of torture and ill-treatment reported to the Commission were random attacks on civilians with no political motivation. Only a very small number of victims were East Timorese who collaborated with Indonesia.



Group size

31. Most victims were detained individually, suggesting that they were specifically targeted by the perpetrator. Close behind this though were victims who reported being detained as part of groups of 98 people or more. The detention of individuals and groups is closely correlated; when more individual arrests are being made, more mass arrests are also being made. The patterns changed over time. In every year between 1975 and 1984, except 1983, more people were arrested in large groups than as individuals. Between 1985 and 1998, more people were being detained individually than in large groups. This suggests that detention by Indonesian security forces became more targeted and strategic towards individuals in later years of the occupation.

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

32. Torture and ill-treatment were obviously more often experienced by victims on an individual basis than as part of a group. Nevertheless, the category "groups of 98 people or more" was the second highest category in which people reported suffering ill-treatment or torture and in two years, 1975 and 1982, more people reported being tortured in a group than individually. Examples of torture and ill-treatment of groups include where large groups of people were detained and then beaten by their captors or were kept in terrible conditions amounting to inhuman treatment.

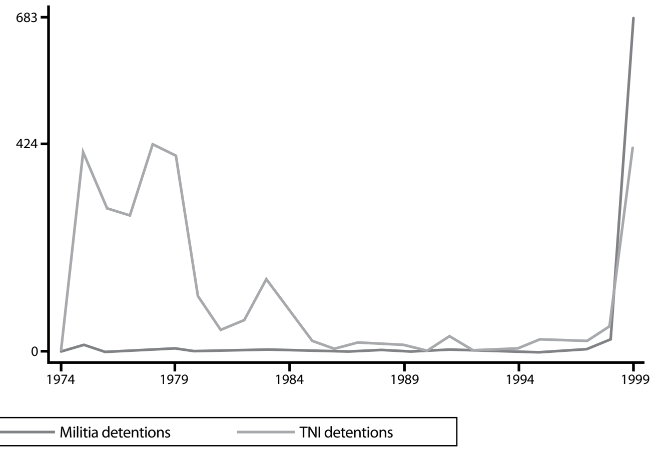
Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Institutional perpetrators

33. By far the most frequent perpetrators of arbitrary detention, ill-treatment and torture were the Indonesian military and police together with their auxiliaries. Together they were named as directly involved in 82.2% (20,867/25,383) of arbitrary detentions and 82.4% (16,135/19,578) cases of torture and ill-treatment.

Table 1: Violations by institutional perpetrator group*

Violation type	ABRI/TNI alone	East Timorese Auxiliaries Alone	ABRI/TNI with East Timorese Auxiliary	Fretilin/ Resistance	UDT	Civilian Popula-tion	Pro-Au-tonomy	Not re-ported†	Violation Count
Detention	12,212 (48.1%)	3,126 (12.3%)	5,557 (21.9%)	3,309 (13%)	984 (3.9%)	772 (3%)	222 (0.9%)	14 (0.1%)	25,383
Torture and ill-treatment	8,890 (45.4%)	4,380 (22.4%)	2,880 (14.7%)	2,250 (11.5%)	747 (3.8%)	509 (2.6%)	157 (0.8%)	27 (0.1%)	19.578

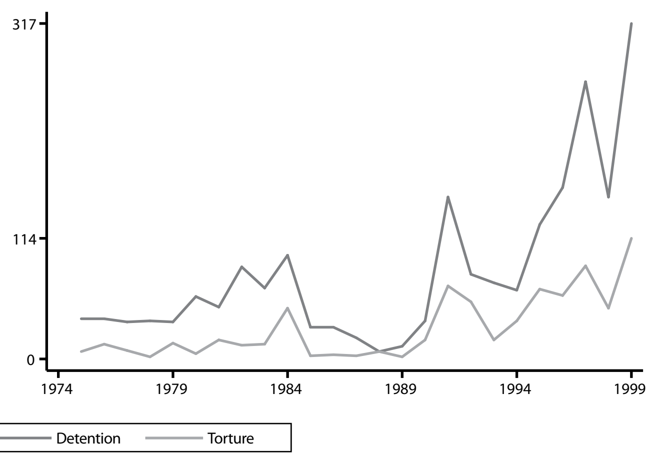


Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

34. If this figure is broken down, it is clear that members of the Indonesian military and police acting on their own were still the largest perpetrators. Victims attributed 48.1% (12,212/25,383) of arbitrary detentions and 45.5% (8,890/19,578) of incidents of torture and ill-treatment to members of the Indonesian armed forces acting alone. Different agencies of the Indonesian armed forces were attributed responsibility at different times. In the early years, battalions and their commanders were named in most cases of detention, ill-treatment and torture because they were carried out during military operations. By the late 1970s, units which formed part of the territorial structure such as District and Sub-district military commands (Kodims and Koramils) were most frequently named. Police became more active in the latter part of the occupation, when the detention procedures in the province were normalised. Reflecting the fact that the chief targets of the security apparatus during the occupation were members of the armed and clandestine Resistance, throughout the occupation the various intelligence agencies and the Special Forces (Kopassandha/Kopassus) frequently perpetrated arrests, detention, torture and ill-treatment. They perpetrated these violations both directly and indirectly, for example, by ordering or encouraging East Timorese auxiliaries such as Hansip or militia groups to perpetrate violations.

35. East Timorese who worked with the Indonesian security forces (such as civil defence, local administrators, "village guidance" officers, and paramilitary and militia groups) acting alone were named in only 12.3% (3,126/25,383) of cases of detention and 22.4% (4,380/19,578) of other cases. The following graph shows the involvement of the military relative to East Timorese who worked in these auxiliary roles in detention cases alone. It is clear that the Indonesian military is the chief institutional perpetrator in all years except for 1999.

* Note that the violation count is not a total of the figures in the table as in many cases more than one institutional perpetrator was identified by the statement-giver [see Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of human rights violations].



Violations over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

36. The Resistance movement was identified as the institutional perpetrator in 13% of detention cases, 11% of torture cases and 13% of ill-treatment cases. Most of these cases occurred in 1975 during the period of the internal armed conflict, and between 1976 and 1979 when internal divisions within Fretilin were at their height.

Non-fatal violations over time, 1974–1999, committed by Police

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

* Where the statement-giver did not identify the institutional affiliation of the perpetrator in his or her statement.

Where people were detained

37. The Commission's data analysis process did not analyse the type of places used to detain victims. However qualitative review of victim statements and information obtained through interviews and Community Profiles have revealed a number of patterns.

38. First, a huge variety of places were used to hold prisoners. During the internal armed conflict and the period of Fretilin administration, both UDT and Fretilin used whatever places were at hand. In some instances these were large buildings such as warehouses, military barracks or school halls; in others they were pens which resembled chicken coops, bamboo huts or holes in the ground. The Indonesian military continued this pattern after it invaded in 1975 and before it had built its own military structures. By mid-1976, the military had established military commands and police stations and it began to use these and other military buildings, such as barracks and mess halls, to detain and torture victims. Many victims were moved between detention centres numerous times and thousands were sent far from their friends and family to other parts of Timor-Leste, including the island of Ataúro or parts of Indonesia. The Annexes to this report contain a list of all of the detention centres in all districts reported by statement givers. It is not comprehensive but provides a sense of the number and variety of places used.

39. Second, throughout the mandate period but particularly in the early years and in 1999, conditions of detention were routinely far below internationally accepted minimum standards. Victims held by both political parties (UDT and Fretilin), and by Indonesian security forces and their agencies frequently reported suffering food deprivation, inadequate sanitation and ventilation, overcrowding and long periods of solitary confinement. Beatings and other forms of physical abuse were routine. Many people died in detention or were injured so seriously that they were never able to live normally again. Indonesian authorities are plainly the most culpable, as indicated by the number of people who suffered, the systematic nature of abuse and the length of time over which it occurred.

Structure of the part and key findings

40. This part is arranged both according to periods of time and perpetrators. Given the sheer number of reported cases of arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment, it was impossible to enter every deponent's testimony into this part. This should not be taken to imply that one deponent's testimony was more or less valuable than another's, merely that owing to constraints of space it was necessary to cite cases which exemplify general patterns.

41. The Commission has looked at patterns of who suffered these violations, who perpetrated the violations, and what strategies or policies (or lack thereof) led to these violations occurring. This was not always a straightforward process. Deponents described what happened to them in the way that they experienced it. Many victims did not even know who was committing the violation, let alone who had ordered it or of the policy behind it. Nevertheless, from reviewing many thousands of such testimonies, certain clear patterns can be gleaned and responsibility attributed.

42. Victims' experiences were drawn not only from statements but also from extensive interviews conducted by the Commission's research team between 2002 and 2004. The experiences of communities as a whole, as set out in Community Profiles, were also a valuable research tool.

Detention, torture and ill-treatment by UDT, 1975

43. The first section looks at the nature and extent of arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment perpetrated by UDT during its August 1975 armed movement, carried out between 11 and 20 August 1975. It looks at the reasons for the detentions and then the patterns of detention, ill-treatment and torture on a district-by-district basis. The Commission has found that a key strategy of the UDT armed movement was the detention of leaders and ordinary members of the main opposition party, Fretilin. The Commission received testimony about people being arbitrarily detained in all districts of Timor-Leste apart from the enclave of Oecussi, but the largest concentrations of prisoners were in the districts of Dili, Ermera and Manufahi. Most of those detained by UDT were held in such poor conditions, often without any food or water, that some died in detention. Beatings and other forms of physical abuse occurred widely but incidents of torture were isolated and torture was not perpetrated systematically. As the UDT armed movement was short-lived, so were most of the detentions.

Detention, torture and ill-treatment by Fretilin, 1975

44. Fretilin forces declared an armed general insurrection, or "armed action", on 15 August 1975. It responded to the violations perpetrated by UDT with ferocity, detaining many hundreds of UDT leaders and supporters. As the threat of Indonesian invasion became more real, Apodeti leaders and members were also targeted for detention. Many former detainees of Fretilin report being heavily beaten, in some cases tortured. Fretilin also differed from UDT by actively engaging the civilian population in the punishment of UDT members. Many detainees died or were killed while in detention. After the Indonesian invasion, Fretilin continued to hold several thousand people in detention, depriving them of food and water but making them perform forced labour such as carrying heavy goods. Some prisoners died in these conditions and some were executed.

Detention, torture and ill-treatment by Fretilin/Falintil, 1977–1979

45. Indonesia did not have complete control of the territory until early 1979. Until then, Fretilin had control of a large part of the civilian population. In Fretilin-controlled zones it set up a rudimentary justice process. This section outlines the justice process, the reasons that people were detained through this system, as well as the treatment of prisoners in several districts. The Commission finds that arbitrary detention was widespread and was not mitigated by the Fretilin practices of meting out justice. Ill-treatment and torture were also widespread and in some areas were systematic. They occurred during both interrogation and in the punishment of the prisoner. This treatment can be partly explained by the chronic food shortages in the Fretilin zones due to the need to continually move from the invading Indonesian forces and that crops were being burned by the Indonesian military.

Detention, torture and ill-treatment by the Indonesian security forces and collaborators, 1975–1979

46. The Commission's data show that the peak years for arbitrary detentions, torture and ill-treatment were the early years after the Indonesian invasion of Timor-Leste. This section looks at these violations: at the time of the Indonesian incursions along the border; during and immediately after the invasion of Dili and other major population centres; when people surrendered; or when they were captured in large numbers during military operations aimed at destroying the Resistance and bringing the whole population under Indonesian control. The Commission finds that targeted detention of East Timorese that the Indonesian security forces identified as members of Fretilin occurred from the day of the invasion of Dili. As well as targeted detentions, mass detentions of communities who surrendered or were captured occurred frequently throughout this period.

Detention, torture and ill-treatment by the Indonesian security forces and East Timorese auxiliaries, 1980–1984

47. Between 1980 and 1984, large military operations were again conducted to destroy what remained of the Resistance and its new support base in towns and villages. This section is chronological and examines the military's tactical response to the reformed Resistance. It begins with the first major attack by the Resistance after its apparent defeat, on the Marabia broadcasting station, followed by Operation Security and the transfer of thousands of people to the island of Ataúro, the crackdown following the Mount Kablaki levantamentos, the ceasefire and its tragic aftermath in 1983, the peak year for detentions and torture in this period, and finally the decline in detentions in 1984. Although the military still played a leading role in this period, East Timorese auxiliary forces, such as civilian defence (Hansip), became heavily involved in detaining and torturing suspects. This period is also notable for the number of mass arrests following events that demonstrated that the Resistance was still active. Entire families were detained for several years on Ataúro or in resettlement villages. The number of people tortured relative to the number detained increased after 1983 and this trend continued throughout the remainder of the occupation.

Detention, torture and ill-treatment by the Indonesian security forces and East Timorese auxiliaries, 1985–1998

48. This section looks at the nature and extent of detention, torture and ill-treatment during the long period of "normalisation" in Timor-Leste. Indonesia's decision to "open up" Timor-Leste, from the end of 1988, together with the increased international scrutiny that followed the Santa Cruz Massacre and the growing importance of clandestine and diplomatic activity to the Resistance struggle resulted in new patterns of arrests and detentions in the late 1980s and the 1990s. There were fewer arrests and detentions during this period but they were more targeted. There were also preventive arrests made, for example, before visits by international delegations. The increasing mobilisation of youth by both sides led to numerous spontaneous clashes and violent outbursts around religious, economic and political issues. The number of incidents of detention, torture and ill-treatment began to increase substantially from 1997.

Detention, torture and ill-treatment by the Indonesian security forces and East Timorese auxiliaries, 1999

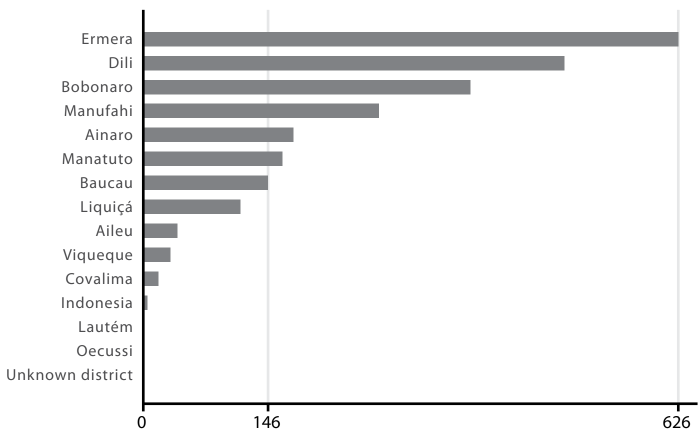
49. 1999 is dealt with separately because of the unique circumstances of that year. The announcement of, and preparation for, the Popular Consultation led the military to take drastic measures to influence the outcome. This part looks at the main perpetrators and the main victims of non-fatal violence, the reasons for detention, torture and ill-treatment, the patterns over time and space and the forms of detention and torture that emerged in 1999 and that were unique to this period.

Detention and torture by UDT, 1975

Introduction

50. The first major wave of detentions, torture and ill-treatment was carried out by the União Democrática Timorense (UDT) political party when it launched an armed movement in August 1975. This act is commonly known as the UDT 11 August 1975 armed movement or anti-communist movement (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict).

51. In the first days of the armed movement, UDT supporters attacked and burned villages where there was strong support for Fretilin. They arrested members of Fretilin and members of the Fretilin Central Committee (CCF). Radio broadcasts from Dili on the morning of 11 August urged UDT supporters in the districts to take up arms against Fretilin "communists", encouraging violence and inter-party conflict in all areas except the district of Oecussi.* The UDT armed action lasted until 20 August 1975 when Fretilin launched its general armed insurrection.



* In Oecussi, according to the official Portuguese Relatorio da Commissão de Analise e Esclarecimento do Processo de Descolonizacão de Timor [Report to the Commission of Analysis and Explanation on the Process of Decolonisation in Timor], the situation was unchanged on 11 August. Oecussi remained quiet on 12 and 13 August. On the night of 13–14 August, when the Portuguese Governor briefed representatives of Dili units on the latest situation and asked them to come up with a solution, the Oecussi Mounted Company said that it would abide by any decisions made by the Dili units' representatives. The town of Aileu was under the remaining Metropolitano (Portuguese metropolitan police) unit, and most of Fretilin's Central Committee members were based in Aissirimou (Aileu) until 15 August. UDT therefore reportedly did not enter the area. Detentions in other parts of Aileu were reported, however, such as a joint UDT and Apodeti arrest of two members of Fretilin on 11 August in Seloi Malere. [HRVD Statement 3256].

52. Detainees were released after Fretilin gained control of the territory in September 1975. The periods of detention were therefore no more than a month; in most cases, they were for less than two weeks.[18] Although the UDT armed movement was led from Dili, it was coordinated by district level leaders in each district. The overall statistical patterns of, and reasons for, detention by UDT and the treatment prisoners in detention in seven districts of Timor-Leste is considered below.

Statistical patterns

53. The Commission's research found that the level of violence related to the UDT armed movement varied between districts. The graph below shows the numbers of reports of arbitrary detention by UDT in each district.* It is clear that the violence was concentrated in the district of Ermera, followed by Dili, which was the UDT headquarters, Bobonaro and Manufahi. No detentions were reported in Oecussi and the numbers in the districts of Lautém, Viqueque and Covalima were low.

Count of reported acts of detention commited by UDT, by district, 1974–1979

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

54. A popular notion in Timor-Leste is that the UDT movement was not especially violent and that prisoners were treated well, particularly compared to the way that Fretilin treated its prisoners. For example José Ramos-Horta once wrote:

> The leaders of UDT acted more sensitively and humanely compared to the leaders of Fretilin…no leader of Fretilin who was detained by UDT stated that he was tortured by UDT. The same could not be said about the conduct of some Fretilin leaders.[19]

* Although the time period on the graph is 1975–1979, the first phase of the conflicts, it should be noted that the vast majority of these cases occurred in 1975.

55. However, the Commission's research has found that many detainees reported experiencing torture and ill-treatment at the hands of UDT members and supporters.

56. Qualitative analysis of the statements reveals that in most cases violations that detainees reported having experienced were closer to ill-treatment than to torture. Common violations were beating, kicking and slapping. Detainees were kept in detention for extended periods without food or water and in poor sanitary conditions. They were also used as forced labour. In many cases these actions amounted to cruel and inhuman treatment. These violations were often perpetrated by the UDT leaders themselves. An analysis of the deaths in detention by UDT is found in Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances.

Victims

57. Almost all the victims of arbitrary detention by UDT reported to the Commission were of Fretilin leaders, members and sympathisers, either real or suspected. Indeed, 81.1% (673/830) of detentions attributed to UDT reported to the Commission were committed against victims affiliated with Fretilin. Another 7.7% (64/830) of victims were reportedly civilians and 3.7% (31/830) were "other". UDT members themselves constituted 7.6% (64/830) of victims. These figures support the qualitative research findings of the Commission that UDT targeted Fretilin members when it conducted its 11 August movement.

58. Apodeti maintained a neutral position during the UDT movement, and its members were not targeted by UDT.[20] Only 0.2% (2/830) of victims in cases of detentions attributed to UDT were Apodeti members. Some Fretilin members reportedly hid in the homes of Apodeti supporters while the armed action was taking place.[21] Other Fretilin members fled from the fighting and many sought refuge in Dili, for example at the Office of the Department of Social Services (Assistençia).*

59. Paulo Freitas, President of the Trabalhista party at the time, said that the party had verbally "collaborated with UDT's anti-communist movement" but did not join the party when it launched its UDT armed movement. He was, however, placed under house-arrest by UDT in Ossu (Viqueque) during the UDT movement:

> UDT made the coup and imprisoned me…what had I done wrong for them to come and imprison me? They took me and our liurai Gaspar… held a pistol and threatened the two of us: "You two, from now on you keep away, you must not get close to the people, I now control the people…You go to your homes and stay there [and be] silent. You will have to put up with this like a prison." So the two of us were just dumbfounded and stayed in our houses.[22]

* The Office of the Department of Social Services was in Caicoli (Dili). This building is now used by the National University of Timor-Leste (UNTL).

Arbitrary arrest

60. The Commission heard testimony that the orders for the detention of Fretilin members in the districts came from the UDT leadership in Dili. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, the first President of Fretilin, described how he heard UDT giving orders over the radio:

> Radio Dili sent UDT to attack Bucoli. They said: "Arrest Fretilin! Go and arrest them in Cairui, go and arrest the communists." I thought, "What communists? Don't tell me that Fretilin are all communists". They were saying that all Fretilin was communist…I listened to the radio all the time; there wasn't an hour when I didn't have it on. I heard that they attacked in Aileu, attacked in Ermera, attacked in Letefoho and those from Atsabe [Ermera] came and attacked the Central Committee in Aileu. From Turiscai [Manufahi], Funar, Fatumakerek, Laclubar [Viqueque], Soibada [Manatuto], Barique, they all came together and formed a crusade. They said: "This war is a crusade, a war against communism". This had the blessing of the priests. The priests prayed with them in a big mass and gave them their blessing.[23]

61. João Carrascalão, the military leader of the UDT party at the time of the armed movement, denied that the UDT leadership in Dili ordered the arrests. He told the Commission:

> There was no order to arrest Fretilin members and take them to prison. Suddenly we were surprised to see the prison full. There was no order from the Central Committee. The action taken was spontaneous…and many people acted for their own personal reasons, from earlier years, and they took the opportunity and just took people arbitrarily…Every day I went to the UDT prisons and released 50 to 60 people.[24]

62. The evidence suggests that local leaders at the district and sub-district level identified the Fretilin members and supporters in the area and either apprehended them personally or sent other UDT members to make the arrests. Victims were taken wherever they were found. In some cases this was at home, on the street or at work. Two nurses were arrested while on duty and were still wearing their uniforms in the detention centre.*

63. Others were caught as they tried to flee their villages from UDT armed supporters who were burning down their houses and looting their belongings. For example, UDT captured Fretilin leader Vicente Reis (Sahe), his brother Marito Reis

* Enfermeiro José Espirito Santo was arrested at Lahane Hospital in Dili. Agustinho Freitas said that Guido Valadares and José Espirito Santo were still wearing their hospital uniforms when they were arrested and detained in Palapaço. [CAVR interviews with Maria José Fatima Ximenes, Enfermeiro José Espirito Santo's former wife, Baucau Town, Baucau, 2003; Agustinho Freitas, Carabau Village, Bobonaro, 12 June 2003].

and 11 other Fretilin supporters in Laleia (Manatuto) after they fled from the UDT attack on the village of Bucóli (Baucau). Marito Reis described how UDT supporters yelled abuse at them when they stopped in Manatuto:

> They surrounded our car and screamed at us things like: "Kill communist sympathisers!…Like you Vicente Reis! Can you rule Timor?" We just stayed silent because in that situation we were unable to speak.[25]

64. Others were arrested when they were found to possess a Fretilin membership card. João Lopes of Memo Village (Maliana, Bobonaro) told the Commission that a UDT leader arrested him in the village of Asumali because he was found with a Fretilin membership card, and then he was tied, beaten and detained.[26] In another case from the sub-district of Maliana, António da Costa Guterres told the Commission he was arrested on 2 September 1975 in the village of Odomau (Maliana) with a person called Carlos because they held Fretilin membership cards. Their captors were a Bobonaro UDT leader T1 and his men T2, T3 and T4. António and Carlos were tied, beaten and threatened with death.[27]

65. The Commission also heard of cases in which the victims were detained when they were caught up in the general chaos and violence of the time, not specifically for their party affiliation. For example, Lucio Dinis Marques described his arrest with eight of his friends:

> On 11 August, we were living in Rosa Lay [a shop in Bairro dos Grilos, East Dili]. I was 19 years old and working at the Dili Diocese at the time. My younger brothers and sisters…and I were watching UDT men marching with their weapons. Then the men began shooting sporadically in our direction. We ran inside the house and no one dared go out because gunfire could be heard all over Dili. Around 3.00pm the same UDT men came back by car carrying Mausers and G-3s. They broke into our house and told us to go out into the street. They took the nine of us to Palapaço [location of the Portuguese military police headquarters] in a pick-up truck. A lot of people were already being held there. We did not know for sure if we had become prisoners, they just told us to join the other detainees in Caserna [the barracks]… While we were in detention we weren't beaten.[28]

Detention centres and cases of human rights violations

Detention centres

66. UDT set up detention centres in various districts in Timor-Leste. In general, these facilities were temporary, to meet the immediate need of holding large groups of people. The Commission heard of schools, military compounds, warehouses and other large buildings used as UDT detention centres.

67. In most districts, one or two main detention centres were established, and then smaller places were used on an ad-hoc basis in other parts of the district. The main centres in each district were as follows:

Table 2: The main UDT centres of detention in every district
District	Main Detention Centres
Dili	Palapaço, Portuguese military police barracks
Ermera	Ermera Prison Aifu, a coffee warehouse
Manufahi	Former Portuguese Prison in Same A "Chicken Coop" in Wedauberek, Alas
Liquiçá	Liquiçá Primary School Maubara Primary School
Bobonaro	Corluli, a rice-storage warehouse
Lautém	Military barracks at Companhia dos Caçadores 14 (14th Rifle Company)
Baucau	Pousada Baucau, a former hotel Descascadeira, a rice mill in Bahu, Baucau

68. Many prisoners told the Commission of suffering human rights violations including torture and ill-treatment while being held by UDT. Many also told of being held in poor conditions with little food or water.

Dili

69. On the morning of 11 August, UDT seized key points around Dili including the Portuguese Military Police barracks called Caserna Palapaço. As well as providing the UDT forces with a considerable arms cache, this became the UDT headquarters and the main UDT detention centre in Dili.[29] As well as detainees from Dili, the Commission also heard of people arrested in the districts of Manatuto and Baucau who were brought and detained in Palapaço.[*] Fretilin leaders such as Vicente Reis, Guido Valadares and José Siqueira were detained in Palapaço. Other detainees included Fretilin members and sympathisers, and civilians suspected of supporting Fretilin.

70. Mario Carrascalão described visiting Palapaço around 14 August 1975, after being in the districts of Timor-Leste:

> In Palapaço I found old men, young boys and young men…12-year-olds carrying guns. I saw the son of a friend of mine, 12 or 13 years old, carrying a G-3.[30]

* Vicente Reis and several other members of Fretilin from Bucoli (Baucau) were arrested and taken to Palapaço in Dili to be detained. Domingos Gusmão, a member of Fretilin, was apprehended by UDT soldiers in Gariuai (Baucau) and was also brought to Dili to be detained in Palapaço. [CAVR Interview with Agustinho Boavida Ximenes (Sera Malik), Soe, West Timor (Indonesia) 28 August 2004].

71. From victim testimonies and interviews, the Commission has heard estimates ranging from 100 to 200 Fretilin members and supporters detained by UDT in Palapaço.* The room in which people were held was so full that the guards had to stand outside.[31] Female guards brought the food and fed the detainees with plastic spoons. Each detainee was entitled to one spoonful of porridge twice a day.[32] The guard used the same spoon for all detainees.[33]

72. Witnesses told the Commission that prisoners in Palapaço suffered ill-treatment at the hands of UDT members and guards. At the prison door, the guards beat detainees who had to go to the toilet so that many detainees chose to urinate in their cells. Several detainees were reportedly shot dead by prison guards, one accidentally.† Some detainees also experienced torture, as illustrated by the following statement of Luis de Jesus Guterres to the Commission:

> On 11 August 1975 in Ailok Laran, Dili, my wife, my child and I, with some of our neighbours [there were 12 of us altogether] were taken away by force by ten people from the UDT party whom I didn't recognise. They made us walk to the prison at Palapaço. When we arrived we were separated from our children and wives. They were taken to Liquiçá and the men were held together in Palapaço. We [the men] were interrogated by two members of UDT, T5 and T6. Then they beat us with a leather belt until we were bleeding all over and the torture went on for two days…We were made to cook for the other detainees for eight days. After that we were released by the UDT leaders at Palapaço, João Carrascalão and Manuel Carrascalão. Then we went to Liquiçá to find our families.[34]

73. Members of the CCF did not escape ill-treatment in detention. Vicente Reis (Sahe) suffered beatings and verbal abuse after he was taken to Palapaço and interrogated by a UDT member, T7.‡ Vicente Reis's brother, Marito Nicolau dos Reis, gave the following account of their detention in Palapaço.

> First we came in…then [T7] called Sahe: "You brought communism from Portugal. Come here!" He slapped, kicked and beat his face. [Sahe] fell and knelt with his hands on the ground. T7 reached for the bayonet from his Mauser and aimed it at Sahe but a police officer, T8, who collaborated with UDT, quickly slapped the bayonet away and said to him in Portuguese: "Não faz isso" [Do not do that]. When the beating stopped, Sahe was told to sit. I remember when they beat and kicked us,

* According to Vicente Araújo there were around 200 members of Fretilin detained in Palapaço, † Marito Reis told the Commission that a guard accidentally killed José Espirito Santo in Palapaço when his gun went off unintentionally and that José Siqueira was shot by a guard when he was sick and cried out [see CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 27 July 2003].

‡ T7 was a member of UDT. He was killed by T9 and T69 of Fretilin in Hola Rua (Same, Manufahi) on 28 January 1976, one day after he had escaped from the massacre of José Osorio's group in Hat Nipah, Hola Rua Village (Same, Manufahi) [see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances].

maybe only the two of us. Then they ordered us to sit near the door, and said: "You are from Unetim, you are those communists in Baucau."*[35]

74. Xanana Gusmão, who was arrested and detained by UDT in Palapaço, also recalled the detention and torture of Vicente Reis:

They yelled "Communist!" as they beat and kicked Sahe's body until he staggered. But he never complained. A UDT guard told us that we were in detention because we were all communists. Sahe asked him whether he knew what communism was. He said: "Communism, yeah, ah, I am not sure" and he left.[36]

75. The Commission also received testimonies suggesting that some detainees experienced physical abuse before they arrived in Palapaço.

Manuel Agustinho Freitas, detention in Palapaço

Manuel Freitas was a Fretilin delegate from Lepo Village in Zumalai, Covalima District. UDT arrested him in Mota Maloa, Dili, on 11 August 1975. He described his arrest and detention in Palapaço:

On Monday morning, 11 August 1975, UDT arrested me in Mota Maloa, Dili. The four of us were arrested and taken to Aitarak Laran (Dili) in a jeep. At the bridge, UDT supporters beat us with wood. Then they said: "Take them to the port and throw them into the sea."

Somehow, they decided not to take us to the port. Instead, they took us to Mandarin.† There, I saw people lined up in the street. They stopped our car. They started beating us…Then they took us to Palapaço. As we got out of the car, UDT supporters beat us and threw rocks at us. We were put into a military compound at 6.00am. There, I saw nurses like Guido [Valadares] and José Espirito Santo from Baucau who were still in their hospital uniforms.

On 14 August, I tried to talk to UDT leader T10 and I said: "Why not just capture the leaders, why [capture] us small people?" We asked whether he could facilitate our release. He refused and said that he could not sleep until UDT captured Francisco do Amaral and Nicolau Lobato. So we had to die. They dragged us back to the cell. On the night of 15 August, Senhor Arthur came. I did not know him, I only heard people

* União dos Estudantes de Timor (Unetim) was a student organisation affiliated with Fretilin.

† Mandarin is an area in Dili near Farol and Palapaço.

address him as Senhor Arthur. He entered our cell and wanted to free us that night…but nurse José Espirito Santo raised his hands and advised him not to let us go that night. He was afraid that other UDT members would think that we were escaping. He suggested that we be freed in the morning. The next morning at 7.00, the police chief, T11 entered the prison and screamed angrily: "You wait until you die. You communists cannot leave." We were tied up and stomped on.

On 17 August, a Malae, T12, and a police officer T13, the in-law of Lucio Marques who was detained with us in our cell, came. With a Mauser in his hand, he stood at the prison door and said, "Raise your hands if you are a blood relation of Albano." I pinched Lucio to also include me. We raised our hands, and made a "V" sign† and we were released.*[37]

76. Reports obtained by the Commission show that while the political violence was widespread at the start of the UDT armed movement, UDT continued to arrest people until Fretilin launched an armed reaction in Dili on 20 August 1975. The following reports obtained by the Commission describe the arrests and detention of Fretilin supporters in Dili:

Table 3: The arrests and detentions of Fretilin supporters in Dili

Deponent	Date and place of arrest	Detention	Torture
Matias de Jesus Soares[38]	11 August 1975 Arrested by ten UDT members.	Detained for six days in Palapaço.	Not mentioned by the deponent. On 16 August, Matias and Felix Fatima, a UDT driver, fled Palapaço by car. T7, a UDT member, shot at them but missed.
Vicente de Araújo[39]	11 August in Camea (Dili).	Taken to Palapaço.	When he arrived at the prison door he was hit by a rifle butt on his back, beaten and kicked.
Domingos Carvalho[40]	11 August arrested by UDT members in Becora (Dili).	Put in a car with eight others and taken to Palapaço.	Slapped twice on arrest. Beaten for three days in detention and closely guarded by UDT members from Ermera armed with swords, knives and arrows.
Alexandrino da Silva[41]	11 August, UDT members T14 and T15 attacked the deponent's house in Bairro Pite airfield, West Dili, and arrested deponent.	Deponent tied-up with other victims, Suriano and José. They were taken in a jeep to Palapaço.	João Carrascalão was standing at the door; they were untied and detained with Guido Valadares, José Alexandre Gusmão (Xanana Gusmão), Cornelio, Pontelião, José Siqueira, José Espirito Santo, Domingos Conceição, Alberto da Costa and Manuel Freitas. They were given dirty food, once a day; other detainees from Ermera and Maubisse (Ainaro) who went to the toilet received beatings.

* A term used in Timor-Leste to describe an outsider or foreigner, in this case a Portuguese person.

† Their fingers formed a V sign, a sign of UDT.

Moises Soares Pereira[42]	18 August, by UDT troops in Audian, Dili.	Tied up and taken to Palapaço by car.	Was put into a cell that already had around 250 people inside. While in detention he was forced to clean the cell.
Manuel do Rêgo[43]	18 August, deponent was stopped by an armed UDT member who asked for his UDT card, but he did not have one.	Soon after, a jeep came by and took the deponent to Palapaço.	Upon arrival, UDT members T7 and T16 hit the deponent, Mário Sousa, Acaçio Carvalho and Moises, with G-3 rifles until the weapons broke. The deponent was ordered to fix the water pipes and the other victims were ordered to clean the toilet.

Ermera

77. Ermera was also a UDT stronghold and the Commission received the highest number of reports of arbitrary detention by UDT in the district of Ermera, numbering 626.* Ermera was a coffee-growing area, and an owner of the plantations in Aifu, Ermera, T17, was the head of the UDT regional committee in Ermera.[44] He was named to the Commission as being directly involved in numerous cases of arrest and detention in Ermera District.†

78. UDT set up two major detention centres in Ermera District, in Aifu and the Ermera Prison. Other smaller detention centres were set up throughout the district. Once Fretilin's armed reaction was underway, UDT transferred all prisoners in Aifu to the Ermera Prison. UDT forced around 70-75 Fretilin prisoners into one small cell with poor ventilation, making it difficult for the prisoners to breath. Conditions in this prison were poor. Prisoners were deprived of food. There was no toilet in the cell; the guards provided a drum for prisoners to use instead. On 1 September 1975, UDT guards began to take the prisoners out of the prison. Some were executed and others were released[45] (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

79. Two women from Ermera described detention and torture in Aifu and Ermera Prison. Eufrasia de Jesus Soares from Poetete (Ermera, Ermera) was married to Daniel Carvalho, the Apodeti Regional Secretary for Ermera District. She told the Commission:

> After their coup d'etat, UDT began to become violent in various areas from Ermera to Railaco…I followed all the developments in Ermera...In the beginning they did not kill, they just beat, captured, and engaged in various inhuman activities, so that many sought our protection. At that time we were living in Railaco. But acts of violence occurred in many places. People were captured, beaten and killed in Aifu.[46]

* Note that this figure does not represent 626 separate detentions; some deponents may have described the same incident.

† HRVD Statements: 1061; 4540; 6156; 8341; 6203; 8304 and 6421.

80. Maria Cecilia de Jesus told the Commission that UDT troops arrested her husband Virgilio Agustino Exposto Monteiro and his friend Luis da Costa at the Humboe intersection (Ermera Sub-district, Ermera) on 11 August. The arrest was ordered by UDT leaders T18 and T19. Both victims were detained in the Ermera Prison for two days and on 13 August António Casimiro released them. But, on 20 August, Virgilio was re-arrested at Humboe by UDT with Cecilia's father and detained in Ermera Prison. Because Cecilia was not yet legally married to Virgilio, she went with Father José Maria Barbosa to Ermera Prison and married Virgilio. Father Barbosa was threatened and expelled from the prison by T18. She said that she saw 72 people detained in the Ermera Prison.[47]

81. Adelino Soares described his arrest in Sakoko (Ermera) and his detention in Aifu:

> On 11 August, UDT armed supporters arrived in Sakoko, Ermera. They came to Sakoko first because they thought it was a Fretilin stronghold. They came with a major and guns like Mausers and G-3s. The villagers panicked when the armed supporters opened fire, shooting randomly. People ran in all directions. The supporters arrested ten of us who did not manage to escape and took us to Aifu. T20, a UDT commander, and T17 were waiting for us.[*]
>
> [T20] asked: "Are you the [Fretilin] delegate in Sakoko?" I answered: "Yes, I am", although I was just a regular member. Then [T130] said: "You can go home now, but tomorrow you must come here with your spears, arrows, machetes and any other sharp weapons you can find." At 6.00am we returned to Aifu [and] they took our weapons. They said: "Now go and find your Fretilin friends!" We obeyed and went to look for our friends but when we returned at 10.00am they tied our hands and feet. We were left tied up for a week. They beat other prisoners but they didn't beat people from Sakoko…
>
> They starved us for a week. They tied our hands and feet from morning until night. Many friends cried because of the unbearable suffering. Some died of starvation.[48]

82. Adriano Ximenes's older brother was one of those detained in Aifu. Adriano reported that a UDT commander, T21, went to Lekesi in Poetete Village (Ermera, Ermera) and threatened to shoot Adriano's older brother, Alexandrino Mau Soko. Because Alexandrino knelt at T21's feet, he was not shot but was instead imprisoned in Aifu. When they arrived Alexandrino was slashed across the back with a machete and was then forced to clean and cook for members of UDT.[49]

* T17 was a UDT leader and the owner of a coffee plantation in Aifu. He owned a house in Aifu. On 1 September, UDT guards took prisoners from Ermera to his house and executed them [see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances].

Manuel Duarte, imprisoned in Aifu

Manuel Duarte managed to escape from a group whose members were eventually killed by UDT in early September. He gave a description of his imprisonment by UDT in Ermera and in Aifu to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, held in Dili from 15 to 18 December 2003:

On 9 August I arrived in Dili from my home in Ermera. On 11 August I was at Zeca Bras's house when T22 from UDT captured me and took me to Uma Kleuk. At Uma Kleuk they exchanged my Fretilin card for a UDT card and then released me.

The next day on 12 August, T22 with four others recaptured me and took me to Aifu where there were many prisoners. They tied us up and made us lie on the ground like pigs. We were held there for over two weeks. On 20 August in response to the counter coup in Dili, UDT fled to Ermera. T18 moved us from the prison in Aifu to the prison in Ermera. We were kept there for five days. The toilet was just a drum in the middle of the cell.

On 1 September, T69 ordered the UDT armed supporters to take Lorenço dos Santos, Armando Barros, Miguel Salsina, Vicente and myself to Aifu to be killed. Before we arrived in Aifu we met UDT forces and a commander coming from the direction of Aifu and we were ordered to go to Claetreman [a place in the aldeia of Duhoho, Catrai-Leten Village (Letefoho Ermera)]. There, they took our wristwatches and money and we thought we were going to be killed. We met a second group of prisoners there but we didn't speak to each other, we just prayed.[50]

83. Prisoners affiliated with Fretilin were also kept in smaller detention centres throughout Ermera. The Commission heard testimony about UDT prisoners held in the sub-district of Hatolia in Nunsloet, Lemia Sorin Balu, Boatu, Koliate (all in Hatolia, Ermera), and Leotela;[51] in the sub-district of Letefoho,[52] in the Lihu Primary School; and other locations in the sub-district of Railaco;[53] a private house in the village of Poetete and an improvised prison in Maudiu Village in the sub-district of Ermera.[54] Detainees in these smaller detention centres also suffered torture and ill-treatment. The following cases occurred on the day of the armed movement, 11 August 1975:

- Dinis da Costa Pereira of Gomhei, in Riheu Village (Ermera, Ermera) told the Commission that on 11 August 1975, he was arrested in his home by 12 UDT armed supporters led by T25 and acting on the orders of T18 and T19. They took Dinis Pereira to a makeshift prison in Maudiu Village, Riheu

(Ermera, Ermera) where he saw five other people who had been detained that day, namely Nicolau, Mau-Hatu, Viegas, Mau-Usi and Francisco. The prisoners were stripped naked, beaten heavily, kicked and punched. They were given no food or drink during their time in detention. On 20 August, as Fretilin launched its armed response, they escaped.[55]

- Also on 11 August, a UDT local representative, T26, asked the head of Nukurai Village, namely, T27, and T28 to arrest five Fretilin members. The victims were arrested in Haufu Village (Letefoho, Ermera) and taken to the Companhia (Portuguese military headquarters) in Dinhati (Letefoho). While in detention, they were tortured and subject to inhuman treatment.[56]
- Luciano Salsinha Ximenes described how in Railaco Kraik Village (Railaco) on 11 August, UDT forces, including UDT members T29 and T30, arrested him. They tied his hands, beat him with an iron bar and wood until blood streamed all over his body and then took him to Railaco Town to the head of UDT in the area, T31. There, he was put into a cell with four other people including the liurai Napoleão from Taraso (Railaco, Ermera), Mau Tero and Mau Lere from Lihu and José Tilman from Aileu.[57] On 13 August they were beaten again and then taken to Aifu (Ermera).
- Abel de Oliveira Pinto told the Commission that UDT leader T17 arrested him on 11 August in Eratoi (Letefoho, Ermera) because he was a Fretilin supporter. T17 tied Abel Pinto's hands and then beat him, before taking him to Letefoho where he was held with 25 other Fretilin prisoners. UDT supporters also burned down his house. He described how on 20 August UDT leaders, including T18, T19, T32 and T33 came to Letefoho to see the prisoners. They threatened to kill Abel Pinto but instead, they slashed him with a knife.[58]

84. Detentions continued on 12 August: Paulino de Deus Araújo described how on 12 August 1975 in Lauana (Letefoho, Ermera) UDT members forced him to join UDT. The same day he was arrested and taken to Letefoho. The following day, he and another detainee named Victor were tied and beaten by three UDT supporters named T34, T19 and T32.[59]

85. Serafin de Jesus Martins testified about his detention and that of his father during the UDT armed movement. In his statement he recounted that as a 16-year-old Fretilin supporter, UDT members T35, T36 and T37 came to capture him at his home in Manusae (Hatolia, Ermera) on 12 August. Failing to find Serafin, they took his father Besi Leto and detained him in the UDT Hatolia Headquarters in Nunsloet in Ailelo Village (Hatolia, Ermera) for two days.

86. On 13 August, the three UDT members returned and, still failing to find Serafin, verbally abused his mother and sister. On 15 August Serafin and his brother Cipriano Guterres went to Nunsloet, Aileo (Hatolia, Ermera) to speak to UDT leaders about their father's detention:

> When we arrived, the UDT members arrested me straight away. They hit me all over with an iron bar and a piece of wood. Some of them hit me with a rock until my head was wounded, my right hand was broken and my knee was bleeding. Someone used a machete and cut my legs, both right and left. Then they burned me with fire and kicked and punched the rest of me. There were many people [beating me] but I only knew T38, T39, T40, T41 and T42.[60]

87. Serafin shared a cell with four other Fretilin prisoners, namely Rui Fernandes, Manuel da Silva, Damião de Oliveira and Gaspar de Oliveira, all arrested in Uruhau (Hatolia, Ermera). After a few days, the four were taken out and executed. Serafin was detained for eight days altogether and then moved to Hatolia Prison and then released by a member of the Public Security Police (Policia Segurança Publica).

88. On 25 August, UDT members arrested Serafin again and took him back to Nunsloet. This time he was not put in a cell but was forced to sleep on gravel for four days. A Segunda Linha* captain, T43, planned to kill Serafin when the UDT flag was lowered. Two other UDT supporters, Agusto Marcal Lemos and Hilario Soares, found out and alerted Serafin. He escaped and hid until Fretilin soldiers entered Raimerhei (Ermera, Ermera).[61]

Bobonaro

89. UDT arrests in Bobonaro District also began on 11 August 1975, mainly in Maliana and led by UDT commanders T1 and T44. The main UDT detention centre for people from Maliana Sub-district was a rice barn in Corluli, Ritabou Village (Maliana, Bobonaro).[62] The Commission heard that 70 Fretilin members were detained there, although several had been moved there from other detention locations around the sub-district of Maliana.[63] T45 was the warden and he carried a Mauser rifle. His treatment of prisoners was extremely harsh. Martino Lopes and João Godinho both told the Commission that prisoners received neither food nor drink and one or two prisoners died of starvation.[64]

90. João Godinho was one of the 70 Fretilin members detained in Corluli. He told the Commission that on 11 August UDT militants arrested a number of Fretilin supporters in Maliana. He was apprehended on his way to work and taken to the UDT secretariat. In the afternoon, UDT transferred the people it had captured to the public works camp (Acampamento Obras Publicas) in Maliana. There, UDT guards gave prisoners a radio to listen to the UDT broadcast. They said to the prisoners: "Listen to that! Fretilin has surrendered!" But after a few days the guards took the radio away. At every opportunity, the guards threatened to "bathe" the prisoners but the prisoners did not understand what they meant.† The prisoners were then transferred to Corluli. João Godinho told the Commission:

* Segundha Linha was the Portuguese second line or reserve military forces. They were usually traditional forces that had been allied to particular local kings (liurai) and which were then co-opted into the Portuguese military structure and given Portuguese military ranks.

† 'To bathe' was a euphemism for 'to kill'. The same term was used during the Indonesian occupation, i.e. 'to bathe at sea' (mandi laut) meant 'to kill'.

One afternoon, they told us to stand in a line and not to bring clothes and blankets. They said: "Get in the car!" Some were just thrown onto the truck. We didn't know where they were taking us [until] we got to Corluli…[UDT forces] stood in two rows armed with spears, machetes and arrows. They pushed us through them to enter the prison. From then on we no longer ate…We just stayed there until 2 September 1975.

When the gunfire started, we thought UDT was shooting. But soon the daughter of Felisberto, one of the detainees, stood up to the window and said: "Father, father, let's get away. Bobonaro is attacking!"…One detainee, António Valente, was already weak and João had died in the other cell. Soon six women – Ernestina Moniz, Florençia Maia, Flora de Jesus Moniz, Anita Amaral, Luisa da Gama and Leonita – came to look for us…They opened the prison door…We took Antonio Valente out too, but he was already too feeble to stand up and just lay there. So we put him back inside the room and closed the door and we just left. We heard that later troops from Bobonaro came and found him and they buried him.[65]

91. José Pinto Guterres was also one of the detainees in Corluli and spoke to the Commission about his experience. He was captured with other Fretilin supporters on 11 August 1975 on the orders of UDT leaders in Maliana, including T3, T47, T48, T49 and T50 from Odomau (Maliana, Bobonaro). They were taken to Corluli:

In the truck on the way to Corluli they kicked and slapped us. They beat us in the prison and they didn't give us food. Our wives brought food to the prison but they would soil it first before giving it to us. We did not eat or drink for nine days in the Corluli prison. If we asked for water, they would bring dirty water and spill it on the ground so we would have to lick it up. Some friends could no longer stand the thirst and [they] drank their own sweat and urine. There were 70 of us detained in Corluli.[66]

92. Statements provided to the Commission confirm the inhuman treatment of prisoners in Corluli. Several statements describe how the guards starved the prisoners of food and water, leading to the deaths of two or three detainees. Further, they stated that guards beat prisoners who dared to ask for permission to go to the toilet.[67] José Pinto Guterres described how the ear of his nephew, Anus Alesu, was cut off in Corluli by a UDT member.[68] António da Costa Guterres, held in Corluli for having a Fretilin card (see case above), told the Commission that he and some prisoners were forced to flee to Turiskai (a village in West Timor bordering sub-districts Suai and Maliana) with UDT on 12 September. From there he was taken with UDT to a refugee camp in Atambua in West Timor, Indonesia.[69]

93. Arrests in Bobonaro continued for several weeks. Other smaller detention centres were set up in the sub-district of Maliana including in Santa Cruz in Maliana Town, the UDT headquarters in Ritabou Village, "Secçao" Maliana detention centre or the quartel Maliana, Maumali and the house of local liurai Guilherme dos Santos, in Memo Leten. In other sub-districts, detainees were taken to the sub-district capital and detained. The Commission heard of prisoners from the sub-district of Cailaco being held in the town of Cailaco and from the sub-district of Lolotoe being detained in Lolotoe Town.[70] Below are testimonies of the torture and inhuman treatment that prisoners experienced at a number of detention centres in the district of Bobonaro:

- Hermenegildo Fernandes described how on 11 August UDT leader T1 and his men T51 and T52 arrested Fretilin leaders, delegates and members of OPMT in Maliana. The victims were detained in the UDT office in Maliana then moved to Maumali in Ritabou Village (Maliana, Bobonaro). One detainee died of starvation.[71]
- Florindo Gonçalves, a Fretilin member at the time, told how in August 1975 (day not recalled) he and ten friends, named José Gouveia, António Valente, António Nascimento, Daniel Caldas, Avelino Moniz, João Gonçalves, Filomeno da Costa, Rosario, Moises Nunes and Guilherme Moniz, were arrested in the aldeia of Oecelli in Lolotoe Sub-district by a group of UDT soldiers led by T53 and T54. The victims were put in a room and held for three days, during which they received no food or water. The detainees were then moved by truck to a house in Lolotoe and held there for about one week.[72]
- Adriano João told the Commission that in 1975 he was the Fretilin representative in the sub-district of Cailaco. At around 4.30pm on Wednesday, 13 August 1975, UDT members led by T55 came and arrested him and then tied him up and beat him heavily. Adriano was detained in Cailaco for one week with other Fretilin members including José Martins, José Barros and Marcelino Borges.[73] During the period of the UDT armed movement, Adriano also suffered abuse from an Apodeti member, T56.* T56 attacked Adriano after he came home with his wife from seeing the doctor in Cailaco Town. Adriano was beaten heavily, stomped on and then his ears were slashed with a machete. As well as the physical abuse, Adriano told the Commission that he also suffered trauma after his livestock including his goats, pigs and cows were confiscated by UDT.

94. In Guda Village in Lolotoe, the Commission heard of two group arrests. Sebastião Amaral told the Commission that three young Fretilin members (himself, Amaro Moniz and Candido Daniel da Silva) were detained by UDT members on 14 August. He said that they were taken to the home of UDT leader T1 where they were beaten heavily. The UDT members threatened to kill them with arrows. After five hours, the detainees were taken to the quartel Maliana (the Maliana radio transmission station) and held for one week. The victims received no food while in detention.[74]

95. The community of Guda described how nearly two weeks later, on 28 August 1975, four UDT militants ranked first lieutenant (Alferes in the Segunda Linha) arrested the Fretilin delegates and 14 other young men in the village. They were taken to Lolotoe and handed over to T54 on the charge of being communists. T54 tried to force them to

* T56 was a member of Apodeti. He was the son of the liurai of Atsabe, one of the Apodeti leaders. He was the younger brother of a former Apodeti Partisan. It was not clear what motivated this torture by T56. [see CAVR Interview with Erminio da Costa da Silva, Jakarta, Indonesia, 9 August 2004].

accept UDT membership cards but they refused. He kept them in a toilet overnight and the next day ordered that they be tied up and taken to Maliana. The UDT soldiers then beat, kicked and stomped on the youths until their faces were almost unrecognisable.[75]

Manufahi

96. The third greatest number of detentions by UDT reported to the Commission were from the district of Manufahi. The main detention centre in Manufahi was a prison in Same Sub-district built by the Portuguese administration. Statements provided to the Commission estimate between 100 and 300 Fretilin detainees were held there during the UDT armed movement.[76] They also reveal that Fretilin prisoners in UDT detention centres in the district of Manufahi experienced torture and other forms of inhuman treatment.

97. Leonardo Paicheco, a former Fretilin delegate, was one of those held in the Same Prison. He told the Commission that on 11 August he was arrested by the Segunda Linha major, T57, and T58, the UDT leaders in Same, accompanied by a number of UDT soldiers. He was first taken to the Orema region in Hola Rua (Same, Manufahi) where Major T57 hit and slapped him and then beat him with his rifle butt. Major T57 then ordered his men to tie up Leonardo and take him to the Same Prison. There, Major T57 and T59 repeatedly hit Leonardo and others with a rifle butt. The prisoners were not allowed out of their cells for 14 days so that they had to go to the toilet in the cell and live in their own urine and faeces.[77]

98. Mateus Alves described in his statement about his arrest by UDT leader T58 and his men T68, T69 and T70 in the aldeia of Deunai in Hola Rua Village (Same). At the time of the arrest, T72 and another UDT member punched and kicked Mateus Alves. Then T73 tied him up and took him to see UDT leaders Major T57 and T74. Major T57 lashed Mateus with a whip (chicote) until he collapsed. Then they threw him into a truck with other detainees and took the group to the house of T75, another UDT leader in Fore-Udo Village (Same). After that Mateus Alves was taken to the Same Prison where he and other detainees were held for one week without food.[78]

99. Reports suggested that UDT also detained Fretilin prisoners in smaller detention centres in the district of Manufahi, where they also experienced inhuman treatment. For example, two men from a village in the sub-district of Alas were arrested by UDT and taken to Wedauberek Village in Alas. There, they were subjected to forced labour and inhuman living conditions by the UDT Commander in Alas, T60.[79]

Baucau

100. In Baucau, UDT operated two detention centres, the Pousada Baucau* and the Descascadeira† in Bairro Central Bahu, Baucau. In most cases, prisoners were held for the first few days in the Hotel Pousada, where they were interrogated by the UDT

* Hotel Pousada Baucau became known as the Flamboyan Hotel during the Indonesian occupation.

† The Descascadeira was a building used for milling rice, husking coconuts and similar processes.

leader in Baucau, and the party's vice-president, T62, before being transferred to the Descascadeira. The Commission heard that around 30 Fretilin members were held in the Descascadeira, from the districts of Baucau, Lautém and Viqueque. Former prisoners reported experiencing ill-treatment and torture including being lashed with a whip, kicked and punched.[80]

101. Liborio Maria told the Commission that on 11 August 1975, he and Faustino dos Santos, both young Fretilin members, were arrested by T61 of UDT in Bahu (Baucau, Baucau). The victims were taken to the Pousada Baucau where they were interrogated by T62, the head of UDT in Baucau. Another UDT member, T63, then took Liborio, Faustino and 30 other detainees to the Descascadeira.[81]

102. Domingos de Sousa Freitas told the Commission that he was arrested by two UDT members in the house of the aldeia head, T64, in Bacaiwa, Adagoa aldeia in Uailili Village (Baucau, Baucau). He did not provide the date of his arrest. Another UDT member then tied him up and beat him, and then took him to the wash house in Gariuai Village (Baucau, Baucau), where he was held for five days. The Uailili village head, T47, along with 20 other UDT members, then moved Domingos de Sousa Freitas to the Pousada Baucau. While in the Pousada, T62 beat him. He escaped after Fretilin launched its armed reaction.[82]

103. At 9.00am on 11 August, according to the statement of Diamantino da Costa, he and four other Fretilin members who had been charged with organising the community in Ostico Village (Vemasse, Baucau) were arrested in Ostico by UDT leader T46, his men T48 and T79 and ten other UDT members. They were taken to the Pousada Baucau. At 10.00am, T62 interrogated the detainees. During the interrogation, T62 accused them of being enslaved by Vicente Reis (Sahe). They were held in the Pousada for four days and on 16 August 1975 they were moved to the Descascadeira. They were released on 29 August after Fretilin launched its armed reaction in the area.[83]

Liquiçá

104. The district of Liquiçá was the home of the third UDT base, in the sub-district of Maubara. UDT operated two detention centres in Liquiçá District: one in the Liquiçá primary school and the other in the Maubara primary school buildings. The Commission heard that around 75 Fretilin members were held in the Liquiçá Primary School. These detainees were moved to the Maubara Primary School around 1 September.[84] They were held in Maubara for almost one month. No estimate of detainee numbers in Maubara was provided. The Commission heard that when Fretilin launched its armed insurrection, the first town it captured in the district was Liquiçá Town. This caused tensions to rise in Maubara and detainees took the opportunity to break down the prison door and escape.

105. There was no reported maltreatment of detainees in either centre and no deaths occurred in the detention centres. The Commission did find evidence, however, of detainees suffering ill-treatment outside, before they reached a detention centre. Albino da Costa Mouzinho, a former Fretilin vice-delegate in Leotela Village (Liquiçá, Liquiçá), testified:

On 12 August 1975, UDT delegate T65 and his men came and arrested me in the rice fields of Pabo in the aldeia of Kaimegoluli, Leotela Village. Straight away I was beaten; they punched me with their fists six times across the ears until my ears were bleeding and I could not hear. After that I was ordered by another UDT delegate, T66, to go and find Maubroke and Asuloe (Fretilin members) in the aldeia of Paulara [Leotela Village]… so I went with T66 and his men to arrest Maubroke and Asuloe and took them to Nunloi in Fatumasi Village, to the house of the Village Chief T65. There I saw [a Fretilin member called] Maudasi lying on the ground seriously wounded and screaming. I was sent home.[85]

106. Marcelino Soares described how in Vatuvou (Maubara, Liquiçá) on 13 August 1975, UDT supporters arrested him and five members of his family and beat them heavily. The victims' heads were also shaved and then they were tied and taken to Maubara. They were held there for 27 days until Fretilin attacked Maubara and they managed to escape.[86]

107. Daniel Pereira Martins testified in his statement that he was arrested by a UDT member in the aldeia of Kota Lara in Loidahar Village (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) on 14 August 1975 and taken to the Liquiçá Council building (Conselho). When they arrived, another UDT member threatened to kill Daniel Martins. He was taken instead to the Liquiçá Primary School where he was held for over two weeks. On 1 September 1975, Daniel and 67 other detainees were moved to the Maubara Primary School where they were held for nearly a month. Daniel told the Commission that in Maubara a UDT member called T66 slapped detainees whenever he gave them their food.[87]

Lautém

108. When the UDT armed movement broke out in the district of Lautém, Captain Lino da Silva, a Portuguese officer and commander of 14th Rifle Company (Companhia de Caçadores 14) came to the sub-district of Moro and placed the Segunda Linha commander, Edmundo da Conceição Silva, under house arrest. He also confiscated 150 firearms belonging to Segunda Linha, which he took to Dili and handed over to UDT.[88]

109. In addition, UDT supporters arrested a number of Fretilin members and detained them in the military barracks at 14th Rifle Company.* Prisoners held there did not suffer ill-treatment and were fed. The Commission heard of people detained at the Company headquarters for two weeks or less. Other Fretilin supporters were called to come to the headquarters for questioning by UDT and were then sent home.

110. According to José Conceição, a number of Fretilin leaders in the district of Lautém, such as Afonso Savio, Felipe Dias Quintas and others, were taken to Baucau and detained at the Pousada.[89]

---

* The Indonesian occupation forces came to use C-Casa 14 as a military (TNI) base. They named it "Headquarters of Battalion 745 Company A".

Forced labour

111. As well as the physical abuse and the ill-treatment of UDT detainees, the Commission heard that many were also forced to work for UDT. The Commission received statements describing how prisoners were forced to build roads, to lift rocks and to dig gravel and to cook for the UDT forces and the detainees without compensation. For example, the Commission heard that on 15 August 1975 around 500 people were detained in Same and forced to work building roads all day without being given food.[90] Adriano João stated that prisoners in Cailaco (Bobonaro) were forced to build a road for one week, linking the town of Cailaco to Bilimau Village, on the border with Hatolia (Ermera). UDT released the prisoners on 4 September 1975 when the road was finished.[91] Similarly, in Maubara (Liquiçá) Marcelino Soares and his family (see above) were forced to carry rocks and sand to repair the road from Maubara to Mauboke.[92]

112. Women were also used as forced labour. For example, the Commission heard that when the UDT armed movement began the male Fretilin supporters in Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) left their families behind and fled to hide in the forest. UDT supporters captured Antonieta Corte Real and other women and took them to Lesuata (Ainaro). There they were forced to cook for UDT soldiers for one week. When Fretilin attacked the UDT base in Lesuata, Antonieta and the other women escaped.[93]

113. In the village of Ossu de Cima (Ossu, Viqueque), Seferina Freitas, her elder brother, Adelino da Silva, and the Fretilin delegate in Ossu, João da Rocha, were arrested by UDT. T71 and his men held the three prisoners for one week. During this time they forced them to carry rocks and wood to build a road as well as beating, slapping and kicking them.

Detention, torture and ill-treatment by Fretilin, August 1975–February 1976

Introduction

114. On 15 August 1975, four days after the beginning of the UDT 11 August armed movement, the Fretilin Central Committee (CCF) declared a General Armed Insurrection (Insurreição Geral Armada) from the Fretilin base in Aissirimou (Aileu). The declaration urged people to resist the armed movement and in a matter of days internal conflict broke out between UDT and Fretilin.*

115. During the internal armed conflict Fretilin replicated UDT's practice of arbitrary detention of its political opponents. Some of those detained were UDT combatants

* CAVR Interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004. Fretilin's declaration in Aileu was first made public in its statement on 13 September 1975 that "at 3.45pm on 15 August, the Fretilin Central Committee became aware that there was going to be no peaceful solution, so it urged armed resistance nation-wide." [See Helen Hill, Stirrings of Nationalism in East Timor: Fretilin 1974–1978, Otford Press, Sydney, 2002, p. 142].

but many others were ordinary members or supporters of UDT or members of other political parties, or their families, who were civilians due all of the protections accorded to civilians under international humanitarian law. The Commission has not differentiated in this section of the Report between combatants and civilians, because all detainees have a right to be treated humanely and not be subjected to torture or other cruel or degrading treatment. Further, in many of the statements received by the Commission, people who identified themselves as combatants were often arrested in their homes or villages, not during combat.

116. The Commission has found that Fretilin conducted widespread detention, including the arbitrary detention of civilians. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) estimated that around 2,000 prisoners were in Fretilin detention centres after its armed reaction to the UDT movement. The Commission, through its narrative statement-taking process, documented 1,369 cases of arbitrary detention by Fretilin in 1975. Of the 64.3% (880/1,369) of these cases that reported the exact month in which the violation took place, 95.2% (838/880) occurred between August and December, as can be seen in the table below. Furthermore, 58.8% (517/880) of the victims were reported to be affiliated with UDT. The arbitrary detentions attributed to Fretilin which involved UDT members were overwhelmingly concentrated in August and September of 1975, as can be seen in the following table.

Table 4: Count of reported acts of torture committed by Fretilin, by months, 1975

Month	Count	Percent
January	11	0.8
February	3	0.2
March	5	0.4
April	8	0.6
May	0	0
June	12	0.9
July	3	0.2
August	338	24.7
September	289	21.1
October	59	4.3
November	28	2.1
December	124	9.1
Unknown	489	35.7
Total	1,369	100

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

117. Qualitative evidence received by the Commission suggests that people detained by Fretilin generally received adequate food but were held in overcrowded and unsanitary conditions. Physical abuse and sometimes torture of detainees were widely reported.

118. The Commission's statistical research reveals that in 1975 the overwhelming majority of Fretilin detentions occurred in the central districts, in particular in Dili, Aileu, Manufahi and Ermera, as is shown in the table below.* The Commission's qualitative research, through interviews and Community Profiles, suggests that Dili was also one of the main detention places during the internal armed conflict. This is consistent with the Commission's view that arbitrary detention was used as a tool of the conflict and was concentrated where the conflict was most intense.

Table 5: Count of reported acts of torture committed by Fretilin, by districts, 1975

District	Count	Percent
West	321	23.5
Central	806	58.9
East	225	16.4
Oecussi	17	1.2
Indonesia	0	0
Total	1,369	100

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

119. Fretilin continued to detain people after the Indonesian invasion in the early months of 1976 but at a much lower level – 150 cases were reported in January–February 1976. In contrast to previous months, these cases occurred mainly in the eastern districts: 64.7% (97/150).

The Fretilin armed reaction

The General Armed Insurrection

120. Rogério Lobato received a coded message from Fretilin in Aileu in Dili on the night of 15 August,† signalling the start of the Insurrection. He told the Commission:

> *On the night of 15 August, the transmission unit called me [and I heard the coded message]. I knew they had started the "counter-coup" in Aileu. Then I prepared the "counter-coup" in Dili. I called Commander João Branco, Adão Cristovão and the others. Then we made a plan at the soldiers' mess hall (sala dos soldados).*‡

* 58.9% (806/1,369) of detentions were reported in the central districts compared with 23.5% (321/1,369) in the western districts and 16.4% (225/1369) in the eastern districts.

† Rogério Lobato and other CCF members in Aileu agreed to use the code when Rogério came to Aissirimou, on behalf of Lemos Pires, to negotiate with CCF members in Aileu on 15 August 1975. The message read "A minha muelher ja esta à Aileu, chegou bem" ("My wife arrived safely in Aileu"). Rogério Lobato devised this message as he was about to leave for Dili by helicopter. He conceived the coded message when he thought about his wife in Dili, and revealed the message to Commander Gil António Gonçalves and José da Silva. [CAVR Interview with Rogério Lobato, Dili, 26 August 2003].

‡ Rogério Lobato said the sala dos soldados was a bar set up for Portuguese soldiers where they could order food and drink. [CAVR Interview with Rogério Lobato, 26 August 2003]

121. On 17 August, Fretilin took over the Portuguese military barracks in Aileu and detained Portuguese officers and soldiers. On the night of 17 August, 44 Fretilin members moved to encircle the Portuguese troops in Aileu. Lucas da Costa told the Commission:

> [A]ll the troops were gathering for a meeting. We started to surround their position and hid in the drains. Nicolau Lobato, Abel Larisina and Alarico Fernandes were the first to approach the gate. When the meeting ended, the commander left through the gate and Nicolau jumped out from the drain, pointed his pistol at the commander and asked him to remain quiet. Nicolau told the captain to surrender his Aileu troops to Sergeant José da Silva. There were 11 Portuguese soldiers, five officers and some sergeants and corporals. These soldiers became prisoners.*[96]

122. The launch of Fretilin's armed reaction in Dili also began with the detention of members of the Portuguese military. At 1.00am on 20 August. Rogério Lobato and Sergeant Hermenegildo Alves, East Timorese soldiers who had already aligned themselves with Fretilin, arrested the Portuguese deputy chief-of-staff who headed the Quartel Geral (QG) where he also lived. That same morning, East Timorese soldiers disarmed 50 to 60 Portuguese soldiers.[97]

Reasons for arbitrary detention

123. A number of the leaders of the UDT 11 August movement were arrested and held by Fretilin, including its vice-president César Mouzinho from Baucau, Francisco Oliveira and Mário Jaorez from Dili, and a number of other UDT leaders from the districts. They also detained the Portuguese chief of police, Lieutenant Colonel Maggiolo Gouveia,† The Commission was told that some Fretilin members who detained UDT members were motivated by revenge for the violence committed by UDT members during the armed movement.‡

124. As Indonesian incursions in the western districts intensified, Fretilin also turned its attention to the pro-integration Apodeti party. Filomeno Cabral explained that Apodeti members were arrested because of the escalating attacks in the border region by the Indonesian military and East Timorese exiles who had been formed into a force known as the "Partisans". Lucas da Costa stated:

* The Captain's name was Horta."My brother [Nicolau Lobato] disarmed Horta" [CAVR Interview with Rogério Lobato, Dili, 26 August 2003]

† Mario Carrascalão told the Commission that Maggiolo Gouveia was released from UDT custody shortly after the armed action of 11 August 1975 "because he had made a political declaration that he adhered to the UDT movement". Mario Carrascalão said that Maggiolo Gouveia went to talk with Fretilin members after this release, but that he was arrested by Fretilin and subsequently disappeared. [Testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003. See also: Mário Lemos Pires, Descolonizaçâo de Timor. Chapter: "O Golpe da UDT [The UDT Coup]".

‡ Xanana Gusmão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

It was a simple logic; in this war (in Timor-Leste) some people conspired with the enemy to wage war. The conspirators were of course UDT and Apodeti people…Fretilin had to resist border incursions. Our soldiers started to die [and] journalists from Australia [were also killed]…And so leading figures in UDT and Apodeti were all arrested.[99]

125. Mari Alkatiri testified to the Commission that the Apodeti leaders were arrested on his orders on 4 or 5 October 1975, after he received intelligence that they were planning an attempted coup against Fretilin. He said that when he was told that Apodeti members were planning to begin the "attempted coup" by throwing a grenade into a Fretilin Central Committee meeting:

I called Sergeant Carmo. I said: "You carry out this operation. Go catch them all." We caught a lot of Apodeti people, nearly all of them. The sergeant put the police into what is now Undil [Dili University building].[*]

126. The leaders of the KOTA and Trabalhista parties were also detained, but not their ordinary membership.[100]

127. On an individual level, victims reported being detained if they were known UDT or Apodeti leaders or supporters, were from UDT- or Apodeti-affiliated villages, if they held UDT membership cards or if they were suspected of spying for UDT or Apodeti.[101]

Places of detention

Dili

128. The Quartel Geral (QG), the Portuguese army headquarters in Taibessi, Dili, was the first building occupied by Fretilin on 20 August. Most of the UDT leaders and members captured during the armed action were detained there, including César Mouzinho, Francisco Oliveira and the former Portuguese police chief, Lieutenant Colonel Maggiolo Gouveia. João Oliveira was the Fretilin warden at the QG.[102] Rogério Lobato, the commander of the Fretilin armed forces at the time, told the Commission that about 1,000 Fretilin supporters gathered at the QG to see the arrested UDT leaders, many with guns. He said that they beat the UDT leader, César Mouzinho, and, as they lost control, another prisoner being led to the cells, Mateus Ferreira from Same, was crushed to death by the mob.[103]

129. Testimony and statements to the Commission indicate that prisoners at the QG experienced various forms of abuse, torture and other forms of cruel or inhuman treatment. Fretilin acknowledged that there were cases of unrestrained physical violence against prisoners. Rogério Lobato said that members of Fretilin began to abuse their power and commit violations against prisoners. He said that Fretilin as an organisation "never gave a direct instruction to do bad things to people, but members of Fretilin as individuals sometimes abused their power and committed violations of human rights." He told the Commission:

* Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

> Sometimes they entered the prison, called out for prisoners and beat them. Sometimes this wasn't because they had a problem with them about the [political] situation, but from an old problem. I know that sometimes it was because someone had taken their girlfriend and so now they used this as a chance to beat him. I know this. People took advantage of the war to beat others and to take justice into their own hands. But some did beat them because they were angry because of the war.
>
> They beat Maggiolo and others…I want to say something about Maggiolo Gouveia. Many Fretilin and Falintil colleagues entered his cell and beat him. The prison warden, Sergeant João Oliveira, came to me and told me about their unrestrained behaviour. They came just to beat Maggiolo Gouveia. [I said]: "Why don't you bring Maggiolo here?" and I met him in my office, which used to be his. I said: "My dear Lieutenant Colonel, I heard about what happened to you in this prison. I will release you from this prison and take you to hospital." So I took him to the hospital and handed him over to the International Red Cross.[104]

130. José Ramos-Horta was one Fretilin member unimpressed with the treatment of UDT members at the QG. He was also displeased with the treatment of prisoners at the Lahane Military Hospital in Dili. Some prisoners were transferred to Lahane Hospital after suffering severe torture at the QG.

> I visited the military hospital in Lahane. The UDT vice-president Mouzinho and other UDT members had already been transferred there, including Agapito Mariz, Fernando Luz, and Chico Oliveira. Mouzinho almost died of the severe beating [he received] when he surrendered to Fretilin soldiers in Baucau…Chico Oliveira…lost most of his vision through severe beatings.[*]

131. The Commission received a number of reports from victims of such treatment. Francisco Gonçalves told the Commission that a Fretilin member, T80, ordered his men to torture him while he was a prisoner at QG. Francisco was aged 17 at the time and was in grade ten at Liceu Dr Francisco Machado in Dili. He had studied in

* José Ramos-Horta, Timor Leste Amanha En Dili , pp. 107-113. In the same book and at the same pages, Ramos-Horta wrote that when he came for lunch at Nicolau Lobato's house, he told Lobato what happened in the prisons. He told Nicolau Lobato that the practice had to end. If not, he would invite ICRC delegates as well as foreign journalists to expose the practice. Earlier, Ramos-Horta heard that a second sergeant and Fretilin deputy commander had whipped Maggiolo Gouveia and Victor Santa.

Mozambique and on his return to Timor-Leste in 1974, became a member of the UDT youth group, Lesvalt. He was not involved in the UDT armed movement, but Fretilin arrested him at the Motael Church on 27 August and took him to its headquarters. On 28 or 29 August, T80 came to the prison and found Francisco's name on the list of detainees. When Francisco was called out of his cell, he heard T80 say to a guard: "This is a playboy…from Mozambique…whip him 150 times." Gonçalves collapsed after being whipped 17 or 18 times and was put back in his cell.[105]

132. Felix Fatima Ximenes reported that on 12 September 1975 two Fretilin members, T81 and T82, arrested him and António Soares in Maubara (Liquiçá) because of their UDT membership. They were taken to Dili and detained at the QG for two months. Throughout their detention they were beaten by Fretilin member and former sergeant in the Portuguese army, T83, who acted on the orders of T84, the person responsible for beating prisoners. On 19 November, Fretilin moved them to Balide Prison.[106]

133. A member of UDT reported that in September 1975 he was arrested by commander T85 of Fretilin in Dili, and taken to the QG. He said he and two others including a police chief were whipped by Fretilin guard T84. They were then ordered to lie in the sun and beat each other.[107]

134. The Commission's research indicates that unlike UDT, Fretilin did not deprive detainees of food (see section on Detention and Torture by UDT 1975, paragraph 50-113 above). Mari Alkatiri told the Commission that Fretilin members and prisoners ate the same food:

> As for food, I remember I ate whatever the prisoners ate. We ate the same food. After all, the food came from the same kitchen.[108]

135. Mari Alkatiri testified to the Commission that Fretilin also held Fretilin members at the QG from about October. He said that they were detained due to the excesses that they had committed in the internal conflict and its aftermath.[109]

Comarca Balide

136. From mid-September Fretilin began to use the main Portuguese prison, in Balide (Dili), known as the Comarca.[110] Fretilin detained around 390 prisoners there, including both members of UDT and Apodeti.

137. Statements received by the Commission indicate that prisoners detained in the Comarca were brought in from a number of districts, including Dili, Liquiçá, Aileu and Ermera.[*] Lamberto Ximenes told the Commission that he and other civilians were detained by Fretilin forces in Leimea Leten (Atsabe, Ermera). They were forced to work building a road for three days and were then sent to the Comarca in Dili where they remained until the Indonesian invasion of Dili on 7 December.[111]

* CAVR Interview with Anselmo dos Santos, at the village of Vaviquina-Maubara, Liquiçá, 9 March 2004. Anselmo dos Santos was arrested in Maubara, detained first at QG and then moved to Balide. Anselmo dos Santos estimated that 64 of the 390 detainees at Balide were from Maubara. All of them survived and returned to Liquiçá after the Indonesian military defeated Fretilin there.

138. A statement received by the Commission states that two prisoners were held for two months in the QG before they were moved to the Comarca on 19 November. There they joined senior Apodeti members who had previously been detained in Aileu, including Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, António da Silva, Mahrus Alkatiri, José António dos Reis, José Gastão Melo Araújo, Herminio da Costa Silva, Ernesto and Frederico Almeida dos Santos.[112] Frederico Almeida dos Santos told the Commission that he was detained first in the Museum, near the Government Office (now the Palàçio do Governo) on the waterfront, before he was moved to Aileu with 12 others, and was finally sent to the Comarca in Balide on 20 October 1975 on the orders of T86.[113]

139. The Commission did not find evidence of abuse, torture or other cruel treatment directed at UDT or Apodeti prisoners at the Comarca. Anselmo dos Santos, a former prisoner in the Comarca, described the conditions:

> At the Balide Prison we were guarded by four Fretilin guards and a commander named [Filomeno] Gomes from Atsabe. He was a good man. We were held in the Balide Prison from September to December [1975]. Each morning after breakfast we worked. We swept or did other jobs such as hoeing the land or cutting grass in Caicoli [an area of Dili behind the prison].
>
> In the beginning, we had breakfast of sweet potatoes, bread and coffee. We were also given lunch and dinner. But as we went into November the situation became desperate. Food supplies brought from the east dried up and the sweet potatos from Ermera ran out. We just waited to die. In the morning we could still have as much coffee as we wanted but without food. At lunch we ate only green vegetables, the same for dinner. The food supplies had run out and this situation lasted until the end of November.[114]

Aileu

140. Aileu was the main Fretilin base. It had two main detention centres, the Companhia in Aissirimou (the military barracks taken over by Fretilin), and a large coffee warehouse. Fretilin detained leaders of opposition parties at the Companhia, and sent ordinary party members to the warehouse.[115] The two detention centres held prisoners from the district of Aileu and also from other regions. The Commission received reports of abuse and ill-treatment of detainees at these centres.

141. Amelia Mesquita told the Commission that she and eight members of her family were among the first detainees to be held in the Aileu coffee warehouse. Amelia and her family were farmers from the village of Seloi-Malere in Aileu. In August 1975 a group of Fretilin men armed with arrows and spears came to her village and arrested her, her mother Lourença da Costa and her father Carlos de Araújo, while they were in their coffee plantation. They also arrested six of Amelia's relatives, two of whom were women. Fretilin arrested them on suspicion of hiding guns, which Amelia's father denied. They were dragged along the street and then tied up and beaten. They tied Amelia's uncle to a flag-pole and beat him until he bled.*

142. Rafael Nascimento told the Commission that Fretilin arrested him in his village in Aileu. He said that they tied him up with another detainee, Martinho, and kept them in the warehouse in Aileu. He claimed that T87 beat him in the head with a helmet causing severe injury.† He said he received no medical treatment even though his head was severely injured.[116]

143. Other places were used as smaller ad hoc detention centres in Aileu. In the sub-district of Laulara, the Commission heard of several people detained in the village of Unmenlau. Domingos da Silva Soares told how his friend Afonso Mesquita (a Fretilin member) was arrested in the village of Boklelo on 19 August by a Fretilin commander, T88, and his men and taken to the village of Unmenlau. He managed to escape but his father, who came looking for him, was detained and killed. According to Domingos, the whole community of Boklelo was then tied up and walked to Unmenlau because they were suspected of hiding an escaped detainee named Marcal. The community members were released after questioning.[117]

Manufahi

144. Manufahi was another district that saw intense clashes during UDT's armed movement and again during the Fretilin armed reaction. On 27 August 1975, Fretilin troops attacked and captured Same (Manufahi), forcing UDT troops to retreat to the eastern region.[118] Fretilin captured and detained several UDT and Apodeti members who failed to escape. It held them temporarily at the Same Primary School, before moving them to the Same Prison.[119] More people were arrested in Same during September 1975.

145. The Commission obtained victims' testimonies claiming that Fretilin physically abused, tortured and treated prisoners cruelly at the Sub-district prison in Same.

146. Monis da Maia was one of the detainees at this prison. He told the Commission that Fretilin arrested and detained him temporarily at the primary school when it captured Same. He said that Fretilin soldiers abused him when he was arrested, and that this continued at the prison, causing him to lose consciousness twice. He testified to the Commission:

> When we went to the town to watch the arrival of Fretilin troops, they [the troops] said: "Look at him." Then, everyone came and beat me until I fainted. I knew one of the troops, T34, when we were in Dili. He

* Amelia Mesquita said the six relatives were: Domingas Mendonça, Sarah de Araújo, Aleixo, Serkoli, Romaldo and António.

† Other former detainees, for example João da Costa and Assis dos Santos, confirmed that T87 often beat and tortured detainees in Aileu.

*lifted me up and took me to the school. Then other detainees started to come, including Celestino Soares.

One day T90, a Fretilin minister, visited the prison and ordered the prisoners to come out, and he hit them one by one with a branch. We were all injured and I fainted. The next day T91, a member of the CCF [Fretilin Central Committee], entered with a G-3 gun in his hands and told the prisoners to step outside to be beaten. I refused to come out because I still felt the pain from the previous beating. I told T91: "Why don't you shoot me? I won't come out."

The other prisoners were then taken outside and beaten and then ordered to return to their cells. Then T91's friend, T92, came into my cell and hit me with a rice pestle and I fainted. T92 thought I was dead, so he ordered the guards to dump my body in a coffee plantation. Then he left. With God's help, I survived.

At a flag-raising ceremony the guards took 11 of us and told us to line up to be killed. But then Mau Hunu changed his mind and said: "If we kill them all, who are we going to govern once we become independent? Are we going to govern trees and stones?" So they did not kill us. Instead, they put us back in our cell…

Fretilin asked everyone in the local community to come to the Sub-district prison for a Popular Justice [Justiça Popular] hearing. Then they ordered the prisoners to step out of their cells one by one. Fretilin took prisoners accused of serious crimes to Aileu. António Cepeda was the Fretilin leader then. When it was my turn to face popular justice, I hadn't done anything wrong, so the people were silent. But another man provoked them by saying: "Tell us that he beat you!" But people refused, except one who said: "He swore at my grandfather." I raised my hands but kept silent. So they took me to Aileu just because I swore at his grandfather.[120]

147. The Commission received testimonies describing Fretilin arrests of UDT members who had escaped to the eastern region from Same. They were taken back to Same and detained at the Sub-district prison. On their arrest, they suffered physical abuse and torture. One victim, João da Costa, told the Commission that Fretilin troops abused him and treated him and other UDT members cruelly on the way from Venilale (Baucau), where he had been captured. João da Costa told the Commission how the prisoners were treated by Fretilin at the Sub-district prison:[121]

At the Sub-district prison, they [Fretilin] took us out in the afternoon and told us to beat each other. Prisoners beat other prisoners. First they took my two older brothers, cut branches from a coffee tree and told them to beat each other. It was like a cockfight and everyone stood around watching them. The branches broke into pieces, and the guards beat us before they returned us to our cells. I had to fight my own cousin, José Tilman. I hit him until he fell to the ground. Then the guards beat us again. They beat us every day. We spent one month in Same before they took us to Aileu.

* Celestino Soares was the Apodeti area secretary in Same. He was shot to death by a Fretilin soldier. (See Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Forced Disappearances).

148. Those held at the Sub-district prison were taken to Aissirimou in Aileu in early October 1975.

Ermera

149. The highest number of detentions by UDT in 1975 occurred in the district of Ermera. When its forces entered Ermera, Fretilin responded in kind. The Commission received many reports of detention in the period August to September 1975, especially in the sub-districts of Railaco and Ermera. Fretilin detained members of UDT and Apodeti in buildings previously used by UDT to hold Fretilin prisoners, such as the warehouse in Aifu (see section Detention and torture by UDT, 1975 on detention centres in Ermera District, par. 77 above) Many prisoners were transferred directly to the neighbouring district of Aileu.[122] Various sources reported to the Commission that UDT and Apodeti prisoners in Ermera suffered ill-treatment by the Fretilin soldiers who arrested and detained them. The following are examples of the physical abuse and other cruel and inhuman treatment of detainees reported to the Commission:

- Pedro Madeira, a UDT member in Matata (Railaco, Ermera), said that he was detained on 20 August by Fretilin member T94 and taken to Railaco where he was held for about three months. He said that while he was in detention, he was kicked and beaten with a rifle butt. He was then moved to Aileu and held there for three days before he was released.[123]
- The Commission was told that Adão Exposto was captured by Fretilin members T95, T96 and T97 who beat him heavily, and took him to Aileu where he was interrogated by the Fretilin president before being returned to Railaco and detained.[124]
- Lamberto Ximenes told the Commission that he had been involved in the UDT armed movement in Dili and then fled to his village of Leimea Leten (Atsabe, Ermera). He said that on 20 August Fretilin arrested him with many civilians, who were UDT members, and forced them to build a road for three days. Lamberto himself was later moved to the Comarca in Dili.[125]
- Domingos da Silva, a UDT member, told of the arrest of three UDT members in Loro Hou, the village of Lisipat (Letefoho, Ermera) by Fretilin. They were taken to Tali Koto where one was killed and two, Lino and Maubere Kohe, were held in detention.[126]
- José Dofan testified that in September 1975, T99, a Fretilin sympathiser, arrested his brother-in-law Feliciano (no last name provided) and Feliciano's mother Soe Leki in Bernukera. They were held for one night in the Fretilin headquarters where Feliciano was beaten and then tied up and dragged along the ground until he bled. His mother's back was injured. The next day they were taken to Maumeta in the village of Seloi (Aileu) where they were shot and killed.[127]

- A UDT soldier was arrested and detained by Fretilin forces on the orders of the Ermera Regional Committee. While imprisoned in Ermera he was beaten by T100 and T101.[128]
- Felisberta de Jesus told the Commission that in early September 1975 her husband, António Ximenes, who was a UDT member, surrendered to the secretary of the Ermera Regional Committee, Florentino de Jesus Martins. He surrendered in Erusa, the village of Talimoro, (Ermera, Ermera) and Fretilin then took him to the village of Humboe (Ermera, Ermera) and held him there for six days. During this time, she said, her husband was beaten, kicked and then thrown to the ground and dragged until he was bleeding by three Fretilin members T102, T103 and T104. On 17 September, António Ximenes was arrested again by Fretilin along with four other UDT members in the village and disappeared.[129]

150. António da Silva Barreto, a UDT member at the time, told the Commission of his arrest in early September 1975:

> In 1975 I was a militant in the UDT party. When the counter-coup occurred on 20 August, UDT couldn't withstand it and the leaders all ran to Atambua…along with most of the population of Poerema, who were UDT. I didn't run. In September, the Ermera Fretilin leader Pedro Gonçalves Lemos ordered me to go to Fatubolu [Hatolia, Ermera] to pick up a weapon from Napoleão.
>
> When I reached the steps of the Ermera Church I was captured by T105 and Fretilin forces from Aileu and Maubisse. They tied my hands behind my back and then used a bayonet but I didn't fall. Then they punched, kicked and beat me but I didn't fall. So they took out a machete and hit me across my skull and I was bleeding heavily. They were going to take me away to kill me but then the Ermera Fretilin leaders Manuel Barreto and Commander Teky came and saved me. They took me to the hospital to treat my head. When I had recovered, I brought the population of Fatubolu to surrender in Ermera.[130]

151. This did not protect António Barreto from further suspicion and ill-treatment however. In September 1975, when Indonesian forces infiltrated Aifu (Ermera, Ermera), António and his friends Mau Talo, Alberto da Silva and Mau Sama were arrested by Fretilin on suspicion of assisting the Indonesians. The four were taken to Fatubessi where they were interrogated by the Fretilin leaders T106, T107 and T108. During the interrogation they were beaten heavily with a short whip (chicote) and then held in Fatubessi for six months.[131] The Commission was told about several other places used for detention in the district of Ermera, including prisons in Raimerhei, in Talimoro and Raimea (Ermera, Ermera). People formerly detained in these locations also reported receiving cruel treatment by their Fretilin captors.[132]

Ainaro

152. UDT and Apodeti members detained in the district of Ainaro were held in a number of locations and also reported ill-treatment, during arrest and while in detention. Detention centres included the village of Aitutu (Hato Builico), the Fretilin headquarters in Maubisse, and Aimegudo (Hato Builico).[133] Several former detainees from the district of Ainaro reported torture and ill-treatment.

153. A former UDT member told the Commission that he was captured in Ainaro Town in 1975 (month unknown), by a Fretilin member T109 and his men, on the orders of a Fretilin delegate named T110. He said that he was arrested and tortured because they suspected him of killing a Fretilin member.[134]

Baucau

154. In Baucau, Fretilin also used the buildings previously used by UDT for detention. The main prison was the Descascadeira (a building used to hull grains, coconuts, coffee and rice) in Bahu, in the centre of Baucau Town.[135] The Commission was also told that prisoners were detained by Fretilin at its headquarters in the sub-district of Vemasse.[136]

155. The Commission was told that members of Fretilin in Baucau responded to the UDT armed movement with vengeance. Fretilin attacked the Pousada, which UDT had used to detain and torture Fretilin members. Fretilin then detained the leaders of UDT and Apodeti in the Descascadeira, including UDT members Manuel Belo, Laurentino Gusmão and José Viana Freitas, the Apodeti leader Mauricio de Andrade Freitas, Clementino dos Reis Amaral and village head José Piter. The detainees were slapped and kicked heavily.[137]

156. Clementino dos Reis Amaral said that once Fretilin had taken control, they imprisoned nearly all of the village chiefs and heads of sub-districts, who, in the Baucau area, were mostly UDT supporters. He told the Commission that Fretilin imprisoned him with about 170 people:

> I was imprisoned for more than 100 days. In the Baucau Prison there were more than 170 people, all imprisoned together. There were important Baucau people: the liurai*, the village heads. The important people were all put in prison there because in those times the village heads in Baucau were all UDT people. Because of that we were all imprisoned. You could say that some people swore, some beat people up, all of that happened.*[138]

157. José Viana Freitas testified to the Commission about his ill-treatment by Fretilin in detention:

On 20 August 1975 in Naulale in Uatolari Village [Vemasse, Baucau] I was with my father, Pedro Viana Freitas, my mother Ana Maria da Costa, my wife Helena and my younger brothers Domingos Viana and Abel Viana [all Apodeti members]. Fretilin came and arrested us at 6.00pm. There were seven people from Fretilin…[with rifles] but I only knew one of them, T113. They came into our house with their guns, called us out and then took us to the Fretilin headquarters in Baucau.

They didn't do anything on the journey, we just walked to the Flamboyan Hotel [the Pousada] Baucau, which we reached at 11.00pm. There, a Fretilin leader just ordered us to sleep. The next morning we were taken to the Descascadeira. There were many people detained there, 160, all men. I only knew Clementino dos Reis Amaral. The leaders did not hit us but when they left, other Fretilin members beat us with wooden batons and weapons on my back. They beat us all the same, whether we were Apodeti or UDT.

We were held for [four] months and during this time we were beaten the whole time. But we had enough to drink and we ate three times a day, including buffalo meat and red beans.[139]

158. The Commission also heard of prisoners from the district of Viqueque being brought to Baucau and held in "a small toilet room" (see section on Viqueque paragraph 167-9 below).[140]

Lautém

159. There were relatively few detentions in the district of Lautém. Communities in the district told of varying levels of violence. For example, in the village of Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém), which was a Fretilin-affiliated village, the situation returned to normal when Fretilin took control.* Other villages reported that their people who had supported UDT were arrested, but in Dili, where they had gone to take part in the fighting.[141]

160. Fretilin took over the Companhia Caçadores 14 headquarters, which UDT had used to hold Fretilin prisoners, and held both UDT and Apodeti members there. Edmundo da Conceição Silva, the Apodeti leader in the sub-district of Moro, told the Commission that some prisoners spent six months in the Companhia headquarters.[142] Other prisoners were taken to Dili by Fretilin, including Sergeant Carçeres, Sinanis, Marão and others.[143]

161. Some detainees in Lautém were reported to have been ill-treated. The community of Bauro reported that its villagers linked to UDT, including Pedro Amaral and Serafin dos Santos Pinto, were arrested by Fretilin. They were beaten heavily and forced to work in the rice fields.[144]

* CAVR, Community Profile of Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 27 November 2002. The community of Barikafa also reported that their village was peaceful in 1975. CAVR, Community Profile of Barikafa Village, Luro Sub-district, Lautém District, 9 September 2003.

162. The detainees in Lospalos escaped after the Indonesian military offensive in early 1976.

Liquiçá

163. Fretilin detention centres in the district of Liquiçá included ones in the village of Leotela, in the village of Leorema (Bazartete, Liquiçá), the Fretilin main headquarters in Fatumetafu (Maubara) and in Belavista, the village of Gugleur (Maubara).[145] Several former detainees from these locations said that they suffered cruel treatement, including heavy beatings, being stripped naked and forced to sleep on the sand for five nights until they were cut and bruised.

164. Other examples include Cosme da Silva Afonso from the village of Gugleur (Maubara), who testified that he was arrested in August 1975 by a Fretilin commander and his men because he was a UDT commander. He said that they confiscated 30 of his cows as well as sacks of rice, and then took him to Nunupuroubu in the village of Gugleur where he was interrogated and then released. Soon after, two Fretilin commanders and their men arrested him again, took him to Base 2 in Kakaegoa in the village of Leotela (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) and held him for seven days. He was detained in a hole that was four metres deep, and each day received only one piece of cassava to eat. During the day he was forced to work carrying wood and collecting water. He said that after one week, he was moved to a detention centre in Cailaco (Bobonaro) and held for a further three months. Finally, he was taken to Nunulisa in the village of Gugleur and kept overnight in a hole. He did not report any physical abuse during his time in detention.[146]

165. Marcos Borges, who was a UDT member and had been fighting Fretilin in Dili, told the Commission of his detention in September 1975. He had fled from Dili to the district of Ermera with a group of UDT members, including leaders João Carrascalão and João Bosco. He said that after he was captured by Fretilin he was beaten heavily and then his captors attempted to kill him with a machete and a spear. He was held in Leorema for two nights.[147]

166. Cecilio dos Santos told the Commission that he guarded the radio at the Fretilin base, but the commanders suspected him of being a spy. They took him to the Fretilin headquarters in Fatumetafu where he was beaten heavily with a buffalo leather whip.[148]

Viqueque

167. Agusto Ximenes described how Fretilin commander Nicolau Lobato led the Fretilin armed reaction in the district of Viqueque. He said that a Fretilin Commander T115 arrested UDT leaders including Mateus Soares, António Pinto, Domingos Sousa, Domingos Lekiloik and about 20 other members of UDT in Carau-Balu (Viqueque, Viqueque).[149]

168. Some prisoners from Viqueque may have been taken to Manatuto and many prisoners were taken to the prison in Baucau.* They included leaders of the Apodeti and Trabalhista parties. Paulo Freitas, the president of the Trabalhista party, was arrested in his home in Ossu. He told the Commission:

* HRVD Statement 6502 mentions Domingos Soares in Manatuto.

> Suddenly we heard that there had been a counter-coup…The Fretilin forces came and grabbed us and threw us into prison…Chiquito Osório, and Jaime who is dead now, who used to be the administrator of Viqueque. Their (Apodeti) troops were from Laclubar…The two of them ran to Ossu and came to hide in my house…and then Fretilin came and arrested us. They took the three of us. They took us at night to prison.

169. Paulo Freitas explained how the three were taken to Baucau by Fretilin troops and that five to six prisoners were held in a small toilet. He said that prisoners held in this room were brought from Ossu (Viqueque), Baucau, Quelicai and Laga (all sub-districts of Baucau).[150]

Manatuto

170. The Commission received evidence that Fretilin detained members of UDT and Apodeti throughout the district of Manatuto during its armed response to the UDT armed movement, including in the Fretilin headquarters in Manatuto, in the village of Leikala (Laclo, Manatuto), and in Welihumetan (Laclo, Manatuto), the Fretilin headquarters in Soibada, and in Konte Tatoli (Manatuto, Manatuto).[151]

171. Statements from Manatuto indicated that most detainees held in the district were not physically abused, but were commonly used for forced labour. The Fretilin headquarters were in Manatuto Town. Sebastião Almeida told the Commission that he was detained there in 1975 because he was suspected of being a member of UDT. He said that he saw many detainees there but only recognised João Batista Braz, Luis Pereira and Domingos Sousa. They were held until the Indonesian military invaded Manatuto in early 1976 and he fled with Falintil. He testified that he was not mistreated but had to work each day tilling the land.[152]

172. The sub-district of Laclo was the site of violent clashes between Fretilin and UDT in early September 1975, leading to more killings than detentions. Manuel Nunes Soares, a UDT member in Laclo, told the Commission that in late August he heard that Fretilin forces in Remexio (Aileu) were coming to capture him and Pascoal Bernardo, another member of UDT. The two ran away and while they were gone, all of their possessions including livestock were stolen by members of Fretilin. Manuel Nunes Soares said that on 5 September, after a number of killings in the area, Pascoal Bernardo reported to the Fretilin command post in Fatu Butik (Laclo, Manatuto) and was then detained. He said that two days later he was killed. Manuel Nunes Soares was captured with a Fretilin commander on 12 October and held in the wash house in Laclo until 28 October by Fretilin commander T117. He was beaten and kicked while in detention.[153]

Bobonaro

173. In some areas of Bobonaro, such as in the village of Lourba (Bobonaro, Bobonaro), the communities reported that there was no party conflict. By September, Fretilin was preoccupied defending the villages from Indonesian military attacks.[154]

174. The Commission was told, however, of a detention centre in the town of Bobonaro, where several people were detained after they were captured in various places around the district. One member of UDT reported that he was arrested by a Fretilin member, T121, in Ritabou (Maliana, Bobonaro). He said that T121 beat him with a Mauser rifle, tied him with rope and then took him to the sub-district of Bobonaro where he was held for two months. He said that he was released after the Indonesian military invaded.[155]

175. A captain in the Segunda Linha, who was also a UDT soldier, was captured by Fretilin in the sub-district of Cailaco as he tried to flee from Ermera into West Timor during September. He was taken to Bobonaro and detained for two nights, before he was returned to the district of Ermera.[156]

176. There were also arrests in the sub-district of Lolotoe. Joana Afonso reported the capture of her husband, João Pereira, when Fretilin attacked Lolotoe Town. She said that members of Fretilin took him to the village office in Lontas (Lolotoe) and that he did not return.[157] Mariano Leite gave testimony that in 1975 (month unknown) his uncle, Rafael Maria, and two of his uncle's friends, Geraldo Pereira and Mariano from Lolotoe, were arrested by Fretilin on suspicion of spying for UDT. He said that the soldiers took them to Mapeo in the village of Sibuni (Lolotoe), where they were tied up and beaten. Two Fretilin soldiers cut Rafael Maria's right ear off. He said that Fretilin kept the three detainees in the Manil Molop command post (Lolotoe, Bobonaro) and forced them to cook and serve food to Fretilin soldiers for nearly one year.[158]

177. Armania Borges told the Commission how her brother Santano Berlelo and her son Angelino Botu-Mail were arrested in their home and taken to the village of Genulai. Only Angelino returned, after he escaped from detention.[159]

178. Other Fretilin detention centres in the district of Bobonaro included the Maliana Prison, the village office of Lontas (Lolotoe), Tapp-Dirihun (Atabae) and the command post in Manil Molop (Lolotoe, Bobonaro).[160]

The period of Fretilin administration

179. From late September 1975, Fretilin had control of the territory of Timor-Leste and began to establish an administration, while seeking the return of the Portuguese colonial administration from the island of Ataúro. Many UDT leaders and supporters fled to Indonesia. Fretilin detained those UDT members it had captured in the fighting, and continued arresting opponents. By early October, members of Apodeti also became a target of Fretilin arrests in Dili. Human rights abuses, including ill-treatment and torture, continued. Members of Fretilin who were arrested on suspicion of spying or other transgressions were also detained.

180. Mari Alkatiri, however, told the Commission that Fretilin was concerned about the welfare of its prisoners. He told the Commission that the Central Committee formed a special committee to consider the situation of those detained in Fretilin prisons. He emphasised that Fretilin gave the International Committee of the Red Cross full access to its prisons, and that Fretilin had begun to release people from prison by early October.[161]

Continuing detention of UDT supporters

181. Once in control of the territory, Fretilin continued to arrest and detain political opponents. Some examples from this period include:

- Anacleto do Nascimento told of his capture in the village of Matai (Maukatar, Covalima) on 14 October 1975 by Fretilin members T801, T802, T803, T804 and T805, because he was a member of UDT. He was tied to a piece of wood for one night and then the next morning was taken to the Fretilin office in Matai where he was pummelled in the chest with a rifle butt and stabbed. He suffered broken bones and he vomited blood. He was detained for three months.[162]
- Some former detainees of Fretilin in the district of Manatuto reported ill-treatment. For example, Saturnino Sarmento, who described himself as a (unaffiliated) civilian, told how he and his children Cristiano, Oscar and Armindo were detained in Leikala (Laclo, Manatuto) in 1975 (month unknown), by a member of Fretilin named T806 on the orders of Fretilin commander T807. They were taken to Leikala immediately after their arrest and interrogated. Their hands were tied and they were beaten with a branch from a tamarind tree. Fretilin held the family for two months and during this time their hands were tied each night, and during the day they were forced to cut sago palms and carry them back to Leikala.[163]
- The Commission heard from Rubi Metan that, in October 1975, he and his wife, Biliba, their son António and his younger brothers, Masanak and Mahare (who described themselves as unaffiliated civilians), were captured and taken to Konte Tatoli in Iliheu (Manatuto, Manatuto). During their detention Rubi Metan was beaten with wood by T808, T809, T810, T811 and T812 in turns for one hour. Eventually, Biliba, António and Masanak were sent to Remexio in Aileu and never returned. Mahare was stabbed with a knife to the solar plexus by T812, and he died. Rubi Metan was held for a further two years with other detainees who were members of Fretilin, including Sico Loi and João Manrui. They were forced to work each day, for example in rice fields or cutting sago palm.[164]

182. The Commission heard from a member of UDT who was arrested after he returned from West Timor, where he had fled during the fighting in the internal conflict. Rafael de Araújo testified that he returned to his home in the village of Ritabou (Maliana, Bobonaro) in late 1975. He was arrested by Fretilin soldiers, including T121, and was beaten with a rifle then tied up and taken to Bobonaro Town (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) where he was held for two months. He was released when Indonesian forces entered Bobonaro.[165]

The detention of Apodeti supporters and members

183. During the period of internal armed conflict Fretilin leaders in some areas targeted members and sympathisers of the Apodeti party as well as UDT. For example, groups of Apodeti members were arrested in Baucau on 20 August,[166] in Manufahi on 27 August,[167] and in Lautém in September 1975.[168]

184. On 4 October, Indonesian operations in the western region increased. Fretilin launched mass arrests of Apodeti members and sympathisers around the territory.[169] Detainees included the party president, Arnaldo de Araújo, and Secretary-General José Osório Soares.[170] Mari Alkatiri testified to the Commission that he ordered these arrests after learning of a planned coup by Apodeti to overthrow Fretilin.[171]

185. The district of Oecussi remained relatively calm during the UDT armed movement, although witnesses describe tensions between political parties emerging in early 1975.[172] After Fretilin's armed reaction and with escalating incursions by Indonesia in the western regions, clashes began to occur between Fretilin and Apodeti. For example, in Tumin in the village of Bobometo (Oesilo) in 1975 (month unknown) Francisco Enas Tebbes, an Apodeti supporter, was arrested by a Fretilin force led by T118. He was tied up and beaten heavily, then taken to Oesilo where he was held temporarily until he was moved to Oecussi Town and detained for three days. Francisco Enas Tebbes testified that while he was in detention he was threatened by T119, a Fretilin soldier, that he was tied up at all times and not given any food and that he suffered continual physical abuse by two members of Fretilin. He managed to escape briefly but was caught and detained for several more days before he was released.[*]

186. Arnaldo Sombiko described similar tensions in the sub-district of Pante Makassar in Oecussi in 1975 (month unknown). He told of four Apodeti members named António Lalus Sila, Oki Neno, Lelan Coi and Cobo Coi who were captured in the village of Costa by Fretilin and taken to the village of Naimeko. They were held for one month, and were forced to cut grass each day.[173]

187. Other detentions of Apodeti supporters reported to the Commission include:

- Carolino Bere of Samara (Hatolia, Ermera) told how he joined Apodeti in August 1975, and was eventually detained by Fretilin in November 1975 and held for seven months with about 70 others in the Hatolia prison. He was released after his family promised to bring pigs, eggs and goats.[174]

* HRVD Statement 9058. Bobometo was the site of a massacre of Apodeti supporters by Fretilin in 1975 [see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances].

- José Soares testified that in December 1975, when he was a member of Apodeti, he was in Maubisse (Hato Builico, Ainaro) when Fretilin forces led by T120 attacked and detained 150 people. They were put in an empty coffee warehouse in the village of Aitule, (Maubisse, Ainaro) where they were beaten with wood and weapons and forced to build a road. He reported that they were not given food or water.[175]

188. In Dili, a small number of Apodeti detainees were held in the QG in Taibessi.[*] Many others were held in the Comarca, and Fretilin also took over the Museum on 4 October 1975, specifically to hold Apodeti prisoners. According to Luis António de Aquino Caldas, prisoners at the Museum included José Fernando Osório Soares, the secretary general of Apodeti, who was captured with seven of his men near the Areia Branca beach as he returned from a picnic.[176] Frederico Almeida Santos, also a member of Apodeti detained by Fretilin, recalled:

> First, they took us to the Museum. The door was still locked and T83 opened it. He ordered us to go inside and then Fretilin arrested other people.[177]

189. The Commission received testimony naming four others detained at the Museum by Fretilin, Armando Suriano, António dos Santos, José dos Santos and Assis dos Santos. The four were detained until the Indonesian invasion except for José dos Santos who became ill and was released.[†]

Movement of detainees between detention centres

190. Detainees were also moved around between detention centres in this period or were released. These movements occurred either as Fretilin brought senior UDT leaders to major detention centres in Dili or Aileu, or later, as Fretilin retreated from the invading Indonesian forces. Fretilin moved detainees from Ermera, Viqueque and Maubisse to Aileu.[‡]

191. The Commission heard that detainees held in the Sub-district prison in Same were transferred to Aileu in early October, although the reason for this move was unclear.[178] Bento Reis was a prisoner from Same who was transferred to Aileu. He told the Commission:

* For example, Abilio Amaral testified that he was a member of Apodeti and was arrested in Dili on 6 October 1975 by a Military Police van (Unimog) in Alfandega (Dili). He was taken to the QG and on the way one of the soldiers kicked and beat him in the stomach with a rifle, until he was covered in blood. When they arrived at the prison, Rogério Lobato ordered the soldiers to stop the beatings. [HRVD statement 3361].

† HRVD Statement 5073 testifies that after José dos Santos was released to go home by Fretilin on 8 December, one day after the Indonesian military invasion of Dili, José and two others - Manuel Febu and Duarte dos Santos - were killed by ABRI in Matadouro (Dili). Liberatu dos Reis witnessed the killing.

‡ HRVD Statement 2222, in which Eduardo Mau Leto described how Fretilin forces from Maubisse arrested civilians from Tokoluli, Labudo and Raegoa Villages in Ermera. The prisoners were tied up in pairs but then released except for seven individuals, both UDT and Apodeti members, who were detained in Aileu. The seven were eventually taken to Same with Fretilin and four never returned.

We were transferred from Same to Aileu, and as we arrived in Aileu Fretilin troops and civilians were waiting for us. We got out of the van one by one. To the left and right, people carried pieces of wood and other weapons. They beat us as we got out of the van. Some of us fell to the ground with broken skulls, wounds or other injuries. They beat us all the way from the van to the prison…We were brought directly to the warehouse. There were many people. They beat us all, but Major Lourenço [Tilman] and Senhor Monis da Maia suffered the most severe injuries. I saw it with my own eyes. The next morning, they took the injured to the hospital for treatment.[179]

192. The Commission received testimony that UDT and Apodeti detainees from Same (Manufahi) experienced physical abuse while being transferred to the Aileu detention centres. Abuses continued in Aileu. Monis da Maia, a UDT supporter from Same, testified to the Commission:

On 9 October we left for Aileu. When we arrived in Maubisse [Ainaro], we were lined up in a field and beaten one by one with a wooden stick. When everyone had been beaten we went on to Aileu. When we arrived in Aileu, we were beaten there by the local citizens.[180]

193. João da Costa was also moved from Same to Aileu and told the Commission that he suffered similar treatment on the journey:

[After] one month [in detention] in Same, [Fretilin] ordered us to go to Aileu. As we left Same, the van stopped at every Fretilin post so the guards could beat us. Arriving in Maubisse they drove into the military barracks…They climbed into the van and beat us. Some prisoners were beaten unconscious. Then someone said: "Don't beat them in the van. Take them out and beat them." They ordered the detainees to stand in three rows. One by one we entered the prison. The guards hit each detainee with a piece of wood.

Then Commander Soares arrived. He was kind. He said to us: "We are all sinners in this world. God who is innocent will forgive us. Why don't we, human beings, forgive each other?" The beating stopped. But then they continued to Aileu. On the way they ordered us to lie and not to lift our heads, because children along the way aimed their arrows at us. The guards still stopped the van at every post and beat us. In Aileu the car stopped in front of the warehouse next to the hospital. They beat us one by one as we got down from the car. I could not remember how many times they beat us either with a piece of wood or an iron bar. The most excruciating [method of beating] was when they beat us with car brake cords. I did not feel the pain anymore when they beat us with an iron bar or nails. But it was so painful when they beat us with car brake cords.

It was not just one or two people beating us. I collapsed, and after another beating I fell to the ground. Then Carlos Ferreira fell right on top of me and fainted. My oldest brother lifted us up but we gasped for air. Two people ran towards me and beat me. I just sat motionless because I had almost lost my breath. There were more than 30 of us [from Same]. That night we stayed in our prison, but every night after that they took us out. However none of us from Same died in Aileu.[181]

Life in Aissirimou

Aissirimou, in the mountainous Aileu District of central Timor-Leste, was where Fretilin set up its headquarters after UDT launched the 11 August movement and from where it put its armed insurrection in motion on 15 August 1975. It was also the location of Fretilin's largest detention centres. At first the buildings were used only to hold detainees from the Aileu area but soon other detainees, from Manufahi and Ainaro, were brought to Aissirimou. Leaders were held in former Portuguese military barracks and other detainees were held in a coffee warehouse. In early December, when Indonesia invaded Dili, Fretilin's prisoners from the QG in Taibessi were also brought to Aissirimou.

Conditions in Aissirimou

When prisoners from outside areas were brought to Aileu the detention centres started to fill up. The number of people detained in Aissirimou is hard to estimate. Clementino Araújo, a former guard at the Fretilin headquarters, said that there were 200 prisoners in August 1975.[182] A former prisoner told the Commission that by December there were around 3,000 people detained there.[183] Eufrazia de Jesus Soares visited her husband, Daniel Carvalho, the Apodeti regional secretary in Ermera, at the warehouse prison. She told the Commission:

The detention centre was a warehouse. The place was so overcrowded that prisoners could not sit. It was like sardines in a can, and everyone had to stand up. I arrived there and was not allowed to enter. The guard tried to find a way for me to speak to my husband and I managed to speak to him through a window.[184]

The warehouse was not constructed to house large numbers of people. The absence of sanitary facilities forced the guards to provide large containers for use as toilets. One former detainee, José Maukabae, spoke of the detention centre:

There were several containers in the middle of us. Prisoners defecated or urinated in them. In the morning prisoners vied to take them out so they could go out and feel the warm sun and rinse their hands or wash their faces with water.[185]

Some former detainees said that the guards gave them breakfast and lunch but not dinner. For breakfast prisoners ate rice, and for lunch they ate corn.[186] Others testified that the guards beat prisoners every time they came to get their food. One former detainee, João da Costa, told the Commission:

Every day they beat us when we wanted our food. Many did not bother to eat because they were too afraid. We had to be careful so that the food did not spill as they beat us. Many starved because they were too afraid to eat.[*]

Forced Labour

To provide food for the detainees, Fretilin forced prisoners to work in the rice fields or coffee plantations as part of a Campo de Trabalho (Labour Camp).[187] Men tended the fields and women pounded rice and cooked for Falintil soldiers.[188] Fretilin seemed to be aware that this kind of work constituted forced labour but believed that this was necessary in order to provide food for detainees. The Fretilin President, Francisco Xavier do Amaral, explained to the Commission:[189]

I think there was an element of force but we had to feed them. How else could we get food? We had to look at the situation confronting us: no logistics, no assistance. How else could we feed them? In the end they were prisoners and they worked for themselves and for us. That was the rule and it was justified…Campo de Trabalho was a policy, or an emergency measure, implemented by Fretilin to feed people.

Food was still scarce however. António Serpa, who had been brought by Fretilin to Aileu after the 7 December invasion of Dili, told the Commission:

Because of the situation we suffered a lot in terms of food. When we would go to get food we could be taken away and killed. In the end

* CAVR Interview with João da Costa, Letefoho-Same, Manufahi, 24 June 2003. João da Costa was a detainee at the Same Sub-district prison. In October 1975, he and other prisoners were transferred to Aileu. On 27 December 1975, when ABRI approached Aileu, Fretilin moved João and the other prisoners to Maubisse and then to Same. On 27 January 1976, as ABRI entered Betano, Fretilin moved João and the other prisoners to Holarua. Fretilin executed some prisoners in Holarua and then moved João and around 40 other prisoners to Same and kept them at the primary school, where many prisoners were massacred. João and three other prisoners survived the massacre [see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances].

those who were really hungry went to get food but we were scared…On 15 December I was selected to be taken and killed. I was placed with the Aileu group. There were more than 60 people in one small room… They didn't give us any food. While we were kept in the warehouse they fed us but in this room they didn't give us anything to eat.[190]

He was eventually let out of the storeroom and survived.

Torture and ill-treatment in Aissirimou

The Commission also heard of people being tortured and suffering other forms of cruel and inhuman treatment in Aissirimou. João da Costa described the torture of Major Lourenço Tilman, a former major in the Seghunda Linha and the UDT commander in Same (Manufahi):

Major Lourenço was the most severely beaten in Aileu because he was a commander. They put him on the roof of a van and drove him around Aileu and screamed: "Viva Fretilin". Someone stabbed him and he bled. His face was swollen and he could no longer speak.[191]

Fretilin members and citizens of Aileu participated in this ill-treatment of prisoners. Monis da Maia told the Commission that "it was not the soldiers but the community who beat us."[192]

Trials of Fretilin detainees*

194. As Fretilin leaders became aware of the arbitrary nature of the detention and the overcrowding in the Fretilin detention centres they acted to create a way to acquit and release innocent people. The Portuguese colonial administration showed no signs of returning from Ataúro and so was not in a position to deal with the situation. On 30 September, Fretilin announced a commission to investigate detainees' backgrounds. In many areas this commission began its work too late, well after human rights abuses against detainees had begun to be committed. It was not active in all areas of the territory. Indeed, statements received by the Commission indicate that numbers of detainees continued to rise and that individual members of Fretilin in the districts began to make decisions and take action against detainees on their own initiative.

195. One example of such action was the emergence of "trials" of detainees in some areas. These trials were a form of people's justice called popular justice (justiça popular). It involved bringing a prisoner before the assembled community, who would decide by popular verdict whether he should be punished.

* The Commission notes that the justice processes described in this Report did not amount to a formal justice system, but were a number of practices used by Fretilin members in this period to achieve some level of justice for detainees and perpetrators.

196. Popular justice neither followed procedural norms nor respected the human rights of the accused. Decisions were arbitrary and often based on sentiment and anger. The danger of violation of the rights of the accused in this process was heightened in the climate of ongoing tension and widespread anger among victims of the civil war. People innocent of any involvement in the armed movement were punished and sentenced to beatings and imprisonment.

197. Luis Godinho, a UDT member from Lospalos (Lautém), was condemned after a popular justice hearing to be publicly beaten to death with a whip fitted with sharp spikes.[193] A fellow detainee of Luis Godinho, Edmundo da Conceição, told the Commission about the"trial" which led to Luis Godinho's death:

> *The popular justice (ceremony) took place in two locations. First, they held it at Companhia Caçadores 14 headquarters, and after beating [the prisoners], they took them to the Lospalos administrative office. They took us there. After a flag-raising ceremony, they beat us so severely that Luis Godinho died near the flagpole. They beat him to death. In front of the Secretariat office, they held the popular justice hearing and beat him to death. They beat him with a barbed whip (rusan pahano) until he dropped dead in front of our eyes.*
>
> So many people beat Luis Godinho that it was difficult to identify him. Fretilin member T122 started it, followed by Fretilin member T123 and then the rest of them. So I could not tell who was involved. Everyone beat him.
>
> Satisfied that Luis was dead, they loaded his body into a tractor, drove off and buried it. Everything happened right in front of our eyes.[194]

198. Two statements given to the Commission described a popular justice "trial" in Poetete (Ermera) on 25 September 1975. According to Filomena dos Santos, two Fretilin soldiers went to the Ermera prison and called out her father, Captain Miguel Martins of the Segunda Linha and a UDT soldier, who had been held in the prison for one week. Miguel Martins was taken out to face the public and be tried. T124 said to the assembled people of the village: "If you answer go to Aileu, it means he lives, if you say stay in Ermera it means he dies." The majority of the people cried: "Stay in Ermera!". Filomena noted that in the crowd were women whose husbands had been killed six weeks earlier by UDT. Miguel Martins was shot and killed.[195]

199. Another example of popular justice in Ermera was described to the Commission. Angelina Barros told the Commission how in Fatubessi (Hatolia, Ermera), in September 1975, a Fretilin commander from Aileu, José Soares, and his men chased a group of UDT members to Bobonaro. There they captured the UDT commander, Serafin dos Santos, and 11 of his men and took them back to Fatubessi. The 12 UDT members were brought before a people's court. The people were asked whether the

* Rusan pahano is a word from the Fataluko language of the region around the district of Lautém. It is difficult to find an equivalent word either in Tetum or Indonesian, but the instrument has spikes.

12 UDT members should live or die. The answer from the people was that the 12 members should die. The 12 were then taken to the Fretilin command in Fatubessi and detained. She did not tell the Commission the fate of the 12 men.[196]

Following the full-scale Indonesian invasion

200. The Commission heard that in most districts of Timor-Leste, including Bobonaro, Covalima, Baucau, Lautém and Manatuto, Fretilin prisoners were released after the Indonesian military entered those areas. João Viena Freitas told the Commission that in Baucau the 160 prisoners held at the Descascadeira in Baucau Town were evacuated to Venilale (Baucau) when Indonesia invaded. They spent one night in the Venilale school and were then told to look after themselves. Many surrendered to the Indonesian marines in Baucau.[197]

201. Some of the prisoners in Baucau had already been taken back to their home sub-districts by Fretilin before Indonesian forces attacked Baucau, and were released from there. Paul Freitas, the president of Trabalhista at the time and a Fretilin prisoner, had been taken from Baucau to Uatolari (Viqueque):

> When Indonesia invaded, I thought they [Fretilin] were really going to kill me, that now we were in big trouble and the situation would be worse. The invasion was broadcast by radio and the children who brought our food told us that Indonesia was about to attack. It happened very quickly. Then they [Fretilin] said to us: "Now you can go because we are fleeing into the forest." They said that the people in the town will be killed [by ABRI] but the people in the forest would be fine. So it was better for me to flee to the forest.[198]

202. Prisoners in Dili and Aileu, the major centres for detention, were moved with the Fretilin leadership as it fled south.

203. In mid-October, ABRI and its East Timorese auxiliaries occupied Maliana and the frontlines moved further east. On 3 or 4 December, Fretilin moved Apodeti members detained in the Museum in Dili to the QG in Taibessi to join the UDT prisoners.* When the Indonesian military invaded Dili on 7 December, Fretilin took its prisoners held at the QG in Dili to Aileu.[199] Xanana Gusmão explained in his testimony:

> The UDT and Apodeti prisoners were taken up into the hills not with the intention to kill them…but the paratroops were already landing…The Indonesian troops were occupying Dili, [they were] coming up, coming up.[200]

* CAVR Interview with Luis António de Aquino Caldas, Palapaço, Dili, 21 May 2004. Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes testified that on 4 or 5 December, Fretilin moved prisoners at the Museum to QG, Taibessi, and detained them until 7 December.

204. Fretilin forced the prisoners to carry boxes of ammunition with them on the march. A member of UDT, José Maukabae, told the Commission:

> On 7 December, we ate nothing. Only those who had food could eat. At noon Nicolau Lobato came to the QG. He stood in front [of the room we were detained in] and told us in Portuguese: "Comrades, do you want to live or die? So we said: "We, commander, want to live."
>
> [He replied] "[If] it is a fact that you want to live, you have three minutes to line up and help carry this equipment to the mountains and then you must return here. Do not carry your belongings. Your belongings stay here. You will only go to the ammunitions' depot and help take the equipment to the mountains and then return. If you do not help, everyone will die. The law of war dictates this. While the forces are facing difficulties, prisoners have to assist the forces. If you do not help the forces, everyone dies."
>
> And we said: "Commander, we want to help…until we die." Then, in three minutes we all went out to help take the equipment to the mountains.[201]

205. Others recounted that as the Indonesian military attacked Dili Fretilin leaders had a heated debate about the fate of prisoners at QG. António Ximenes Serpa told the Commission:

> On 7 December, birds [paratroopers] descended from the sky. We were in serious trouble. There was a big debate among the leaders about whether the prisoners were to be killed, left alive, or released and left to save themselves. They had a serious discussion. Then Nicolau Lobato said: "If you want to kill them, you will have to carry the ammunition boxes in the arsenal yourselves." His words finally dampened their emotions. They took us out at one o'clock to get the boxes of ammunition and go to Aileu.[202]

206. The prisoners in the Comarca managed to escape and walk to the Indonesian Consulate in Lecidere, Dili.

Escaping the Balide Comarca, 7 December 1975: Anselmo dos Santos and Frederico Almeida Santos[203]

Anselmo dos Santos

One day we approached Arnaldo [Araújo, the President of Apodeti], and he whispered to us: "Comrades, don't despair. It will not be long before we get out of here." On Sunday morning around 4.00am, 7 December, we heard the sound of airplanes and saw that Indonesia had landed soldiers by parachute. They had not yet reached the ground when guns started firing from below. The prison doors were all shut and nobody went out.

Frederico Almeida Santos

We saw parachutes. We were watching closely for what would happen. We did not know whether to run out or just stay inside. I called Filomeno Gomes [the prison warden] and said: "Comrade, usually when war rages and houses are burned down, people in cells can't get out. You must free us so that we can find a way out."

Anselmo dos Santos

At first, [the guards] were still on the roof firing their guns, but President Arnaldo advised them: "Comrades, it would be better that you take off your military uniforms and hide your weapons. If someone comes and asks, we will say that all of us are prisoners." So the five Fretilin people followed his advice, hid their weapons and took off their uniforms.

Frederico Almeida Santos

People were shooting at each other and we piled up the mattreses so that we could reach the window and see outside. João Branco [a Falintil commander] and three others passed in front of us as they were in a shoot-out with ABRI. By the middle of the day they passed back again and saw us all at the window. João said: "What are you waiting for? Now it's a big war. We don't care about you anymore." Then he left.

Anselmo dos Santos

After Fretilin troops [next to Balide prison] had begun to retreat to the QG, we began to get ready to leave. Just as we were about to go out of the prison, Arnaldo took out a white pillowcase and tied it to an iron pole and placed it in front of the prison. Not one of us was hit by a bullet. We all went out.

As we were about to leave, an ABRI soldier and his parachute fell right in front of the prison kitchen. He was already dead. Arnaldo told us to lift the body of the soldier and put it on a table. Arnaldo examined the body and took an ID card and a rosary out of the soldier's pocket - maybe he was Catholic. The ID card and the rosary were then placed beside the body. His gun and mortar were leant against the wall near the head of the soldier. After that we left. President Arnaldo, the malae Albano and an Arab – the three of them led the way waving a white cloth...We followed behind them to the Indonesian Consulate in Lecidere.

The movement of prisoners from Dili to Aileu and then Same

207. As the Indonesian military advanced on Aileu and planes attacked the town on 27 December 1975,[204] Fretilin again evacuated prisoners, first to Maubisse (Maubisse, Ainaro) and then to Same (Manufahi). The Commission has found that massacres of prisoners occurred in both Aileu before the forced march began, and in Maubisse on the way (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). The remaining prisoners reached Same on 31 December. The former President of Fretilin, Francisco Xavier do Amaral, described the reason for the move:

> We were in the middle of war, in this war, when we ran from our enemies… We took those we had imprisoned, our enemies whom we had imprisoned, with us. Before we even had a chance to catch our breath, we said: "What do we do now? We must keep running. We don't have too many choices. There's no transport, no food, not much medicine, none of this." Some of those we imprisoned were already seriously sick, many were very weak.
>
> So we had to look at this. Do we leave them here alive? Do we run alone and leave them? Or do we kill them and then run? I see danger in all these...If we abandon them, for example a member of UDT or Apodeti, [they could] fall into the Indonesian enemy's hands. The Indonesian military can come and he can fall into their hands. Indonesia can put pressure on him and they could find us. They could trick him or he might confess.[205]

208. José Maukabae recalled the move from Aileu:

> The planes started dropping bombs over Aileu very early in the morning. ABRI may have known where the prisoners were held so they dropped bombs around them. We heard gun shots outside the prison. We did not know what to do because the prison doors were shut and we could not escape. Then one of the planes dropped a bomb right on the house across the street. Water splashed. They took us out and evacuated us.[*]

209. António Serpa, another prisoner from Aissirimou, described the difficult journey to Same through Maubisse:

> When we left Aileu for Maubisse it was raining. We hadn't eaten for three or four days. Our arms were tired. We were unsteady on our legs. We walked slowly to Daisoli where we spent the night. Those who were planning to escape couldn't escape because they didn't have enough energy.

---

* CAVR Interview with José Maukabae, Maubara, Liquiçá, 9 March 2004.José Maukabae mentioned two groups of prisoners in Same, the first group or primeiro grupo and second group or segundo grupo. He was in the second group known as the Maubere group. Other reports referred to three groups in Same: Grupos de Maubere, Grupos de Semi Perigoso, and Grupos de Perigosisimo [CAVR Interviews with Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes, Dili, 5 May 2004 and Assis dos Santos, Dili, 17 July 2003, Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2003; Bento Reis, Same, 2004].

Then on the morning of 28 December we continued on our way to Maubisse. On the evening of 28 December we slept in Maubisse. On the morning of 29 December we left Maubisse to get more ammunition and take it to Same. There was one person who couldn't carry it. He just threw it away. Then the late Nicolau Lobato said: "Now I'm losing my patience. Who threw away the ammunition? You all have to stay here."

We felt embarrassed. Those who had the most strength picked up the ammunition and carried it. As we left Maubisse it was also raining. Before we got to Fleixa my friend João Damas, who was exhausted, collapsed. To this day I don't know if he died then or not. We walked slowly carrying the ammunition to Fleixa. We all stopped there. It was raining hard.

And so we went on. We were hungry. We sat under a house on stilts. I asked the comrades "Who is ready to die?" I felt I couldn't go on anymore. I suggested we wait for the Prime Minister [Nicolau Lobato] to ask if we could stop and stay there. They could kill us there. I couldn't bear it anymore. So we all waited…The Prime Minster arrived with his bodyguards. I said to him that we had come from Aileu and hadn't eaten all this time and had no strength left to carry the ammunition. I said we just cannot do it and if he didn't believe us he could just kill us.

And so all the ammunition was stored in Fleixa. Three cars came to take the ammunition to Maubisse and those three cars came back bringing sweet potatos. We slept in a place called Fahi Teen. Then in the morning of 30 December we left that place and went to Same.[206]

210. The prisoners arrived in Same around 31 December 1975 and spent New Year's Eve there. According to António Serpa, on 10 January they saw lights out to sea and Fretilin suspected the prisoners signalling to the Indonesian military. Fretilin ordered the prisoners to gather in three large rooms in the Same Primary School. José Maukabae described what happened:

The primary school had three halls. José Osório and I went to the middle room. He sat in the middle. He said: "I can no longer speak because I am in an impossible position. Arnaldo is in Dili. I do not know what he is doing. My party does not want war. I want integration with Indonesia but without war. Now, Indonesia came for war. Let them find their enemy wherever they are, but my men will not collaborate with them. I can no longer speak. I do not know what Arnaldo says to the Indonesians."[207]

211. On 12 January 1976, Fretilin divided prisoners into three groups: Grupo Maubere (Maubere Group), Grupo Semi Perigoso (Less Dangerous Group), and Grupo Perigosissimo (Dangerous Group).[208] Grupo Maubere comprised sympathisers of opposition parties who had no political clout. Fretilin held them in Mateus Ferreira's house.* Grupo de Semi Perigoso was for opposition party members and supporters

* Mateus Ferreira was a UDT leader in Same.

who had minor influence. Fretilin put them in the Same Primary School. Grupo Perigosissimo comprised opposition party leaders and administrators whom Fretilin considered dangerous. Fretilin held them in the Sub-district prison.[209]

Hola Rua (Same, Manufahi)

212. When ABRI entered the village of Betano (Same Sub-district, on the south coast of Manufahi), Fretilin was struggling to maintain control. It was difficult for the party leadership to manage the prisoners. On 27 January 1976, it evacuated prisoners from the town of Same to the village of Hola Rua (Same, Manufahi).[210] There Fretilin held most prisoners in another primary school building but some, including José Fernando Osório Soares, the Apodeti Secretary General, were detained in the Segunda Linha Major Lourenço's house.[211] Prisoners in Hola Rua included those from the Perigosissimo (Dangerous Group) and Semi Perigoso (Less Dangerous Group). The Commission heard testimony about two groups of prisoners who were executed by Fretilin. Monis da Maia told the Commission of the first group, which included Apodeti Secretary General José Osório Soares, at Hat Nipah near Hola Rua on 27 January 1976.[212]

213. The Commission was told of a second, larger group execution of prisoners at the Same Primary School, where Fretilin executed 44 UDT prisoners on 29 January 1976 (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

214. Most of the prisoners from the Grupo Maubere (Maubere Group), except for members of Apodeti, were released on 31 January 1976. José Maukabae described what happened to the prisoners:

> Fretilin released most of the prisoners except for a few, whom it executed. About 20 Apodeti and UDT prisoners were freed by the Fretilin commanders Paulino Gama and Guido Soares in Hola Rua at the end of January 1976. Also at the end of January 1976, César Mau Laka released the second group of prisoners, which included UDT, Fretilin and non-political prisoners in Hola Rua, but held Apodeti prisoners.[213] The Apodeti members were separated and put into an elementary school building in Hola Rua. They were then brought at night to Mota Karau Ulun, Hola Rua, and executed with spears.[214]

215. Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes and Assis dos Santos confirmed the first release by Fretilin of 20 UDT and Apodeti prisoners.[215] Filomeno Cabral stated that Fretilin commanders Guido Soares, Paulino Gama (Mauk Moruk), Antonio Pinto (Kalohan) and Moises Quina requested that the prisoners be taken out of Hola Rua. They signed an agreement with them and were taken towards the east by Falintil troops and were released from there. Assis dos Santos told of an agreement signed with the 20 prisoners in Kiras (Same, Manufahi) before their release:

> We signed an agreement with Fretilin. Many survived. The agreement insisted that we had to draw blood and promise to join and strengthen Fretilin forces. Failure to keep the agreement meant death.[216]

216. José Maukabae described in detail what occurred when César Mau Laka decided the fate of the second group of detainees in Hola Rua:

> [César Mau Laka] said: "You are prisoners here. Many are UDT people. Fretilin people are also detained for brawls and theft. Apodeti people and even civilians who are not involved in politics are detained. I will count in one minute who belongs to UDT, Apodeti or Fretilin and who did not belong to any party. Form lines here according to your group." Each of us prisoners examined our consciences (exame de conciênçia). Soon there were four groups…I joined UDT. Four other friends [colleagues from Maubara] went to other groups. Then the commander, César Mau Laka, said: "You militia take these Apodeti comrades to the school building down there, and tomorrow after their trial, they can go home." As they took the Apodeti prisoners, César Mau Laka said: "You UDT and Fretilin people, and all of you who do not belong to any party, whoever has a friend in Same can stay with them, and when this country is safe, you can go home. Those who do not have friends here can go home." All were happy and cried out. That happened at 6.00 or 7.00pm.[217]

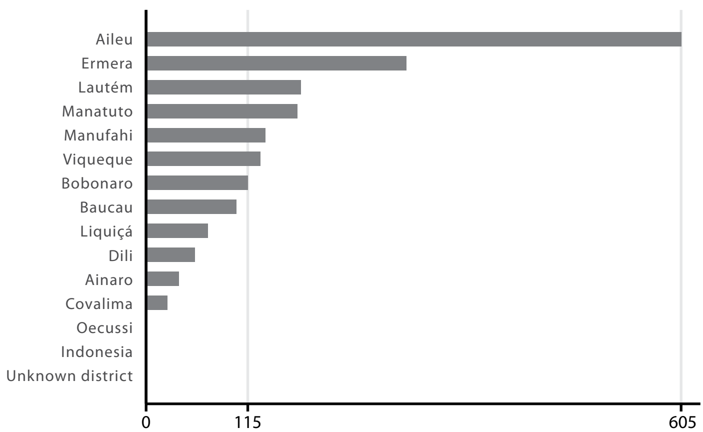
Detention, torture and ill-treatment by Fretilin/Falintil 1976–1979



217. After the Indonesian invasion and before the destruction of the Resistance bases in late 1978, Fretilin/Falintil continued to hold people in detention in the areas it controlled (liberated zones, or zonas libertadas), based on its own form of justice. Unlike in 1975 however, the victims of detention, torture and ill-treatment were the party's own members or civilians living in these areas.

218. For serious offences or repeat offenders, prisoners were placed either in ordinary detention centres or in National Rehabilitation Camps (Campos de Reabilitação Nacional, or Renals). The difference between a Renal and an ordinary Fretilin detention centre was very clear in theory. Renals were for the discipline of Fretilin members or civilians "who need to be brought back to the right path" through the teaching of the principles of Fretilin ideology. As well as involving people in the process of production through farmwork on cooperative farms, they also provided political education and sometimes literacy training. In practice the difference was not always that clear. Renals became synonymous with detention in the minds of civilians and indeed many Renals effectively became prisons. Further, the Commission has heard of widespread torture and ill-treatment of detainees in Renals.

219. During the Soibada Conference, held between 15 May and 2 June 1976, Fretilin organisers decided that territories controlled by Fretilin would be divided into six sectors controlled by the military command, as well as political administration territories under the control of Fretilin administrators. They were: East Point (Ponta Leste), which included Lautém District; Central East (Centro Leste), which included Baucau and Viqueque Districts; Central North (Centro Norte), which included Manatuto, Aileu and Dili Districts; Central South (Centro Sul) which included Manufahi and Ainaro; North Frontier (Fronteira Norte) which included Liquiçá, Ermera and parts of Bobonaro; and South Frontier (Fronteira Sul), which included Covalima and parts of Bobonaro. The Commission heard that detention centres including Renals were opened in every Fretilin sector of the territory. The Commission's statistical data record, however, that detentions occurred with by far the greatest frequency in the district of Ermera, from which the largest number of reports came by a significant margin, followed by Manufahi, Aileu and Viqueque. The districts of Bobonaro, Oecussi and Ainaro reported no such detentions and in Dili, Lautém and Covalima Districts the numbers were low. These results do not reflect in all respects the findings of the Commission's qualitative research, which, for example, suggests that the number of detentions in Lautém was among the highest.

Count of reported acts of detention commited by Fretilin/Falintil against Fretilin/Falintil members, by district, 1974–1979

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

220. Significantly the correlation between torture and detention is extremely high. For the 49 cases of detention of Fretilin/Falintil members by Fretilin/Falintil reported to have occurred in Ermera District, for example, there are also 49 reported counts of torture, indicating that torture may have been a routine aspect of detention of members by Fretilin/Falintil in this period.

221. This section looks at practices that Fretilin adopted to achieve some level of justice and the reasons for detention of civilians and Fretilin/Falintil members between 1976 and 1978, and the treatment of Fretilin detainees in general. All types of detention centre are described in the statements and testimonies set out below, but particular attention is given to the Renals because they were unique to this period and were an essential part of Fretilin's strategy of social and political revolution. The Commission notes that the treatment of detainees differed from place to place.

Justice under the Fretilin administration

222. The justice practices adopted by Fretilin are set out in detail in Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy. In summary, they created a distinction between what were regarded as minor offences, such as a commander's mistake that caused the deaths of his men,[218] the harassment of women (book feto), or the theft of chickens, and serious offences, such as being a traitor to the "political line", the nation or the revolution.[219]

223. For the less serious offences, the accused would be called by the Political Commissar* to undergo criticism and self-criticism in a public meeting. This involved a Fretilin leader pointing out the person's mistakes (criticism) and then the person expressing understanding and remorse, and promising not to reoffend (self-criticism). Sometimes the person would also be required to undertake an appropriate "corrective act" (justo correctivo), such as collecting water or firewood for a certain period of time. This was considered a form of rehabilitation of the offender.[220]

224. For more serious offences the accused went through a process of popular justice (justiça popular) where the people decided on the accused's fate. In justiça popular there were no judges or prosecutors. The commander who was making the accusation would bring the accused before the public and put the accusations and the reasons for the charges to the people. The political commissar, alone or with the sector commander, would decide on a sentence.[221] João Vienas explained:

> The justice section was like a judge who decided cases based on Fretilin rules. Through the process, the accused would answer questions about why he was arrested and who reported him. It also called leaders such as the [political] commissar. I was asked: "Do you know what wrong you committed?" I answered: "I have no idea". They said: "We are telling you that what you did wrong was that your younger brother, José dos Santos, was a traitor. And the one who us gave this information is a friend of yours."[222]

225. Not all serious cases were investigated and there was no presumption of innocence or even, in many cases, right of reply. There were cases where people suspected of having planned to surrender [to ABRI] were simply accused by the local commander, and a decision was made. Although the people had the right to decide, they usually followed the commander's line. For these reasons, the Commission finds that even where practices were applied correctly the resulting detention was arbitrary. A former Fretilin political assistant to the commissariat (assistente) told the Commission:

---

* The political commissar (Comissário Política) was the highest leader in the sector for all political, administration or military matters [see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy].

Popular justice was formal. The form it took was: say that I was a person who was accused and I was taken before the public. When I came before them, many people would say that I was guilty; nobody would challenge that decision, even if I had done the right thing. There was no judge to defend us and it was not a judge or a prosecutor that brought the accused person before the public. I witnessed around three cases, of people who were suspects and were captured in the guerrilla [war] zone and the case of a man arrested by the commander on a charge of spying. [At the justiça popular*] the commander said: "This man we captured in the guerrilla zone is a spy." Then people said, "If he is a spy, he must die." A Falintil commander usually handled cases like these and people just went along with what he said.*[223]

226. If a person had already undergone criticism and self-criticism and completed justo correctivo but then reoffended, he or she was detained in a Renal or other prison. Alternatively, the adjunto[*] could decide to send an offender to a Renal through a justiça popular hearing. In other cases, as the quote above suggests, offenders were killed.

227. Like guilt, the length of the sentence of imprisonment was decided by the political commissar or other person with authority. Several criteria were used to decide if a person should be released including the detainee's conduct while in detention. In some cases, a quasi-judicial process was used, run by the Fretilin justice section.

Reasons for detention

228. Renals were established to hold Fretilin and Falintil members and civilians who had violated (or were accused of violating) the principles and ideology of Fretilin and betrayed the struggle. Some of the most common reasons for detention were:

- Treason by planning to surrender to ABRI or making contact with people in ABRI-controlled areas, evidenced by going beyond the boundaries delineated by Fretilin[224]
- As a result of internal political divisions
- To enforce discipline.

Treason by planning to surrender or contacting people in ABRI areas

229. The most common reason for being detained in a Renal or Fretilin detention centre was for treason by being in contact with, or working with, the enemy, the Indonesian military (or people "in the towns"), or for planning to surrender to the enemy. Both civilians and members of Fretilin/Falintil were arrested for committing, or being suspected of committing, these offences. When caught they were taken to a Fretilin base for interrogation, detention and trial.

* The Commissario Politica provided political leadership in the Freitlin structure at the sector level. An adjunto represented the Commissario Politica at the zona level. (see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy).

230. A finding that a person had ventured beyond the boundaries of the Zona or of crossing the linha de fogo (the outer line of the Fretilin resistance base), where armed troops were stationed, was enough to support a charge of making contact with the enemy.[225] A commander could also be accused of cooperating with the enemy if enemy soldiers succeeded in entering a Fretilin area and killing people. In these circumstances, the commander was considered to have committed a grave mistake,[226] and when a commander was found to have committed a mistake his men were also arrested for the same offence.[227]

231. Pedro Faria, commander of the Fretilin militia in 1975 and secretary of the Sakalu Zone, told the Commission that he was detained in a Renal called Belta Trés in Irara (Fuiloro, Lospalos, Lautém):

> I was detained in the Renal because I was planning to surrender and the political commissar heard of my plan. I was arrested and interrogated, and I confessed to the plan. I was detained for one and a half months. I was not alone in detention, there were many people detained with me.[228]

232. Sometimes being in contact with someone who was suspected of being a traitor was reason enough to be detained by Fretilin. This happened to João Vienas in November 1977. He was arrested, bound and detained for a week. During this time he was abused, denied regular food and urinated on, although he was not told why he was arrested. After a week he was called to see the head of the Zona Secretariat.

> Then it was my turn to be called and interrogated. I was asked: "What is your relationship with José dos Santos?" José dos Santos was my younger brother and the Fretilin commander of the region and he had been killed by Fretilin. I did not do anything wrong but I was arrested because of the death of my younger brother José dos Santos. They suspected that I might react by running away to the town and report to ABRI. I was sure that I had not done anything wrong.[229]

233. As João Vienas's statement demonstrates, if one or more members of a family were arrested on suspicion of collaborating with Indonesia or for seeking to surrender, other members of the family were liable to be arrested as well. This was particularly so if one or more members of the family were Fretilin leaders.

234. Domingos Soares Martins told the Commission that, even though he was an active member of Falintil, he was accused of being a spy in 1978 by Fretilin Commander T131 in Leubasa (Ermera), because his mother had just surrendered to ABRI.[230]

235. Modesto de Jesus Almeida Sanches told the Commission:

> In November 1977, my father Salvador Almeida, Adelino Freitas and I were arrested by a platoon of Falintil soldiers at the aldeia Haksolok in Iliomar [Lautém], because we were relatives of Pedro Sanches, Gil Sanches, Bendito Savio and Adão Amaral who had been arrested recently and imprisoned in central Ponte Leste sector.

After we had been arrested we were put in a pig-pen for three days and three nights. * My arms were tied behind my back and I was forced to walk from Iliomar to the Besi Manas [Hot Iron] prison in Luro. At Luro, [Fretilin] adjunto T125 said to the 49 detainees, including myself, that we were traitors to the country. Then, with our arms still tied behind our backs at our fingers and elbows [and our legs tied at the] knees and toes, we were put in a house that had a floor of small sharp stones. We were tied up day and night…

Only after three months was I interrogated by T126, the secretary of Luro Zone. He accused me of planning to surrender, but I answered that I was only arrested because he had arrested all of my brothers. I did not think that I had done anything wrong.[231]

236. When the Indonesian military attacked an area and the leaders of that area decided to retreat, detainees were not released because it was considered that they would certainly surrender and thus enable the enemy to control that area. Orlando Silva Correia Belo (Fernando So), the former village secretary of the Sakalu Zone and later the person in charge of the Marabia Renal in Iliomar (Lautém) described his detention in a pig-pen in 1976:

In October 1976, Pedro Nunes (alias Sabalae), Julio Alegria, Vitor Gandara, Caetano Vilanova, Manuel Gandara and I, together with civilians, attended a large gathering in Paição. At the meeting, Fretilin leaders including T127, T128 and T129 explained the Indonesian military infiltration into Sacalo, Tutuala. We were told that we were irresponsible and we were ordered to put down all of our things and hold up our arms. Then our waists were tied with ropes linking one another and we were taken to a pig-pen…

Only after we had been held in the pig-pen for nine months were we interrogated by adjunto T125 about the infiltration of ABRI and the capture of the Tutuala area. I answered that I knew nothing about these things. After that 27 of us were released and I was appointed the person in charge of the Renal at Marabia, Iliomar, to replace Tito Cristovão da Costa (Lere Anan Timor).[232]

237. Having a relationship, in whatever form, with people in the towns was regarded with suspicion by Fretilin. Miguel da Silva told the Commission that in 1976 he was arrested because he was accused of bringing food to his family in the village of Laritame (Ossu, Viqueque).[233]

* The "pig-pen" prisons were not structures formerly used to hold pigs. Rather they were usually improvised detention structures, sometimes similar in shape and size to a pig-pen, to hold detainees. The name "pig-pen" was adopted to refer to the fact that the detainees ate, slept and toileted in the cell like a pig in a pen.

238. Luis da Costa was a parish priest when Fretilin arrested him in May 1976 and again in November 1976. He was accused of contacting people in towns, and also of not supporting Fretilin ideology because of his role as a Catholic priest.

Detention of Father Luis da Costa

Luis da Costa became a priest in April 1974 and was stationed in Ossu (Viqueque). As a priest he was not a member of any political party. In 1976, when ABRI entered the Ossu region, Father Luis fled to the forest but kept up his pastoral work. He performed mass every Sunday, gave baptismal sacraments and taught the people about Catholicism. Father Locatelli in Quelicai was his contact for obtaining materials needed for the mass. However, his religious work was criticised by some in Fretilin and he was first arrested in April 1976:

Around Easter in April 1976…they took me to the Sagadate Command in a village in Laga. The Commander then was Paulino Gama (Mauk Moruk)…Abel Ximenes Larisina conducted the interrogation… He asked why we didn't sing revolutionary songs? I said: "There is a time to sing revolutionary songs and a time to sing church songs; we shouldn't mix them?"…Then after five days they left me to continue my activities.

Father Luis da Costa continued his pastoral work in Uatolari (Viqueque) and then Ossu (Viqueque). In May 1976, he was approached after the Easter mass by the secretary of Laga Zone (Baucau), João Maubere, who accused him of contacting Catholics in the town and of only teaching religion, not political ideology. It was not until December 1976, however, that Father Luis was arrested a second time, as part of the internal conflict between the Fretilin Central Committee and Aquiles Freitas*:

On 1 November 1976, we left our work because ABRI had entered the area from Quelicai [Baucau]. We ran with the community to Mount Kaebukaekami. We lived there and I performed mass as usual…Then they said there was to be a meeting between [Nicolau] Lobato and Aquiles Freitas on 2 December but it never happened. Instead they arrested everyone in Uabitae on the peak of Mount Matebian including me [and Aquiles Freitas, as part of an internal conflict in the eastern

* Aquiles Freitas was arrested by Fretilin with Ponciano Gomes in December 1976 and reportedly executed in January 1977 (see box on Luis da Costa above). According to Xanana Gusmão, Aquiles Freitas was a former Portuguese soldier and Fretilin commander who had his own loyal company in the border region of Timor-Leste. Although he was a supporter of independence, he did not support all of Fretilin's ideology. The CCF saw him as a threat and had him arrested and killed for being a reactionary. [Xanana Gusmão, To Resist is to Win, at p. 45].

*region]. We were arrested on the orders of the CCF [Comite Central da Fretilin, Fretilin Central Committee]. They took us first to Baguia where we were forced to work, cutting grass by hand for one week. Then they took us to Nahareka where they split us into two groups. Some went to Mount Girai, but my group of 14 people went to Cascol.

There I saw violations connected to the politics and the war that was going on around us. I saw that most of the people there were not leaders like Nicolau Lobato and Vicente Reis but little people. Most of them did not understand politics and demanded that people do things that weren't outlined in the political education. People were also often too scared to speak out because the soldiers with their weapons had the power…They didn't give us food because at that time there was no food. From a political point of view, their actions were called political rehabilitation for people who did not follow Fretilin's ideology…I often saw violations of human rights. Towards me they conducted interrogations but they didn't beat me, they just asked questions. They accused me of teaching people that Fretilin was communist.

On 23 December 1976, T132 read the detainees' sentences. Father Luis was not accused of any serious violation and was allowed to leave but with "conditional freedom". Others were accused of being traitors to the nation and were sentenced to death. Aquiles Freitas was sentenced to death for being a traitor and Father Luis heard that he was executed in January 1977. Following his release, Luis continued to perform his duties as a parish priest until he surrendered to ABRI in November 1977.[234]

239. Cooperating with the Indonesian military was considered a more serious violation by Fretilin leaders than contacting the military or planning to surrender. It therefore attracted a more severe punishment. Torture during interrogation and lengthy periods of detention were common when a person was accused of this offence.

240. António da Silva told the Commission about his arrest early in the Fretilin administration period. He was not tortured but was held in difficult conditions and for a long time:

In April 1976, my colleagues and I were captured in Ailemi Lohono in Uatolari Sub-district [Viqueque]. The names of my colleagues were Mausela, Mário Nascimento, Ernesto da Cruz, Alfredo da Cruz, João

* According to Xanana Gusmão, Cascol (Centre East Sector Commisariat) Naroman was the command set up by Vicente dos Reis (Sahe) the Political Commissar of Centre East Sector, west of Venilale (Baucau). [To Resist is to Win, pp. 29 and 44].

da Silva, Teotónio Sarmento da Silva, José de Araújo and Raguiel da Silva. We were arrested because…we were suspected of collaborating with the government and the Indonesian military. The CCF ordered the armed forces (Falintil) to come to my house and arrest me and my son Teotónio Sarmento da Silva. My son was about 14 or 15 years old then.

My son, our friends and I were arrested, tied up individually and then tied together in pairs. Then we were told to walk to the Zona [Sub-district] town, guarded closely until we arrived. I didn't recognise the Falintil soldiers…

The arrest was made on the orders of the Political Commissar T133… When we arrived at the Zona, we were interrogated one by one. Not all of us were interrogated in the same way; there were those who were tortured during interrogation, there were those who were interrogated but not tortured, and there were some who were interrogated and then killed, namely Francisco Xavier from Uatolari [Viqueque] and another from Mondelo, the village of Uaibobo [Ossu, Viqueque]. Both were civilians.[235]

241. Conduct on the battlefield could also be a test of loyalty to Fretilin. Gaspar Luis was wounded in the chest during a shoot-out with ABRI in August 1976, so he left the battlefield and went back to the headquarters. He was denounced as a traitor and put in a hole for two months in Nundamar Renal (Remexio, Aileu) on the orders of a senior member of Fretilin, T136, and a member of the CCF, T135. The political commissar, Mau Lear, ordered his release.[236]

Internal armed conflicts

242. Under increasing pressure from the encroaching Indonesian military, a number of splits developed in the Fretilin leadership. As a result many people were arrested and tortured for criticising one or other of the leaders. The Commission also heard of people being branded as reactionaries or traitors for criticising the leadership or for supporting a leader who was considered a reactionary or traitor. In several cases these people were executed (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

Conflict between Helio Pina and José da Silva, October 1976

243. An early internal dispute within the Fretilin leadership occurred between the political commissar of the Northern Front Sector, Helio Pina, and the Falintil chief-of-staff José da Silva in 1976 in Fatubessi (Ermera). Celestino de Carvalho Alves was detained as part of the dispute. He told the Commission that the conflict arose because Helio Pina and Commander Sebastião Sarmento sought to demote José da Silva to deputy chief-of-staff. According to Celestino, on 6 October 1976, company commander, José Soares, on the orders of José da Silva, brought Helio Pina by force to Fatubessi where they could resolve the dispute. However that night a group of men led by Commander Pedro Lemos from Leorema (Bazartete, Liquiçá) who supported Helio Pina, attacked Fatubessi. They succeeded in rescuing Helio Pina but several people died in the attack.[237] Celestino Alves, who was a Fretilin security officer in Fatubessi, ran with José Soares and 60 of his men to hide in Leorema. Before they reached their hiding place, they were captured by T137, a Falintil commander. They were held briefly in Leorema, and were then taken to Poerema (Ermera, Ermera) and imprisoned in an empty house:

> In Poerema we really experienced torture that was unusual. We were beaten, burned, tied so tightly that we could feel our blood stop flowing. And there were some who were taken out and killed. Also, some of us were tortured like Jesus Christ on a wooden cross. We were ordered to sleep in a place full of mud, or our bed was splashed with water to make it wet. They beat us with wood, a whip, bamboo and…they beat our bodies with pipes and iron. Until eventually we weren't aware of what was happening to us in detention…The sadism was extraordinary… We received no food during this time.[238]

244. Over the next year, they were moved between several different detention centres including Cailaco (Bobonaro) and Saugata (Maubara, Liquiçá). They moved as the Indonesian forces advanced. Some were killed, others died from the terrible conditions in which they were kept, including severe food shortages and lack of medicines. After one year only three people out of the 62 who had been captured were still alive. They were Celestino, José da Silva and another man named Jerónimo Albino da Silva. Then, one day in November 1977, they were called to Fatubessi to be interrogated by the commissar of the Northern Front Sector, T139. Celestino Alves told the Commission that during the interrogation T139 threatened him with a pistol, another weapon and a rope (for hanging him). They were detained in an Estufa (see below: Fretilin detention centres, Ermera par. 272-275) and from there, T139 at last released him.[239]

245. Jerónimo Albino da Silva also spoke to the Commission about his arrest in relation to the conflict between José da Silva and Helio Pina in the Northern Front Sector. He said there were many others detained with him, including: Celestino Alves (alias Sei Moris), José Soares, José da Silva, José Carvalho, Cornelio Soares, Alberto Babo, Afonso Araújo, Manuel Alves, Aparicio, Belarmino Alves, Bosco Araújo and Domingas Madeira. He described how he was arrested in Asulau/Sare (Hatolia, Ermera) for his association with José da Silva. Jerónimo da Silva confirmed that the detainees were heavily beaten, kicked and punched both at the time of arrest and in Poerema.[240] He was finally sent to the Saugata Renal where he stayed until ABRI attacked in February 1979.

246. Eduardo de Jesus Barreto told the Commission that about 40 detainees were executed as a result of the internal conflict between José da Silva and Helio Pina in October 1976.[241]

Disputes in Iliomar, Lautém, November 1976

247. The Commission was also told of the conflict between Francisco Hornay, who was a Falintil commander and an associate of Aquiles Freitas, and the Fretilin leaders in Iliomar Sub-district. According to Francisco Hornay's adopted son, Constantino, Francisco formed a group that was deemed "reactionary" in Iliomar because he did not agree with Fretilin's political ideology. The community of the village of Tirilolo (Iliomar, Lautém) told the story of these events.

Fretilin internal conflict in Iliomar, November 1976

In 1976 there was an internal conflict within Fretilin in Iliomar. The secretary of Iliomar Zone, Tomás Pinto (Lesamau), and the Falintil leader, Afonso Henrique, issued an order to arrest Francisco Ruas Hornay because one of his men, Mateus Oliveira, displayed indiscipline by shooting a coconut in Cacaven (Lospalos, Lautém) while coming back from Lospalos. Francisco Hornay made a self-criticism before the political commissar, Juvenal Inácio (Sera Key), in Akara (Iliomar, Lautém) and then followed Sera Key to Belta Trés to undergo justo correctivo for 14 days, while at the same time cleansing his mind of thoughts contrary to Fretilin ideology.

When he returned from Belta Trés, Francisco Hornay gave military training to the former Segunda Linha forces and youths at Larisoru-Mumu. Members of the CCF decided that the training had negative effects so closed it down. Then members of the CCF announced that all civilians must gather in one place to receive political education, which Hornay in turn disagreed with. Hornay was invited by the CCF to attend a meeting in Istasi, Fuat. He didn't go because he heard rumours that he was going to be arrested at the meeting. He also stopped people from two villages, Iliomar II and Tiriloro, from going. He sent 45 people to represent him led by Celestino Barreto and Bernardo Soares. Feeling unsafe, Hornay went to Uaibitae (Quelicai, Baucau) to ask for help from Aquiles Freitas. When he came back he had G-3 rifles, grenades and ammunition but, needing more ammunition, he told 12 of his men to take some from Uaritin, an ammunition depot in Iliomar.

Then Hornay sent two of his men, Celestino Barreto and Afonso Barreto, to meet with leaders from Iliomar such as Jeremias dos Reis and Gregório Pinto to try to resolve the conflict. The leaders were not there and Celestino and Afonso were arrested and Celestino was taken to Borutau (Iliomar). Hornay then sent his younger brothers Afonso Pinto and Silvino Ximenes to try to resolve the conflict. Both returned because the situation had become more tense and they had not been able to meet the leaders in Iliomar. Finally, Hornay himself went with his men to meet the leaders of Iliomar to discuss the misunderstanding that had developed. As the group reached Larisoru-Mumu (Lospalos, Lautém), Serafin Jeronimo shot at Hornay and Hornay returned fire. Hornay captured two of Serafin's men.

One week later, Hornay led an attack on both Sera Key's group and Fernando Txay, wounding a Falintil member and a civilian. Sera Key and Fernando Txay organised Falintil soldiers and civilians to form a barrier and pursue Hornay and his men on Mount Paitah (Iliomar). Hornay and 49 men with one G-3 weapon had escaped to Uato Carbau. Some of the civilians on Mount Paitah surrendered to the Sera Key and Fernando Txay groups. Nine people were detained and tortured by Sera Key's men. Another civilian, Orlando da Costa, was distressed at the treatment of the detainees and went to see Fernando Txay to tell the commander that he must go as soon as possible or all the detainees would be killed.

About a week after meeting Orlando, Fernando Txay led people from four villages to Uato Carbau to capture Hornay and his men. Before reaching the Hornay group, they heard that Paulo Hornay had been captured and killed by T155, commander of Fade (Forca da Defesa, also known as Armas Brancas [see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy]. Then commanders including Fernando Txay, Tito Cristovão da Costa (Lere Anan Timor), Tomás Pinto (Lesamau) and others entered Kulaldere (Uato Carbau) and captured 75 people from the Hornay group. All were bound and taken to Tailoi-Caentau (Iliomar).

In Iliomar the detainees were tortured and hung from house poles. They screamed out in pain until the Fretilin leaders T813, T143 and T814, and their Falintil counterparts T815, T144, T816 and T817 decided that if the detainees were not going to be interrogated they might as well be killed. However, if they were to go through some kind of interrogation process they should not be tortured.

On 17 November 1976, it was decided that eight people would be executed in Kakinatar, Loré (Lautém): among these were António Oliveira, Oscar Ferreira, Angelo Pinto, António Soares, Silvino Ximenes, Julio Ximenes, Libertino Bastos, and Bernardo Soares. Those accused of less serious violations were required to undergo justo correctivo for two months in Cacaven. There they had to make salt, cut sago trees and make sago flour. Children who had not done anything wrong were told to go home but their freedom was restricted.

Then Francisco Hornay, together with Duarte Ximenes Pinto, José Nunes, Dinis de Castro, Manuel Sarmento and Marcos Pinto, were captured in Quelicai and taken to Iliomar. The six prisoners were not interrogated but were executed immediately in Muapepeh (Iliomar, Lautém).[242]

248. Francisco Hornay's son Constantino was around 11 years old when he and other members of his family were among those arrested by a Fretilin commander T142 and Fretilin member T143 in Uato Carbau in November 1976. He told the Commission:

> We were captured at dawn. We were taken back to Iliomar and tied up in a place called Sailari and then put into a pig-pen…after that we were investigated. First the leaders and then the little people. So they interrogated me at the end, after about four or five days. They kept us tied up and each day we received one meal. They tied us with black rope and ordinary rope, in three layers and then put us in bamboo stocks. Then in turn we were interrogated by a Falintil member called T144, the operational commander. He interrogated me that morning. Senior Falintil commanders T145 and T146 also interrogated me. After that I was released on the condition that I work in the kitchen, draw water…look for firewood and look after the buffalo.[243]

Dispute between Francisco Xavier do Amaral and the CCF, September 1977

249. The most well-known and serious dispute within the Fretilin leadership occurred when the founding president of Fretilin, Francisco Xavier do Amaral, was accused of treason towards the Resistance struggle and deposed. The conflict occurred in the context of a mounting food, health and security crisis, which was causing increasing civilian deaths in the Resistance bases, and with the Indonesian military drawing nearer. Francisco Xavier do Amaral was of the opinion that the people should be allowed to surrender and continue the struggle from the towns and villages, but the majority of the members of the CCF opposed this course.[244] The conflict created an atmosphere of mutual distrust within the Fretilin leadership and resulted in the arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment of many of Amaral's associates and supporters.

The detention and torture of Francisco Xavier do Amaral

Francisco Xavier do Amaral spoke to the Commission about his arrest and detention for his views on the future of the struggle:

> There began to be divergence within Fretilin. We had begun to divide between ourselves. Some said that the doctrine [of Fretilin] was not right. Some said that the doctrine was right but people weren't following it properly. Some said it was good. We began to lose our trust in each other… From this they arrested me, put me in prison and accused me…that I had sent the people to surrender so that in the future when I surrendered to Indonesia they would give me a position as a general or a minister. This was the argument of those who were against me.[245]

Xavier do Amaral described to the Commission his arrest in September 1977 and his subsequent detention:

All the members of the CCF decided on the arrest. I was asleep in Mindelo near Orsanako [Turiscai, Manufahi]. I woke up to Alarico [Fernandes] yelling and holding a pistol to my ear. He was saying: "Traitor, you are arrested!" It was Alarico's idea, he was the one who reported me as having anti-revolutionary ideas. This had been a problem since I had returned from Mozambique [in 1975]…I had offered to hand the position to Alarico…[but] they [the members of the CCF] knew that if I stood down they would lose the trust of the masses in the bases. Maybe that problem had gone on until finally I was arrested…

Apart from pointing a pistol at me, no other physical abuse was done to me then. They took me to Aikurus [Remexio, Aileu], but first we went around through Soibada [Manatuto], the village of Fatu Makerek in the village of Laclubar [Manatuto] and then back to Turiscai [Manufahi]…I wasn't tortured on the journey, just abused with words such as "Speak, you traitor to the nation, reactionary!" The journey took about a month.

When I arrived at Aikurus, I was tried by the CCF. They accused me of being a traitor to the nation and surrendering the people. Alarico was the one who accused me…[But] everyone was there, like Nicolau [Lobato], Vicente Reis [Sahe], Juvenal Inácio [Sera Key]. They all accused me, but through Alarico because he was the minister for the interior and security. Their decision was that I be sent to the Central-East Sector. I was sent with 20 others, including Diogo Moniz.

As to the torture I experienced while I was in detention, I was burned with hot metal by T90. All of the CCF…were there watching.

No one paid attention to [things like food, water and clothing]. If you were going to die, you were hungry, it was your business. I got food from the guards but it was because they pitied me, not because the CCF ordered them to. Many prisoners died, maybe 75%. When I was detained about 50 people were detained with me but every day four or five people died. If they couldn't walk they were killed. In the end only about five survived.

Amaral was moved continually to escape the Indonesian military:

In Uaimori [Viqueque] I was held in a hole. When we arrived in a place, the prisoners would be ordered to dig their own holes…Sometimes we'd stay one week, sometimes two weeks in one place, because we were always being chased by ABRI.

In October 1978, when the group was on the south coast of Viqueque, the camp was surrounded by ABRI and although he tried to escape, Amaral was captured by Infantry Battalion 744.[246]

250. As well as Xavier do Amaral suffering torture, many of his friends and supporters were arrested and tortured for their association with him. In his autobiography Xanana Gusmão describes the torture suffered by Adão Amaral, José dos Santos, Pedro Sanches, Gil Fernandes, Raul dos Santos, Victor Gandara, José da Conceição, Dinis Carvalho and Andrade Sarmento, and how he intervened to put an end to it. He described the effect of the torture on Pedro Sanches: "His body had been burnt, and his breath smelt nauseating. We feared for his life."[247]

251. Several witness statements were received by the Commission about the arrests of suspected supporters of Xavier do Amaral. Domingos Maria de Andrade gave a statement to the Commission describing his arrest and ill-treatment, when he was beaten, kicked and threatened with a bayonet by Fretilin soldiers, T151 and T152 in 1978 in Mindelo (Turiscai, Manufahi). He said that he was humiliated in front of many people and accused of being a traitor. He was detained for one month and during that time received only sweet potato skins and food-scraps to eat.[248]

252. Domingas Araújo Sarmento told the Commission about the arrest and torture of her husband, Alberto Viteho, in the village of Fatisi (Laulara, Aileu):

> I met my husband Alberto who was a courier for Xavier [do Amaral]. Not long after, Fretilin forces appeared and immediately arrested my husband and took his clothes off. Then they ordered him to wear a sarong and they took us to Trassu where they hung him from a coconut tree and hit him and tortured him until he was bleeding. They [Falintil] threatened me that if I told people about this they would kill me.[249]

253. Thomás Araújo, a senior commander of the Turiscai Zone between 1975 and 1977, was arrested in a meeting of the CCF in Tutuluru (Same, Manufahi) in September 1977 in connection with the case of Francisco Xavier do Amaral. He was arrested with several others and was detained for 27 days in Aikurus (Remexio, Aileu) and for three months in Fatubessi (Hatolia, Ermera) together with eight of his friends. Of the nine people detained in Fatubessi, two were executed, Domingos and Mário Bonifacio.[250]

254. Feliciano Soares, a former Fretilin member, told the Commission that he was arrested in December 1977 on suspicion of meeting the Nothern Front commander, Martinho Soares, who was loyal to Xavier do Amaral, and telling people to surrender.* He was taken to Abat (Fatubessi, Ermera) on the orders of the Northern Front Commissariat. There he was interrogated by T153 and Assistente T154 but was not tortured. He was detained for two months.[251]

* The Fretilin commander Martinho Soares was detained at the same time as Feliciano Soares and also held in Abat. He disappeared [see CAVR, Case Summary 902: Martinho Soares, 2003].

255. Januario Faria told the Commission that he was arrested in Caicasa (Fatuberliu, Manufahi) by Fretilin and interrogated about having contacted Xavier do Amaral with a view to surrendering. He was not tortured but was detained in Caicasa with other prisoners including Father Mariano (see par. 293, below).[252]

256. Grasindo Mariano was arrested by Fretilin commander T155 and Fretilin member T157 in Tutuluro (Same, Manufahi) on 11 September 1976 and accused of being a supporter of Xavier do Amaral. He was detained in the Bubulau Church, Tutuluro (Same, Manufahi) for two months, and then moved to Fahinehan (Fatuberliu, Manufahi) where he worked in the gardens for eight months.[253]

Enforcing discipline

257. Fretilin detained people to discipline or to punish breaches of Fretilin rules within the Fretilin Resistance bases. The Commission also heard of torture and ill-treatment of those detainees, particularly later in the period.

258. Ijaias da Costa told the Commission that he was forcibly recruited to Falintil. One night in 1976 in Remexio (Aileu), he was assigned night duty but because he was not used to operating a weapon he accidentally fired his gun. He was punished by being detained for two days without food by Samarusa Company.[254]

259. In 1977, Natalino de Andrade, a Fretilin soldier, did not report for work in Remexio (Aileu) for two days. The platoon commander ordered the zone secretary, T147 and two other Fretilin members, T148 and another person, to arrest him. They tied him up and then beat and kicked him for about one hour. He was detained for four months.[255]

260. Other people were detained if they looked for food outside the Fretilin delineated zones. Henrique Pinto stated that in Dilor (Viqueque) Fretilin allowed civilians to live and work the land in certain zones, while other zones were marked with red lines to denote war zones. Civilians who wanted to enter those zones had to get permission. However, many civilians were caught in the forbidden zones when they were looking for food. The Fretilin troops tolerated these violations once or twice, but if civilians were caught repeatedly they could be arrested and detained. Because of the critical condition of food supplies and the prevalence of sickness and disease at that time many detainees died in Dilor. Pinto stated there was no logistical section to look after the basic needs of the detainees.[256]

261. Mariano Meneses was arrested three times because he did not want to be a member of Falintil. He told the Commission that he was interrogated and made to work in the gardens but was not tortured.[257] Horacio Mendonça told the Commission that he was detained for ten days in 1977 by a senior CCF member, T40, in a horse stable because he criticised Falintil troops who were taking cassava belonging to civilians. He said that he was not tortured while in detention.[258]

262. On 19 June 1977 a regional commander, T149, assigned Jaime da Costa, a section commander, to guard detainees in Laclo (Manatuto). One night Jaime da Costa fell asleep and a prisoner escaped. The regional commander ordered that he be taken to Aikurus (Remexio, Aileu). At night he was put in a hole and in the morning he was taken out and given food. He was detained for one year and four months. Jaime da Costa told the Commission that he was not tortured in detention, but that he was forced to work the land, planting cassava and vegetables; with the produce given to the Fretilin command.[259]

263. Not following the order of a commander was also grounds for punishment. For example, Silveiro Trindade told the Commission that in April 1978 he and his friend Alarico Trindade, both Fretilin members in the village of Matata (Railaco, Ermera), were called to the hiding place of Falintil commanders Mau Brani and Mau Buti. When they did not attend the meeting, a platoon of Falintil soldiers was sent for them. T141, one of the soldiers in the platoon, tied the victims with bamboo ropes, submerged them under water and then detained them for two weeks in a "chicken coop". While they were in detention, T155 beat them with a stick of wood.[260]

Renals and other Fretilin detention centres

264. Statements provided to the Commission describe detention in both ordinary detention centres and in Renals, although in many cases the line between the two is unclear. There were several types of detention places in Renals. The Commission identified at least two types. First, a hole in the ground covered with wooden bars or by a wooden plank with a large rock on top of it, or covered over with dirt. These holes varied in size. Some were only 80 centimetres in height, forcing prisoners to sit on the floor, and some four metres deep, such as the holes in Nundamar Renal in Remexio.[261] Second, a detention centre above the ground surrounded by a wall of stones stacked two to three metres high.[262]

265. Marito Reis told the Commission that during 1976-77, Vicente Reis (Sahe) travelled through sub-districts in the Centro Leste sector to explain to Falintil commanders that prisoners were not to be killed but should be rehabilitated. Detainees were at that time being held in extreme conditions. In Laleia (Manatuto) for example, Marito Reis said that he saw people detained in a hole in the ground covered in bamboo and soil with only a tiny bamboo pipe for people to breathe through. He said that Renals were established around July–August 1977.* The first Renal was built in Centro Leste sector in a place called Ai-Manas Rai near Lacluta (Viqueque). The land was fertile there and Fretilin did not have to flee, for the time being, from the Indonesian forces.[263] The Commission was told that the Renals were established in Fretilin Resistance bases in each sector as part of the revolutionary strategy:[264]

> The principles behind the establishment of the Renals were that education should continue even in time of revolution and that people who did not follow the party line or breached disciplinary rules could be "rehabilitated".

* Compare António Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, who said that Renals were established in 1976 after the Soibada Conference in May of that year. The first Renal, according to Antonio Guterres, was the Nundamar Renal in Remexio, Aileu (see box par. 288 below). [CAVR Interview with António Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 11 December 2003].

266. The stated principles behind Renals were "Lutar, Aprender e Produzir" or "Struggle, Study and Produce". Detainees were formed into farming cooperatives, supposedly operated in an ethos of equality, social support and cooperation. As well as providing education on literacy and political ideology, it was thought that detainees with thoughts or opinions that were not in accord with the concepts and strategy of Fretilin and its ideology or the ideology of struggle would be "rehabilitated" to support the revolution.

267. During the day detainees would work in the fields and in the evenings they heard lectures on politics. The produce from Renals was divided between Falintil and civilians. A typical timetable in a Renal was work between 8.00am and 4.00pm with a one-hour break for lunch; then at 4.00pm detainees would bathe and listen to political education given by the adjunto or the political commissar.[265]

268. In theory, therefore, Renals were quite different to ordinary prisons, but in practice the difference was not so great. People were deprived of their liberty and often for an indefinite period, until they were deemed "rehabilitated" and supportive of Fretilin and the revolution.[266] The Commission also heard numerous reports of torture and ill-treatment of detainees in Renals, as well as of executions. In addition, the encroachment of Indonesian forces meant that the population could not grow crops, and food was scarce. Many people died in Fretilin detention, both in Renals and in ordinary prisons, of hunger and illness. António Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, who attended the Soibada Conference in 1976, explained:

> When a person came under suspicion, he had to go to a Renal to undergo rehabilitation. They received political education on revolutionary politics. Many people did not like revolutionary politics with its communist ideology [but] Fretilin…implemented it by force. Fretilin leaders often said that reactionaries were taken to a Renal to be educated. But many were tortured or killed in the Renals. Some who were detained in a Renal were released. Some died of hunger.[267]

269. Also, because Renals were overseen by the political commissars in charge of the particular sector, and the military situation was different in different sectors, conditions varied between Renals.[268] In some Renals conditions were quite good, whereas in others the Commission heard of regular torture and ill-treatment of prisoners and of many deaths due to hunger and disease.

270. The Commission identified several reasons for the release of detainees from Renals or from other Fretilin/Falintil detention centres. Detainees could escape, or be freed following intervention from a leader. It could also happen that when the Indonesian military attacked a Fretilin/Falintil stronghold, which also housed detainees, the detainees could free themselves when their gaolers fled. Sometimes detainees were captured by ABRI during such an attack and then freed.

271. The following are witness statements received by the Commission about detention in both detention centres and Renals in the districts of Lautém, Viqueque, Manufahi, Aileu and Ermera.

Ermera

272. The Commission received 49 reports of Fretilin/Falintil members detained by Fretilin in the district of Ermera, the highest number in the territory. It also heard of civilians detained by Fretilin/Falintil. Not all of these detentions were in detention centres or Renals, some people were simply deprived of their liberty and held in any convenient place. António Malibere, for example, told the Commission that he was held in a cave in Lauana (Letefoho, Ermera) for four days by a Falintil commander, T121.[269]

273. In 1977, there was a Renal constructed in Fatubessi. Adriano João, former Fretilin political assistant in Cailaco (Bobonaro) told the Commission about the treatment of detainees:

> Some were beaten, both hands tied then put in the underground prison, given food once a day, sometimes no food for a day. Some died of sickness and hunger.[270]

274. One of the prisons in Ermera was unique, the Estufa in Abat (Fatubessi, Ermera). The Estufa, according to Celestino Alves, was built by the Portuguese to burn rubber sap. It was very dark, narrow and had no holes for fresh air to enter. Only three people could be held in the Estufa at one time and even then they had to sit with their legs "interleaved like crosses". They could not stretch their legs out, stand up or move. Celestino was held in the Estufa with Commander José Soares and Jeronimo Albino by Political Commissar T139 in November 1977 (see section on Conflict between Helio Pina and José da Silva, October 1976, par. 243-246, above).

275. The three men were held in the Estufa day and night and were allowed out only once a day at most. They received food only once a day and in very small amounts, such as a small piece of cassava each or a plate of boiled corn between three people. Celestino told the Commission that they did not know if they were going to live or die. They were held in the Estufa for about one month when Helio Pina released them.[271]

Viqueque

276. The headquarters of the Central East Sector was in Viqueque. Fretilin's Political Commisariat, Cascol, was the most ideologically innovative of all of the sectoral commissariats. The Commission heard of a number of prisons and Renals in the district.

277. Clementino da Silva told the Commission that he was arrested, tied and taken to Nahareka (Ossu, Viqueque) because he was accused of making contact with his family in the town. He was held in Nahareka for six weeks and then Uailaba for six weeks. While in detention he was given instruction in Fretilin ideology in the Centro de Formação Politica (Ceforpol).[272]

278. António da Silva told the Commission that he was accused of collaborating with the Indonesian military in order to surrender. He was arrested in April 1976 and taken to Zona 15 de Augusto at Ailemimi (Lohono, Uatolari, Viqueque) and placed in a pig-pen. He said that the pens were made of stones piled two to three metres high, and that ten people were held in each pen. He also said that prisoners received only one meal a day, but that he was forced to cook and take food to Falintil on the battlefield. Antonio also told of how he was forced to attend political education classes at the Centro de Formação Politica. António was detained until November 1978, and surrendered when the Resistance base was destroyed.[273]

279. Paulo da Costa told the Commission that there was a large Fretilin prison in Uaimori (Viqueque) which was operated between 1976 and mid-1979, before ABRI attacked and occupied the area. Large holes were dug in the ground and the space divided into a number of holding cells. "Three-month" cells were for people accused of being "two-faced" (pretending to be loyal to Fretilin but actually working for the Indonesians). In these cells detainees received only one meal a day but were released after three months. Paulo da Costa told the Commission that a third group, whose violations were "too serious", were killed, either by being fed salty water or by being shot. The Commission has not been able to confirm this practice of a tiered system of cells.[274] According to other sources, Uaimori was a Renal that was known for successfully rehabilitating people. For that reason, Francisco Xavier do Amaral was held there.[275]

280. The community of Baulale in Irabin de Baixo Village (Uato Carbau, Viqueque) said that Fretilin/Falintil frequently arrested people on suspicion of being Indonesian spies and held them in pig-pens. Detainees were then interrogated while tied with horse ropes. Informants told the Commission that one detainee named Paulo Fernandes died because he was tied too tightly, that three others were executed, but that Xanana Gusmão freed the remaining detainees when he visited Baulale.[276]

281. Xanana Gusmão told the Commission that the Renal in Ulusu (Uatolari, Viqueque) operated on the principle that it should provide education in literacy and politics and allow detainees to grow food crops. Xanana Gusmão said that the Renal under his charge even produced abundant crops, but when the enemy attacked the area, they destroyed them all. People accused of being reactionaries or traitors were arrested and put in the Ulusu Renal. Detainees had relative freedom and could get permission to visit their homes or have their families visit them in the Renal.[277]

282. Cipriano da Cruz described being arrested and tied-up by Fretilin with seven members of his family in 1977 and taken to a Renal in Uatolari (Viqueque), probably the Ulusu Renal. They were kept in a hole for six months before Xanana ordered the release of all 280 people held in the Renal.[278]

Lautém

283. Fretilin also maintained several detention centres in the district of Lautém, used for holding people suspected of treason, of being reactionary, of associating with leaders who were under suspicion or of other offences. They include Belta Trés in Irara (Fuiloro, Lospalos), a pig-pen prison in the sub-district of Loré, Besi

Manas (Hot Iron) Prison in the sub-district of Luro, and another pig-pen prison that became the Marabia Renal in Iliomar. Statements from former detainees in these prisons and Renals provide a detailed description of life as a Fretilin prisoner in this period.

284. Orlando Silva Correia Belo (Fernando So) told the Commission about conditions in three different pig-pen prisons in the district of Lautém in 1976, before the establishment of the Renals:

> We were not beaten, but we had to…keep our arms up because the rope was still around our waists and necks. After one month of imprisonment in the pig-pen at Belta Trés, Irara, we were moved to a pig-pen at Loré. While we were detained we were given food once a day …Sometimes we washed once in two weeks. After two months we were moved to Iliomar.
>
> In Iliomar, detainees were divided into three groups. Each pig-pen had nine people. Our food was similar to Belta Trés and Loré. We ate sago, tips of palm leaves, maize and cassava.[279]

285. Gaspar Seixas, the former zone vice-secretary of Iliomar from 1975 to 1977 told the Commission that he saw many people detained in Renals. He said:

> Activities in the Renal usually involved working in the rice-fields or gardens during the day and being taken back to the prison at night under heavy guard by Falintil soldiers. The produce was given to Falintil…and also to people who did not have enough food. As well as work, detainees were given political education on Fretilin ideology and the principles of the struggle. Adjunto Lere Anan Timor gave these lessons in the Iliomar camp.[280]

286. Modesto de Jesus Sanches told the Commission about his time in the Besi Manas Prison in 1978:

> If we were lucky, we had between nine and twelve corn kernels per day per person and we drank only water. Because we [received so little] we were very happy when it was our turn to fetch firewood because we could eat leaves that we found on the way. Usually five people were sent to fetch firewood at a time, with a rope connecting their waists one to another…two metres apart, and the Falintil soldier who guarded us held the end of the rope. If…one of us saw a candlenut in the river, he ran to get [it], forcing everyone tied to him to be dragged along and fall on top of each other. We secretly wanted to laugh but, because we were hungry, we just did everything we could to eat.
>
> One day our place was bombed by the enemy's warplanes. Adjunto T125 came to us and said that all of us were traitors. He ordered one of his men to get a big stick and then he approached Cristovão Lopes and hit Cristovão across the head several times, killing him on the spot. I saw with my own eyes how the guard hit him [until he was] dead then dragged him off to be buried. Another victim was Julião, who dropped dead next to me of starvation. He was given no food because he was suspected of being an enemy spy.

In June 1978, when Adjunto Xanana visited Luro he ordered his members to undo the ties that bound our hands and legs. We were told to sit outside in the sun. Then we were told to have a wash and a haircut. Our bodies were infested with dog fleas and lice, because for six weeks we had not been allowed to wash. Xanana himself took us and brought us over to our families in Iliomar. While I was imprisoned in Besi Manas, my wife, my four children, my nephew, and my mother were put in the Marabia Renal in Iliomar to work.[281]

287. Horacio de Conceição Savio was part of the same group of detainees as Modesto Sanches, and he told the Commission a similar story:

In 1978, I was arrested together with João Vienas, Alcino Savio, Cristovão Lopes, Julião Cacavei, Mário Amaral, Felix da Conceição, and Bernardino...Commander T156 and his men arrested us in Iliomar and we were taken to the Besi Manas Prison in Luro. There…we were hit on the face and beaten across the head with their guns until our bodies were swollen, cut and bleeding.

The Fade troops kept beating and kicking us and we were hung up on a pole in the heat of the day for nine days, from 8.00am until 4.00pm, when they took us down and put us into the prison cells again. But our hands were tied behind our backs. While we were hanging, they kept beating us. The people who beat us included Commander T156, Adjunto T156 [sic, ed.], T125 and T159. We were given food but very little and only once a day. If we wanted to go to the toilet we had to get permission, but were still guarded by the Fade troops. We were told to work in the rice-fields. When Adjunto Xanana visited the Besi Manas Prison, after about a month of detention, we were released.[282]

Aileu

288. The main Renal in Timor-Leste, Nundamar, was in the sub-district of Remexio in Aileu. Nundamar was Fretilin's model rehabilitation camp for implementing Fretilin ideology, but it was also the Renal most notorious for serious human rights violations. Xanana Gusmão told the Commission that there were cases of inhuman treatment of detainees including beatings and burnings using red-hot wood, and that this was witnessed by Political Commissar Sera-Key.[283]

The Nundamar Renal in Remexio, Aileu

The Nundamar National Rehabilitation Camp was the first Renal established by the CCF. Set up in Remexio (Aileu),[284] it was the largest and most important of the Renals. The CCF built Nundamar as a model for putting CCF political ideology into practice. It had literacy programmes, political awareness lectures and economic development programmes for its detainees, who included ordinary civilians, Fretilin members and Falintil forces.[285] Xanana Gusmão told the Commission that the Political Commissioner Sera-Key visited Nundamar to study the methods applied in the Nundamar Renal before he established Renals in the Central East Sector.

Adjunto Sebastião Montalbão (Lais) was appointed by the CCF as the main person responsible for the Nundamar Renal. "Lais" is the abbreviation of "Localização da Administraçâo e Informação Serviços Secretos".[286] José Manuel dos Santos told the Commission that about 300 people were imprisoned in the Nundamar Renal between 1977 and 1978. Nundamar was closed on 28 May 1978 when it came under Indonesian military attack. José Manuel dos Santos was a detainee in Nundamar, and told the Commission:

I was arrested by a Falintil platoon under the command of the sector commander, T160, because I refused to become a company commander in the Central Northern Sector. Originally my position was the Assistant Company Commander for the Central East Sector (Colaborador Comandante Compania Sektor Centro Leste). After being arrested I was taken to see Sector Commander T160, who said that I was a reactionary because I refused to accept their decision. I was detained in the Nundamar Renal. At Nundamar I was beaten by hand…and lashed with a whip (chicote da liberdade)…I did not count how many times I was whipped, but it lasted a long time.

Then those of us who were detained, including Zacarias, Mário Mesquita, Marcelino, Gaspar, Alexio, António and Maurubi from Laclubar, were forced to cut large pieces of wood and bring them back to the Nundamar Renal. I was told to make salt on the beach at Metinaro [Dili] for two weeks. After the wife of Political Commissar Mau Lear saw me, I was ordered to become a nurse and to treat civilians and Falintil soldiers. I treated detainees in Nundamar Renal, but on my own initiative…I was held as a prisoner until the Nundamar Renal was attacked by the Indonesian military.[287]

Killing and torture of detainees

Some detainees were beaten to death. José Manuel dos Santos told the Commission of the deaths of a number of prisoners, including:

Martino Mesquita who was beaten first by hand and then beaten to death by T162 with a rice pestle on 5 December 1977; Afonso Araújo and Leki Mau, both from Metinaro (Dili); Mauloco from Ailok (East Dili); Beremau from Daralau (East Dili); and a young man (unidentified) from Hera (Dili).[288] He also gave evidence that Domingos Dulas, from Maubisse (Hato Builico, Ainaro), was shot dead on 17 February 1977 in Nundamar.[289]

Some detainees in Nundamar were taken outside and executed: Zacarias and Maria Fatima were reportedly both executed in Aldeia 8, in the village of Liurai, on 8 March 1977. José Manuel dos Santos told the Commission that a hole was dug and then the two prisoners were tied together with a rope around their necks and waists and shot, their bodies falling into the hole.[290]

José Manuel dos Santos also told the Commission that torture and ill-treatment of detainees was a common occurrence in Nundamar. He said that detainees were beaten with sticks, iron bars, lengths of bamboo, or with a whip known as the chicote da liberdade (whip of freedom). These whips were made of plaited buffalo skin, similar to whips commonly used on horses and buffaloes, and were about 80 centimetres long.[291] José Manuel dos Santos told the Commission that a number of people commonly used the whips on prisoners, including: Commander T163, T162, Company Commander T165, T166, T167, T168, T169, T170, T171, T174, T175, T176, and Secretary T177. This group of people were the chief agents of T136 (a senior member of the CCF).

Other forms of torture and ill-treatment included burning prisoners' bodies with cigarette butts or with iron rods heated in fire or putting them in a hole in the ground. In the Nundamar Renal there were two such holes, one in the shape of the letter "E" and the other like the letter "U". They were about three metres deep. The holes were covered in layers – first big logs were laid crosswise, then split bamboo and finally dirt was shovelled on top. There was one door to each hole with a ladder that detainees used to climb in and out.

Conditions in the Renal

During the day the prison leaders' time was filled by work such as political education for the people or meetings, and the evenings were filled with entertainment, such as dances. José Manuel dos Santos told the Commission that T136 and his men would get drunk at the dances on palm wine and then quite arbitrarily decide to arrest and beat people with the chicote da liberdade and throw them into the hole.[292] He said that on one occasion, when there was a party, he saw T136 and his men get drunk and without any clear reason beat Luis Barros so hard that his head was seriously wounded.

Prisoners' movements were severely restricted. José Manuel Monteiro, the man in charge of the Nundamar Renal, acknowledged to the Commission that detainees could not lie down in the holes, they could only sit or stand up and that even then they had to cross their legs due to the confined space. Detainees who were going to be executed were not let out of the underground holes.[293]

Reasons for detention in Nundamar

Those held by Fretilin in the Nundamar Renal were considered traitors. However, José Manuel dos Santos told the Commission that there was no clear investigative process to prove such allegations. There was also no process of self-criticism or justo correctivo in Nundamar because of the seriousness of the allegations. Conditions for prisoners considered traitors were especially harsh. The Commission received statements suggesting that medical treatment for those who were ill was withheld due to their political status, and that the sick were forced to continue working in communal farms. As the detainees were considered traitors, there was also no room for terms such as illness or other excuses. Everyone had to work in the gardens or rice-fields even when they were sick.

When working in the fields detainees who were categorised as having committed serious offences were tied by the waist to one another, two to three metres apart and guarded by Fretilin/Falintil soldiers. José Manuel dos Santos said that in the first months of his detention the workers received water from the guards when they were thirsty.[294] However after Xavier do Amaral was detained, detainees were not given water unless the Falintil member who guarded them was kind-hearted. Both José Manuel dos Santos and José Monteiro told the Commission that this deprivation caused many detainees to become sick and die.[295]

The guards at Nundamar treated women no differently to men, especially in relation to work. For example Lucia Osório Soares, the wife of Xavier do Amaral, had her head shaved and was forced to work in the Renal.

Food and drink

Food consisted of the skin of buffalo, horse or goat cut into small pieces and mixed with cassava or jackfruit and vegetables such as the leaves of wild taro. This mixture was cooked and each detainee received two large spoonfuls. If boiled cassava was given to the prisoners, each detainee received one piece. The meat from the slaughtered animals was given to the man in charge of the Renal and his men, or sent to other members of the CCF who lived in the Central Northern Sector.[296] José Manuel dos Santos said that the food was not sufficient and many people died of hunger and disease. One group of civilians brought from Ilimanu (Laclo, Manatuto) including men, women and children, almost all died of hunger or illness, or were killed.[297]

Movement of detainees between Renals

According to José Manuel dos Santos, prisoners were moved frequently between Renals. Detainees were brought to Nundamar from the prisons in Laclo and Laclubar (Manatuto), Laulara (Aileu) and other sectors. Most of the civilians brought by force from Ilimanu (Laclo) including men women and children died of hunger and disease. Most died of hunger but some were executed. The Commission also heard from José Manuel dos Santos that goods belonging to detainees, such as gold jewellery, clothing and other articles, were seized by T136 and given to the men close to him, and that T136 said: "Fogo aos Traidores, Abaixo aos traidores!" (Shoot all traitors, down with all traitors!).[298]

289. Maria Fatima Pinto also told the Commission:

> At that time we were attending a party. About 3.00am, they [Fretilin members of the Central Northern Sector Base B, Laulara Zona, Aileu] said the party had to end because "there are traitors among us". That morning they…arrested me and several others.
>
> We were taken to the Nundamar Renal, Remexio. I was interrogated about things that Maria Goreti sent such as oil, medicines and clothes. I had received those things and I handed them over to João da Silva Godinho, who handed them over to Nicolau Lobato. Because there was no clear information, I was held in the Renal hole for two days with a friend, Maria Antonia of Laclo. I was released by Nicolau Lobato, because there was no proof of my wrongdoing.
>
> I continued to be punished in the Renal for three months. While in detention we were told to work in the gardens and in the rice-fields. In 1978 Fretilin members killed many detainees by throwing grenades into the holes.[299]

290. In the Nundamar Renal in 1978 Fretilin set up a place for holding children known as the crèche. Children kept in the crèche were children of Fretilin detainees aged between two and five years old and at times numbered more than 50 children.[300] According to Maria Antónia, one of the detainees charged with caring for the children in the crèche, all of the children in the crèche died, including the two children of Francisco Xavier do Amaral. She said that they suffered malnutrition from the poor quality food they received and that they washed only with water, not soap.[301]

291. Raul da Costa witnessed the mistreatment and killing of detainees kept in the Nundamar Renal and Erluli and other killings committed by Fretilin because at that time he was deputy commander of the Remexio Zone. He gave evidence of torture meted out by Fretilin on detainees in the Renal, including on Francisco Xavier do Amaral, who according to him was tortured by having burning embers put on his chest.[302]

The detention of Ambulan

Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan) was a Fretilin zone secretary arrested in Liquidoe (Aileu). He was taken to Erluli (Remexio, Aileu) because he was accused of being a member of Xavier do Amaral's group. Ambulan was called a traitor and then tortured by the Fretilin adjunto, T187, and a CCF member, T90, including being hung up and beaten. Almost all parts of his body were beaten by hand or with wood, and he was also kicked. Ambulan told the Commission that T90 interrogated him in front of several ministers in the Fretilin administration including Mau Lear, Hata, Mau Kruma, Sahe, Nicolau Lobato and Afonso Rendentor. T90 asked whether Ambulan was a bodyguard of Xavier. Ambulan answered that he was. Ambulan was tortured again by T187 and T90. T187 hit Ambulan with a piece of wood until the wood broke in his hand. T187 took another piece of wood. He beat Ambulan until he had broken three pieces of wood. Then he took a last piece of wood, which had a burning tip, and he used it to burn Ambulan's skin. Ambulan says that many people were executed in public and T90 said that this was to warn the public and other detainees not to do the same thing.

Ambulan says that one day in 1977, T90 showed a letter which, according to T90, had been sent by the people of Liquidoe. The content of the letter was that Ambulan was not allowed to return to Liquidoe. It was thought that the letter was written by T90 and T132. However in the letter there were names such as Gaspar, Mateus, Lequiboe, António, Mau João, Berleke and Bernardo. Based on that letter Ambulan was placed in an underground hole. In that hole Ambulan stayed with João Bosco, his friend. Ambulan was imprisoned there for one and a half months. Ambulan was detained with Xavier do Amaral for one week before he was moved to Fatubessi (Ermera). Ambulan was taken to Fatubessi together with nine other detainees: Luis Koto from Uatolari (Viqueque), Mário Bonifacio from Laclo (Manatuto), Hermenegildo from Maubisse (Hato Builico, Ainaro), José Sabere and Diego from Fahinehan (Fatuberliu, Manufahi), and Thomás, Domingos, Unkoli and Nuno from Turiscai (Manufahi).

Ambulan says that of the ten, five were put in a special cell then killed after the Indonesian military carried out a massive attack. The five detainees who were killed were Luis Koto, Mário Bonifacio, Domingos, Martinho and a woman from Suai (Covalima). Ambulan and his four friends were released.[303]

292. The Commission also heard of several incidents of torture in Liquidoe (Aileu). Guilherme Brito was arrested in Fatukaimauk in Faturilau (Liquidoe, Aileu) in 1977. He was tied-up and forced by T196 to stay in the river at a depth of one and a half metres for three days and three nights.[304] Daniel de Andrade told the Commission that his father (also Daniel de Andrade) was arrested in 1977 by Falintil commanders T197 and T187 in Liquidoe. They hit him with a block of wood and then tied him to a cross for one week. Then he was taken down and put in a hole in the ground for another week, before they took him out and beat him to death with a piece of wood.[305]

Manufahi

293. In Manufahi, the Commission heard of at least one Renal in Dotik (Alas, Manufahi), which had similar conditions to the nearby prison of Uitame in Viqueque, described above.[306] Tomé da Costa Magalhães told the Commission about prisons in Rameliak and in Lakeruhun, both in Caicasa Village (Fatuberliu, Manufahi).

The detention of Tomé da Costa Magalhães

On 9 February 1976, when ABRI started to attack the Fahinehan area (Manufahi), a Fretilin commander named Matias ordered all people including Tomé Magalhães to run away to the forest. In the forest Tomé hid in his gardens in Ailora, Fahinehan. It turned out that Francisco Xavier do Amaral and Father Mariano were also hiding there. They grouped together but then Xavier do Amaral moved to another location and Father Mariano stayed with Tomé in Ailora.

On 9 September 1976, on orders from Political Commissar T199, Commander T200 with four of his men, carrying two G-3 rifles and two Mausers, came to Ailora to arrest Tomé and Father Mariano. Tomé and Father Mariano were allowed to go home first to collect their things and then went on horseback to Rameliak (Fatuberliu, Manufahi).

When they arrived in Rameliak, Fretilin members came up to Father Mariano and pulled him so that he fell from his horse. Tomé and Father Mariano were interrogated and then put in separate cells with only a bamboo wall between them. Tomé described the cell as very narrow and not allowing a person to move freely. They were guarded closely day and night, and if they needed to go to the toilet they were escorted by two armed Falintil members. In the morning, T199 called Father Mariano for interrogation and when he arrived T199 ordered two of his men to take off the priest's clothes. Then T199 whipped Father Mariano until he was unconscious and then put him back in his cell. Father Mariano was repeatedly interrogated about his connection to Xavier do Amaral and tortured during interrogation.

Tomé said that they received no food from Fretilin while in detention. His family brought food to the prison. The food was always inspected by Fretilin and sometimes it was confiscated. Tomé says that he was never interrogated and tortured, but that T199 and his men took turns beating the priest for three days. T199 then tried to force Tomé to fight Father Mariano, but the priest's body was so bruised and swollen and his legs so stiff that he could not stand up. Tomé and Father Mariano were imprisoned for three months in the Remeliak prison and were then moved to Caicasa prison in Fatuberliu.

In Caicasa they were put in a house on stilts that had dozens of sharpened bamboo poles underneath. They were held there in terrible conditions for one month. Their legs were put in a wooden hole and tied tightly so that they could not escape, and their hands were tied behind their backs. When it was time to eat, the guard had to lift their heads and put food in their mouths. They were fed only once a day with a piece of cassava and water. There was no way the prisoners could go to the toilet, so they had to relieve themselves where they lay and the room reeked of excrement and urine. It was very cold in that area, but they were given no blanket to sleep under.

Tomé says that on 19 September 1977, ABRI entered Fahinehan. The Fretilin guards took him and Father Mariano from the bamboo house and forced all of the prisoners to walk, tied together, from Caicasa to Lakeruhun (Fatuberliu, Manufahi). There they were put with detainees from Fatuberliu under Commander T206. Many detainees were tortured and ill-treated, including having their bodies jabbed by bayonets or being burned with lit cigarettes. Then the prisoners were moved again to Rameliak except for the priest who was taken to Liquidoe.

Later Tomé asked T199 why he had been detained for so long without any explanation of what he had done wrong. T199 answered: "Because you worked with Francisco Xavier do Amaral and Father Mariano. That was why I punished you. But believe me, soon you will be free." Then Tomé was put in the Rameliak Renal to work in the gardens and plant vegetables. On 8 August 1978, after nearly two years in detention, Tomé was released and he returned to his family.[307]

294. Valentino da Costa Noronha also told the Commission about torture and execution of members of his family:

> Because there was no food, my family, numbering 51 people, and I decided to go to Aileu to get cassava and sweet potatoes from someone's garden. On the way back to Laututo, Tutuluro [Same, Manufahi] we were hungry and decided to roast the sweet potatoes and cassava to eat them. Suddenly we were surrounded by a group of Falintil people who arrested us. All of my family had their hands tied and we were bound to one another by a rope around our waists. We were told to walk from Laututo to Ailora [Fahinehan, Fatuberliu, Manufahi]. On the way the Falintil soldiers tortured my family by beating us with their hands, with thorny lime branches, with bamboo and wooden branches on our stomachs and backs, and by burning us with lit cigarettes. When we arrived in Ailora everyone in my family was tied and hung from house poles. In the evening Falintil executed 45 members of my family. Seven of us were saved because one of my uncles was a political assistant.[308]

Liquiçá

295. The main Renal in the district of Liquiçá, according to the Commission's research, was Saugata in the sub-district of Maubara. There were at least 120 people held here during the time it was in operation. Celestino Alves, who had been arrested on 15 October 1976 with José da Silva and 60 of José da Silva's supporters in Leorema (Bazartete, Liquiçá), was eventually taken to the Saugata Renal (see box on the Conflict between Helio Pina and José da Silva, October 1976, par. 243-246, above).

296. Alexandrino de Jesus told the Commission that he was detained with 48 other Fretilin activists in the Saugata Renal from October 1977 to early January 1978. Alexandrino de Jesus had been accused of planning to surrender to the Indonesian military and of being in contact with Commander Martinho Soares. Fretilin detained the group for three months. The detainees were required to perform work such as pulling out grass by hand over an area of about 1.5 hectares so that it could be planted with corn. They were not given any food so Alexandrino and his friends had to find food for themselves.[309]

297. The Commission also received statements indicating that there was a Renal in Maukuruslema, in Berdois in Maubara, and a detention and torture centre in Sedoze

Camp in Kailima, in the village of Laculai (Liquiçá). For example, Agapito dos Santos was arrested by Falintil along with four others in Berdois (Maubara, Liquiçá) in 1977. They were tied with bamboo ropes, hit with a piece of wood, kicked with military boots and detained for seven and a half months in the Maukuruslema Renal (Maubara) before Falintil Commander José Soares released them.[310]

298. Some people were not detained in a building or other space but were tortured where they were arrested. Jorgé Pereira Pinto told the Commission that he was accused of treason in March 1976 in Pukemanaru (Manati Village, Liquiçá) for allegedly taking civilians to surrender to ABRI. He was arrested by two Fretilin members called T209 and T210. They hit and kicked him until he fell down and then beat him with a Mauser rifle, leaving his face bloody and his body bruised and swollen. After the beating he was tied to a tree for one day before being released.[311]

Violence in the Fretilin zones

Torture and other forms of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment were perpetrated in many of the Fretilin-controlled zones, not just in the Renals and prisons discussed above. Violence was used routinely as a way of punishing any real or suspected misdemeanour and asserting one person's power over another. Some examples include:

Valenti de Sousa Guterres told the Commission how on 3 January 1976, in Baguia (Baucau), he was beaten by Fretilin members with a belt, injuring his right eye. Then he was kicked until he fell unconscious.[312] Fretilin Commanders T211 and member T212 interrogated him and were about to kill him when Aurelia, the mother of commander Mau Hudu, intervened. He was released soon after.[313]

Geraldo Pereira told the Commission that in Molop (Bobonaro) in 1976, he and two others were arrested and abused, and beaten with weapons and hands by Falintil. Another victim was hit on the head with a machete three times causing heavy bleeding from his head, so that he finally lost consciousness. Another victim had his ears cut off. They were detained for three weeks and then released by Commander Agustino Espirito Santo.[314]

António Soares told the Commission that he was arrested in Modok Zone in Iliheu (Laclo, Manatuto) in March 1977 by Fretilin members T213, T214 and T215. They took António Soares to Modok Zone where he found five other Fretilin members detained (António Demetrio, João Carceres, Caetano Gusmão, João Harek and António Amado) whose bodies were swollen because they had been burned with hot iron rods.[315]

Arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment by the Indonesian occupation authorities, 1975–1979

Introduction

299. The years 1975 to 1979 recorded the highest numbers of East Timorese people arbitrarily detained, tortured or who suffered cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of any years during the Commission's mandate period. These violations occurred in the context of chaos and violence as the Indonesian military invaded and then gradually occupied the territory and the civilian population fled to the mountains only later to be captured or to surrender. From early on arbitrary detention was a military strategy for gaining control of the population and obtaining information about the strength and the leadership of Fretilin/Falintil. Intelligence was often used to target particular individuals. Local divisions were exploited to identify and detain possible Resistance members or supporters.

300. This section examines the nature and extent of arbitrary detention, ill-treatment and torture under the following headings:

- Statistical profile of violations
- Invasion of Dili
- Takeover of other areas
- Securing the territory, 1976 to 1979
- Surrenders, both early in the period and in the mass surrenders and captures in 1978 to 1979.

Profile of violations: 1975 to 1979

301. The Commission recorded 6,494 detentions, tortures and ill-treatments in this period at the hands of the Indonesian military and its auxiliaries, 43.45% (6,494/14,491) of the total for the years 1975-79.* Females comprised 11.32% of all victims from this period, a relatively high figure given that women rarely played an active role in the hostilities.

302. As the graphs below demonstrate, there was a major peak for detentions, torture, and ill-treatment at the beginning of the period in 1975 to 1976 and a higher peak at the end of the period in 1979. Between these peaks the figures remain consistently high relative to other periods of the Indonesian occupation.

* Note that in 11.19% (1,622/14,491) of cases the perpetrator was unknown.

Number of reported acts of torture, 1974–1979

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

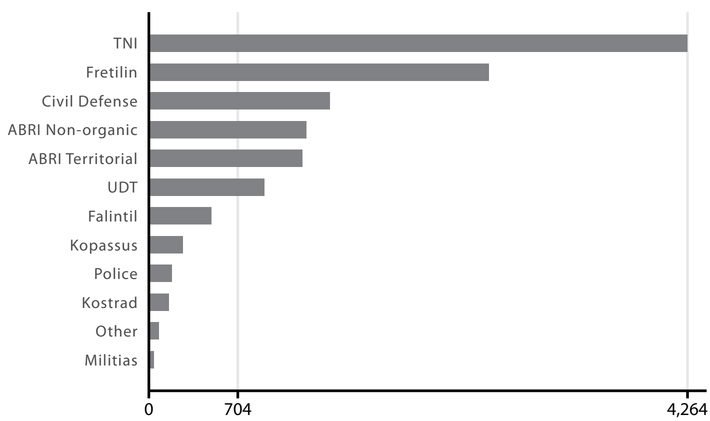
Number of reported acts of detention, 1974–1979

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Number of reported acts of ill-treatment, 1974–1979

RELEVANT GRAPH NOT AVAILABLE [ed.]

303. The peaks in 1975 to 1976 and 1979 coincide with major military operations: the first being the invasion of the territory (the beginning of Operation Seroja) which was most intensive in late 1975 and early 1976. This was followed by the bombings and marine attacks in the eastern region in late 1978 and mopping up operations in the central region in 1979, which led to the mass surrenders and detentions of civilians in these years.



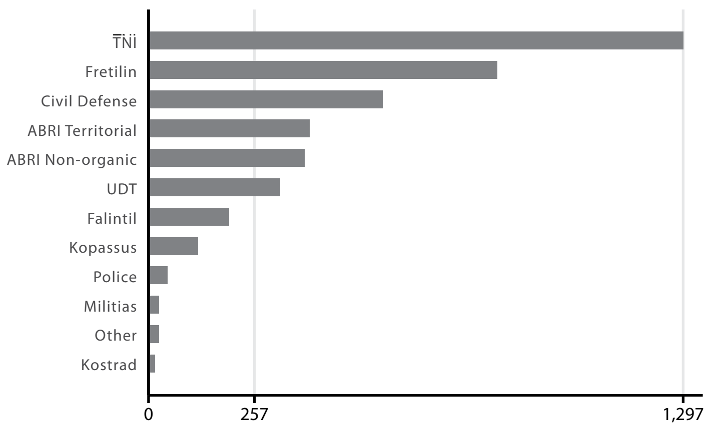
304. Even in the intervening period between these major operations, a high number of people were detained relative to other years in the occupation (see graph in the Introduction to this Part par. 23). These detentions occurred as the Indonesian military continued to fight Fretilin/Falintil to gain control of the territory, and to force out members of the Resistance in areas where the military had established control, and then destroy them.

305. The patterns of detention, torture and ill-treatment violations, like other fatal and non-fatal violations during this first phase of the conflict, varied from region to region. While the initial violence around the time of the Indonesian invasion in 1975 was most intense in the western and central regions, after 1976 the focus of non-fatal violations shifted to the eastern region. It was in 1976 that the Resistance began to be concentrated in the eastern regions of Timor-Leste and therefore these areas were targeted by Indonesian security forces.

Perpetrators

306. The Commission's analysis of perpetrators attributed with responsibility for detentions in this period is indicated in the following graph:

Count of detention by perpetrator, 1974–1979



Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR
Note: Some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators.

307. The graph indicates that the Indonesian military forces perpetrated a large majority of the detentions. Although the civil war in 1975 took a heavy toll on East Timorese society, more people suffered non-fatal violations at the hands of the Indonesian military than either of the political parties in 1975. The Indonesian military was named in 49.17% (4,393/8,934) of all documented detentions in the invasion period, 42.55% (1,328/3,079) of torture cases and 31.19% (773/2,478) of ill-treatments. In most cases, the victim identified only ABRI/TNI and did not specify the unit or section of the military responsible. In this early stage of the occupation, the various elements of the military, including battalion names and numbers, were not yet known by the majority of East Timorese people. Many of these early detentions occurred in a climate of upheaval and chaos as the military attacked villages or groups of civilians, unlike later periods where battalions were resident in a particular area and were identifiable by the community.

308. Nevertheless, it is clear that territorial units including organic and non-organic units were involved in the detention of suspects.* Special Forces (Kopassandha/ Kopassus) also detained people. Aside from the military itself, East Timorese working for civil defence organisations established by the Indonesian military were involved in a significant number of detentions in this period; qualitative evidence suggests that many of these violations were conducted in conjunction with the military. These patterns are virtually identical with reported incidents of torture in this same period.

Count of torture by perpetrator, 1974–1979

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

* Territorial units are non-combat units responsible for a particular geographical area and fall within the territorial structure from sub-district to national levels of command. Organic territorial units primarily comprise locally recruited soldiers whereas non-organic units comprise territorial battalions from Indonesian provinces. Combat units are not geographically defined and fall outside the territorial command structure. For more information, see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation.

Detentions during the invasion

309. The Indonesian military began its incursion into towns close to the border with West Timor in September 1975 and then launched its invasion of Dili on 7 December 1975. The invasion of Dili marked the beginning of Operation Seroja (Lotus), (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict). After taking control of the capital, and Baucau two days later, forces moved to capture strategic areas.

310. Each time the military moved into a new area the general patterns of detention were the same. Military forces detained civilians and combatants, who had either been captured or who had surrendered. In some places mass detentions occurred as the military sought to gain control of the local population and to identify Fretilin/Falintil members or supporters connected to the Resistance. In other places it arrested family groups or individuals who had not managed to flee in time or who were caught returning to find food. Detention served several purposes:

- It separated members of the Resistance from the general population
- It was a way of obtaining strategic information about the Resistance
- It served as punishment for membership in, or support of, the Resistance.

August–November, 1975

311. Between August and November 1975, Indonesian Special Forces units together with East Timorese Partisans conducted incursions into the western region beginning in Atsabe (Ermera), Bobonaro (Bobonaro) and Suai (Covalima) on 14 September, Batugade (Bobonaro) on 8 October, Balibó (Bobonaro) on 15 October and Atabae (Bobonaro) on 20 November. Fretilin combatants were captured and detained in battles with the Indonesian forces. Alberto Tavares recalled:

> In 1975, a Commander of Segunda Linha, T216, forced us to carry out an attack in Balibó against Indonesian soldiers. Other friends and I were involved in a shoot-out with Indonesian forces in Balibó from morning until evening. Because we were not as strong as ABRI, we retreated to our base in Damalaran [Balibó]. When we reached there, Indonesian forces attacked us with tanks and my younger brother Talo Bere was killed. After his death, Commander T216 surrendered to ABRI and then he and the Indonesian forces came and arrested us in Atabae. Then we were arrested and detained in Rairobo [Atabae]. We weren't given any food or medicine and so we only ate leaves. My son Januario Tavares died there from hunger.[316]

312. Cases of detention of civilians from this period are sparse, suggesting that it was not a part of the incursion strategy. In one case from the sub-district of Atsabe, Marciana da Graça described how four civilians, Mau Butar, Berleki, Beremau and Mausiso, were captured by Battalion 403 in Coileki in Babo Leten Village (Atsabe) and taken to the town of Atsabe. The soldiers, along with a Partisan commander, T217, then took the victims to Malabe Village (Atsabe) and killed them.[317]

313. Similarly, in another case from Atabae (Bobonaro), Guilhermina Gusmão told the Commission:

> In 1975 [I forget the month], Indonesia came and attacked the village of Kolibau [Atabae] with tanks and shot at us indiscriminately. I don't know which unit because I was just a little person. Because we were afraid we would die I ran with my mother and father…Then planes started attacking us from Aidabaleten [Atabae], so we hid in a cave then we ran to Lou-Mate [Atabae], and then hid near the Aidabalete River. When we were there, they came to our hiding place and arrested my older brother Mateus Maubere. The people who arrested my brother were a mixture of ABRI soldiers and Partisans, East Timorese people. They took him to Aipusrah [Atabae], where they tied him to an orange tree and shot him. We watched from afar.[318]

Dili

The invasion

314. On the day of the invasion of Dili the military captured and detained both combatants and civilians who had not fled the city. Some were taken to the pier at Dili harbour and executed (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Some members of the Resistance surrendered to the invading forces after realising that they could no longer hold out. Marcelo da Costa Pereira, the Fretilin operations commander for Sector A, told the Commission that he and four others, Luis, Sebastião, Celestino and Simão, surrendered after their ammunition ran out. The group was arrested then taken to the harbour and other detention centres where they were tortured by their captors:

> We were taken to the command headquarters and after that to the harbour in an ABRI tank. Once we arrived we were stripped of our clothes down to our underwear for 15 days. Then we were taken to the Tropical [detention centre] and [later to] the Balide Prison [the Comarca]. When we arrived at the prison, we were interrogated, beaten across the head with iron, burned with cigarettes, electrocuted and our feet were pinned under the legs of chairs.[319]

315. Some Fretilin/Falintil fighters were captured after fleeing from the fighting. Luis Sarmento and 30 others, whom Rogério Lobato had armed to defend the Palapaço area in Motael (Dili), realised that they were too few to fight off the Indonesian military and so ran to hide at the airport. A week later, Kopassandha troops arrested them after an informer, T218, had told the military where they were hiding. The treatment of Luis Sarmento and colleagues was similar to that suffered by Marcelo da Costa Pereira:

Our hands were tied behind our backs and [we were tied] to each other. Then we were taken to the harbour. On our arrival we were slammed to the ground and then we were run over by two motorcycles, twice. Then they moved us to the Tropical [detention centre] where we were beaten, hot water was poured over us, we were burnt with cigarettes and they gave us rotten boiled corn for food. I was detained in the Tropical for one year. In 1977, I was moved to the Balide Prison.[320]

316. Although most of Dili's residents had fled the city when the invasion began, those who remained were vulnerable to being arbitrarily detained by the military. Marcus Valadares of Beto, an area of Dili behind the Comoro Airport, told the Commission how his family was detained in their home:

When the Indonesian military arrived by plane, I saw many people fall from the planes. Around dawn…at the Comoro airport my family and I did not have the chance to run before we were surrounded by the military. At 6.00am we were arrested. I don't know by which unit. For three months we were prevented from leaving the house except to go to the toilet. If we left the house we would be shot.[321]

317. Those who fled to the mountains were chased by the military, and many were captured around Dare, in the hills above Dili. Some of those captured were detained and suffered ill-treatment and torture. Elda Guterres described the capture of her son, a former soldier with the Portuguese military in Timor-Leste:

On 7 December 1975, many people fled to the mountains and the bush because of the ABRI invasion. My son Armindo hid in Dare. ABRI attacked from many directions at once and many people were captured… including my son Armindo. They were taken to Dili and put in a cell in the Balide Prison. While in prison, Armindo was beaten, electrocuted and tortured in many other ways. After that a [Partisan] soldier called Marcelino Ximenes, my nephew, asked ABRI that Armindo be sent to hospital. [ABRI] agreed and he was sent to the Wira Husada hospital [Dili], but he died on 24 July 1976.[322]

The days following the invasion

318. The Commission's research suggests that after the effective occupation of Dili the Indonesian military began identifying members of Fretilin and then detaining, interrogating and/or punishing them. In this process ABRI detained civilians or restricted their freedom of movement. Civilians were told to gather in several locations, the most important of which included the Intendência building (formerly the Dili Kodim and at the time of writing this building was the Uma Fukun cultural centre) and the Sota (Sociedade Orientale do Transportes e Armazens, a Portuguese trading company) building.

319. On 7 December, the Indonesian military ordered hundreds of civilians to sleep on the ground at the Intendência building, located to the east of the Governor's Office building (called the Paláçio do Governo at the time of writing). On the morning of 8 December, these civilians were ordered to walk along the waterfront to the harbour area where they were told to wait in front of the Hotel Timor. That afternoon these and other civilians were taken to the Pantai Kelapa/Kampung Alor area. Late that afternoon 127 ethnic Chinese were allowed to return to their homes, but a large number of East Timorese civilians were told to stay in the area.[323]

320. On 8 December, the Indonesian military began the process of registering the population of Dili and issuing registration cards. They called on the people to report to a building formerly owned by the Portuguese wholesale and retail company Sota in the suburb of Bidau Lecidere (at the time of writing the Dili Trade Centre). At the Sota building, every person was required to fill out a form registering personal details, including his or her political affiliation, in order to receive a card. People who identified themselves as Fretilin were immediately arrested. António Caleres Junior explained the process:

> On 12 December, we all had to go to Sota to get a safety [registration] card. Through the microphone [on top of a car which drove around Dili], [they] said that everyone must go or face the consequences. Everyone went to get the card and then carried it home because the card was checked on the way. We had to fill out a form before we could get the card, and in that form there were things we had to reveal, such as which party we were from. There were also a number of checks. If they weren't convinced they would arrest us [and take us] somewhere, but we didn't know where.[324]

321. Francisco Calçona was arrested at the Sota building because of his Fretilin membership. He was detained first in the Sota and then moved to the Tropical detention centre on 19 December. From the Tropical he was taken to the Sang Tai Hoo building (a shop in Colmera, Dili) for interrogation. During the interrogation, he was forced to squat with a wooden stick squashed behind his knees and lit cigarettes were pushed into his nostrils. His interrogators told him to hold his ears out and they wrote on his forehead with paint "hau Fretilin" (I am Fretilin). He was also ordered to put on a helmet and they hit him over the head with an iron bar.[325]

322. António Caleres, to save himself, wrote down that he belonged to the Apodeti party:

> We saw that Apodeti people stood out and that they were organising things with the military. They were also arresting people. But there were also good Apodeti people, who told us what the situation was and that we should all write down Apodeti on the form. So we all did. It was not so bad to write down KOTA or Trabalhista, but if you wrote Fretilin they would surely arrest you and take you somewhere. I wrote down Apodeti so I could get a card. The screening process at the Sota building was overseen by Apodeti party leaders * who had reported to the Sota the previous day.[326]

323. Filomeno Gomes described how he and other Apodeti leaders, including party leader Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, escaped from Fretilin detention on the day of the invasion and went to the Sota building. The next day, 8 December 1975, "[Colonel] Kalbuadi and [Major General] LB Moerdani came to the Sota building and met with us". Several of the group were then appointed to oversee the screening of the population, as they were considered more able to identify likely Fretilin supporters than the Indonesian soldiers.

324. A clear pattern in victim's testimony to the Commission was the role that members of the Apodeti and UDT parties played in providing the military with background information on other East Timorese people in this early period of the occupation.

325. Sometimes this could work in an individual's favour. Maria Olandina Isabel Caiero Alves told the Commission:

> I was arrested by the red beret troops on 13 December 1975 and taken to Sota, which was used by people from the Apodeti party. There I met with [soon to be] Governor Arnaldo and Sergeant Vicente Tilman [and] the two of them said to ABRI: "She is not a bad person, she is not a communist. Watch her, interrogate her, but don't hurt her."[327]

326. In many other cases, members of Apodeti or UDT pointed out members of Fretilin to the Indonesian military, accompanied soldiers during the arrest of Fretilin members, or even arrested people themselves.[328]

327. For example, Lino Soares told the Commission about how on 10 December 1975 four members of Special Forces (Kopassandha) with T219 (an Apodeti member and the village head of Bidau Santana) arrested his father, Jeferino Soares, and his friend, Francisco da Silva, in Bidau Santana (East Dili, Dili). They had heard that Jeferino was hiding a Timor-Leste flag. When they had tied the hands of the two victims, the military beat them and then took them to the command post where Jeferino was beaten more heavily. They were held overnight and released the next day.[329]

328. Francisco Soares Henrique, a member of Fretilin who had resisted the invading forces on the day of the invasion, was also arrested at his home in Bidau Santana on 10 December 1975. Again, T219 came to the victim's home with members of the military. They interrogated Francisco, his younger brother and their father about weapons found in the house. They were then accused of being communists and were arrested and taken first to a shop in Colmera and then to the military command in Dili until 17 December when they were moved to the Comarca.[330]

* Labut Melo, another senior member of Apodeti, said that he reported to Hotel Timor on 8 December rather than the Sota building, where he received the weapons of Fretilin fighters who had surrendered.

329. Acaçio Tau Pelo was a member of Fretilin also living in the suburb of Bidau Santana at the time of the invasion. He told the Commission:

> On 12 January 1976, three members of Apodeti, T220, T221 and T222, arrested me in my house and took me to the Dili District Military Command [Kodim]. At the Kodim I was interrogated from 9.00am to 12.00pm. The person who interrogated me was T223. I was arrested because I was a member of Fretilin. After the interrogation I was moved from the Kodim to the Tropical, where I was interrogated again by intelligence and I was tortured by being beaten with a belt. On 15 April 1976, I was released and I went to find my family, and then I joined the Fretilin Central North Zone Committee under Alarico Fernandes.[331]

Detention centres in Dili

Within a few days of the Indonesian invasion of Dili, forces had commandeered the buildings at the Dili Port[332] and the Sota building. They also took over the former Portuguese prison in Balide (Dili) known as the Comarca,[*] the private buildings Sang Tai Hoo[†] and the Tropical,[‡] and a number of private houses in the suburb of Farol (Motael, Dili). Ill-treatment and torture were widely reported by former detainees in all of these places, but statements suggest that different locations had different purposes. Two of the main detention locations in the early years of the occupation were the Comarca in Balide and Sang Tai Hoo building in Colmera. The Comarca was used until the end of the occupation in 1999.

The Comarca

One of the most notorious detention centres for political detainees during the Indonesian occupation was the Comarca, the Balide prison. The Comarca was built as the official prison by the Portuguese colonial administration in 1963,[§] and was used during the internal

* Also referred to by deponents as the Balide Prison because it is in the suburb of Balide, Dili.

† Sang Tai Hoo was reportedly used from the day of the invasion until 1980, although it was possibly still used in 1981.

‡ Tropical detention centre [See HRVD Statements: 5092; 4881; 5730; 7011; 5725; 3742; 3734; 3607; 5683]. Statements provided to CAVR indicated that the Tropical was used only in 1975-76; it was reoccupied by the Aitarak militia in 1999 and used to detain pro-independence supporters.

§ Plano de Fomento, an official document of the Portuguese administration, 1963. It refers to the construction phase of the Dili Comarca, a public service installation.

armed conflict by Fretilin to hold UDT and Apodeti prisoners.* By January 1976, the Indonesian military was using the prison as a long-term detention centre and the official prison in Timor-Leste. It held both ordinary criminals and political detainees,† many of whom, in the 1970s, were held for several years without charge or trial.‡

The Comarca consisted of six cell-blocks and eight individual steel-door cells, known to prisoners as the "dark cells".§ The dark cells were just 2.02 metres long x 2.72 metres wide x 3.1 metres high and had very little ventilation. Prisoners were held in their underwear without light or fresh air, often crowded with other prisoners until there was only standing room. Another cell, also known as the "Maubutar cell", was used to hold prisoners in solitary confinement. Saturnino Belo, a detainee in the 1990s, describes his experience in the dark cell:

That cell was not like usual cells…When you were in that cell you got very stressed because you couldn't wear clothes, you didn't wear trousers. You just wore underwear. But you sweated constantly. Even though we slept only on the ground we still sweated…It also stank. The toilet was broken, and in that cell, when you first entered, you would get a headache and fever [paludismo]....

I slept at night but when the night was over you didn't even know. You only knew it was morning because the rooster crowed and because they brought rice. In the morning they brought rice, at noon they brought rice and in the afternoon they brought rice…But when they shut the door you couldn't tell whether it was night or day. It was always dark. At night you prayed. When you felt sleepy you slept. But you couldn't follow the light.[333]

* International Committee of the Red Cross, East Timor Relief Operation, 16 September 1975. E-mail from Noel Barrow, archivist of Australian Red Cross, National Office, Melbourne to CAVR, 8 October 2004. Due to the confidential nature of ICRC records regarding the organisation's visits to prisons, no specific details are available.

† Interview with Justino Mota, Lisbon, 3 and 4 July 1984. One of the first prisoners held in the prison who reported to the Commission was Venancio Gomes. He was arrested immediately after the invasion, and held first at the Tropical detention centre, before being moved to the Comarca in 1976. He was detained there until 1979. [Amnesty International, Statement of Amnesty International's Concerns in East Timor, ASA 21/09/83, London, p. 7]

‡ Amnesty International, Statement of Amnesty International's Concerns in East Timor, ASA 21/09/83, London, p. 61. By the mid-1980s most prisoners were charged and tried at some point, even if they were held for an initial period of detention without charge [see Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials].

§ "Sel gelap", "cela escura" or "sel nakunun", which all mean dark cell in Indonesian, Portuguese and Tetum respectively.

In the early years of the occupation, until the mid-1980s, conditions of detention were extremely poor.* The prison was chronically overcrowded due to the numbers of people arrested in military operations in these years.† This in turn led to chronic food shortages and poor sanitation. When the ICRC began weighing prisoners around 1983-84, it recorded prisoner body-weights as low as 30kg.[334] Manuel Fernando Oliveira Neves, sent with 16 others to the Comarca on 12 June 1980, after the Marabia attack, described the conditions:

The 17 of us were put in one cramped cell, which stank and the toilet stank and human filth overflowed. We slept in human filth that had already dried, and also our own filth as we had no mats to lie on.[335]

Torture and ill-treatment during detention in the Comarca was repeatedly reported by victims in their statements to the Commission, particularly during the early years of the occupation. Interrogation was also conducted at the Comarca, but more often detainees were taken to special interrogation (and torture) centres such as Sang Tai Hoo. Disappearances of prisoners held in the Comarca also occurred frequently, mainly at night.

Sang Tai Hoo

Sang Tai Hoo was a Chinese shop during the Portuguese era in Colmera, the central business district of Dili. The building had two storeys; the ground floor comprised two rooms and a garage, and the first floor had only two very small rooms with very poor ventilation. The downstairs rooms each held about 20 prisoners[336] and when these rooms were full, detainees were held upstairs, three prisoners to a room. According to Antonio Caleres Junior, at times up to 200 people were held at Sang Tai Hoo.[337] Conditions were very unhygienic and one had to go to the toilet inside the room.[338] The detainees cleaned the toilet themselves. Maria Fatima Maia, detained at Sang Tai Hoo recalled:

* In 1983, the International Committee of the Red Cross began visiting detainees in the Comarca and advocating for improved prison conditions. Another official prison was also built in Becora (Dili) around 1986, followed by the construction of prisons in Baucau (Baucau), Gleno (Ermera) and Maliana (Bobonaro) in the late 1980s and early 1990s The Commission has been unable to determine the precise years these prisons were completed due to the destruction of Indonesian government records in 1999.

† The official capacity of the prison was 200 prisoners. [Statement of an Indonesian civil servant to the UN Commission on Human Rights, Sub-commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, cited in Amnesty International, Statement of Amnesty International's Concerns in East Timor, ASA 21/09/83, London p. 62.] In mid-1977 the estimated number of detainees in the Comarca was 500 [Interview, Justino Mota, Lisbon, 3–4 July 1984] and, according to Amnesty, this number rose to 700 by 1979. [Amnesty International, p. 61] The prison governor between 1980 and 1986 speaks of "upwards of 500 prisoners being crammed into the gaol in the aftermath of military campaigns" [Peter Carey, interview with Ian Dion, West Java, 3 January 2004].

They moved me to another cell in very bad condition – the water was clogged with lots of phlegm and human faeces…I couldn't see the sun, I could only see through the ventilation, but they also covered the ventilation.[339]

Sang Tai Hoo was, however, primarily an interrogation and torture centre rather than a place for holding detainees. Prisoners from other detention centres such as the Comarca were brought to Sang Tai Hoo for interrogation. For example, Moises Mesquita de Almeida, a member of Falintil, and his older brother Manuel Soares were arrested in November 1976 and held in the Comarca but they were taken to Sang Tai Hoo for interrogation. Moises told the Commission that on 12 November 1976, during three days of interrogation by an Indonesian colonel, T224, he was subjected to torture and ill-treatment including "being beaten, having my toes pinned under a chair that two ABRI members were sitting on, being kicked in the face which made my teeth almost fall out, having my ears hit until they bled and I became deaf, and other forms of torture."[340]

Francisco Soares Henrique told the Commission:

After one month in the Tropical we were moved to Balide prison. From there, every Monday, we were taken to Sang Tai Hoo for interrogation. In Sang Tai Hoo we were treated very cruelly. We were forced to drink ABRI soldiers' urine and beaten until we bled. Then we were forced to dance with the female prisoners (Maria Goreti, Maria Soares, Maria Pereira, Elda Saldanha and Merita Alves), who were only wearing bras and underpants. I was detained for three years and was released in 1978.[341]

Torture practices at the Sang Tai Hoo were particularly cruel and humiliating. Most interrogations were held in the corner of a corridor so there was no opportunity to run away. On the same floor was an administration office also used sometimes for interrogation.[342] The guards would intentionally not lock cell doors to make it easier to take away prisoners. Maria Fatima Maia (1981) told the Commission:

I was always suddenly called for interrogation at nights, from 7.00pm until midnight. After I was interrogated I was taken to another cell which had a toilet in it. In the morning they took me out and put me in a storage room that only had one hole in the door. Every morning they would give food through that hole in the door.[343]

The Sang Tai Hoo is not reported in statements after 1981, indicating possibly that the centre was no longer used for interrogation and/or torture after this time.

Early patterns of detention

330. Even in this early period, clear patterns of detention practice began to emerge. Two patterns, discussed in the box above, were the use of both official and non-official detention locations, and using different locations for broadly different purposes, such as the Comarca for long-term detention and Sang Tai Hoo or the Tropical for interrogation and torture. Military commands and bases also were used frequently to hold detainees, sometimes for up to several years. This pattern continued throughout the occupation.

331. Another pattern to emerge, and which was also seen in later periods, was the frequent movement of detainees between different detention locations. Sometimes detainees were moved around to several places in one night. This pattern, beginning early in the occupation period, was repeated in statements received by the Commission up to end of the mandate period.

332. One explanation for this treatment of detainees may be because different locations were used for different purposes.[344] Also, different interrogators sought different information or the same information in different ways. One former detainee explains that if one interrogator did not get the desired information, the detainee would be sent to an interrogator who used even harsher techniques.* A common pattern was taking detainees first to informal detention centres such as the Tropical[345] and Sang Tai Hoo, which were used primarily for interrogation and torture, before sending them to the Comarca.† Another likely explanation is that continual movement of a detainee, especially during the night, was a way of intimidating and disorientating the victim and of instilling fear.

333. Francisco Soares Henrique's experience is an example of this pattern. He told the Commission that after his arrest by ABRI on 10 December 1975 he was taken first to a former shop premises, the Toko Lay, until 12 December. He was then taken to the Dili military headquarters until 17 December and subsequently he was moved to the Tropical, where he spent around one month. Only then was he moved to the Comarca, where he was held for three years (see box: Detention centres in Dili par. 329, above).[346]

334. Maria Olandina Isabel Caiero Alves was a broadcaster for Radio Maubere and the wife of a member of Falintil at the time of the invasion. She told the Commission that on 13 December 1975, soldiers arrested her at the home of Bishop Dom José Joaquim Ribeiro and took her to the Sota building. That same night she was taken to

* Chiquito Guterres was detained in 1996 and moved between several detention locations. He explained: "The reasons they moved me…first was because they didn't get clear enough proof to take me to Court to be tried, second they thought that SGI Colmera, because they were harsher, could torture me in a way to get the concrete evidence, third so they could torture me more heavily so that I would say the names of other clandestine members and fighters in the forest." These reasons–to obtain more concrete proof of involvement and also to obtain the names of others involved in the Resistance–applied equally in the 1970s. [CAVR, Interview with Chiquito da Costa Guterres, Dili, 14 June 2004].

† See for example HRVD Statements 0175; 0113; 3752; 4881; 3780; 5050. The Indonesian military used detainees to renovate the Comarca building in early 1976.

several places in Farol where she was held with others where she was interrogated and tortured:[347]

